The Major informed me that an invitation was upon one occasion extended to himself and his room-mate, a brother officer named Tom —, to join a party of officers who were to dine with Colonel —. They gladly accepted the invitation and went to the dinner, during which the wine circulated freely, and every one seemed to enjoy the sumptuous fare which the Colonel's long purse enabled him to spread before his guests. At a late hour in the evening, when all were competent to give direct evidence as to the superior quality of the wine that had been so bountifully supplied by their hospitable host, and at a time when some of the guests appeared about taking their departure, a bottle of Champagne was placed at each plate, and an intimation given by the Colonel that he expected every one to finish his bottle before leaving the table. The Major said he regarded this as a peremptory order, drank off his wine at once, and retired with the intention of reaching his quarters and going to bed before he became seriously affected by it.

On his way, however, he was passing the door of a gambling saloon, and, having a dollar in his pocket, he determined to try his fortune with it. Accordingly he entered the establishment and placed his money upon a card which won for him several times, and he in a short time accumulated quite a "pile of chips." At length, however, the room began to revolve as upon an axis, the cards and money multiplied into many times their original numbers, and every thing in the establishment appeared to wax dim and misty; and finally he lost all recollection of events until late on the following morning he was awakened by his mess-mate, Tom —, when, to his astonishment, he found himself in his own room and suffering from a most excruciating headache.

His friend informed him that their larder was completely exhausted, and if they expected any dinner it would be necessary to replenish it, but that he himself had no money. The Major said it was probable that his finances were in the same condition, as he had paid a visit to the faro-bank and was rather oblivious in regard to the result; but if there was any thing, he presumed it would be found in his pockets; whereupon his clothes were examined, and, to their utter amazement and delight, every pocket of coat, vest, and trowsers was filled with doubloons and bank-notes, amounting in the aggregate to something like ten thousand dollars. The Major then said to his mess-mate:

"Now, Tom, my boy, as we have been roughing it for some time on commissary tack, I propose that you go to market and lay in a good stock of luxuries, and from this time out we will live like gentlemen."

Accordingly his friend took money and went in quest of the supplies.

Now Tom, be it known, was himself very fond of his grog, and would at any time sooner have dispensed with his dinner than his liquor. After he had been absent for some time the Major heard a great noise like the rolling of barrels across the hall, and on going to the door found his friend engaged in unloading barrels from a huge wagon. He was in most exuberant spirits, and, rubbing his hands together, informed the Major, with a most gratified expression of countenance, that he had secured a splendid lot of supplies, sufficient to serve them for a good while. In reply to the Major's inquiry as to the character of the articles purchased, he said there were thirteen barrels of whisky, two hams, and a loaf of bread. He added that he would have purchased some coffee and sugar, but he thought they did not care much about such flummery so long as they had a good stock of the substantials of life.

I once inquired of the Major if, while he was with the army at New Orleans, he ever chanced to meet with the renowned pirate Lafitte. He said he had seen him often and knew him intimately; indeed, that General Jackson had once sent him out for the express purpose of capturing Lafitte. According to his account, it had been reported that the formidable buccaneer, with but three or four followers, was then lying concealed among the islands in the vicinity of the present site of Fort Livingston, and the Major, with a detachment of twenty men, was directed to search out his hiding-place, and, if possible, secure him. Accordingly he left New Orleans with his men in two row-boats and proceeded down the river to the Balize, thence he turned west, and skirted along the bayous and islands for some time, until suddenly, as he rounded a high projecting point, he came directly into immediate proximity with a fleet of seven raking, suspicious-looking vessels, lying quietly at anchor.

He was then too close to retreat; and putting on a bold face rowed directly up to the flag-ship, and demanded to see the commanding officer. He soon appeared in the person of the veritable Lafitte himself, who very courteously saluted him, and calling him by name, invited him aboard his vessel. He accepted the invitation, and as he went aboard, remarked that having learned the fleet was in that vicinity he thought he would pay his respects to the commanding officer. He was escorted to the cabin and treated with the most distinguished consideration and hospitality. The best wines and liquors were set before him, and a sumptuous dinner was prepared of which he partook freely. Afterward he smoked the most costly cigars, while indulging in the luxury of a siesta in a gorgeous hammock swung upon the coolest part of the deck, and every thing was done by the courteous pirate to render his visit pleasant.

When the time arrived for him to take his departure, he found his boats stocked with baskets of Champagne, jars of sweetmeats, and other delicacies in the greatest profusion.

As he was on the point of leaving Lafitte took occasion to tell him that he was perfectly well aware of the object of his visit, but suggested that when the Major next started out for the purpose of capturing the commander of a fleet of seven vessels, completely manned and armed, he should take a greater force than twenty men. He returned to New Orleans, and resolved to profit by the advice of the buccaneer, whom he pronounced a most hospitable, generous fellow.

The Major had at one time been stationed at Portsmouth, New Hampshire. I was aware of this fact; and as I had understood that a whale was once killed in that vicinity, I inquired if he had ever heard of the circumstance.

"Why, my dear fellow," said he, "I was the very man that killed him."

I expressed some surprise at this, and requested him to give me an account of the affair. He said that one day it was reported to him that a large sperm-whale was seen spouting about two miles below Portsmouth, and there was every indication that he was coming up to the town; whereupon he called out his boat's crew, manned his barge, and, taking a harpoon that he happened to have, set off in pursuit of the sea-monster. He soon came alongside of him, and succeeded at the very first cast in fastening his harpoon into him. The whale made some terrible efforts to extricate himself, but not succeeding set off furiously up the river with the barge in tow. At length, however, he turned down stream for a few miles, then turning back again went up the river, and in this manner the Major said he continued towing them up and down the river for three successive days and nights, during all of which time he stood at the bow of the boat with axe in hand, ready to cut the harpoon-rope in case he should take them out to sea. At the expiration of this time the whale became so much exhausted that he was easily killed and landed, and afforded an enormous amount of oil.

I inquired of the Major if he did not become hungry during all these three days. He replied:

"No; our friends threw provisions into the boat as we passed back and forth under the bridge at Portsmouth."

One evening I came in from a duck-shooting excursion, when I had been very successful in bagging a large number of birds. I reported my return to the Major, and gave him some account of the incidents connected with our hunt, and among other things I mentioned that I had killed nine ducks at a single shot.

"Why, my dear fellow!" said he, "when I was with Old Hickory at New Orleans I took a day's duck-shooting on Lake Pontchartrain; and, Sir, two of us bagged six hundred and ninety-one duck and mallard. I myself, with my large-bored 'Joe Manton,' that Packingham presented me with, at a single shot killed seventy-seven ducks, which we picked up, besides wounding many others."

One of the officers present gave a prolonged low whistle of incredulity at this marvelous statement, when the Major turned upon him, and with a most indignant expression asked if he presumed to doubt the correctness of what he had advanced? He replied:

"By no means, Major—certainly not. I haven't the slightest doubt upon the subject."

The Major continued: "You may rest perfectly assured, Sir, that every word I have stated is absolutely and literally true. We bagged eight hundred and ninety-three duck and mallard, and I myself killed eighty-seven of them at a single shot with my 'Purdy,' which Andrew Jackson insisted upon my accepting as a Christmas present. Moreover, Sir, let me tell you that it was an infernally bad day for duck-shooting too."

The Major had upon one occasion given permission to an officer of his command to visit New Orleans, and the young man, having overstaid his leave, expected to be called to account for it. Immediately on his return he called at the commanding officer's quarters, and not finding him in at the moment endeavored to place himself on as favorable a footing as possible with the lady of the house. He described to her the latest fashions, and related the most recent gossip of the city, and was getting along very well when the Major entered, and in a very dignified manner asked him the news from New Orleans.

Now the Major was not at all fond of literature. He very seldom read a book of any description, but poetry was his abhorrence; he could not endure it. He had, however, gone entirely through the four volumes of Emmons's epic "The Fredoniad," in the vain effort of finding his own name mentioned in connection with the events of the War of 1812. He did not appear to appreciate the merits of the work in the slightest degree. On the contrary, he even went so far as to pronounce the author "a humbug." The Lieutenant being aware of this prejudice against the writer of the poem, replied to the question as follows:

"There is but little news in the city, Major, excepting that Emmons has come out with a new edition of his 'Fredoniad.'"

"He has, has he?" said the Major. "Well, Mr. —, I'll tell you what it is, Sir, that man Emmons I take to be a consummate ass, Sir."

"Why, Major," said the Lieutenant, "he has introduced you into this edition."

"The devil he has? What has he got to say about me, I'd like to know?"

"Well, Sir, he says:

'And there was Major — in a blaze of fire,
He caused the British to retire.'"

The Major's face lighted up instantly, and he observed that, upon reflection, he believed that "Emmons was a d——d sight more of a knave than fool."

The cunning Lieutenant escaped without arrest, or even a reprimand.

THE FOOL CATCHER AGAIN.

THAT it should have occurred a second time! I protest I am mortified! I am more than mortified! I must explain.

It began with Dolly Dalrymple, but all the aunts, cousins, and nieces are in it. In fact there is a breeze in the family tree, and every twig is in a flutter; and Aunt Sennoth went to explain to Dolly, who shut the door on Aunt Sennoth, thereby knocking in the crown of her hat, and nearly pushing her from the steps; and the children, even to our three-years-old Dot, play Dolly and Aunt Sennoth, and say to each other, "You old hate——"

But never mind what they say. It is simply shocking, and, putting on my mantle of charity, I was starting the other morning to act as mediator, when coming up our steps again, with his book under his arm, I saw the Fool Catcher.

"I see," remarked that gentleman, with his quiet smile, "that though you bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him. Fall in line, Madam!"

And so we marched on as before—the Fool Catcher and I—and at the first turning met Mrs. La Place, looking fagged and fretted.

"I am worn out," said Mrs. La Place, plaintively. "I am searching for a roc's egg to hang from my drawing-room ceiling, and I believe I have explored every street of the city on foot lest my stupid man should pass a single door. I have telegraphed every where! I have sent to Barnum's, and all the museums! and Dr. Thibet, the great traveler, you know, has promised to bring me one from Syria, or Timbuctoo, or some of those places. But that is so long, you know! Besides, he may be eaten by a lion, or some of those horrid natives; and every time I see Mrs. Conda, 'My dear,' she cries, 'isn't it perfect!' pointing to the egg dangling from her ceiling. I could box the woman's ears."

"Why?" asked the Fool Catcher.

"Do you suppose I intend to be outdone by Mrs. Conda?" cried Mrs. La Place, with spirit. "Is it not enough that she has the first roc's egg? and they are the rage in Paris, where they are bringing fabulous sums! It is even said that the Empress is dying of vexation because they have all been bespoken by the Quartier Breda, and she is unable to get one for the Tuileries. Why, Mr. Fool Catcher, no house is perfect without one."

"Mrs. La Place," said the Fool Catcher, "if Mrs. Conda—whom you know as an ill-bred, illiterate woman, for whose mind and heart you have a thorough contempt—if Mrs. Conda, I say, in this hemisphere, or some woman in another hemisphere, so much more worthless that the details of her existence could not be mentioned before a lady like you, should choose to make a drawing-room pet of a donkey, and keep him on the rug, do you think your house would be perfect without him? Or suppose Mrs. Conda or Mdlle. Anonyme grow thistles in their green-houses, would you not pull up your roses by the roots at once?"

"One must do as the world does," commenced Mrs. La Place, when—"Fall in line, Madam!" interrupted the Fool Catcher, sharply.

"But the roc's egg?" bleated Mrs. La Place.

"Will be for sale in every shop in the city, once it is known by American women that one dangles in Mdlle. Anonyme's boudoir," retorted the Fool Catcher, grimly.

And so we marched on—Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till we were brought to a stand by young Tandem, who had nearly run us down.

"Good-morning, Mr. Tandem," said the Fool Catcher, putting up his glass. "Pray, Sir, will you allow me to examine your pocket-book? Unless my excellent glass deceives me that is remarkable currency you are carrying."

One of the Fool Catcher's peculiar conditions was that no one was ever surprised by his requests or dreamed of disputing them. Accordingly young Tandem drew out his porte-monnaie, and looked quietly on while the Fool Catcher, like an amateur brigand, counted out bank-notes and gold pieces in his broad hand. By what magic we read there, in place of the usual legends, such inscriptions as, "Business Credit," "Mother's Peace," "Broken Heart," "Father's Disappointment," "Good Health," "Common Sense," "A Year of Life," "Good Name," and "Energy," I do not pretend to say; but there were the letters, and there were we looking at them, young Tandem with us.

"Good Health—Energy—Honor—Business Credit—Mother's Peace—A Year of Life," repeated the Fool Catcher, in his deep voice. "Large prices to pay, Mr. Tandem, for wines and cigars, for drinking bouts, smiles that can be bought, games at cards, and horse-flesh. You buy dear and sell cheap, Mr. Tandem, and have as good a chance as any man I know of being shortly bankrupt of all these commodities," tapping the inscriptions with his finger. "Fall in line, Mr. Tandem!"

And so we marched on—young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till we found Miss Sharpe cutting up the beautiful Amaranthe:

"Nothing in her at all!" cries Miss Sharpe, shrilly. "Call her beautiful if they like. I say her complexion is dull, her eyes are of a bad color, her nose is too long, she has no——"

"Fall in line, my dear Madam, and don't perjure yourself!" cried the Fool Catcher, briskly.

"So"—snapped Miss Sharpe, viciously, and eying Mrs. La Place and myself—"all the fools are women! We should have a female Fool Catcher!"

"Ah, Madam! what need," said the Fool Catcher, serenely, "when fool-catching is the business of ladies' lives, and you do it so well?"

"The brute!" muttered Miss Sharpe. But by this time we were at Mrs. Merrywell's door, and found that pretty little woman in violent perturbation—crying, in fact, and sniffing unromanically, because her honey-moon had gone down; in one breath abusing her Harry, in the next bemoaning herself.

"Dear Mrs. Merrywell," said the Fool Catcher, sympathetically, "is your husband unkind to you?"

"Not—not exactly," sobbed Mrs. Merrywell. "I think he is fond of me in his way, but he is so changed. He used to lean over the piano, and now he lounges on the sofa with his horrid cigars while I sing, and says, 'That's jolly!' and 'You're a larkly little woman!'—think of my being a larkly little woman now, when he used to call me an angel! and then he brought me bouquets every evening, and I now asked him for one and he forgot it; said he had been so busy; and I cried, and he called me a goose—me!"

"Dear Mrs. Merrywell," asked the Fool Catcher, seriously, though not without a twinkle of the eyes, "have you your husband's picture?"

"To be sure," returned Mrs. Merrywell, briskly. "I had it before our marriage, and I used to kiss it every day."

"Precisely; and did you kiss it this morning, Mrs. Merrywell?"

"Why, no," returned the little woman, doubtfully. "I—"

"Did you kiss it yesterday, or the day before, or even the week before?" continued the Fool Catcher, with increasing severity; "or did you this very morning pinch your husband's ears and pull his hair instead? Mrs. Merrywell, you may be fond of your husband in your way, but think of pulling his hair instead of kissing his picture!"

"At any rate, I don't forget what he asked me, and then call him a goose," argued Mrs. Merrywell, plucky and pouting.

"Mrs. Merrywell," said the Fool Catcher, "when you have baked your cake on one side you must turn it and bake it on the other. Your case is by no means singular. Wholly to win a man, a woman must win him twice over. Once by her beauty, her girlish freshness and sparkle, whatever it was that attracted him; the second time, by her goodness, tact, and cleverness: and as the last qualities are superior, so is the last love sweeter and dearer. But if instead you only show him tears, pouting, and deshabille, he will be apt to remember that he was won by fair looks, and feel as you would, Mrs. Merrywell, if you paid for a silk gown and they sent you home a print."

"Why are not women then to be won twice over, and all the rest of it?" commenced Mrs. Merrywell, mutinously. "Why must men—?"

"My dear Madam," interrupted the Fool Catcher, "I do not make facts, I only state them. Fall in line, if you please. A walk with us will do you no harm."

And so we marched on—Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till we were unlucky enough to meet Nullus with an armful of books, all bearing, "THE WORLD AS IT IS: NULLUS," in gilt lettering on the back. I am positive that the Fool Catcher tried to dodge him, but Nullus seized him by the coat, and began to dilate on his book, assuring him that he would find satisfactorily treated there every subject of note that had been started since the deluge.

"Do you find market for your works?" asked the Fool Catcher, uneasily.

"Market!" repeated Nullus, with huge disdain. "Does any thing find market nowadays but clap-trap? Give people sound reasoning, and profound thought on original subjects, and they won't read it. Fine fancies and delicate shades of thought are thrown away on the brutal taste of the day. I tell you, Sir, men are required to write as scene-makers paint—in great, staring colors, that require no thought, and no close inspection. No, Sir," pursued Nullus, with increasing heat, "I don't expect to find a market, Sir. A hundred years hence, somebody may dig out a stray copy of 'The World as it is,' and make the publisher's fortune; but I pay for publishing, and starve in a dirty lodging-house."

"To suit a vitiated taste? Never," declaimed Nullus.

"Choose another profession."

"What, and give up my muse! Impossible; why—"

"Fall in line, Sir!" roared the Fool Catcher. "What the deuce would you have, if you will play dead-marches when people want jigs!"

And so we marched on—Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—and met the Hon. Mr. Boreas, coming fast, and with a bright face, around the corner.

"Congratulate me," he cried to the Fool Catcher. "I have just been investing my money in the Monthly Periwinkle, the best magazine published! Splendid investment! The circulation is—"

"Fall in line!" exclaimed the Fool Catcher, sharply. "Why, you are a curiosity, Sir!"

And so we marched on—the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—to the Tornado Place, where old Tornado sat at dinner, in a fury, over the beef.

"Underdone again! Is there a house-keeper in this house or not, Mrs. Tornado?" roared her husband. "If not, inform me, and I will supply the deficiency. Upon my word, Madam, it is a wonderful thing—a wonderful thing, that nothing can be done properly in my house. Every thing, from the children to the dinner, neglected and spoiled. D—n it, Madam, do you hear me? I say every thing is ruined in this house!" glaring fiercely at Mrs. Tornado, who sat stonily through it all, looking steadily at her plate.

"The brute! the ass!" murmured the Fool Catcher, "to trample under his hoof not only the woman but all his own chance of happiness, when you can lead any woman, with kisses and coaxing, from Dan to Beersheba. Fall in line, Mr. Tornado!"

And so we marched on—Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—to the next block, where Mrs. Scragge sat reading a letter, crossed and re-crossed, after the horrible manner of women.

"Such a sad case!" she said, looking at the Fool Catcher; "but, of course, you have heard. I always felt there was something about that woman that was to be distrusted. How can people do such things, Mr. Fool Catcher?"

"Circumstances alter cases," returned the Fool Catcher, sententiously.

"I do not think they do," cried Mrs. Scragge, virtuously. "I do not consider any circumstances an excuse for such things. I have never pretended to be better than other women; but, Mr. Fool Catcher, you might bring me what circumstances you like, and it would make no difference with me; not an atom."

The Fool Catcher waved his hand toward our ranks.

"Fall in line, Madam! You are as wise as a baby that is sure the candle will not burn its fingers;" securing, in the same breath, an editor, whom he had caught among the prophets.

And so we marched on—the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—to—well—really, there are times, and persons, and things about which one should have discretion—let us say that it was Dash, who was observing, in an unctuous, comfortable way, to three bony women in print gowns:

"I don't deny that it is hard, my good ladies, but it is undoubtedly the will of God, because, whatever is, is right; so that, in my opinion, the powerful effort that is now being made to alter your status, is a direct flying in the face of Providence. It is painful individually, but, no doubt, that is a wise provision that makes the condition of working women as uncomfortable as possible, since, were it otherwise, women might be tempted to revolt against their natural protectors, and make themselves independent of men."

"My good Dash!" cried the Fool Catcher, twirling that worthy about on his own steps like a top, "if there was a custom of horsewhipping, daily, all fat, pompous men like you, would you consider it an ordinance of God or a device of man? and when you have a fever, do you not think that a doctor and medicines is so much flying in the face of Providence? since, though the fever may bear individually hard on you, doubtless a wise provision made fevers possible for mankind, especially in the spring. Fall in line, Dash!" at the same time pouncing on what he called Similar Cases—a young man, who insisted that a fine head of blonde hair and a pair of pink cheeks were a sweet temper and a good heart, and a young lady, who believed a well-starched shirt-bosom and a heavy mustache to be refinement and bravery.

And so we marched on—the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till we found old Cruet, dropping gall as usual.

"Hear the fellow!" said the Fool Catcher, as Cruet ran up to Dr. Honiwell.

"Good-morning, Doctor! I congratulate you, Sir. I see your son has graduated at last; and, for my part, let people talk as they like about young Cresses, I never fancied such precocious development. Ah! Mr. Besom! why, I was thinking of you. I have just seen your new house, Sir. Pity there wasn't a varnish of time, and ready-grown moss, to be had with other building materials. A spiteful neighborhood like yours will have its fling, you know, at new people. Miss Cresses, how ill you look! what has become of that fine bloom that I used to praise a year ago? My dear Hodein, why I am meeting all my friends this morning! So you have an article in the Saga; and, by-the-by, what a wretched number that was! Pity, too; its editor never pays, if he can help it. Now—"

"Fall in line," said the Fool Catcher, laying a heavy hand on Cruet's shoulders. "I remember, Sir, that Heaven reckons up each drop of gall that you distill for your fellow-creatures, and will, one day, give it all to you to drink!"

And so we marched on—Cruet, the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—and found old Mene, peeping into a kettle, boiling on the range in his own kitchen, and lecturing Mrs. Mene and the cook.

"Mrs. Mene, I thought I ordered this fish to be kept till to-morrow, and a picked-up dinner for to-day! 'There was nothing left,' Mrs. Mene? Do you mean to tell me there was nothing left? And a pudding! Mrs. Mene, will you look here? The woman is making a pudding! Fish, and a pudding, together! Burning out the candle at both ends! And you talking about new hats for the children! There must be some old things in the house. Look them up, look them up, Mrs. Mene, and set the pudding away, do you hear? Fish, and pudding, in one day! indeed!"

"Here is an idiot," said the Fool Catcher, with strong disgust. "You should have married a five-dollar note, Sir. It would have cost you nothing, and you need never have spent it. Fall in line, Mr. —; but hush, what is that?" And listening, we heard Mrs. Worreit.

"Oh, yes! I get the woman, my dear, at little or nothing. She has neither home nor friends, and is glad of a shelter; and she is not aware of her own value. She is a perfect seamstress; has taste and judgment, and I should pay two dollars a-day for the work that I get out of her at a dollar a week. As you say, I think I am in luck myself; but I am always on the look-out for such lucky chances. I get all my work done in that way. I can afford to dress well on the money I save."

"Ah! Madam," cried the Fool Catcher, suddenly stepping in before her, "as I told Mr. Cruet, Heaven is in account with you, and of such as you will exact usury on every penny that you have gained or saved out of the poor and afflicted, and you will find it a fearful debt to pay. Fall in line, Madam. You are penny-wise and soul-foolish."

So we marched on—Mrs. Worreit, Mr. Mene, Cruet, the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—when we met Miss Blew, in a dingy, rumpled gown, and the ugliest bonnet that could be bought for money.

"You are a pretty Fool Catcher!" cried Miss Blew, scornfully scanning our line. "A man or two to save appearances, and all the rest to go free. But wait till the new order of things comes about. Then we may have a female Fool Catcher, and men may get their deserts for their meanness, stupidity, obstinacy, ugliness, pettiness, tyranny, malice, and abuse of women generally. I only wish they would make me Fool Catcher," she said, grimly, curving her fingers like claws.

"Is the new order of things at hand?" asked the Fool Catcher, quietly.

"No; nor won't be," snapped Miss Blew, "till women pluck up a spirit. Men are like donkeys—"

"But, my dear Madam, you can lead your donkeys better with thistles than sticks. Tact, and conciliation—"

"Have been tried for the last six thousand years!" screamed Miss Blew. "Men are to tyrannize over us, because it is unfeminine to show temper and resist; and we are to look pretty, because men like pretty faces; and wear neat gowns, because men like neatness in women. But if we only get a dinner semi-occasionally, we must not mention it, because the only remedy is, more trades and more wages; and as it tickles men's vanity to think that he is the centre of woman's universe, and that in him she lives, and moves, and has her being, the best he can do for working women, who live and move in themselves, if at all, is to wink at their existence, and continually hold them up as dreadful examples of what may happen to women without his protection; telling us, meanwhile, how feeble we are in muscle and endurance, and how inferior in judgment and talents. But when the painter drew the lion at the feet of the man the lion said that he should have placed the figures differently. It makes a difference who tells the story. Give us as thorough and sensible an education as you do men, as fair a chance, and as desirable a prospect, and let us demonstrate our inferiority. So far it has been millions of times asserted, but never once proved. Let—"

"Fall in line, Madam!" interrupted the Fool Catcher, who had listened with something like interest. "There are grains of wheat in all this chaff, but common-sense might teach you that when you deliberately make yourself as unbearable to men as possible they will very naturally suppose you the fruit of the system you advocate, and as naturally oppose it, when you stand in need of their sympathy and hearty co-operation, instead."

And so we marched on—Miss Blew, Mrs. Worreit, Mr. Mene, Cruet, the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till the Fool Catcher stopped us to listen to Mrs. Gnat.

"There, Gnat!" she was saying, "just like you! Forgot it, of course! You wouldn't have forgotten it if Mrs. Walliker had asked you! Toiling and slaving, you say! I suppose you expect to have a wife and daughters for nothing, Sir. I suppose you would like us to turn our old gowns, and wear them the year through. Mimy extravagant! She don't dress as well as Laura Walliker! Always talking about sitting at your desk! Where would you sit? or as if you cared for any thing outside of your counting-room."

"Yes, but he might have cared for his home," said the Fool Catcher, softly.

"You are lazy, Gnat," pursued the lady, "or you would be willing to escort your daughters about, poor things! You would, if you had natural affection. Worn down! Well, I am worn down, I should think, with a house, and three daughters, and six servants, to oversee! But I sacrifice myself; I go till I am fit to drop!"

"What a pity that the Gnats are not given to the Tornados!" said the Fool Catcher, stepping forward with his customary formula of "Fall in line, Mrs. Gnat."

And so we marched on—Mrs. Gnat, Miss Blew, Mrs. Worreit, Mr. Mene, Cruet, the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I—till we overtook Mrs. Pharisee, entangled in a crowd about a miserable woman caught in the act of filching an apronful of beans.

A movement of the crowd brought Mrs. Pharisee and the woman face to face. Mrs. Pharisee was fresh, clean, and spotless, from her stockings to her collar. Her face was fresh and spotless also, with here and there a line—for Mrs. Pharisee was not young—but lightly drawn by small anxieties. The woman, though ten years younger than Mrs. Pharisee, looked older, so haggard, ragged, and begrimed was she. No stronger contrast could have been made. Mrs. Pharisee was proper; the woman was reckless. Mrs. Pharisee was neat; the woman was filthy. Mrs. Pharisee was on her way to evening prayers; and the woman had just stolen beans, for her children, she said, looking half-impudently at Mrs. Pharisee.

"And you see where your theft has brought you and them," said Mrs. Pharisee, answering her look. "Why will people be bad, when, in these days of light and of the dispensation of the Gospel, it is just as easy to be good?"

The Fool Catcher choked.

"Fall in line!" he gasped, when he had recovered breath. "If all the virtues and proprieties have been able to make nothing better of you than this, I wonder what you would have developed had you been born, like this woman, not to days of light, but to days of darkness; not to the dispensation of the Gospel, but to the dispensation of the devil! Fall in line, Mrs. Pharisee."

And so we marched on—Mrs. Pharisee, Mrs. Gnat, Miss Blew, Mrs. Worreit, Mr. Mene, Cruet, the Similar Cases, Dash, the Editor, Mrs. Scragge, Tornado, the Hon. Mr. Boreas, Nullus, Mrs. Merrywell, Miss Sharpe, young Tandem, Mrs. La Place, the Fool Catcher, and I.

CARLYLE AT EDINBURGH.

EDINBURGH has no University Hall, and accordingly, when speech-day approached, the largest public room in the city was chartered by the University authorities. This public room—the Music Hall in George Street—will contain, under severe pressure, from eighteen hundred to nineteen hundred persons, and tickets to that extent were secured by the students and members of the General Council.

On the day of the address the doors of the Music Hall were besieged long before the hour of opening had arrived; and loitering about there on the outskirts of the crowd, one could not help glancing curiously down Pitt Street, toward the "lang toun of Kirkcaldy," dimly seen beyond the Forth—for on the sands there, in the early years of the century, Edward Irving was accustomed to pace up and down solitarily, and "as if the sands were his own," people say, who remembered, when they were boys, seeing the tall, ardent, black-haired, swift-gestured, squinting man, often enough. And to Kirkcaldy too, as successor to Edward Irving in the Grammar School, came young Carlyle from Edinburgh College, wildly in love with German and mathematics—and the school-room in which these men taught, although incorporated in Provost Swan's manufactory, is yet kept sacred and intact, and but little changed these fifty years—an act of hero-worship for which the present and other generations may be thankful. It seemed to me that so glancing Fife-ward, and thinking of that noble friendship—of the David and Jonathan of so many years gone—was the best preparation for the man I was to see and the speech I was to hear. David and Jonathan! Jonathan stumbled and fell on the dark hills not of Gilboa, but of Vanity; and David sang his funeral song: "But for him I had never known what the communion of man with man means. His was the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine ever came in contact with. I call him on the whole the best man I have ever, after trial enough, found in this world, or now hope to find."

In a very few minutes after the doors were opened the large hall was filled in every part, and when up the central passage the Principal, the Lord Rector, the Members of the Senate, and other gentlemen advanced toward the platform, the cheering was vociferous and hearty. The Principal occupied the chair of course, the Lord Rector on his right, the Lord Provost on his left. When the platform gentlemen had taken their seats every eye was fixed on the Rector. To all appearance, as he sat, time and labor had dealt tenderly with him. His face had not yet lost the country bronze which he brought up with him from Dumfries-shire as a student fifty-six years ago. His long residence in London had not touched his Annandale look, nor had it—as we soon learned—touched his Annandale accent. His countenance was striking, homely, sincere, truthful—the countenance of a man on whom "the burden of the unintelligible world" had weighed more heavily than on most. His hair was yet almost dark; his mustache and short beard were iron gray. His eyes were wide, melancholy, sorrowful; and seemed as if they had been at times aweary of the sun. Altogether in his aspect there was something aboriginal, as of a piece of unhewn granite, which had never been polished to any approved pattern, whose natural and original vitality had never been tampered with. In a word, there seemed no passivity about Mr. Carlyle—he was the diamond, and the world was his pane of glass; he was a graving tool rather than a thing graven upon—a man to set his mark on the world—a man on whom the world could not set its mark. And just as, glancing toward Fife a few minutes before, one could not help thinking of his early connection with Edward Irving, so seeing him sit beside the venerable Principal of the University, one could not help thinking of his earliest connection with literature.

Time brings men into the most unexpected relationships. When the Principal was plain Mr. Brewster, editor of the Edinburgh Cyclopædia, little dreaming that he should ever be Knight of Hanover and head of the Northern Metropolitan University, Mr. Carlyle—just as little dreaming that he should be the foremost man of letters of his day and Lord Rector of the same University—was his contributor, writing for said Cyclopædia biographies of Voltaire and other notables. And so it came about that, after years of separation and of honorable labor, the old editor and contributor were brought together again—in new aspects. The proceedings began by the conferring of the degree of LL.D. on Mr. Erskine of Linlathen—an old friend of Mr. Carlyle's—on Professors Huxley, Tyndall, and Ramsay, and on Dr. Rae, the Arctic explorer.

That done, amidst a tempest of cheering and hats enthusiastically waved, Mr. Carlyle, slipping off his Rectorial robe—which must have been a very shirt of Nessus to him—advanced to the table and began to speak in low, wavering, melancholy tones, which were in accordance with the melancholy eyes, and in the Annandale accent, with which his play-fellows must have been familiar long ago. So self-contained was he, so impregnable to outward influences, that all his years of Edinburgh and London life could not impair, even in the slightest degree, that. The opening sentences were lost in the applause, and when it subsided the low, plaintive, quavering voice was heard going on, “Your enthusiasm toward me is very beautiful in itself, however undeserved it may be in regard to the object of it. It is a feeling honorable to all men, and one well known to myself when in a position analogous to your own.” And then came the Carlylean utterance, with its far-reaching reminiscence and sigh over old graves—Father’s and Mother’s, Edward Irving’s, John Sterling’s, Charles Buller’s, and all the noble known in past time—and with its flash of melancholy scorn. “There are now fifty-six years gone, last November, since I first entered your city, a boy of not quite fourteen—fifty-six years ago—to attend classes here and gain knowledge of all kinds, I knew not what—with feelings of wonder and awe-struck expectation; and now, after a long, long course, this is what we have come to.” (Hereat certain blockheads, with a sense of humor singular enough, loudly cachinnated!) “There is something touching and tragic, and yet at the same time beautiful, to see the third generation, as it were, of my dear old native land, rising up and saying, ‘Well, you are not altogether an unworthy laborer in the vineyard. You have toiled through a great variety of fortunes and have had many judges.’”

And thereafter, without aid of notes or paper preparation of any kind, in the same wistful, earnest, hesitating voice, and with many a touch of quaint humor by the way, which came in upon his subject like glimpses of pleasant sunshine, the old man talked to his vast audience about the origin and function of Universities, the old Greeks and Romans, Oliver Cromwell, John Knox, the excellence of silence as compared with speech, the value of courage and truthfulness, and the supreme importance of taking care of one’s health. “There is no kind of achievement you could make in the world that is equal to perfect health. What to it are nuggets and millions? The French financier said—‘Alas! why is there no sleep to be sold!’ Sleep was not in the market at any quotation.” But what need of quoting a speech which by this time has been read by every body? Appraise it as you please, it was a thing per se. Just as, if you wish a purple dye you must fish up the Murex; if you wish ivory you must go to the east; so if you desire an address such as Edinburgh listened to the other day you must go to Chelsea for it. It may not be quite to your taste, but, in any case, there is no other intellectual warehouse in which that kind of article is kept in stock.

Criticism and comment, both provincial and metropolitan, have been busy with the speech, making the best and the worst of it; but it will long be memorable to those who were present and listened. Beyond all other living men Mr. Carlyle has colored the thought of his time. He is above all things original. Search where you will, you will not find his duplicate. Just as Wordsworth brought a new eye to nature, Mr. Carlyle has brought a new eye into the realms of Biography and History. Helvellyn and Skiddaw, Grassmere and Fairfield, are seen now by the tourist even, through the glamour of the poet; and Robespierre and Mirabeau, Cromwell and Frederic, Luther and Knox, stand at present, and may for a long time stand, in the somewhat lurid torch-light of Mr. Carlyle’s genius. Whatever the French Revolution may have been, the French Revolution, as Mr. Carlyle conceives it, will be the French Revolution of posterity. If he has been mistaken, it is not easy to see from what quarter rectification is to come. It will be difficult to take the “sea-green” out of the countenance of the Incorruptible, to silence Danton’s pealing voice or clip his shaggy mane, to dethrone King Mirabeau. If with regard to these men Mr. Carlyle has written wrongfully, there is to be found no redress. Robespierre is now, and henceforth in popular conception, a prig; Mirabeau is now and henceforth a hero. Of these men, and many others, Mr. Carlyle has painted portraits, and whether true or false, his portraits are taken as genuine.

And this new eye he has brought into ethics as well. A mountain, a daisy, a sparrow’s nest, a mountain tarn, were very different objects to Wordsworth from what they were to ordinary spectators; and the moral qualities of truth, valor, honesty, industry, are quite other things to Mr. Carlyle from what they are to the ordinary run of mortals—not to speak of preachers and critical writers. The gospel of noble manhood, which he so passionately preaches, is not in the least a novel one—the main points of it are to be found in the oldest books which the world possesses, and have been so constantly in the mouths of men that for several centuries past they have been regarded as truisms. That work is worship; that the first duty of a man is to find out what he can do best, and when found, “to keep pegging away at it,” as old Lincoln phrased it; that on a lie nothing can be built; that this world has been created by Almighty God; that man has a soul which can not be satisfied with meats or drinks, or fine palaces and millions of money, or stars and ribbons—are not these the mustiest of commonplaces, of the very utterance of which our very grandmothers would be ashamed? It is true they are most commonplace—to the commonplace; that they have formed the staple of droning sermons which have set the congregation asleep; but just as Wordsworth saw more in a mountain than any other man, so in these ancient saws Mr. Car-

And then, in combination with this piercing insight, he has, above all things—emphasis. He speaks as one having authority—the authority of a man who has seen with his own eyes, who has gone to the bottom of things and knows. For thirty years the gospel he has preached, scornfully sometimes, fiercely sometimes, to the great scandal of decorous persons not unfrequently; but he has always preached it sincerely and effectively. All this Mr. Carlyle has done; and there was not a single individual perhaps, in his large audience at Edinburgh the other day, who was not indebted to him for something—on whom he had not exerted some spiritual influence more or less. Hardly one perhaps—and there were many to whom he has been a sort of Moses leading them across the desert to what land of promise may be in store for them; some to whom he has been a many-counseled, wisely-experienced elder brother; a few to whom he has been monitor and friend. The gratitude I owe to him is—or should be—equal to that of most. He has been to me only a voice, sometimes sad, sometimes wrathful, sometimes scornful; and when I saw him for the first time with the eye of flesh stand up among us the other day, and heard him speak kindly, brotherly, affectionate words—his first appearance of that kind, I suppose, since he discoursed of Heroes and Hero-Worship to the London people—I am not ashamed to confess that I felt moved toward him, as I do not think in any possible combination of circumstances I could have felt moved toward any other living man.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT is often observed that after death the lines of faces most worn with age and sorrow soften and change, and the fresh and long-vanished expression of youth steals over them again and remains. So now that General Scott is dead, the brave and skillful soldier, the hero of Lundy's Lane, and Chippewa, and Mexico, is alone remembered. His long life of eighty years was full of services to the country, many of them illustrious, all of them patriotic. It was his misfortune that the severest trial of his ability came when his powers were weakened, but not so far that he did not see that the time had arrived at which he should formally retire from official station, and he did so, with the national gratitude undiminished. No man was ever better known in all his foibles as well as in his virtues, and it was a touching proof of the kind of hold he had upon the respect of the country that even party-spirit could not disturb it.

His military career during the war of 1812 and in Mexico, with his semi-military negotiations upon the Canada border in 1837, were the most conspicuous and valuable portions of his public life. He had great personal bravery and the talent of military organization and command, with the enthusiasm which inspires an army and implies victory in advance. Unfortunately the lustre of his action in the field and of his real capacity was obscured by an overweening sense of personal importance and of powers which he did not possess. It is the common mistake of military men. The immense and resounding applause which justly hails their achievements in the direction of their peculiar gifts bewilders and deceives them. They accept it as a credential of general power. With their admiring countrymen they forget that it is very, very seldom, as Hawthorne says in speaking of Nelson, that "warlike ability has been but the one-sided manifestation of a profound genius for managing the world's affairs." Military ability is usually a special talent, and a talent usually incompatible with that of statesmanship. Wellington, the greatest of modern English Generals, was the poorest of modern English statesmen. Our own history also gives us a striking instance. Andrew Jackson was a good soldier and one of the worst of statesmen.

Scott's political career, therefore, was altogether unfortunate. He had neither the proper perception, nor temper, nor manners for political success. He had the ill-luck of raising the laugh against himself. But happily the ridicule was felt to be superficial, and could not affect his true position. Indeed there was a time when even his political attitude was full of dignity. This was when President Polk intrigued against Scott during the Mexican war, because of Scott's probable success and his consequent dangerous importance as a Presidential candidate. It was poor business for a President, but fully harmonious with the purpose of the war—a war totally without honor to this country except in the conduct of our soldiers and the skill with which they were directed. If any American is inclined to ask contemptuously why Europe should go to war at this time, and proceed to draw a moral against monarchies, let him remember the purpose and the pretext of the Mexican war, and learn that even Republics are fallible.

His political disappointments undoubtedly tried General Scott sorely. How deep his feeling was appears from his autobiography—one of the most melancholy books ever written. But as Lieutenant-General of the army his position in the country was unique. The rebellion found his patriotism clear and stanch. He was a Virginian like Robert Lee, his Adjutant. But his oath as a soldier of the United States prevented him from resigning when his flag was insulted, even had his mind been less truly informed of the duty of an American citizen. He was too old in mind and body to plan or to conduct the stupendous operations of such a war, and after a few months during which the country reluctantly surrendered its confidence in his adequacy to the occasion, he withdrew forever from public service.

At the ripe age of eighty General Scott died, and amidst all the signs of national respect was buried at West Point, a historic spot of which he was always peculiarly fond, and to which his grave will now impart fresh interest. He will always be counted among our most illustrious soldiers, and may be truly cited as a successful General, whose ambition was perfectly restrained by patriotism—who never for a moment forgot the duty of the citizen in the glory of eminent military command. Nor can any vague regret linger around Scott's grave; for his successor has thus far shown only those qualities which are the most precious to a Government like ours.

GEROME's picture Deux Augures, which is well known from the photograph, was among the works at the late exhibition of the Allston Club in Boston. It represents the Augurs, of whom Cicero speaks, as wondering that they could look in each other's faces without laughing, standing over the coops of sacred chickens, whose peckings they were to interpret. The story has served to illustrate many a sharp criticism, and at last appears in art; and it is certainly very effective, except that Cicero never said any thing of the kind, and that it was not the Augurs who performed that duty. This fact is stated by D. in a pleasant note to the Boston Advertiser, which does a service to scholarship and popular accuracy which we are glad to acknowledge. How many other of our stock classical illustrations would shrink under the same shrewd eye! D. says:

"More than a century and a half ago the great Bentley took the trouble to expose this blunder at full length in his celebrated Letter of Phileleutheros Lipsiensis. The reader, who has any taste for classical learning in an entertaining form, can not do better than to refer to the passage there, and indeed to read the whole letter. But the substance on this point may for convenience be given here.

"Cicero neither ever himself said, nor reported the elder Cato as saying, any thing of the kind about the Augurs. They were both of them Roman Tories, staunch supporters of church and state in Roman politics; and whatever Cicero may have thought or said in private as a philosopher, he was not the man to hold up, in a published treatise, the College of Augurs and the state religion to ridicule. If Lord Derby were to write that Lord Eldon said that he wondered that two English bishops could look each other in the face without laughing, the scandal and improbability would hardly be greater. Besides, Cato and Cicero were themselves Augurs, while Eldon and Derby were not quite bishops. How comes the story, then, to have such currency? Simply by substituting for a Roman Augur a very different character, an Etrurian soothsayer (Haruspex). The highest churchman might ridicule the episcopal character of a Methodist bishop or an Irvingite 'archangel.' Haruspex, as distinguished from Augur, is the word used by Cicero in both passages, from which the familiar allusion is derived. The Haruspex was in common with the Augur a professed diviner from natural signs, but in all other particulars they differed essentially, as much as a Catholic and a Methodist, though both are professed Christian divines. Their sacred books even were not in common. The origin and nature of their systems, the sources of their authority, and still more their political and social positions, differed widely. The Haruspex was usually and properly regarded as a foreign religious adventurer; the Augur was always a man of high political and social station in Rome. But it is unnecessary to pursue the detail, which is to be found not only in Bentley, but in any of the standard manuals on Roman antiquities. With all this knowledge accessible to them, the wonder is that two magazine writers should recall their witty allusions to the two Roman Augurs without a laugh at their own, or at least at each other's, expense; and M. Gerome might, it seems, make a third in the party."

THE extravagance and absurdity of style of much of our Yankee newspaper writing is a favorite topic of censure with many among ourselves, and of the most scornful contempt with writers in England. Indeed, John Bull's affectation of contempt for our general literary style is as ludicrous as it is unfounded. There are extravagant and foolish writers here as in England, simply because folly is not local; but we challenge any reviler to find any where in American writing so turgid and ridiculous a piece of bathos as Henry Kingsley's description of the manner in which Jefferson Davis would hear of Thackeray's death—which the Easy Chair quoted at the time; while every steamer from England brings newspapers and magazines in which our most astounding "reportorial efforts" are outdone.

This absurdity of style is most conspicuous in personal descriptions and allusions, and in those we can not compete with our brother Bull. The truth is, that Jenkins is a purely British product. We have toadies and weak brains, but the perfect snob is found only among the proud Britons, who never, never, never will be slaves. The most daring efforts of the Yankee Jenkins are tame when measured by the great original. Here, for instance, is the manner in which he speaks of the Queen's letter to Mr. Peabody, thanking him for his generous gift to the London poor—a letter which was properly womanly and polite:

"We have this week to record an act of grace so rich, and of glory so pure, on the part of her Majesty the Queen, as will more than quicken the sentiments of reverence which all her subjects, of every order and every class, have been accustomed to entertain toward her. We refer to the letter—couched in terms of right noble simplicity—addressed by her Majesty to Mr. Peabody, in acknowledgment of the splendid gifts which that gentleman has made to the working-classes of this country."

"Here's richness!" quoth Mr. Squeers. But from Jenkins merely groveling we ascend to Jenkins in the vein of pure sentimental "hifalutin." If the Yankee "reportorial style" has produced any thing so amusing we have not seen it. Here is Mr. Gladstone driving up to the House of Commons on the evening when he was to introduce the Reform bill:

"Four o'clock had struck, and the crowd, making up its mind that Bright had gone in earlier, was only held together by the chance of seeing Gladstone. It had not been an indifferent crowd—rather a crowd keenly inquisitive, honestly in earnest. Its cheers, originated by a few men here and there, had been far more hearty than, in England, expressions of opinion are wont to be. But hitherto there had been nothing which could honestly be called enthusiasm. In fact, the people were waiting for that one leader in whose splendid brain and whose generous heart they put their whole faith. At last there came a swaying about of the crowd—a cheer went ringing and rolling along the line—the police tried to keep men back, and men wouldn't have it—a sort of electric telegraphy seemed to flash and sparkle from face to face, and those behind cried, 'Who is it?' and those in front were too busily cheering to answer the inquiry. It was wonderful—the change from the calm, indifferent, jesting manner of the crowd to the sudden earnestness with which the leader of the Liberals was welcomed. Up went the voices, and off went the hats; and all that an unimpassioned spectator could see through the tempest of applause was a pale, grave, gallant face, firmly set; then a light on the face, as the great orator was compelled to raise his hat in recognition; and by his side a lady, graciously proud of her husband's fame.

"Said one working man to his neighbor, 'Looks pale, don't he?'

"Answered the other, 'He'll make the Tories look a deal paler afore he's done!'"

But the meanness of spirit which animates both these performances is not surprising in a country where etiquette prescribes that the whim of a dull youth may interfere with the intellectual enjoyment of scholars and cultivated men and women. At a late meeting of the Royal Society Dean Stanley was to read a paper, and the Prince of Wales was present. It is the etiquette that at the end of an hour the lecturer shall pause, and if the Prince indicates that he wishes him to proceed he may do so; if not, he must stop. Upon this occasion the company was composed of the most intelligent persons, and the paper was most interesting and instructive. At the end of an hour Mr. Stanley paused and looked at the Prince, whom common politeness and regard for the wishes of others should have impelled to bow in approval of finishing the lecture. But the young man simply stared. Mr. Stanley looked at Professor Farraday, who presided, and the Professor whispered that if the youth bowed the Dean might finish the paper, of which but little more remained to read. The audience, naturally impatient of an interruption which should have been merely formal and momentary, looked at the Prince in surprise, which became instantly indignation in every breast but that of Jenkins when the Heir of England rose and walked out of the room. Imagine Agassiz compelled by etiquette to stop in the middle of a lecture because Tad Lincoln or a youthful Johnson was ill-mannered! And imagine still more a company of intelligent people gravely tolerating such a proceeding!

But this apparent servility is part of the British system. "Monarchy in England," as Louis Blanc says, "is a simple business transaction. How much does it bring in? How much does it cost? Balance of profit and loss." This incident of Dean Stanley's lecture is an illustration of the horrible extravagance of the price. A system of Government should be remarkably superior to all others which requires that Oriental servility of manner and conduct which monarchy apparently requires of intelligent Englishmen. "I have some difficulty," says the acute observer, from whom we have just quoted, "in reconciling with the manners of a free people the species of idolatrous worship—I speak only as to outward form—to which a 'Drawing Room,' as it is called here, gives rise." Nor while John Bull thinks it cheaper to maintain a monarchy must we expect him to refuse to pay the price. It may seem hard and even ludicrous that the constitutional protection of Dean Stanley's rights as a man should depend in any degree whatever upon his conforming to a system which requires him to stop short in a valuable discourse because a very dull young man in the audience is not well-bred enough to ask him to proceed. But after all, it is undeniable that it is better to conform to that absurd condition than to live subject to the knout or bow-string.

"THE telegrams from Italy of last evening," said the London Times lately, "announce the arrival of General Garibaldi at Como. The intelligence could hardly be more portentous. Garibaldi at Como is on the very theatre of his most brilliant exploits of former days." And as war is about breaking upon Italy again, and names which to most American travelers have only a romantic association become of military significance, the Easy Chair naturally recalls the days of '48 when Carlo Alberto was the Italian chief, and Italian faith and hope were as warm doubtless as they are to-day, and when, at the very moment in which the Austrians under Radetzky occupied Milan, the Easy Chair and three friends descended the Gottherd pass of the Alps into Italy. "I think at this moment," writes one of that gay party, "of the evening that we topped the hills around Como and began to descend toward its shores."

The words breathed upon memory like a soft west wind upon an Æolian harp, and looking into the yellow diary of those cloudless days the Easy Chair finds a record which shows how the country looked, and how the people felt when Italy awoke eighteen years ago.

As the afternoon was ending—says the note-book, describing the journey on foot from Lago Maggiore and the Lake of Lugano to Como—we passed a shrine at which a mother and children were kneeling and chanting the Ave Maria, and an ass with loaded panniers jogged slowly by. The vesper bells began to ring from an old church tower upon a mountain-side, and down the long valley, while far over the rounding tops of orange and fig trees in the warm-descending vale a triangle of dark-blue water was the first glimpse of Como. My knees bent a little, not with fatigue, but with reverence, as if I were again entering the very court and heart of Italy. A group of girls, less timorous or more interested than the crowd upon the Lagano Lake shore, asked us if there were any news—if France were coming to help Italy. But ours, alas! were not the beautiful feet upon the mountains. We could only say "nothing" and "good-by."

At Santa Croce we came out in full view of the lake, upon which lay the splendor of sunset, and taking a path which we were told would shorten the journey we lost our way upon a huge hill-side. But as we reached the summit the full moon rose from behind the heights upon the opposite shores of Como, and a handsome Italian boy showed us a straight path to Cadennabia upon the margin of the lake. I gave him a silver trifle, and he wished us "felice viaggio" with his black eyes and his musical lips, and leaving him like a shepherd boy of the purer Arcadia of the hills we descended rapidly into a vineyard, and so came to the shore.

It was a moment of mingled twilight and moonlight. A path of splendor lay upon the Cadennabia shore to the Villa Melzi opposite; and, hailing an old boatman, we glided up that golden way to the vine-clustered balcony which I knew at Bellaggio under the moon. The air was calm and bland. The water was oily and gleaming. The mountains stood around us dusky and vast in the ghostly light as we went silently over the lake.

We landed, and took tea upon the balcony at the hotel whose only rival in Europe for romantic picturesqueness is the Trois Couronnes at Vevey upon the Lake of Geneva. The "magic casement" of Keats's Ode to a Nightingale was mine at Bellaggio. The lake murmured with music every where. I saw the boats full of people singing choruses, then talking and laughing as they floated away. The sound of instruments, the throb of strings, the sad, mellow peal of horns, filled the air; and long after midnight a band was still playing in the village. About midnight Edmund and Frank bathed in the lake. Their figures were white as marble in the black water, and they struck the calm into sparkles of splendor as they swam out.

The boat which we took to descend the lake to the town of Como had three rowers. The chief, whom I remembered from last year, groaned bitterly over the war because there were so few strangers.

"Trade, you see, is conservative," said I to Edmund.

"Who wouldn't be conservative at Como?" he tranquilly replied.

"We live upon the strangers," continued Giovanni Battista, the boatman, with a simplicity and truthfulness that made us laugh; "and this year nobody comes. The Italians are driven away, and the foreigners are frightened."

He had not been to Como for two months, although his business is plying upon the lake, and his winter depends upon his summer. "The war is bad for all of us," he said, "and after all the Germans are back again."

...Farther on, and nearer Como, the shore is covered with handsome villas, of which the most remarkable for beauty and fame are Madame Pasta's, a magnificent estate, and Taglioni's, which is not yet finished, and the stately Odescalchi. As we passed Madame Pasta's the old boatman shrugged his shoulders and trilled with his voice. "That's the way the money came there," he said, contemptuously. He was clearly of opinion that only the decaying and decayed families whose names he had heard all his life, and whose ancestors his fathers knew, were to be spoken of with praise.

"Whose villa is that?" asked I.

"Eh! che! nobody's," he replied; "if it were any body's we should know."

At 5 o'clock we rounded the point over which I had stood the year before on a still September afternoon hearing the girls sing in a boat below, and so came to the shore at Como.

Every where there was an air of consternation. The Austrians had just reoccupied the town, and the streets were full of the "hated barbarians," rattling about with long swords and standing on guard at the doors of public buildings. The walls bristled with military notices. Among others I read one exhorting all well-disposed people to surrender arms of every kind by a certain day at a place named. The people seemed to be stupefied, and gazed in dull wonder upon the soldiers.

Out of the square, ringing with Austrian sabres, we stepped into the Duomo, dim and lofty and hushed, untouched by revolutions or triumphs. A few unodorous sinners were kneeling and praying. They were very poor and ignorant. But this was their palace, and they looked as if they knew that the great Emperor of the barbarians had not one more gorgeous or solemn.

We tried to secure seats in the post for Milan. There was no place. We applied at the offices of public and private diligences. It was still impossible. The evening was cool and clear, and we considered. The distance to Milan was but eight hours of our walking, and we were making a walking tour. And although we had scarcely bargained for a promenade over the plains of Lombardy in an August sun—yet this perfect moon? Should we turn back without seeing the Goths encamped around the most glorious of Gothic cathedrals?

It was nine o'clock when we shouldered our knapsacks and set forth. The dwellers in romantic Como, standing at their doors, looked wonderingly upon the four pedestrians marching in regular resolute tramp along the streets, evidently moving upon Milan. The small children plainly thought us a part of the imperial and royal army. "Here come the Austrians," whispered one boy to another, as he gazed at the gray wide-awakes and knapsacks.

The mild Francis looked at him with the air of an army which would respect persons and property so long as it was unmolested, and wished the boy so soft a buona notte that he smiled gently, and I am sure his dreams were not disturbed.

We passed out of the gate of Como full against the round rising moon and took the broad hard highway for Milan. We passed a few wagons loaded with the furniture of some fugitive and rolling slowly along. As we pushed on, the idea of penetrating by night and on foot into a country at war was stimulating and novel. But what consciousness of war could survive in the deep peace of that night? The fields were covered with high corn, and the hard straight road went before us in dim perspective. There were no other travelers. Two or three empty vetturas or a wine cart straggled lazily by, the little bells upon the horses tinkling, and the drivers fast asleep. Nor were the villages many. As we passed a group of half a dozen houses a fellow was sleeping soundly upon a bench at a door. When we broke in upon the silence of night by asking the name of the village, he sprang up nimbly and limped rapidly out of sight as if the question had been a pistol-shot and had wounded him. Every body was nervous "in questo momento." Toward midnight we stopped at a house which should have been near the point at which we meant to sleep until sunrise, and roused an old lady who shrilly chirped and twittered her terror through the slide in the door. But satisfying her that we were neither Croats nor cannibals, she told us that we were yet a mile or two from Balasina.

It was now twelve o'clock, and the land seemed sunk in a sleep of death. There was no sound but our own echoes as we entered the dreary, dismal village, which, like all Italian villages, is merely a dirty street bordered with gloomy houses. They looked so hopeless with their grim stone fronts, high-barred windows out of reach, and huge gates, as if expecting nothing but hostility, that when we stopped before the inn we felt like the wretched wights who beheld the dungeons of an ogre; and when Edmund exclaimed in what seemed a terrible voice, so still was the night, "Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn?" we started as if had heard a loud joke in church. Then the vision of a pleasant inn hung for a moment in our minds, and the sense of the preposterous contrast awakened a loud peal of laughter which died away echoing among those houses which were as hospitable as sea-craggs. While we stood debating, a group of peasants, with their jackets slung over their shoulders, passed spectrally by, staring steadily at us, as if they would not be unwilling to strike a final blow for the kingdom of Italy.

They disappeared, and we struck a resounding blow upon the door of the Albergo, and another and another. After a while there was a sound of stealthily unbarring window-shutters followed by a voice demanding the reason of the tumult. We explained that we were friends who wanted beds for the night. No, that was impossible, "the voice replied far up the height;" there were no beds, and we had better push on to the next tavern. We expostulated in many tongues with the dimly-visioned head that now appeared, pleading that we were strangers from a far country who were very tired and sleepy. The head disappeared for a few moments and we heard a low colloquy. Then the great gate of the Albergo swung sullenly open, and we stepped into a dim court, and the dimly-visioned face became a face like a dull razor, it was so thin-featured and stupid. The man asked us to stop, and, stepping aside, he called a woman's name, then stood waiting, his wretched dozing face illuminated by the weak lustre of a long-wicked tallow-candle which he held. Presently he moved on along the windows of the court conversing with an invisible within the house. When those murmuring arrangements were made, he led us up a dirty, stone staircase, trying to open various doors with keys that did not fit the locks; and finally, after a desperate wrestle with one, he swore fiercely in a thin, wiry voice that made the blood run cold, and then smashed the door of the chamber, carrying away wood-work and lock together. It was a vast room of immense discomfort, and after barricading the disabled door with tables and chairs, we lay down and fell asleep upon beds which could furnish no dreams.

In the morning we ate grapes and peaches, and finding a wagon which we could hire, we bribed our pedestrian consciences and bowled over the beautiful road to Milan, reluctantly confessing that the imperial and royal post-roads were the best in the world.

"Yes—but not for the public benefit," said the mild Francis; "they are for the quicker transport of troops and artillery to oppress the people."

Sad, silent, broken-hearted Milan! No, not yet visibly broken-hearted, for the Cathedral sparkled pure and lofty in the rare, blue summer air. It was the morning of the Feast of the Ascension of the Virgin Mary, to whom the Cathedral is dedicated, and was therefore high festival. But the people had little aspect of joy. We stopped at the gate, and sat in the steady glare of the sun while our passports were closely inspected. Outside the city wall lay a wilderness of tree trunks, which had been leveled in expectation of a siege by the Austrians. They were useless now; and groups of soldiers in gray slouched hats and black plumes—a kind of Robin Hood uniform—were clustered idly and curiously about the gate. They looked worn and red and wasted, and I fancied had taken part in the fight of the burning day which had made almost as many idiots as corpses in the Austrian army.

Within the city the streets were broken up, and the paving-stones designed for barricades were merely roughly laid back again in their places. In the long vista of the streets there was no shop open. The only signs of traffic were the stands of the fruit-merchants shaded by gayly-striped awnings, and covered with piles of glowing fruit. Multitudes of brightly-dressed people strolled idly and curiously up and down, and a company of sappers and miners marched by without music, but carrying their implements and their soiled accoutrements. They were dirty and draggled, like a corps marching across a battle-field to dig a hopeless ditch. There were no carriages moving; there was no noise, no hurry, no excitement, only that scuffling murmur which makes the silence of a great city so spectral. The stately Milanese women walked finely by. Their long black hair was drawn away from the forehead and folded in massive plaits; and the black veil that hung from the back of the head was partly gathered over the arm. Queen-like they walked, carrying the bright-colored fan which was raised to shield their eyes from the sun, or languidly waved against their bosoms. Forms of the Orient or of Spain the imagination touched them with pathetic dignity—matrons of a lost country.

—The yellow Diary does not stop here, but we must. The traveler to-day, descending the Alps to Como, will find the same Italy arousing to a greater struggle than that from the blow of whose defeat it was quivering when Radetzky sat down in Milan eighteen years ago.

"A CONFIRMED BACHELOR" submits to the Easy Chair the confession of a married friend, upon which he asks advice. There is such pungency in the statement that it shall be also submitted to the great congregation of Easy Chairs in the country. And of all wives and mothers we ask whether such things can be? If not, why has this complaint such a pathetic air of probability?

"Don't marry," says our woeful wight, "unless you can afford to hire an accomplished housekeeper and cook. As for me—let me undecieve you!—I have no comfort or peace. If I want a decent meal I have to get it at an eating-house. My own house is mismanaged, misgoverned, and disorderly from one year's end to the other. My wife sits up till nearly midnight reading foolish novels. If the children trouble her she whips and sends them off to the servants. When morning comes she is so tired she can not get up until after the breakfast is on the table; and it is a regular Biddyfied breakfast, worse than ever I tasted in a four dollar a week boarding-house. Half the time I dress both the children in the morning and get them their breakfast. They live mostly on crackers, cheese, and milk, for there is nothing else in the house fit for them to eat. My wife comes down when we are half through, and gets the morning paper, and looks over it to see what matinées are to take place, and makes her arrangements to leave the children to the care of the servants; and then (while she well knows it takes all that I can do, by the hardest work, to support the family in such a disorderly and mismanaged way) she hounds me to death to run in debt and buy a piano and several expensive dresses for herself. Her mind and thought seem wholly directed to self-gratification.

"My health is feeble, and my doctor insists on particular articles of diet. The only way I can get them in my own house is by appealing to my wife's selfishness. No considerations of my health move her; but if I say, 'Give me such and such so many times and you shall have a new dress,' then I may get it, but even then not always, for if it interferes with the matinées or reading of the last novel I can not have it. All appeals to sense of duty, to the principles of right, all expositions of the duty of unselfishness of purpose, are met with ridicule and laughter, with senseless quibbles, or with smart, impertinent speeches. When I talk of order and system, and lay before her plans of management, I am told that I don't know any thing about housekeeping, which is something different from every thing else. When sickness overtakes me, if it is slight I am ridiculed. My wife is greatly provoked with the bother of it. But if I am violently ill, and the grave opens at my feet, as it has often done, she consoles me by saying, 'Dear me! what will become of me and the children if he dies and leaves me poor?'

"I can't earn any thing ahead. She wants me to get my life insured, but fortunately for me the Companies will not take it. If they would I am afraid that I would get but little attention even in the most dangerous illness. My wife considers children a great nuisance, and if they bother her she whips them, but whips them for nothing else. She can not understand why they cling to their father so. I proposed to join the army, and her objection was only this, that my pay would not be sufficient to support her; but as my services were refused because of my ill health I unfortunately (as Webster said) still live. She makes it a constant practice to oppose me in every thing. If she proposes something and I agree to it, then she changes her mind. I have reasoned with her of duty, of religion, and of justice, and the answer is that domestic duties are a drudgery, and she will make a drudge of herself for no man. She despises household matters as beneath her notice, and looks upon the care of her children as a degrading occupation fit only for servants.

"I have but one hope, and that is to get money enough to hire some thoroughly competent person under the name of a servant to care for my children, and a skilled cook to give them wholesome food. Yet I do not hate my wife. I can not forget that she is all that is left to me of the idol of my youthful heart. God in His all-wise providence has sent this affliction upon me, and I will bear the burden patiently, hoping not only that I may be purified thereby, but also that the time and years may change her thoughts and feelings.

"I have told you these things that you may rid yourself of the idea that all is bliss in the married state."

The Bachelor says that he is of opinion that his friend John was suffering from an unusually severe indigestion. He declares that the wife in question is one of the most "pleasant, agreeable, and chatty ladies in the whole circle of my acquaintance," and that he never dreamed but that she and her husband lived in the utmost happiness. "For aught I see," says this sententious philosopher, "John must grin and bear it." The Easy Chair, M.D., is, however, of a different opinion. There is a specific for such cases—he will not say a panacea—which is very simple, and which he herewith prescribes for the present patient:

Take equal parts of reason, resolution, and patience; combine them, and take uninterruptedly until a cure is effected. In a chronic case, like the one now presented, miraculous results must not be immediately expected. Moreover all the ingredients, and especially, perhaps, the patience, must be of the very finest quality, and perfectly able to bear the utmost exposure. Keep up a good heart, never say die, and ply the remedy unweariedly, and it can hardly fail to cure. It may not produce love, but it will restore it.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 2d of July. Of events at home there is little of special interest to record, beyond the passage in both Houses of Congress of a joint resolution recommending to the States the adoption of certain important Amendments to the Constitution, and the President's Message expressing his dissent from the measure.—In Europe the long-impending war has fairly broken out. We give a brief resumé of the leading points of the facts and authenticated reports, coming down to the 18th of June, when war was formally declared by Prussia and Italy against Austria.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The joint resolution of the Reconstruction Committee, proposing Amendments to the Constitution, after considerable modifications, passed the Senate, on the 8th of June, by a vote of 33 to 11, and was returned to the House, where it passed, on the 13th, by a strict party vote of 120 to 32. Certified copies of the resolution were, as the law prescribes, sent by the Secretary of State to the Governors of each of the States. The resolution as proposed and originally passed in the House on the 10th of May was given in our Record for June. The following is the form in which it finally passed both Houses:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or happiness, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President, representatives in Congress, executive and judicial officers, or members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Sec. 3. That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disabilities.

Sec. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Sec. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

The principal changes from the original form are that to Section 1 a provision is added declaring all persons born or naturalized in the United States to be citizens thereof; Section 2 is altered only verbally; Section 3 is entirely different; and to Section 4 is added a provision declaring the inviolability of the public debt of the United States.—On the 24th the President sent a Message to Congress setting forth his objections to this proposed Amendment, although his sanction is not required to give it validity. The President says: "The steps taken by the Secretary of State [in transmitting the resolution to the Governors] are to be considered as purely ministerial, and in no sense whatever committing the Executive to an approval or recommendation of the Amendment to the State Legislatures or to the people." He thinks, on the contrary, that no Amendment should be proposed by Congress until after the admission of loyal Senators and Representatives from the States which are now unrepresented.

THE FENIANS IN CANADA.

Toward the end of May considerable numbers of Fenians made their way in small parties toward the Canadian frontiers. Buffalo and Malone in New York, and St. Albans in Vermont, were the main points of rendezvous. On the 1st of June a considerable body crossed the border at Buffalo, and had one or two slight skirmishes with the Canadian troops and volunteers. They were driven back, and many of them, on recrossing the lines, were made prisoners by the United States authorities. Meanwhile the President issued, on the 6th, a proclamation denouncing the hostile enterprise as a high misdeemeanor, directing the authorities to arrest all engaged in it, and instructing General Meade to employ the land and naval forces of the United States and the militia to prevent the execution of the invasion. No supplies or arms were allowed to pass to those in Canada, and most of those who had crossed made their way back. Another crossing was made, a few days later, near St. Albans, but it shared the same fate as the former one. The officers of the Fenian army were mainly arrested and held to bail; the privates were released and sent to their homes at the cost of the United States.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

Under date of June 4, Mr. Bigelow, our Minister to France, relates an interview between himself and M. Drouyn de Lhuys. The purport is that the French Minister of Foreign Affairs said that it was the purpose of the French Government, "for its own convenience, and for no other reason," to withdraw its troops from Mexico within the time specified (from November, 1866, to November, 1867) "at the very latest, sooner if climate and other controlling considerations permitted; and it was not its intention to replace them by troops from any other quarter." As to the reported shipment of troops from Austria to Mexico, that was a subject with which France had nothing to do.—Mr. Motley, our Minister to Austria, furnishes the correspondence relating to the reported shipment of Austrian troops to Mexico, the upshot of which is contained in a note from the Austrian Minister, dated May 30, declaring that "necessary measures have been taken to suspend the departure of the newly enlisted volunteers for Mexico." So that it seems clear that Maximilian will have to depend upon his own resources to maintain his position in Mexico.—The desultory conflicts in Mexico tend rather against the Imperialists. The most notable incident is the capture, on the 16th of June, by the Liberals, of a large merchandise train, guarded by some 2500 men, proceeding from Matamoras to the interior.

From the River Plata our tidings come down to the middle of May. On the 2d, a sharp action took place at Estara Bellaco between the van-guard of the Allies and a Paraguayan division. The Paraguayans attacked by surprise, captured a battery of four guns, which they retained; but the Allies being reinforced, the Paraguayans were in the end forced from the field. It is said that the losses on both sides amounted to 5000 men, killed and wounded. The Allies, at the latest dates, were advancing by land and river to attack Humaita, the first of the Paraguayan fortresses on the river.

EUROPE.

The proposition for a general European Congress has proved unavailing, Austria refusing to join it except on the condition that none of the Powers should be allowed any accession of territory. The Emperor Napoleon, in a letter to his Minister of Foreign Affairs, June 11, states explicitly the views with which he should have sent a representative to the Congress. "You would," he says, "have declared in my name that I repudiated all idea of territorial aggrandizement so long as the equilibrium of Europe was not disturbed. In effect we could not think of an extension of our frontiers except in case of the map of Europe being remodeled for the exclusive benefit of a great Power, and of the contemnerous provinces demanding, by votes freely expressed, their annexation to France." The Emperor says: "The conflict which has arisen has three causes: the geographical position of Prussia, imperfectly bounded; the wish of Germany, demanding a political reconstitution more conformable to its general wants; and the necessity of Italy to secure her national independence." He would have proposed that Austria should, for an equitable consideration, cede Venetia to Italy; Prussia should have more "homogeneousness in the north," which must be understood to mean the Duchies which she claims; and that Austria, having given up Venetia, should still "maintain her great position in Germany." In the case of war, which he judges imminent, he thinks that France will not be obliged to take up arms; but he adds significantly that he is assured that, "whatever be the results of the war, none of the questions which touch us shall be resolved without the assent of France."

In the mean while events have been marching. We note the principal in chronological order. Prussia, Austria, and Italy have kept increasing and concentrating their armies and armaments; Russia has moved large forces toward her frontiers, as was supposed in consequence of some understanding with Austria; the Prussians advanced into the Duchies, displacing the Austrian troops there; whereupon the Prussian Minister at Vienna received his passports, and the Austrian Minister was recalled from Berlin. Then a dispute arose in the Federal Diet between Austria and Prussia. The former demanded that the Federal army should be "mobilized" and a Commander-in-Chief nominated by the Diet. Prussia protested against this mobilization of the Federal army as a violation of the Federal compact; but the Diet, on the 14th of June, voted for the mobilization. There were, including Austria, 9 votes cast in favor, and 6 against it. The 8 votes cast with Austria represent a population of 14,000,000, and include the second-class States, Bavaria, Saxony, and Hanover; the 5 votes cast with Prussia are all from minor States and represent a population of 3,000,000. The representative from Baden, having received no instructions, did not vote. The Prussian representative thereupon announced that his Government considered the Federal Diet dissolved, that Prussia seceded from the present Confederation, and submitted proposals for a new league. The Austrian Minister insisted upon the indissolubility of the Confederation, declaring that no member had a right to secede. The Diet passed a resolution sanctioning this view. Prussia had before announced that any State voting for the mobilization of the Federal army would be considered to have committed an act of hostility against Prussia, and that, if war ensued, she would be guided solely by her own interests and those of her friends. Among the States which thus voted were the kingdoms of Saxony and Hanover. On the 16th, two days after the vote, Prussian troops entered both these kingdoms, occupying the capitals on the 17th and 18th.

At the hour when our Record closes the steamer brings intelligence up to the 20th of June, of which we condense the principal points. An engagement took place near Frankfurt on the Oder between the Prussians and a detachment of the Federal army, in which the latter were defeated. Simultaneously on the 18th Prussia and Italy declared war against Austria, of course by previous concert. The Prussian Government sent to the various foreign courts a dispatch justifying its course. It states that the action of the Diet on the 14th broke up the Confederation, and the law of self-preservation compelled Prussia to secure herself against the action of neighboring States. A conditional alliance was proposed to Saxony, Hanover, and others, on the basis that they should reduce their war establishments, agree to appoint delegates to a German Parliament; and on those conditions they should be guaranteed all their rights and territories. These propositions were declined; and "as Prussia's geographical position does not allow her to tolerate in those States open or concealed hostilities while she is engaged in war in another direction, the Prussian forces have crossed the frontiers of those countries in order to prevent our being cut off in the rear while defending ourselves against Austria." A royal proclamation was spread among the people of the invaded States, declaring that, in seeking to make Germany a party in her war against a member of the Confederation, the Diet had violated the Federal Constitution, and that this being in effect abrogated, it was the duty of the German nation to form a new Constitution. And the measures which Prussia had taken were necessary for "the defense of her independence, which had been threatened by the recent action of the Diet;" and "Prussia could not now tolerate either enemies or doubtful friends on her borders." Meanwhile the troops which had entered Hanover, Saxony, and Hesse-Cassel, had received strict orders to observe the most friendly attitude toward the people of those States, and in the event of coming into contact with their troops to avoid bloodshed as much as possible by endeavoring to induce them to lay down their arms.

In the Federal Diet a motion presented by Saxony, requesting assistance against the Prussian invasion, was passed by a vote of 10 to 5; Prussia not being present, and the representative of Baden voting with the majority.

The Emperor of Austria issued a long manifesto to his people. "On the northern and southern frontiers of the Empire," says the manifesto, "are arrayed the armies of two allied enemies of Austria, with the intention of shaking the foundations of her position as a European Power. To neither of them has Austria given any cause of offense. But one of the hostile Powers [Italy] deems no protest necessary to justify its lust for the plunder of a portion of the Austrian monarchy. In the eyes of that Power a favorable opportunity is a sufficient cause for war." In respect to the difficulties with Prussia the manifesto says: "Austria sought no conquests, and bears no part of the blame for the sad list of unhappy complications which, had Prussia's intentions been equally disinterested, would never have arisen, and which have been brought about for the accomplishment of selfish objects, and are not therefore susceptible of a peaceful solution by my Government." The Emperor assures his people that "in this conflict we shall not be alone. The princes and people of Germany are aware of the danger which threatens their liberty and independence, and not only ourselves, but also our German brethren of the Confederation, are in arms for the security of those objects which we are bound to defend."

Literary Notices.

The History of Julius Cæsar, Vol. II. By the Emperor NAPOLEON. The greater part of this volume is devoted to the history of the wars in Gaul. Taking Cæsar's Commentaries as the ground-work, but abridging portions where there is a prodigality of details, and amplifying where Cæsar more slightly develops his proceedings, the authors of this work have produced a thorough history of those great campaigns which have gained for Cæsar a place as one of the four great captains of the world. We say the "authors;" for every page bears proofs that many persons have labored long and diligently upon this History. Every passage in contemporary writers which can throw any light upon the subject has been examined; surveys, explorations, and excavations have been made; profound mathematical and astronomical calculations, often to establish a single point, have been performed; every mile of territory traversed by the Roman legions has been gone over in order to fix the localities and elucidate the operations carried on. The lifetime of no one man, to say nothing of one whose occupations are so numerous as that of the Emperor, would suffice to perform this preliminary work. But the whole of this mass of materials has been moulded and compacted into what we must regard as the most perfect military history extant. The volume details the events of ten years, closing with the passage of the Rubicon by Cæsar, and the inauguration of the civil war. The key-note to the whole history is struck near the beginning: "The sequel of this history will prove that all the responsibility of the civil war belongs not to Cæsar but to Pompey; and although the former had his eyes incessantly fixed on his enemies at Rome, none the less for that he pursued his conquests, without making them subordinate to his own personal interests. If he had sought only his own elevation, in his military successes he would have followed an entirely opposite course. We should not have seen him sustain, during eight years, a desperate struggle, and incur the risks of enterprises such as those of Great Britain and Germany. After his first campaigns he need only have returned to Rome to profit by the advantages he had acquired." All this, changing only the names of persons and places, is the Napoleonic representation of the first Empire. Toward the close of the volume occurs a passage which reads like a vindication of Napoleon's own coup d'état: "Cæsar was reduced to the alternative of maintaining himself at the head of his army, in spite of the Senate, or of surrendering himself to his enemies." Ought not, asks Napoléon, Cæsar to have renounced his command? "Yes," he replies, answering his own question, "if by his abnegation he could save Rome from anarchy, corruption, and tyranny. No, if this abnegation would endanger what he had most at heart, the regeneration of the Republic. As chief of the popular party he felt a great cause rise behind him; it urged him forward, and obliged him to conquer, in despite of legality, the imprecations of his adversaries, and the uncertain judgment of posterity. Roman society, in a state of dissolution, asked for a master; oppressed Italy, for a representative; the world, bowed under the yoke, for a saviour. Ought he, by deserting his mission, disappoint so many legitimate hopes, so many noble aspirations? . . . There are imperious circumstances which condemn public men either to abnegation or to perseverance.

To cling to power when one is no longer able to do good, and when, as a representative of the past, one has, as it were, no partisans but among those who live upon abuses, is a deplorable obstinacy; to abandon it when one is the representative of a new era, and the hope of a better future, is a cowardly act and a crime." Such, in effect though not in form, is Napoleon's view of his own procedure. It is curious to compare it with the representations of Kinglake; still more curious would it be to compare both with what Carlyle might say, were he to write the history of Napoleon III. Apart from the political motive, which is kept quite out of view during the narration of the campaigns, and only reappears in the closing chapters which treat of the civil affairs of Rome, we repeat that this account of Cæsar's Campaigns is the most perfect military history extant. Homes without Hands. By Rev. J. G. WOOD. In the present Number of this Magazine, and in several preceding ones, we have given papers drawn in a great measure from this work. Copious as these are they by no means exhaust the instructive and interesting matter embodied in this volume. Its plan is simple yet philosophical, being to describe the habitations of animals according to their principle of construction. It commences with the simplest form of habitation, a burrow in the ground, whether made by mammalia, birds, reptiles, or insects; then proceeds to those homes which are hung in the air; those that are built up upon the ground or other solid foundations; those that are constructed beneath the surface of the water; those which are inhabited by creatures living socially in communities; those which are parasitic upon animals or plants; those that are built upon branches; closing with those miscellaneous habitations which could not be classed in either of the preceding groups. The homes of well-nigh a thousand different species of animals are described, with accounts of the habits of the handless builders. These are illustrated by a profusion of pictures, conveying through the eye a far more correct impression than could be given by words. Taken all in all, this is by far the most charming work on Natural History which has for years come within our notice. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac. By WILLIAM SWINTON. The history of the Army of the Potomac—commencing from the time when, under McClellan, it undertook the disastrous campaign of the Peninsula, running through Pope's unfortunate operations in Virginia, the repulse of the Confederate invasion of Maryland, the slaughters of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, the triumph at Gettysburg, the fearful march through the Wilderness, the combats on the Chickahominy, the persistent beleaguering of Richmond and Petersburg, closing with the capture of the Confederate army of Northern Virginia, to which it had so long been opposed—is in effect the history of the war. For the great achievements of the armies of the West were in a measure subordinate to these. The head of the rebellion was always with the army at Richmond. While this remained uncrushed the rebellion could survive the loss of its members. When this was finally crushed all was lost. Mr. Swinton has elaborated this history with great care from the most authentic sources, and with great judgment. Some of his conclusions will long remain matters of question; but as a whole his book will stand the ordeal of discussion and criticism.

Whoever hereafter undertakes to write the history of the war must be under great obligation to this work. We judge it to be by far the best work upon the war which has yet been produced. (Published by C. B. Richardson.)

Pictorial History of the Civil War in America. By BENSON J. LOSSING. The war had scarcely closed when several works, previously commenced, purporting to be "Histories" of the great conflict, were hurried to a conclusion. No one of these has the slightest claim to that character. Each and all of them abound with errors, both of omission and commission, to such an extent as to render them, one and all, absolutely worthless. It could not have been otherwise. The materials from which a history must be framed lay widely scattered. Many were inaccessible, and only came to light gradually one by one. Had they all been in the hands of the writers of these so-called histories it would have been a labor of months to arrange and compare them, so as from the mass of partial and often contradictory statements to arrive at even an approximation to the truth. Mr. Lossing has wisely chosen not to hazard his well-won reputation by rushing hastily into print. His first volume—the only one which has been published—is mainly preliminary, narrating the origin and growth of the great conspiracy, bringing the history down only to the battle of Bull Run. Thus far the facts are so well established, and have already been so often detailed, that we think he has committed an error in dwelling so minutely upon them. We think that his first volume might have brought the history down to the opening of the Peninsular campaign, leaving for the succeeding volumes the great military operations which fairly began with the establishment of the Army of the Potomac upon the line of the Chickahominy before Richmond. Thus far Mr. Lossing's task has been comparatively easy. We trust that the harder part, which is yet to be performed, will be worthily accomplished. He certainly brings to its execution some of the prime requisites of a historian. He is unwearied in his collection of facts and documents, and is little likely to be imposed upon by the loose statements which have misled so many of his predecessors into the commission of the most absurd errors. We confidently anticipate that his work will prove not unworthy of the author and the subject. (Published by George W. Childs.)

A Narrative of Andersonville. By AMBROSE SPENCER. There are some passages of history which we could almost wish should have remained forever unwritten. Such are the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Black Hole of Calcutta, and last, but not least, the horrors of the Southern prisons, and notably that of Andersonville. But the world will not suffer the memory of these atrocities to die. It is well, therefore, since they must be held in everlasting remembrance, that they should be truly described. Mr. Spencer, long a resident in the immediate neighborhood of this "hell upon earth," and with the official records of the trial of the chief actor in the atrocities there perpetrated before him, has told the story of Andersonville. It is all the more impressive from the grave and unimpassioned manner in which it is narrated. The naked facts, proved by testimony more conclusive than was ever before brought to bear upon a similar case, show that nowhere before in the world's history has such an accumulation of outrage been perpetrated as in the State of Georgia during the fourteen months which followed the 15th day of February, 1864, when "the first detachment of Federal prisoners was received at the Confederate States Military Prison at Andersonville." How far the deep damnation of these atrocities rests upon Wirz, the miserable instrument by whom they were in part perpetrated, and in how far they are shared by others to whom he was subordinate, we will not here inquire. It may be as well that Mr. Spencer has not inquired too closely. It is enough that he has told the story of Andersonville as fully as it could be told within the limits of a single small volume. Four Years in the Saddle, by Colonel HARRY GILMOR. This Gilmor is a native of Maryland, who, with several of his kith and kin, went over to the Confederates soon after the breaking out of the war. Like Semmes, of the Alabama, he had not the pretext of going with his State against his Nation. Each was a double traitor, upon either theory—Northern or Southern. Semmes was shielded from punishment by being included as "Brigadier-General" in the surrender by Joe Johnston. Gilmor, a prisoner in our hands, was released after the collapse of the rebellion. We rejoice that this was done; and that it will remain upon record that during the progress of the rebellion, or after its suppression, no man was harmed in life or limb, no man suffered by fine or imprisonment, for any offense which could be styled political or military. Gilmor, by his own story, was a perfect Paladin, killing with his own hands quite as many men as the famous Captain Bobadil proposed to do, and making more hair-breadth escapes than have been claimed for Dick Turpin. Meanwhile it is worth noting that to him was committed the work of setting fire to Chambersburg; and that although as a matter of taste he rather disliked the work, he still thinks it a measure altogether justifiable on the part of what he still styles "our government." Lectures on the Study of History. By GOLDWIN SMITH. The Professor of History at Oxford takes ground precisely opposite to the "Positive" theory of History enunciated by Comte and Buckle. According to this, History is governed by universal, invariable, and necessary laws; so that the historian ought to be able to predict the rise, progress, and decay of a nation as surely as the astronomer can foretell the time of an eclipse, or lay down the orbit of a comet. According to Professor Smith, "History is made up of the actions of men, and each man is conscious, in his own case, that the actions of men are free;" and "humanity, advances by free effort, and is not developed according to invariable laws, such as, when discovered, would give birth to a new science." In our judgment the true theory is that elaborated by Professor Draper in his two great works: "The life of the individual man is of a mixed nature. In part he submits to the free-will impulses of himself and others, and in part he is under the inexorable dominion of law;" and man proceeds in his social march in obedience to law. Free-will is a part of this law; and "Free-will and Fate, Uncertainty and Destiny, and all other conditions seemingly contradictory, are watched by the sleepless eye of Providence." We believe, therefore, in opposition to Professor Smith, that there is a Science of History. Appended to the Lectures on the Study of History is one on the "Foundation of the American Colonies," and another on "The University of Oxford," originally published in this Magazine, which are of very considerable interest. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Coal, Iron, and Oil. By S. H. DADDOW and BENJAMIN BAXNAN. One of the joint-authors of this work is a mining engineer, the other the editor of the leading journal of the Coal Regions. We must assume that the statistics which they furnish are reliable. According to these the area of the workable coal-fields of Europe is something less than 10,000 square miles, of which more than 6000 are in Great Britain; Australia has 15,000; British America 2200; the United States 200,000. That is, more than three-quarters of the coal stored up for future generations lies within the limits of the United States. But of the 150,000,000 of tons annually produced, Great Britain furnishes 90,000,000. Some of the ablest British thinkers—notably among them Mr. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—do not hesitate to say that the commercial greatness of Britain depends on her coal-fields. Now these are being so rapidly used up that at the present rate they will be exhausted in from 100 to 200 years, when the supply in the United States will hardly have been touched. The State of Illinois alone, which now produces but 1,000,000 tons a year, has in reserve five times as much as all Great Britain. Such considerations render the facts set forth in this volume of special interest, even though we may not agree with the speculations of the authors as to the origin of coal and oil, which they believe to be strictly mineral, in opposition to the commonly received opinion which ascribes to them a vegetable origin.

Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East. By W. PEMBROKE PETTRIDGE. Fifth Year. This work has become the recognized vade mecum of American travelers in Europe. Within the compass of a single volume it comprises nearly every thing which a tourist requires to direct him in almost any part of Europe, Syria, and Egypt. The editor resides abroad, and every year goes over a great portion of the ground in order to be able personally to see to it that the work is kept up to the requirements of the time. Extensive additions and corrections have been introduced throughout into the issue for the present year—the fifth during which the work has appeared. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Of new novels we note: The Toilers of the Sea, by VICTOR HUGO, the plot of which is constructed with a skill worthy of Wilkie Collins, while it abounds with those touches of pathos and humor which have placed Victor Hugo at the head of French writers of fiction now living.—Phemie Keller, by F. G. TRAFFORD, forming 272 of "The Library of Select Novels," is a story quite worthy of introduction into that Series.—Armada, by WILKIE COLLINS, is familiar to the readers of this Magazine, who need not be told that it evinces the marvelous constructive power which is the distinguishing talent of the author.—Inside: a Chronicle of Secession, by GEORGE F. HARRINGTON, republished from "Harper's Weekly," is more than a novel. Under the form of fiction it presents a vivid picture of Southern life and society during the time of the great rebellion. The author, Southern born and Southern bred, lived all through those four weary years in the midst of the scenes which he describes, which were noted down day by day as they passed before his eyes. Only the concluding pages were written since the war closed. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Editor's Drawer.

A WISCONSIN friend writes: I dropped into a Justice Court one evening in a village hereabout, and found the room crowded with spectators, who had been there all day listening to the arguments of Senator W—— and Judge Q——, as to whether the witness on the stand should be allowed to answer a question put by Q—— and objected to by W——. It seemed that the witness had testified that he saw the defendant one morning splitting rails, and Q—— wished to show what the defendant said he intended to do with them. The answer was supposed to decide the whole case, and the lawyers had spent near ten hours in discussing the question, and had sent several times during the day to a neighboring town for authorities.

At length the Justice decided that the question should be answered. Q—— was elate over his victory, and tauntingly asked W—— if he had any further objections? then, turning to witness, said: "Now, Sir, you answer my question; W—— does not object. What did the defendant tell you he was going to do with those rails?" The audience was profoundly silent; and the witness, giving a very thoughtful look to the floor, calmly answered: "Nothing that I know of!" The court adjourned till the next day.

THE Wisconsin Legislature is noted for its "dog laws" and a habit its members have of voting themselves large quantities of postage-stamps. J—— S——, a not over-intelligent but honest German, represented the Creek district in the Assembly a few years before the rebellion, and voted for and took his quota of postage-stamps with a dignity and promptness worthy of a more experienced legislator. At the close of the session he retired to private life, taking with him over forty dollars' worth of surplus stamps. A few years after J—— S—— took his first letter to the post-office, and was told by the postmaster that the stamp he had put on it was worthless, as it was one of the old kind of stamps, and the time for redeeming them had expired. "Hein!" said John, "I t'ought dey would haf last me so long vat I laves—and I t'ink dey vill?"

HONEY CREEK, Sauk County, is a settlement of Germans several miles from the Wisconsin River and civilization. But its inhabitants love, marry, quarrel, forgive each other, and are happy again, the same as other people. Some years ago Lawyer G——, who lived on the river, about ten miles from Honey Creek, was called upon by an injured wife, for the purpose of getting divorced from her husband. G—— promised it should be done at the next term of court, which was near at hand, if she would bring him twenty-five dollars the next day. She agreed to the proposition, and G—— set about drawing the papers. The same evening the husband called on G——, and wished a divorce from his wife. G—— told him he would do it for twenty-five dollars down, and the German started home for the money. G—— considered himself in luck—a double fee and no opposition.

Court-time came, but he had seen neither money nor husband nor wife. Inquiry showed that his clients were living together again on the best of terms. G—— had drawn the papers in the case, and how was he to get his pay? He sent the parties word that unless they sent him twenty-five dollars they would be divorced the next day, and punished for living together! The German walked ten miles in the rain that night with the money.

LIEUT. K——, a gallant and dashing officer of the — Indiana Battery, Army of the Cumberland, who prided himself not a little on his fine penmanship, had with him a shining piece of ebony answering to the name of Mose. Mose adored a fair African at Nashville. Lieut. K—— often wrote letters for him to her. On closing one for him, he asked, "Mose, any thing more?" Mose, scratching his head, with a grin, replied, "Yess, Massa; tell Rose howdy, and to excuse bad spelling and bad writing!"

DURING the late war, while the exchange of prisoners had been stopped for an indefinite time, and about twelve hundred Federal officers were stopping as guests of J. D. in the Hotel De Libby, time dragged heavily, and among other resources to amuse ourselves, and drive away the dull monotony of prison life, many resorted to writing letters to their friends at home, which, owing to prison rules, were required to be very brief, consisting of but six lines, on purely domestic matters, leaving the envelope unsealed. In consequence, considerable ingenuity and skill was practiced to extend the limit and evade the eye of the officials. Among other devices a solution of saleratus and water was used as an invisible ink by officers having an understanding with their friends. A Tennessee officer among our number, hearing of the secret, concluded to try its effect, and after writing the usual six lines with ordinary ink, concluded his letter with a P.S. informing his friends (not having a previous understanding with them) that "if they wished to read the whole of his letter, to hold it to the stove!" And then finished the sheet with invisible ink. The use of the article with us was soon after "played out."

A CORRESPONDENT in Boone County, Missouri, writes:

Having never heard any thing in the Drawer from our parts, I contribute the following, which you can take for what it is worth. I think it equal to any "fish story" I ever heard:

A traveler passing through our town asked our livery-stable man how much corn was usually raised in this part of the country. He told him there was generally raised from fifteen to twenty bushels to the acre, and each stalk had nine ears on it, and was twelve or fifteen feet high. "That is nothing to our corn," says the traveler, "up in Illinoy, where I come from; we always had nine ears to each stalk, and a peck of shelled corn hanging to each tassel, and we never could raise any corn-field beans with it." "Why?" "Because the corn grew so fast it always pulled the beans up!"

THIS comes from Ohio:

We have for a townsman one Johnny G——, who a number of years since left the "bogs of Ould Ireland" to seek his fortune in America. He found it in the form of a rich widow; and, as a consequence, he to-day ranks himself among the "silk-made min" of the country.

Johnny, though small in stature, is very spry, and when promoted is apt to be somewhat elated. About two years since he was chosen marshal at a military funeral. Every thing passed off satisfactorily until the procession was on march for the cemetery, when Johnny, who had been reviewing them as they passed, galloped to the head, and addressed the following fond remark to the escort: "Gentlemen, gentlemen! not quite so fast! The corpses can't keep up with ye!"

AN officer writes: A short time since while I was passing up the Missouri River, during very high water, the Captain of the steamer spiked some wood partially submerged, and thinking we got it very cheap, the boat was loaded, and all was in readiness to commence taking it on board. Just at this moment the owner of the "wood yard" made his appearance, mounted on a mule, and announced that the wood could not be bought for less than $5 per cord. The Captain told him he did not want any wood at that price, and the boat was again started. We had not gone more than two hundred yards, however, when we were halted by a man standing near a cabin, who evidently had heard the conversation at the lower "wood pile." The engines were at once stopped, and the man yelled at the top of his voice: "Leap, Cap'n! I've got some good, hard, dry wood you may have for three dollars a cord!" "All right," says the Captain: "where is it?" The man slowly raised his hand, and, pointing inland, said: "Well, Cap'n, it's just about four miles right back there to the woods!"

DR. E. K. JONES, formerly a resident of Schoharie County, New York, thinks so often of other persons' health that his own became somewhat impaired. He went to Oswego in the summer of 1862 to be examined and numbered into the volunteer service of the United States. The examining surgeon asked him "if he ever had an attack of the headache or tooth-ache? if so, how often he experienced such an attack, and how long it generally lasted?"

His reply was that he "occasionally had the headache; it would come on about once a month, and last about six weeks!"

DEAR DANFORTH.—I think it was in the March Number that a "good one" on "old Grove" was related by your Abercrombie correspondent. Here is another, and a "reliable gentleman" can be found who will vouch for it. "Grove" was on his way to St. Cloud with a jolly party of friends, one cold day last winter, and when they arrived at the little village of Clear Water (eleven miles below St. Cloud) they concluded to "get outside of something warm" as soon as possible; so they hitched their team, proceeded to the hotel, and called for something to "give away." The food was set before them, and Grove quickly filled his glass as he repeated: "Is this clear water?" The landlord replied (thinking he alluded to the village) that it was. "Then," said he, pushing his glass down him with an expression of the most supreme disgust, "give me whisky, for my stomach could never stand a dose of clear water on us cold a day as this!" The crowd roared, the landlord caved, and the boys didn't have any thing to pay at that bar.

DURING the campaign in East Tennessee, in the winter of 1863-64, quite a spirited engagement occurred near Denn Station, in the beautiful valley of the Holston. In this engagement Colonel Wolford of Kentucky commanded a division of Federal cavalry, and was badly engaged with the enemy, and at nightfall was compelled to retreat. Some time after we visited Denn Station, and passing over the ground held by Wolford's Division we came to a log-hut, in the door of which stood a "best woman" with seven small children and "one at the breast"—one of that class of poor "white trash" who so frequently complained during the war that "we all will perish to death if we don't go to your house, and let us live alone." Approaching the "best woman," we informed her that we were looking over the ground of the late engagement, and asked her if she would please inform us of the position held by the Federal troops. Her reply was thus laconic: "Wah! per seet, Cap'n Wolford's knee along with two long strings of light, all mounted on cotton socks, and he had two warm guns, and he stretched his strings of light right back if any longer than, and they lit and they burnt till clean dark, and they tore down my milk-house, and Cap'n Wolford lit out and never has yet paid me a cent for it. Do you-uns know Cap'n Wolford's name?"

Fully satisfied with her graphic description of the engagement, and informing her that we did not know of "Cap'n Wolford's" whereabouts, we passed on.

THIS comes from Schoharie County, New York:

There is in our temple a devotee of St. Patrick, of the pure, unadulterated stock. His pedigree is without spot or blemish—and so is his character for the manner of that. Jerry is quite defective in his hearing; a misfortune he sadly laments to own to, and many are the ratches and guesses he will make at your meaning where the sound of your voice does not penetrate his ears at all. Often, when speaking to him in a very loud tone, he will motion me out to go to so loud, protesting that he could hear no words better if I wouldn't speak so loud. One day, in order to try him, I approached him in an excited manner, making gestures as if I was in great earnest, yet whispering so low that a person with ears ever so sharp could not possibly have heard me. Jerry bent his head for a moment, and then exclaimed: "Jinkin, Son, if you wouldn't speak so loud I think I could hear you." It confuses me entirely when you speak so loud!

Jerry had a saying that was sufficient to almost every thing he said, and sometimes it bore a significance truly ludicrous; it was, "By the help of God." One day we had been buying some screw in the bunch, and Jerry was sent to the town to help put it in and see to the mounting of it. While paying for the screw I noticed that Jerry was immensely pleased at something, and when the man had left I asked him if the screw was all right! "Fah, I believe it is, Son, for I chanted him out of ten hundred, by the help of God!"

THE smart child-rentall have a plan this month in the Drawer:

Our friend B—— has a hopeful son of three summers—a curly-headed, fair-complexioned little fellow, who is not so unobedient as original in his ideas. A few days ago Harry was amusing himself by throwing an elastic ball at the ceiling in the sitting-room, where B—— was at the time perusing the "latest news." By some mishap the ball lodged on top of the book-case, out of sight and reach of the young hopeful. He, not knowing what had become of it, began exclaiming, "Come down! throw it down!" when his mother stepped into the room and asked him what had become of his ball. His reply was, "Up! up!" and at the same time reiterating the request to have it thrown down. "Who are you talking to?" asked his mother. Harry looked her in the face, and with the utmost assurance answered, "Why, God!" At this juncture R—— came to the rescue, and restored the ball to the boy.

WHILE at breakfast the other morning a little girl at the table departed from "good manners" so far as to take her meat into her fingers. This brought out a lecture from her father, who concluded by saying, "If we were visiting with you any where we should have to say that we found you in the woods, and that you were brought up by a monkey!" The only response from the little impudent was, "Father, are you a monkey?"

A BRIGHT six-year-old in our house asked her mother one day, "Who made the Sabbath-day?" and when told that it was God, instantly replied, "But does not God tell us that it is wrong to work on the Sabbath-day?" showing that metaphysical fogs are not confined to older heads. The little noddle had evidently come to the conclusion that if God made the Sabbath he must have worked on the Sabbath in doing it.

Another, somewhat older, was reading a tale aloud, and coming to the sentence, "The sequel of the story will appear in the next chapter," astonished her auditors by the announcement—"The squeal of the story will appear," etc.

COMING up the Mississippi we had an original darkey girl on board the steamboat. Hearing some of us say steamboats sometimes exploded their boilers, says she, "If dis here steamboat 'splods her bilers I kin jump into de waters and waddle my legs and git to shore!"

WHILE visiting at my sister's, not long since, her little daughter, four years old, came in one morning, looking very serious, and inquired of her mother why she was not black like Sarah (a colored servant girl in the family); and on being told that God did not intend her to be black, she replied, "I 'spect I knows; I 'spect God run out of black!"

A FRIEND writes:

Looking over the good things of the Drawer for June I saw one among the army stories that recalled to mind a little incident where words were mispronounced, and their meaning misunderstood by those using them. The first was by an estimable old lady, who was a devoted and constant reader of the Bible, and used often to read and expound the same to our diminutive understanding. I was always a ready and willing listener. We were enjoying such an occasion, when all at once she stopped short in her reading, and then slowly and very distinctly pronounced the word Synagogue, dividing it in this wise—Syn-a-go-gue. She pronounced it again in a more emphatic manner Syn-a-go-gue, and then, turning to me with a look of wonderment upon her noble old face, said: "I have read the Bible all my life, and I can't recollect of ever having seen that word before." I could hold in no longer, but let off one of my heartiest laughs at the old lady's expense, and got out and kept out of the way of her wrath until she had got over her vexation enough to allow me to explain. But she never forgave my laughing at her mistake.

THE following story is related of a Judge who presided over the judicial affairs of the — District, in Alabama:

The Judge has an acquaintance at one of the towns where he held court. The acquaintance was a shiftless fellow, but so good-natured that he was tolerated in good society. He had a practice of borrowing money of the Judge when opportunity offered. The Judge at one time had a $100 bill of the new issue of the bank at Decatur, of very good design and finish, the back of which was red. Seeing Mr. Shiftless approaching him, and anticipating his intention, the Judge put the bill in an unused portion of his pocket-book, and showed he had but a little money—scarcely enough to bear his expenses home. The ruse was successful, and the Judge thought no more of the matter. A short time afterward he purchased a new pocket-book, and on arriving at home took the notes and papers from the old one and placed them in the new, then threw the old one in the fire. His little son seeing something yet in the old pocket-book snatched it out to find the $100 bill the Judge had hid on the occasion mentioned before.

Not long afterward the Judge attended a public meeting, and while the crowd was gathering, awaiting the arrival of speakers, etc., the Judge related the incident to a crowd of friends standing around. A short distance from the Judge an old farmer was sitting on a log, marking in the sand with a stick, apparently paying no attention to any thing; but as the Judge finished he raised up, gave vent to a loud, shrill whistle of disbelief, and looking at the Judge, exclaimed: "My gracious, Judge, what a whopper that is for you!"

IN Cincinnati there occurred recently a scene at the door of the — Chapel, in which the prime actor came off considerably the worse for wear. A young man, who believed he knew as much as any other man, had been paying his attentions to a young lady, who, among her other attractions, possessed a very luxuriant growth of red hair. The young man could not induce the young lady to think him better than other men, and she finally gave him the mitten. One evening after this, thinking his time to get even had arrived, he stationed himself in the aisle near the chapel door, and seeing the young lady coming, threw up his hands, pretending fright, and exclaimed, "Stand aside, boys, or you will take fire! Here comes —" (naming the lady). She walked very leisurely to where the young man was standing, stopped, and looked him in the face, saying, "You need not be alarmed, Mr. —; you are entirely too green to burn."

The roar of laughter which greeted the young man's ears was more than he could well relish, and he beat a hasty retreat.

A FRIEND in Kentucky, who is always welcomed to the Drawer, contributes a few fresh anecdotes:

A few years ago I was at Estill Springs "for my health." You know what that means, I suppose? I didn't go to see the elephant; for, situated as the Springs are in the mountains, no elephant could get there—especially if its trunk was the Saratoga kind. Lounging through the drawing-rooms one cool forenoon I overheard as I passed a piquant bijouterie of a belle say to a gentleman, "Oh, Mr. Will, here's Joe has just made me a present of his heart and hand! Of all presents what will be the most suitable in return?"

Will, with a sneering look under the edges of his eyelids at his embarrassed, silly-looking rival, just said, "Presents of Mind is what he wants most!" Then the dropping of the ivory piano-keys came in, and I heard no more.

I VISITED a petite and pretty little feminine once. She happened to be standing under the mantle-piece, which made her diminutiveness very striking. I said, banteringly:

"I declare, Miss —, you are a little thing! You seem to get smaller and smaller every day!"

"Yes," came the answer, like a flash; "and if you don't mind I'll be invisible to you."

That visit was spoiled.

You have heard of Mark Hardin in the old times. He was soldier, lawyer, politician, and improved Hardin County by making it his home. A proposition arose while he was a candidate for the Legislature to cut off a new county from Hardin, to be called Larue. The county seat was not determined upon, but Hodgenville was the favorite in the race. Mark opposed the division bitterly, but, he soon found, uselessly. Both sections wanted it to go. The candidate, seeing further resistance was useless, made an appointment to speak at Hodgenville—the very hot-bed of county secession—and duly appeared on the stump. He began his speech somehow in this way:

"Fellow-citizens: I hear every where that there is a decided wish to divide our county; and some, I regret to say, oppose it. Why? I ask, why? fellow-citizens. Look at this end of Hardin. It comes out of the way. It is detached naturally from Hardin. It projects like the toe of a boot; and, fellow-citizens, the toe of that boot ought to be applied to the blunt end of any candidate who opposes this just, proper, and natural division. [Cheers.] Having shown you that this end (Larue) is thus by nature, and should be divided by law from the other, my next consideration is the county seat. To gentlemen as intelligent as you, and as familiar with the section to be divided off, I need not point out that Hodgenville will be the centre of the proposed county; and where, but at the centre, should the county seat be? [Cheers.] Gentlemen, you have doubtless heard the removal of our State capital spoken of. As it is, it is tucked up in a north corner of the State, where it is about as convenient a situation for the capital of the whole State as Elizabethtown [the county seat of Hardin] is to be the county seat of Larue. The same reasons that induce us to separate this part of the county from the other should make us move the capital. We must move it, and to the centre of the State. Now take a map. Kentucky is 420 miles long, by about 140, in the centre, wide. Now Larue County is on a perpendicular line just 70 miles from the Ohio River, and 210 from each end of the State, and Hodgenville is the centre of Larue County. I have thus mathematically demonstrated to you that the State Capital should be removed to Hodgenville. [Enthusiastic cheering.] Fellow-citizens: I have been inadvertently led into these questions, but I will proceed further. In the late war [the war of 1812] Washington City was burned by the British; and why? Because it was on our exposed border. The national capital should be removed from the Atlantic coast, and to the centre of the Union. Kentucky is the great seal set in the centre of our mighty republic, as you will see by enumerating the surrounding States, and as I have already shown you that this is the centre of Kentucky, the national capital should be removed to Hodgenville." As some had begun to smell a large Norway by this time the cheering wasn't quite so loud. "Nay," said the orator, in a burst of enthusiasm, "Hodgenville is the centre of God's glorious and beautiful world!"

"How in the — do you make that out?" said an irritated voice in the crowd.

The speaker, drawing himself up, and sweeping his forefinger in a grand circle about the horizon, said, "Look how nice the sky fits down all around!"

Hardin didn't go to the Legislature that time, though he had mathematically demonstrated every point he made.

AT A dinner-party of Americans in one of the European cities, in 1864, among the guests was a dentist of some distinction, who is the Court Dentist for several sovereigns. In speaking of our civil war and the opinions of the sovereigns upon the same, as well as other subjects, the dentist related a great many things which he said had been told him by these dignitaries, which it seems no one had ever seen published or heard of before. As he continued for some time in that style the Hon. W. M. E—, one of the party, who seemed not to credit the revelation of what appeared to be state secrets, replied to our dentist as follows: "Doctor E—, we had always supposed princes were quite reticent, but now we know they have to open their mouths to dentists."

This created quite a laugh, in which the dentist joined, but without seeing the point.

THE following occurred while the gallant Second Wisconsin infantry was encamped on Arlington Heights, Virginia, in the spring of 1861. From the day of its organization the regiment had been followed by a genius that went by the name of "Yank." Now "Yank" was slightly wrong in the "upper story," and withal stammered considerably in his speech, but for all that was exceedingly sharp at a bargain and quick and cutting at repartee. At that time Captain G—, well known throughout the State of Wisconsin before the war as a prominent politician of good legal attainments, eccentricity, a disregard for the laws of fashion, and as an unmerciful practical joker, commanded Company —. Nature had not dealt very liberally with the valiant Captain in the way of personal appearance, his eyes not having been set squarely in his face, and a huge wart adding largely to the dimensions of his nose. Now clothe the Captain in a suit of government military clothes, altered by a bungling army-tailor to conform slightly to regulation requirements, with a white woolen shirt (such as were first issued to the army), with a collar containing material enough to make a reasonable-sized garment of that description, government brogans, and you have the Captain's personnel. One morning the Captain, dressed as above described, in his walk around the camp, came across "Yank," busily engaged in rubbing an apparently dead army-horse, and accosted him with, "Well, 'Yank,' what are dead horses selling at this morning?" "Yank" straightened himself up, and turning and looking the Captain square in the face, replied, "About the s-s-same price as s-s-shirt-collars and w-w-warts."

The shout that greeted this can be better imagined than described.

BUT "Yank" was not the only "character" of which the Second could boast. Company — had enrolled on its muster-rolls a young man who was nicknamed by his comrades, for some peculiarity, "Puss." Now "Puss" was a tough one. In camp he was a great shirker, and many were the reprimands and punishments he received for neglect of duty; but on the march, the bivouac, or the battlefield "Puss" was a gay and gallant soldier, and many weary miles of marching were made shorter by his lively songs and happy hits at persons and their peculiarities. And better still, "Puss" never shirked a fight. At South Mountain the Second, with the other gallant regiments composing the "Iron Brigade," was assigned the duty of carrying the pass at the point where the main road that passes through Frederick City and Middletown crosses the mountain. Company — was one of the companies selected for the skirmish-line. At first no trouble was experienced in driving back the rebel skirmishers, but finally they came to a halt. Thus matters stood for some five minutes, our boys giving the rebs leaden invitations to vamoise, and the rebs giving, in the same style, their objections to any further retrograde movement. "Puss" had been doing his best with his "Springfield," but all at once he stopped firing, slammed the butt of his musket to the ground, and with all the vim his lungs would allow, yelled out to the rebs: "Well, you rascally rebel cut-throats! if you are going to run, why don't you git up and skedaddle? Now git!" Whether the invitation to "git" had any effect or not we can't say; but this is certain, a short time afterward rebs were scarce in that neighborhood.

THE Sixth Wisconsin was in the same brigade. It entered the service with a better class of officers than usually falls to the lot of volunteer organizations. One of the best was Captain —, of Company —, a German, strict in discipline, prompt in the discharge of all his duties, and a splendid drill-master, with the one failing of not having completely mastered the English language. On drill, one day, the Captain was putting his company through company movements at the double quick, and in giving an order for a change of front had failed to give it distinctly, and the result of the attempt to execute the movement, as the men severally understood it, was a mass of men jammed in together without the least evidence of organization. The Captain yelled "Hal-l-It!" and addressed the men thus: "Now what you look? You look like one herd of goose!" Military discipline was not strong enough to prevent a good, hearty laugh, which the Captain could not understand, until some one explained the difference in the application of the words "flock" and "herd."

MR. N—, a fashionable hat dealer in — Street, one of the most genial and agreeable of men, was conversing one day with some friends on the subject of business-habits and manners. Some one present congratulated Mr. N— on his pleasant way with customers, intimating that business must be promoted by courtesy. Mr. N— said, laughingly, that he remembered an instance in point. "Before setting up my present business," he said, "I was for a year or two a clerk in Mr. A—'s carpet store. While there I sold a carpet to a lady and gentleman from a suburban town. One day, during my first year here, the same lady and gentleman came in to look at furs. I recognized them immediately by some peculiarity which I had noticed on the former occasion, and having perhaps some feeling that I might help to induce a trade by scraping acquaintance, I remarked, pleasantly, 'I think I sold you a carpet last year in Mr. A—'s store?' 'Oh, yes,' replied the lady; 'I remember. It faded all out!'"

THE Indians have not figured much in the Drawer, for they are as a race not much given to joking, but this is a pretty fair sample of Indian wit:

A day or two since Colonel Brackett, commanding Fort Churchill, Nevada, was strolling along the banks of Carson River, where there are some Pi-Ute Indian lodges. The men were all playing cards and loafing, and the squaws were at work making baskets, grinding grass-seed for bread, etc. Meeting Jim Mott, the chief, Colonel B. said, "Jim, you Indians are of little account; you do no work, and the squaws work all the time." "Dat's true," said Jim. "White man and Indian woman much alike—work all time; Indian man and white woman much alike—no work at all!"

How do the ladies like that?

AN ardent temperance man was talking to a crowd of drinkers once at Sharon Springs, telling them of the awful effects of drinking ardent spirits. A noted toper in the crowd said: "Now, Mister, I just want to tell you why I take a dram occasionally. I knew a man once who believed exactly as you do; never drank any thing but cold water. He died suddenly, as the doctor said, of apoplexy; but when they came to open him they found him full of icicles!"

THE Drawer thinks the following claim a good one:

Of the contributor to the Drawer from Nevada we claim the bottle of Sonoma wine. In Washington, where the salaries of Government clerks are well known to run up from 1st class; the 1st class being $1200 per annum, the 2d $1400, etc., occurred the following:

A young Southern Ohioan, who had "traveled," talked big, thought "he'd try a Government clerkship a while," etc., came on here for the purpose of procuring such a position, and applied to his "member," who immediately set about to obtain the prize for the son of his influential constituent. Meeting him on the street one day, he said:

"Well, Mr. W—, I've been very fortunate; I have procured you a 2d class clerkship in the Treasury Department."

Imagine his astonishment when young Buckeye replied: "I'll be darned if I'll have it! If I can't have a 1st class I won't have any!"

A FORMER chaplain in the army appreciates the debt he owes the Drawer for past favors, and pays in kind:

Some very amusing incidents occurred among the contrabands during the war, of which the delegates of the Christian Commission were witnesses. The following I have never seen published:

At a meeting of the colored "breddren" for prayer, one of their number offered the following petition: "Lord bress dese poor critters and dese yer sinners. Dey's surrounded by a great many blessings. Dey don't know how good you is. Dey's like de hog under de 'simmon-tree, catin' de 'simmons, and don't know whar dey come from. Hab mercy on all de sinners, and on my Jim, 'cause he's a bad boy, Lord—badder than you knows for! He swars. He swars drefful, Lord, when you don't know it. He swars more in de tent than he do outdoors! Now bress us all, and stand by me, and I'll stand by you—sartin'!"

At a prayer-meeting in Washington, on the morning after the assassination of the President, a colored man, praying for vengeance on the murderers, said: "Now, Lord, gib it to 'em right smart, and don't be so merciful as you generally am!"

At Belle Plain I had been expounding to the negroes the parable of the Prodigal Son. When I concluded, one of them arose, and, in the soberest manner, said: "Now, breddren, we's a great deal better off than the Prodigal Son, 'cause he didn't hab no gemman of a different color to come to him and tell him how glad his Fadder would be to hab him come home!"

HERE is a portion of another prayer offered the same evening: "Lord, as thou didst hear our prayers away down Souf, when we held de hoe and de plow in de hot sun, and answer them, so hear our prayer for de Union army. Guard them on de right hand and on de left, and in de rar! Don't luff 'em alone, though they's mighty wicked. Be their bulwarks and ditches, and teach 'em how to fight!"

Another prayed: "O Lord, if you please, Sir, come down out of de heavens and take a ride round about here, and gib it a mighty shake!"

"PETE" has been in the Drawer before, but we think his last a good one:

S— has been selling unclaimed packages for the American Express Company. Those of your readers who have ever attended one of these auction sales can testify that, in most cases, buyers as well as packages are well sold; but I leave you to judge who was worst beaten in the following instance:

A large-sized envelope and contents (unknown, of course) was offered. Scarcely had the "How much for this?" passed the lips of S—, when "Nigger Pete" stepped into the door, and, without looking to see what was up, bid "twenty-five cents," and the package was quickly his. "Pass up your money," cried S—. "Let's see what's in dar fust," says Pete. This, of course, was against the rules, and Pete being fully convinced of this fact, carefully drew forth a bank-bill, and with a "Who cares for a quarter any how?" passed over the money, took the package, and while waiting for change opened the envelope, which contained a prize-concert humbug of some sort. Shouts of laughter greeted our darkey on this exposé, but he kept perfectly cool, for he knew where the laugh would come in. At this juncture the cashier handed back Pete's bill, remarking that it was worthless. Now was Pete's time! Seizing the bill, and making for the door, laughing as only he can laugh, he shouted: "Yah! yah! I knowed dat all de time; I knowed dat bill wa'n't worth noffin, nor de package neider!—dey can't fool Pete!" After the explosion which followed had somewhat subsided, S—, greatly vexed, remarked: "I should like to have some man tell me of one good thing that nigger ever did."

Don't you think we have told it?

AN Assistant-Assessor of the Internal Revenue sends to the Drawer this unique return:

"SIR,—I am not a resident of this village, have no worldly goods except a few rags which the tailor said were garments, one worn-out copy of Esop's Fables, Pope's Essay on Man, and a copy, in large print, of the 'Caudle Lectures,' a pair of dumb-bells, and set of boxing-gloves, and—I had almost forgotten—a very elaborate treatise on Physic. I make it a rule never to carry any more portable property than I can safely get away from the boarding-house keeper's with at the end of the month. Hoping you will put my name down on your books as a 'dead beat,' I am, yours, etc."

ONE who signs himself a "Long Reader" writes as follows:

Having devoured you for years without a return, I propose giving you one, for the truth of which more than one can testify.

In 1861 the Annual Conference assembled in our place, and, as is usual on such occasions, the houses of the community were thrown open to receive those in attendance. Among those entertaining guests was Mrs. Jones, and supposing her little boy Frankie would be catechised to some extent, she settled in her own mind the leading questions and appropriate answers, as follows:

"Well, Sir, how are you to-day?"

"Pretty well, I thank you."

"What is your name, Sir?"

"Frankie Jones."

"How old are you, Frankie?"

"Three years old in June."

"Who made you, Frankie?"

"God."

"What did God make you of, Frankie?"

"Dirt."

The day for the convening of Conference arrived, and with it the corps of ministers, two of whom were brought to Frankie's home. Frankie was not long in making his appearance and ingratiating himself into the good graces of the guests—when, sure enough, the first question propounded by the good-natured minister, on whose knee Frankie had almost unconsciously seated himself, was—

"Well, Sir, how do you do?"

"Pretty well, thank you—Frankie Jones—three years old in June—God—dirt!" responded Frankie, without a moment's hesitation, turning his mother's catechism inside out in an instant, to her utter astonishment and mortification, and the amazement of his questioner.

A YOUNG lady from the country making her first visit to the city was taken by her friend to a day performance of the Opera, which is known as "a Matinée." She was intensely delighted, and thought that nothing could surpass that, until she attended Opera in the evening. The splendor of the building by the dazzling gas-lights, the magnificent toilets of the ladies with diamonds and jewels, the music, and probably the atmosphere, all combined, fairly turned her head. After her return to the country she was full of her visit to the city, and never tired of talking of what she saw, especially of the Opera. If you answered yes to her question whether you had ever attended "a Matinée," she always exclaimed, "Oh, but you should attend a Matinée in the evening!"

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BALL'S BLUFF.

July 25, 1861.—Clear and hot. Making an early start from Jones's tavern, I rode to Hancock, suffering with the intense heat during the latter part of my journey. Foreseeing also to what degree of insolence the success at Manassas would raise the revolutionary party, I was disturbed with serious apprehensions in regard to the condition of my family, lest my action in the late campaign should be visited upon my father. A Union refugee, however, informed me he had left all well at Berkeley the day before. I dined in Hancock, and crossing the river, reached Berkeley in the afternoon. Our circle there were all well and comparatively cheerful, discussing the battle of Manassas and making light of it.

My father, who had served through the War of 1812, insisted that it would require at least three years to make soldiers of the American Volunteers, and during the process we must expect many defeats and humiliations. The immediate cause of the loss of the battle at Manassas he thought was, that our available force was not used, one half of it at least taking no part in the fight, according to accounts.

For the rest, the atmosphere at Berkeley was refreshing with courageous and defiant loyalty. The village had not been without its special excitements during my absence. Not to fall behind the times, the citizens had formed a volunteer Home Guard for the purpose of police duty and watching over the general welfare of the community. They kept their headquarters in the Court-house, sat up of nights, arrested each other and every body they found prowling about. It was shrewdly suggested that the peace of the lonely village might have been better preserved if every body went quietly to bed and minded their own business. But in times of revolutionary excitement people can not keep quiet even in view of their own safety, and along the Border every man seemed to suppose he had the right to constitute himself a special constable, to arrest and cross-question every other man he met with whose business he was unacquainted.

One night Dick Ganoe, a harmless and well-meaning citizen of the Home Guard, arrested a stranger who was riding into town from the direction of Winchester. Dismounting his prisoner, Ganoe led the way to the Court-house, lounging along with his musket under his arm and his hands in his pockets as was his wont. The stranger, who followed in apparent acquiescence, quietly drew a pistol and blew the citizen's brains out, then mounted and continued his journey northward. This shot also terminated the volunteer labors of the Home Guard. It abdicated, and was heard of no more.

I spent four days here with my family in the enjoyment of a social intercourse which was cheerful and engaging, despite our adverse surroundings; yet an ever-present sense of insecurity disturbed my repose, and gloomy forebodings of a troubled future would cast their shadows athwart the sunlight of these genial hours. I slept with an arsenal of loaded arms in my bedroom, and nightly laid my clothes in position to be most conveniently gathered up. Still every thing around us remained quiet. The way to Winchester was open, and we could not hear that any Southern troops had returned to the valley.

A great awe seemed to have quelled the spirits of the people. Those who had deceived themselves or had been deluded by others into the belief that the dismemberment of the nation would be accomplished without bloodshed, now began to realize the true character of the contest which was opening. In the first ebullition of their zeal, the élite of the Virginia youth had rushed to the field, many serving as privates in the ranks. The slaughter at Manassas fell heavier (proportionately) upon this class than any other. There was blood upon the door-posts of many an aristocratic mansion, and, for a season, horror and mourning veiled the joy of victory. Among meaner spirits the effect of this battle had already begun to manifest itself in the usual manner. I was informed by a neighbor that several of those whom I had met on the road to Martinsburg and encouraged to resist the assumptions of State officers had openly denounced me for it.

July 29.—To-day I was again warned by a friend that armed squads had appeared in the vicinity, and that I was menaced with arrest. My leave expires to-morrow, and this news shall not hasten my movements.

July 30.—Clear and warm. Purchased a new saddle and refitted generally for my journey. I took leave of my friends and family, with a sad presentiment that I would never again see that social circle cheerful and unbroken as I left it. No one there except my father knew that I was actually connected with the army. I had concealed it from the people lest it should bring trouble upon those I left behind. I hid it from some who should have known it because I had not the heart to declare it.

As I left the village I perceived the national flag still floating on the staff upon the mountain. The local sympathizers had not had the assurance to touch it. I saluted and took comfort. It was still the emblem of power, civilization, and hope.

Several miles on my way I was joined by my neighbor Aaron Bechtol, who came in from a side-road. He was a determined Union man, had sent his sons to the National army, and now, in view of probable troubles, was going into voluntary exile. He had just had an excited discussion with some Secessionists of the vicinity, who twitted him with the result at Manassas, and threatened him with the vengeance of the Confederate authorities, who now held undisputed sway in Virginia. The United States, they said, was a foreign country, and those that refused to acknowledge the Southern Government must leave it. Bechtol replied that, for the present, he would go, as he did not care to live where he could not express his free opinions. "But mark my words," he continued, pointing to the flag that floated on the hill, "under the protection of that flag I will return one day, free and honored, while you and those who make war upon it will be in your bloody graves, or hunted into exile without pity or shelter." His words have been literally fulfilled.

We rode to Hancock together. By the way I met another old acquaintance. We stopped, shook hands, conversed in a friendly manner for a few minutes, and then parted forever; he wending his way to join the Southern army, I following the route toward the national capital.

At Hancock I met my brother-in-law, J. L. R., recently returned from Florida, and on his way to Berkeley. The picture he gives of the condition of things in Washington is deplorable in the extreme.

The revolution has broken up his business in the South, and the climate has impaired his health. His return to Berkeley at this juncture is most fortunate. Commending my family and interests to his care, I told him I was off for the army. If we had been fortunate at Manassas I might have turned back, but the cloud of gloom and disaster which overshadows the national cause had hardened my purpose to iron.

At Fairview, on the turnpike, I stopped to rest and refresh. From the front porch of this house there is a beautiful and comprehensive view of the Shenandoah Valley, extending as far up as the Massanutten Mountains above Front Royal and Strasburg. The towns of Williamsport, Martinsburg, and Shepherdstown are distinctly visible, while the sites of Harper's Ferry, Charlestown, and Winchester can be distinguished. Upon this azure map the whole circuit of the late campaign could be satisfactorily traced.

This country had been my play-ground in boyhood. Each field, each house, each clump of trees recalled some friendly face, some youthful sport, some genial hour of past delight.

There from childhood to maturity I had lived, opulent in friendships and social-sympathy. That fair valley was now the land of mine and my country's enemies: among them I could see whole squadrons of my kindred and former friends—the kindly and generous companions of the olden times. It mattered little to me now how they came to be there, through error, perversity, conscience, weakness, or chance. The Potomac that flowed between us now rolled a fathomless gulf of blood and fire. On this side I was alone. There was neither friend, nor kinsman, nor neighbor to whom I might turn for countenance or counsel in those hours of soul weariness which oppress one whose individuality is too heavily taxed. On this side I found none nearer to me than the acquaintances of yesterday, marching together as champions of a common cause, but strangers to the heart. I felt the weight of my position. I was an exile indeed, poor, weary, and dispirited! Yet I had taken my course after calm and full deliberation. I had asked no man's counsel, and confided my conclusions to one alone.

I had also saved from the wreck of fortune, friendship, and home two jewels of great price—talismanic gems, the possession of which would insure me cheerfulness in the midst of defeat and disaster, and supply the place of fortune hereafter. These were my self-respect and my father's blessing. Courage, O my soul! There is inspiration in the recollection of that venerable face and fearless spirit—enough to brace me for the rugged and eventful journey before me. The sun of my life has already passed the meridian, but there is still time to play an honorable part in the magnificent drama which is developing.

My reflections were disturbed by the approach of a fellow in the uniform of a Federal soldier, who commenced rather unceremoniously plying me with questions. As I perceived he had been drinking and saw no reason why I was bound to gratify his curiosity, I replied civilly but evasively, and in a manner to mystify him. I was presently called to dinner, and when I returned to the bar-room found my late catechiser lecturing a group of a dozen or twenty rough-looking men, and perceived by their looks and gestures that I was the subject of his discourse. My soldier, evidently advanced in drunkenness, ceased speaking as I entered, and, approaching me again, commenced his impertinent queries. He demanded my name, business, and destination, and desired particularly to know why I was traveling with a map of Washington County in my haversack. I replied evasively as before, and told the landlord to have my horse brought out.

The soldier then made open appeals to the by-standers to assist him in arresting me; but finding no one disposed to join him, he turned to me again, and gave me to understand that my talk and appearance were unsatisfactory and suspicious, and he was determined to know what my business was. I asked him sharply who he was, what he was doing here, and upon what authority he undertook to question travelers. He answered, that he was a soldier of the Potomac Home Brigade, and he considered it his duty to find out whether a man had a right to travel about with a map of Maryland in his pocket. In return, I informed him that I was in the United States service, and attached to the Topographical Corps of Patterson's army.

"To-py—top-py—to-pee—to-hell!" he exclaimed, staggering with the effort to accomplish the knotty polysyllable. "I believe you're a dam'd rebel spy."

I retorted, "And I know you're a drunken blockhead skulking away from your duty, and who will be arrested as a deserter as soon as I can inform the officer of the next military post."

I immediately mounted and rode off, leaving my soldier to the derision of his companions. At sunset I reached Williamsport, and found there numerous Union refugees from Martinsburg and some military acquaintances. I here learned that the Army of the Shenandoah had been withdrawn from Harper's Ferry to Sandy Hook on the Maryland side, and that Banks had superseded Patterson in command.

July 31.—Clear and warm. Rode to Harper's Ferry by way of Sharpsburg and Antietam Iron Works. On entering our lines I was put under guard, and thus transferred from post to post until I arrived at head-quarters, three miles distant. These were established at the house of a Mr. Miller, on the bluff above Sandy Hook. Dismounting, I advanced with my guard to the gate, where we were stopped by a sentinel. I inquired for Captain Simpson, my chief; but no one seemed to know any thing about any body, and I saw none but strangers around me. Under the trees in the yard, about ten paces distant, I saw two officers standing apart and engaged in earnest conversation. One a man apparently of middle age and medium height, dark complexion, and angular face, stern countenance, and dignified manner; the other a much younger person, tall, handsome, and soldierly.

I addressed this pair with, "Colonel, can you tell me where Captain Simpson's quarters are?" The elder officer replied courteously, in a deep-toned voice, "You had better call the sergeant of the guard." The younger called sharply to the sentinel "to see what that man wanted."

I had begun to feel annoyed and irritated when Captain Abert, of the Topographical Corps, happening to pass recognized me, and relieved me from my embarrassment. He then introduced me to the officers, Major-General Banks, commanding the Army of the Shenandoah, and his Adjutant-General, Captain Robert Williams. General Banks received me courteously, and we had some conversation in reference to the war. Captain Williams was an officer of the regular army, and a brother Virginian, which, under present circumstances, is more than ever an especial claim to friendship.

I found the Topographical camp in a peach orchard adjoining the house, and re-entered my old quarters with those feelings of pleasure which are common to men and animals on revisiting places that have once sheltered them. My pony testified his accordance with this sentiment by repeated friendly whinnies as he rubbed noses with his equine companions of the late campaign.

Except General Patterson's personal aids all the staff had remained, and was busily engaged in organizing a new Army of the Shenandoah on a more enduring basis than that which had recently evaporated. The regular cavalry under Thomas, Doubleday's battery, and the Rhode Island artillery, were still with us, while fresh regiments, enlisted for the war, were industriously drilling on the open fields in sight. The humiliations of the late campaigns had been discussed and accepted as national blessings (in disguise); although it required very strong philosophical magnifiers to enable some of us to see through the disguise.

I had hoped that an early and decisive overthrow of the insurgent forces would have quenched the spirit of sedition, and have saved the South from the terrible calamities and hopeless ruin that a long war must inevitably bring upon her. But with the dawning of a martial era the mind naturally reverts to the dogmas of the sword. "God is great;" "whatever is, is right;" "whatever is to be, will be."

The week following my reinstallment in the Topographical quarters was occupied in projecting an accurate map of the northern districts of Virginia, which were evidently destined to be the most important theatre of war. I was astonished to ascertain how limited and inaccurate was the information at Washington in regard to the topography, geography, and statistics of the interior of Virginia; while the Government had most complete and accurate surveys of all the Southern coasts, and thorough topographical maps of the Southwestern States and Territories, even to Oregon and California. The Ancient Dominion had jealously maintained her constitutional impenetrability. No National scow was ever permitted to rake mud out of her rivers, and no Federal engineer to set up his tripod on her sacred soil. The consequence was that reliable maps of the country could not be procured. We set about remedying this evil by all the means in our power, reducing the various county surveys in our possession to uniformity, examining refugees white and black, and eking out such uncertain information with my personal knowledge of the country, which was considerable.

This occupation was varied by visits to the surrounding camps, locating military roads, and reconnoitring expeditions to the neighboring heights.

On Sunday I attended divine service with the staff. Our canopy was a large mulberry-

THE DRUM ECCLESIASTIC.

tree. The chaplain of the Twelfth Massachusetts officiated from a pulpit which reminded one of Hudibras's —"drum eccle-iastic, Beaten with fist instead of a stick."

The regiment unarmed, neatly clad, and devoutly-mannered, formed in hollow square, inclosing the place of worship. After the sermon we called at the quarters of the Colonel commanding, Fletcher Webster, and had some fine music from the band.

A squad of our infantry made a successful raid into Loudon County, killing and wounding five rebels, and capturing nine men and nineteen horses. I went out to see the prisoners, but did not recognize any acquaintances among them. They were a seedy, poorly-equipped company, and did not present a very formidable appearance.

August 8.—My chief, Captain Simpson, having been commissioned Colonel of the Fourth New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, left us to-day, turning over the Topographical Establishment to Captain James Abert. At the same time Colonel Fitz John Porter and Captain Newton were appointed Brigadiers in the Volunteer service, and many other promotions were spoken of, which indicated a speedy breaking up and rearrangement of our staff and social relations.

August 15.—A pressing call from headquarters for route maps indicated that some movement was imminent. It had been reported, it seems, that Beauregard was about crossing at the Point of Rocks with forty thousand men to cut off Banks's force from Washington.

I do not credit these reports, as I believe that policy will restrain the Confederates from making any aggressive movements at this time. They have succeeded, as they suppose, in dismembering the country and establishing a very handsome empire for themselves, and now only wish to be let alone, that they may the more securely organize and consolidate their power. They will not fire another gun if they can help it, nor do aught else to arouse the dormant power of this purblind and amiable giant, the American People. Their astounding luck at Manassas has soothed the wounded vanity of the Southern rank and file, and the line of the Potomac will satisfy the imperial cupidity of the leaders, for the present at least. The hope of peaceful secession being blighted, they are wary about urging the war to extremities, and hope to accomplish their full purpose yet by negotiation and compromise. For these reasons, I think, they abstained from Washington after the late battle; and for these reasons, I think, a crossing of the Potomac is not in their present programme.

August 17, Saturday.—To-day the army struck tents and moved eastward. It was cloudy and threatening rain, and the staff did not get off until about the middle of the afternoon.

We took the road over the river bluffs, crossing the Catoctin ridge near the Point of Rocks, and halting at night in an apple orchard near an obscure hamlet called Lickville. Our trains had moved by the Jeffersonville road, and in consequence we found ourselves without shelter, beds, or provisions. A crop of oats lately cut stood in shocks in the orchard, and our horses helped themselves without any qualms of conscience. The men followed their example, and ate apples to amuse their hungry stomachs. A chilly rain had set in, and the officers grouped themselves around the fires kindled beneath the sheltering apple-trees. Feeling the need of something more substantial, Captain A—— and myself went foraging, and at a neighboring farm-house got a supper of light rolls, milk, stewed chicken, and ham, served by a sweet-faced girl of some twelve or fourteen years. Restored and humanized by the meal, we thought of the comfort of our commanding officer, and carried a plateful of our forage to the General.

As night advanced the rain became heavier, and no baggage train. The chiefs spread their shawls and blankets beneath the apple-trees, and prepared to pass the night en bivouac. My Captain, who was an old Rocky Mountain campaigner, made it a rule "never to go hungry if he could get a meal, and never to sleep in the rain if he could find a dry spot." So we bethought ourselves of a deserted log-house which stood, like an eyeless skull, in an adjoining field. Leaving our horses picketed up to their bellies in oats, we shouldered our saddles and took possession of our discovery. There were neither doors nor windows, but the roof and flooring were sound, and we soon had a fire roaring in the mouldy chimney.

Here we dried our blankets and brought oat straw enough for comfortable beds, and then betook ourselves to sleep. Alarmed at our presence, a pair of owls, who lodged in the attic, commenced scratching and hooting, but we did not disturb each other long.

August 18, Sunday.—It was still raining when we awoke. The earth was soaked and the foliage dripping. Our friends who roosted in the orchard had a flaccid, uncomfortable look; but the staff wagons had arrived, and preparations were made for establishing our camp. There was complaint and confusion on all sides. Every body missed something. Baggage, servants, wagons, and extra horses were strayed and lost; regiments had been separated from their trains; brigades had lost their way; officers had straggled from their regiments, and men from their officers. The heavy artillery had broken down; wagons had stuck in the mud, and others upset; teamsters had thrown out ordnance and commissary stores to lighten their loads, and left them to perish in the rain. Others had got drunk and abandoned their charges altogether. Men were scattered over the country generally, hungering and plundering.

It was the first march of an undisciplined army, aggravated by the additional misfortune of a heavy rain and bad roads. As the details came in during the day it seemed as if a Pandora's box of petty disasters had been opened among us. Yet by the following morning all the mistakes and accidents had been rectified and repaired, and the army moved in fine order through the Carroll Manor to an encampment on the east bank of the Monocacy River, opposite Buckeystown.

Lieutenants S—— and B——, of the Regular service, were appointed aids to the commanding General, and doubtless felt the dignity and responsibility of their new position. As we rode through Buckeystown in state a Volunteer Infantry man, who was seated on a fence, gave Lieutenant S—— a friendly poke in the ribs to attract his attention. The young aid-de-camp turned fiercely to resent the indignity, and met the unconscious face and bland inquiry of the incipient soldier:

"I say, Mister, is that Banks there, that feller with the leather cap?"

Even the educated martinet was mollified by the innocent earnestness of the questioner. He replied, politely and emphatically, "That is General Banks."

A little further on another musket-bearer, more advanced in military etiquette by several degrees, as he sits squatted on the top rail, salutes the passing cortège by presenting arms, barrel to front.

August 20, Tuesday.—Fair and pleasant. Amused myself sketching a most charming view from my tent door. As I had left home totally unprovided with extra clothes, I found my suit too thin for the chilling rains of the season, and bought a horse blanket from Frisby the cook to serve me as a cloak.

August 21.—To-day Captain A—— started with his party to reconnoitre and survey the roads toward the Potomac River. The company consisted of Captain A——, chief, with Mr. Luce and myself as assistants, then came our followers: Benjamin the Swiss valet, Swizert the groom, Henshaw the teamster, and Frisby the big cook, with two of Thomas's dragoons as escort—in all, nine men and twelve horses. About one o'clock P.M. we halted and pitched our tents in Howard's meadow, at the foot of Sugar-Loaf Mountain. This is a picturesque little group that rises in the midst of the plain country on the east side of the Monocacy River. It is totally disconnected with any of the regular mountain ranges of this region, and its loftiest summit attains the height of 1300 feet above the sea. This peak we ascended, and from it studied the localities and topography of the country for twenty miles around, and on both sides of the Potomac. We could see the enemy's camps at Leesburg, and our own forces guarding the fords at various points, while Stone's encampments around Poolsville seemed almost beneath our feet.

August 22.—We moved through Barnesville this morning, and found it very difficult to obtain any information from the people about the country or the roads. I think this is more the result of ill-will than of ignorance, as most of the population are Southern sympathizers. At Poolsville we were hospitably received by General Stone, and pitched our tents on the common beside his headquarters. We then started out to reconnoitre the different roads—I was ordered to view that leading toward Conrad's Ferry. On my way I called at the quarters of Colonel Cogswell, commanding the New York Forty-second, Tammany Regiment. The Colonel, who was a West Point officer, accompanied me to the river banks, and pointed out the enemy's camps and most important localities. From a hill I sketched a topographical view, including the Ferry, Ball's Bluff, and the town of Leesburg, four miles distant. We had a strong guard at the crossing, and as we rode back to camp a volunteer dragoon passed us, riding at full speed toward Poolsville. Cogswell halted him and demanded his news. In a voice husky with trepidation he said the pickets had been fired on, and the enemy was crossing in great force. He was almost too much blown and hurried to give details, but the Colonel was peremptory with his cross-questions.

"How many shots were fired before you left?"

"One!" said the fellow, catching his breath. "I heard it myself."

"And how many men did you see coming?"

The messenger reflected a little. "Two," said he.

The Colonel suggested that he was exaggerating.

He declared he was not. He had also heard the drums beating, and saw them coming beyond a doubt. And with this he sped on to General Stone with the important tidings. Cogswell, who was better mounted than I, rode rapidly back to prevent his regiment being disturbed by the news.

Since the battle of Manassas the troops seem to have been afflicted with a chronic affection of the nerves. The hum of a beetle through the air is sufficient to drive in a picket, and the sight of a negro in a canoe will stampede a whole regiment.

General Stone tells me that a few days ago he received information from a reliable loyal citizen, an eye-witness of the facts, that the enemy occupied a certain island in force, and was engaged in constructing an immense raft to enable them to cross the river. The General immediately visited the island indicated, and found it a desert with no trace of human occupancy upon it, the only foundation for the raft story being a large accumulation of drift-wood.

As I passed Camp Tammany I saw the Colonel sitting in his tent door smoking a quiet cigar. Just then I perceived that I was threatened with a danger more certain and imminent than an attack from the rebels. A dark thunder-cloud, all unperceived, had rolled up from the west, and a low-muttered growl warned me that my time was short. I started for Pools-ville at full speed, and had barely time to unsaddle when the hurricane burst upon us with a sweeping crash. My frail tabernacle flapped and rocked so violently that I was obliged to hold on to the poles to prevent its blowing over. The rain came down by bucketsful, and the level common was presently flooded. The Captain, who had returned from his reconnoissance, took refuge with me, the only dry spot in camp being a hillock in the centre of my tent. On this I collected my baggage, and here the Captain and I sat, enveloped in darkness, mud, and water, amusing ourselves with philosophical comments on the times, and pleasant stories of former adventures. When the fury of the storm was spent we looked out for supper, but the whole common was afloat, and the cook was in despair. The General's hospitable mess table supplied our wants for the evening. Luce was still missing, and as he was recklessly venturesome we surmised that he had been captured; but he at length returned, his boots full of water, drenched and hungry, with a plentiful supply of topographical notes, however.

August 23.—I slept last night with my oil-cloth sacking spread on a bed of mud, soft at least, if not wholesome. This morning, before rising, I gathered a supply of mushrooms which had sprung up around my couch. The commons were full of them, and we had a mess for breakfast.

But I must not waste too much time on these trivialities. However agreeable it may be personally to recall the minutest incidents of these days of cheerful hope and exciting expectancy, it can not be supposed that the public will patiently tread the slow, meandering path with the hope that it will lead in time to a field of historic incident. We must cut it short.

On Sunday, August 25, our party, after making a circuit through Dawsonville, Darnestown, Rockville, Mechanicsville, Brookville, Unity, and Damascus, rejoined the army, which we found encamped upon the hills about Hyattstown. Here the commanding General reviewed his force, amounting to ten thousand men of all arms.

On the 29th the army took position around Darnestown, extending its lines so as to meet Stone's command on the right, and the National forces under McCall at Tenallytown on the left. The topographical party established their camp in a pleasant meadow adjoining the village and opposite a grocery store. Here we spread our humid establishment to catch the rays of a genial sun, and prepared to luxuriate in unlimited butter and eggs. The untethered horses gambled and whinnied at will through the exuberant pasture. Every thing looked cheerful and jolly. Our gipsy life was eminently healthful; and here, in the midst of rest and plenty, we concluded that campaigning was not so dreadful after all. My friends and family were all well, and the war would presently be over (Mr. Seward had said so), and I would then return to them to tell my adventures and enjoy my laurels.

He who has not learned to dread these moments of self-gratulation, of happy abandonment, has read but superficially in the mystic volume of human life. How strangely is the shadow of coming misfortune ever mingled with the light of present joy. "Soul, take thine ease—thou hast much goods laid up for many years." The man has scarcely uttered the thought when he hears the awful voice: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." To appease this fearful power the Emperor Augustus (one day in every year) descended from his throne, put off his purple robes, and, clothing himself in rags and humility, poured out libations to the dark Fate who lies continually in wait for the lucky. The story of the sword of Damocles suspended over the feast is but another version of the same idea. How often in my life have these presentiments been fatally realized! How often has the boastful word trembling on my lips been suppressed by a vague dread of impending evil! How often, in the privacy of my own soul, have I smothered the glow of self-satisfaction, and poured libations of secret humility to avert the anger of the dark goddess! Is this superstition? Perhaps so; but it is not the less a pervading human instinct, recognized in every age and among all peoples. "Homo sum: humani nihil a me alienum puto."

This afternoon, to complete my contentment, I received a letter from my wife. On opening it the first sentence that struck my eye froze all my blood: "We have heard from our prisoners at Winchester. They are quite well."

This was all she said on the subject. There had evidently been other letters which had miscarried; but these few words, so obscure and unsatisfactory, left me no room to doubt who these "prisoners" were. I was sure my father and my cousin, Edmund Pendleton, had been arrested by the revolutionists and carried to Winchester. The absence of all definite information left me a prey to vague fears, worse than any form of reality. The evil I had most apprehended had fallen upon me. I was haunted by visions of his feeble form and venerable face, bowed with unwonted privations and shameful indignities. Yet I felt strong in the assurance that his stern, defiant soul would not quail under any outrage that the traitors by whom he was surrounded might offer him.

I deeply felt my own helplessness. The Government was as helpless as I was. But it is not good to dwell upon these subjects. Next day I saw in the papers an account of my father's arrest, confirming my surmises on the subject.

August 31.—The topographical party started to-day on another surveying tour. The people complain terribly of the National soldiers. They are accused of harrying potato-patches, violating hen-roosts, and burning fence rails without remorse or economy. I find these complaints are a very fair test of the political leanings of individuals. Friends of the Government do not regret the little inconveniences incident to the military occupation, and give cheerfully of their stores. Sympathizers with the rebellion screech and cackle louder than their unlucky poultry during a raid.

The country is also filled with refugees from the south side of the Potomac, running away to escape conscription. Some find honorable places in the National army, others seek employment among the neighboring farmers, and endeavor to support themselves; another class sponge on their Maryland acquaintance for a subsistence, talking secession and Southern rights the while, and boasting of their Virginian blood. Our Government should send these worthies back to the sacred soil whence they sprang.

September 6.—Visited Washington on some business with the Topographical Department. The view of the city, with its circumjacent camps, from the heights of Georgetown, was magnificent. On the street I met the District Marshal, Colonel Lamon, who told me the President would be pleased to see me, and we arranged a visit for to-morrow morning at nine.

September 7, Saturday.—According to yesterday's arrangement I called to see the President with Marshal Lamon. We found him in his office, and alone. On our entrance he called a clerk, expedited some business he had on hand, and then turned to converse with us. This he did with an air of honest and unreserved affability, and with one leg over the arm of his chair. His personal appearance was not so awkward or ungainly as I had expected. His face was hard and angular, but lighted with an expression of benevolence and sincerity that warmed the heart; nor was his manner wanting in native dignity. We exchanged a few sentences of commonplace, when Colonel Lamon mentioned to him whose son I was. He said he knew that, and was about to inquire after my father particularly. His visit last spring, he said, had made an agreeable impression on him, and had given him much encouragement. It was at a time when there seemed to be no solid political opinion whereon to base a hope. Colonel Strother had shown himself a strong, brave old man—one after his own heart. At this point our conversation was interrupted by the entrance of Secretary Cameron, to whom I was introduced, and then we immediately withdrew.

I had called to see the President more through a spirit of acquiescence than from any feeling of personal regard. I was, on the contrary, through common report, decidedly prejudiced against him as a man. During this short interview the whole current of my feelings was changed. There was something in his appearance and manner which touched me deeply, and warmed my heart toward him. Called from comparative obscurity to take the chief place in a Government which seemed doomed to speedy and hideous destruction, it appeared not so much a position of power and honor that he was called to occupy, but rather the place of chief victim to the fury of a treacherous and bloody revolution. Instead of the support and encouragement which he needed and meekly asked from all true men, the howls and execrations of his open and armed enemies were not so bitter as the sneers and revilings of the factions among those of whose cause he was the chosen head. All unarmed and unprepared, perhaps unfit, for the vast responsibilities thus thrust upon him, he exhibited always so much of honest and earnest simplicity—so anxious and sincere a desire to fulfill properly the duties of his great office—so much meekness under wrong and insult, such readiness to acknowledge error or failure, such total abnegation of self, that it seemed impossible for any true man not to yield him the fullest confidence and sympathy. Although I sometimes differed with the President in his political views and action, I never met Mr. Lincoln personally that these friendly sentiments were not warmly revived.

September 9.—Returned to Darnestown Camp to-day, and spent the afternoon reading and discussing "Napoleon's Military Thoughts and Maxims." Thus far, in the conduct of our war, we have violated every principle he lays down, both positively and negatively. We have done those things we ought not to have done, and have left undone those things we ought to have done.

September 17.—To-day we received information from General Stone that he intended trying the range of his guns on the enemy's camps and earth-works near the river. Having prepared a map of Loudon County, with topographical and statistical notes, for his use, I rode up to Poolsville to witness the artillery practice.

Arrived in time to dine with the General. After which a furious rain-storm concluded the day. This is my third visit to these headquarters, and at each visit I have encountered a storm of unusual violence. Among the ancients this would be considered a bad omen.

September 18.—The General went out to Edward's Ferry with two batteries of light artillery—one of them 10-pounder Parrotts. On the southern bluffs we could see the redoubts, above and below the mouth of Goose Creek. The upper work was out of range and appeared to be crowded with men. The lower work was only in process of construction, and being within easy range our guns were directed against it. A section of Parrotts were masked in a hollow road while the other guns were sent around to obtain a cross-fire.

While we were waiting the signal to open, a bevy of country lasses with their beaux approached us. Willing to do the honors I offered my field-glass to the prettiest of our visitors. She asked in a languishing tone: "And can we really see the Southern soldiers?" I assured her she might see the color of their eyes with the glass, and, adjusting it, gave her the opportunity of satisfying herself.

"How charming!" she exclaimed. "How romantic it seems; and are you really going to throw shells at them?"

I replied in the affirmative.

"What! without giving them notice beforehand? Ah, that will be cruel!"

I told her not so cruel as it might appear. The first shell would probably miss them, and then they would have an opportunity of getting out of the way.

"Ah, the gallant fellows! But it would be a shame if you should happen to hurt any of them."

"From the interest you express, Miss, I suppose you are from the South."

"No," she replied, "I have never been in Virginia;" and then she sighed, as if she deeply felt the lack of that proud experience; but then sparkling up, as if to palliate the confessed opprobrium, "I had a cousin who once lived in Virginia for several years, and I do so love and admire Virginians."

This conversation was brought to a sudden conclusion by the roar of the guns. The shells fell with remarkable accuracy in and about the earth-work, which presently resembled an ant-hill which has received a kick—the working parties scattered at a double-quick and disappeared in the adjacent woods. The guns were then turned on the distant work; but the shells fell short. The men on the parapets replied to our futile efforts with certain gestures disrespectful and contemptuous in the highest degree, and not calculated to impress their fair admirers on the northern bank with very high ideas of their breeding. Indeed the ladies took leave at this stage of the performance.

In estimating the motives which led many persons to take sides against their Government in this great war we are astonished at the immense influence of mere Anglo-Saxon snobbery. The rebellion is supposed to be aristocratic, consequently every body of doubtful social position professes sympathy with the rebellion, and exhibits zeal in proportion to his or her social deficiencies. Every lazy village mechanic ashamed of his trade, every petty farmer's son with the tastes and education of a stable-boy, espouses the cause of the Southern gentleman as his own, and forthwith assumes the mouth-ing tone and arrogant bearing supposed to distinguish that much-admired and envied class. The ladies, God bless them! are the patented and persistent patronesses of all the Ernanis and other romantic rebels, highwaymen, and murderers, etc., etc. Yet, after all, I can not perceive that this perversity of sentiment has divested them of their charms or weakened their influence, so I reiterate God bless them!

September 21.—Bright and warm. This morning I started with Captain A—— in an ambulance to reconnoitre the roads toward the great Falls of the Potomac. Drove to Duffeif's, who gave us some valuable information about the country and a bushel of fine Lapland Mercer potatoes, an invaluable acquisition to our mess. At the Falls we found the Eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Hayes. We met with a hospitable reception at head-quarters, and dined pleasantly with the Colonel, Lieutenant-Colonel Oliphant, and Adjutant Matthews.

After dinner we viewed the opposite shore from an eminence and discovered a cavalry picket of the enemy. I climbed to the top of a high tree to enlarge my horizon, but was driven down by a shower of rain. The pickets kept up a continual dropping fire at each other across the river, which is not more than forty yards wide here. There was otherwise no lack of excitement at the post, and messengers were continually arriving with open eyes and mouth to report some suspicious or alarming circumstance. During the afternoon two prisoners were brought in who had been taken from a canal-boat, not being provided with proper passes. One of them began to explain his position with much vociferation, and a Yankee twang so unmistakable, that every body laughed, agreeing that if he was found on the other side of the river his tongue would hang him. On this side it procured his immediate liberation.

No sooner was this case disposed of than forgotten in a greater excitement. A soldier entered reporting that the rebels were crossing in great force just above the Falls. There was immediately a girding on of swords and a renewal of pistol-caps, as if preparing for a hand-to-hand fight. The servants were ordered to load the spare muskets and the drums beat the long roll. Captain A—— and myself made some quiet preparation and then seated ourselves upon the porch, not crediting the soldier's report. The regiment moved out in the rain and darkness, but as we waited half an hour and heard no firing we spread our blankets and went to sleep.

Our rest was again disturbed by another messenger with more alarming tidings—a telegram from General Banks, asking if there was an attempt on the part of the enemy to cross, and offering reinforcements. Another telegram from General M'Call, at Tenallytown, stating that an attack was anticipated and warning the commander of the post to be on the alert.

It seemed strange that these intimations of an attack should have come simultaneously from distant points and high quarters, thus appearing to corroborate the vague report of the guard. From the nature of the neighboring country I did not believe it possible that any large force would undertake a crossing here, and concluded the whole matter was one of the usual stampedes. Upon this theory the Captain and myself retired to sleep a second time, and got through the night quite comfortably.

Next morning it was ascertained that one of the sentinels had seen a tow-head (a small rock covered with brush) in the river, and imagined it a boat filled with rebels. The officer of the guard being called actually saw a boat, with men in it, moving stealthily under the shadow of the opposing shore; this his fancy converted into an army, and so the regiment stood under arms all night in the rain, adding a dozen or twenty to the sick list. The boat which furnished the occasion for all this row was one sent out by Colonel Hayes himself, with a scouting party. This party returned to breakfast, bringing with them a ragged and woe-begone captive from the enemy's lines. This fellow informed us that he had been conscripted into the rebel army, and had come home on sick leave to see his father. He had neither shoes nor hat, and looked as if he had not had a full meal for a month. He knew of no troops nearer than Leesburg and Manassas Junction, except the cavalry picket before observed. He was released and sent home.

September 22, Sunday.—In honor of the day the pickets had agreed to abstain from the frivolous week-day amusement of shooting each other. We accompanied the Colonel and regimental staff through the rocky and tangled ground between the canal and the river bank, where the picket-line was established. From an average width of half a mile above, the river here narrows suddenly, flowing in a deep and rapid current between opposing cliffs, not more than forty yards apart. The summits of these perpendicular walls are fringed with a dense growth of evergreens, and exhibit a natural line, where the advantages of stockade, parapet, and casemate are all combined. Across this narrow and romantic gulf the men had been waging a desultory war for several days, peppering each other from the thickets and crevices of the rocks. One of the sentinels pointed out the tree from behind which he made his observations, and which was skinned in a dozen places by adverse bullets. Another showed his cap, which had been exposed on a stick, and immediately perforated with two balls; a third exhibited a scratch on his cheek, received while he was peeping too eagerly around a rock.

To-day there was peace, and the men sat amicably conversing across the gulf. One of ours had already swum over and was exchanging a friendly drink with his late antagonist at ball-play. On the appearance of our officers upon the scene a fine-looking fellow, with plume and sabre, and wearing a light-blue over-coat, showed himself on the opposite platform, and announced himself as Captain — (I missed the name), of Albemarle County, of Third Regiment of Virginia Cavalry, and commanding the Confederate picket. In his gallant bearing and broad accent I readily recognized a lower country Virginian. The cessation of picket-shooting was agreed upon authoritatively, the Confederate Captain engaging himself that it should not be renewed as long as he remained at the post. The intercourse was otherwise limited to courteous speeches, vague expressions of regret at our unfortunate differences, and hopes of a speedy peace. I recognized in a Lieutenant Wever, who appeared beside the Captain, a former acquaintance from the vicinity of Harper's Ferry. The private soldiers were freer in their communications as they warmed with their whiskey. They hoped there would not be another general battle, and mutually damned their political leaders for having got them into a quarrel so needless and ruinous to all parties. I did not join in the conversation, but sat apart musing on the dramatic significance of the scene.

On one side, the tall, soldier-like figure of the Virginian stood out from the dark background of pines; while grouped around, beneath their shadows, appeared his ragged, rugged, sun-burnt followers, like brigands around their chief. His forehead was high and his bearing proud; his speech was friendly, but measured; his courtesy was frank, but not familiar. His men kept in the shade and did not interrupt him. There stood Chivalry and Serfdom, side by side—the types of ancient Feudalism, lingering in the lap of American Republicanism. The historic past, with its prejudices and generousities, its poetry and its poverty, its meanness and its grandeur, its weakness and its power, clearly defined—an anomaly in the light of modern civilization, a stumbling-block in the path of the nineteenth century.

On the northern parapet crowded the stout, well-clad, red-cheeked, and good-natured Pennsylvanians, nudging their officers and interrupting their talk, guileless of any suspicion of superiority of one man over another, except such as he might win by his personal abilities, or hold temporarily by right of office; guileless, too, of anger or hatred against their perverse neighbors; wondering what demon had possessed them to raise this row, to make themselves and others so uncomfortable, wasting money and spoiling trade. They laughed and jested as frankly as they would have done six months ago, when they mixed freely as people of one nation and one Government, buying, selling, and giving in marriage, reciprocally rejoicing in the glory of their common history, boasting of the promised grandeur of their common future. Here stood the American people; the other party in the irrepressible conflict of the present with the past—of the living age with the opinions of decadent centuries.

The friendly tone and familiar accents of the lowland tongue revived many memories of the olden times of peace and good-fellowship, of home and friends, that I had worn in my heart of hearts. The war seemed a cruel absurdity, a something still impossible to realize. The natural and sentimental features of the scene impressively illustrated the beautiful verses of Coleridge:

"They stood aloof, the seas remaining,
Like cliffs that have been rent asunder;
A dreary sea now flows between,
But neither time, nor rain, nor thunder
Shall fully do away, I ween,
The marks of that which once hath been."

The sadness of regret had touched more hearts than mine. As we left the ground I observed the good old Colonel hastily dash his hand across his eyes. "It seems hard," he said, "that we who were so lately one and inseparable should be fighting in this way. We must have no more scenes of this sort, or I can not do my duty. Boys," he said, addressing the guard, "if you shoot one of those fellow-citizens of ours over there unnecessarily, I'll hang you as high as Haman!"

I believe that all these stampedes along the river originate from an apprehension which prevailed at Washington that the enemy was prepared to force our lines, and effect a crossing somewhere, for the purpose of co-operating with the late Maryland Legislature in its attempts to drag the unwilling people of the State into the rebellion. The first act of high and virile statesmanship that has come from Washington has been the squelching of that dangerous assembly, and the arrest of conspirators at Frederick City and in Baltimore.

The weakness of our Government, thus far, has not been exhibited in the assumption of extraordinary and illegal powers, but in the miserable negation of all power and shirking of all responsibility. It is refreshing to perceive that in its despair it is capable of a necessary act, looking to its own protection and preservation. Oh for one hour of old Andrew Jackson!

September 24.—Started on a reconnoissance toward Washington, and stopping at Tenallytown called on Colonel Hayes, of the Pennsylvania Eighth, who had returned with his regiment from picket duty at the Great Falls. We were hospitably welcomed, entertained, and lodged. Called on Brigadier-General Reynolds, of the Pennsylvania Reserves.

September 25.—This morning visited the head-quarters of Major-General McCall. One of his aids, Captain M'Conkey, reminded me of a former meeting which had entirely escaped my memory. In the month of November, 1853, in passing through Charlottesville, Virginia, I walked out to see the University, and, pleased with the view, undertook to make a sketch of the buildings. Seeking shelter from a sharp wind I had seated myself beside a brick house, but found presently the cold was so severe that my crayon dropped from my benumbed fingers. I was about abandoning my work when a youth, calling from the door, politely invited me to come into his room, which was warm, and his window looked out upon the view I was attempting. I accepted his courtesy, and completed my sketch. To-day we met for the first time since, and both under the same flag.

We went on to Washington, when I visited Colonel Randolph, and there learned that my father had been released from prison, and had returned to Berkeley Springs in good health.

Met Lieutenants Hall and Elder, old acquaintances of the Patterson campaign, formerly of Doubleday's Battery. Captain A—— and myself were invited to visit their quarters, with the Reserve Artillery on Capitol Hill. At half past 6 P.M. an orderly brought horses to Willard's for our accommodation, and we rode to camp. My heart was light with the tidings I had received from home, so the evening passed merrily, and terminated in an old-fashioned shindy. "The Derby Ram," and other facetious and time-honored ditties were sung by the company with great unction. We encamped for the night on the field of battle.

September 26.—After a hearty breakfast with the artillerymen we drove up to the Chain Bridge, and, crossing the river, visited the line of earthworks then in course of construction. Called at General Smith's quarters, when we had an account of his successful forage and skirmish yesterday in the vicinity of Lewisville. We inspected the works as far down as Arlington, taking dinner at General Fitz John Porter's quarters, and returning to the city by the scow ferry at Mason's Island.

September 27.—To-day I met my interesting and accomplished young friend and late chum, Lieutenant Kirby Smith. He was in high spirits, and about to take command of a regiment of Ohio Volunteers, to serve in the Western Department. He rallied me on the private's military coat which I wore, and asked, jestingly, if I was aware I was enlisted in a grand abolition crusade? I replied that I never had doubted but that abolition would follow in due time, as an incident of war. So much the better; yet with me it was but a trivial question compared with the great one of Nationality.

In answer to my felicitations on his promotion, he replied: "Yes, I am in for it, and shall one day have my head knocked off, I do not doubt; but it belongs to my profession thus to die." I had several times before heard him say the same thing in a careless, jesting manner; yet I always thought I could detect in his manner an underlying shadow of presentiment. I called to see him at his boarding-house the same evening, where he presented me to his mother, who had come on from Detroit to visit him ere he departed to join his command. I passed a charming evening, and heard from her the same presentiment more seriously and touchingly expressed. As I never saw him afterward I may be allowed to anticipate. He was killed, not long after while gallantly leading his regiment at the battle of Corinth, where Rosecrans annihilated Lovell.

September 29, Sunday.—To-day we returned to camp at Darnestown. Found several letters from home, all out of date, and containing no news; yet it was pleasant to read them. I talked with a refugee from Jefferson County—a negro—who gave me much detailed and recent information of men and things there. I have for the last week or more suffered awfully from anger and vindictive feeling. The accounts of ruin, remorse, and suffering which I get from Virginia have turned all that to pity, which is a far more comfortable condition of mind.

October 1.—I arose this morning feeling better than I have done for several days past, from which I infer that lodging on the ground and in tents is more healthy than sleeping in houses. Doctors Douglas of New York, and Steiner of Frederick City, both of the Sanitary Commission, called and tented with us. My theory was satisfactorily discussed. If I had arisen with a headache or a chill I should have dogmatized in a different direction until some accident had given a new direction to my thoughts. How vexatious are facts to theorists and ideologists! What a stern exponent is war! What a remorseless demolisher of theories and fancies! How damnably practical!

October 8.—Accompanied the Captain to Poolsville, where we dined with General Stone. After dinner we went down to Edward's Ferry to experiment with a mountain howitzer and spherical case shot. The rebel pickets on the point at the mouth of Goose Creek came out from behind their old chimney shelter to witness our practice, which was highly satisfactory. This should be a formidable weapon in mountain warfare. Stone showed us some scows that he was preparing in the canal basin here, indicating a descent on Leesburg shortly.

Oct. 10.—I got leave of absence for a week, and started for Hancock to visit my family.

It was dark when I reached Urbanna, and I stopped with a worthy farmer named Thomas Dixon, who professed to be a true Union man, and with his family seemed to be in great dread lest Jeff Davis should cross the river and devour them. I assured them that Jeff was more likely to cross the Styx than the Potomac under present circumstances.

October 11, Friday.—Finding the saddle wearisome and slow I concluded to leave my horse in Frederick, and pursue my journey in the public coaches. Took the omnibus line for Hagerstown, and en route passed through Middletown, Boonesborough, and Funkstown—all thriving little Dutch villages, filled with stupid Secessionists.

October 11, Saturday.—Arrived at Hancock early in the afternoon, and immediately dispatched a messenger over to Berkeley Springs to inform my family of my arrival.

About four o'clock in the afternoon I walked down to the landing, and, seeing a group on the Virginia side, thought I recognized my wife and daughter. I immediately called the ferry-men, and we started over in the large boat. As we approached the shore my daughter ran down the bank to meet me. This was an only child by a former wife, and now in her eleventh year. They reported that Berkeley was free from Confederate soldiers, and that my father would be over in the morning.

October 12.—On entering the sitting-room of Barton's Hotel this morning I found my father and Dr. Pendleton. The old gentleman seemed fuller of life and spirit than he had been for many a day. Pendleton says the Union mountaineers of the Alleghanies have harried the fat Secessionists of the South Branch lowlands of half their wealth of corn and bees. This of course. We are fast approaching the state of those who live by "The good old rule, the simple plan,

That they shall take who have the power,
And they shall keep who can."

I wonder if it ever occurred to one of those jolly farmers of Hampshire and Hardy, as he gave his vote to destroy the Government which had heretofore assured him peace, prosperity, and plenty, that he was by so doing offering a full and free invitation to the gaunt and hungry hill folks to come down and devour him.

I found my father but little disposed to talk on the subject of his arrest and imprisonment. He treated the whole matter with contemptuous levity, and professed to have been rather entertained with the adventure, as relieving the monotony of his life at Berkeley, and affording him an opportunity of expressing his opinions in quarters where they might be useful. He was, however, of too frank and unreserved a nature to conceal effectually from me the bitter indignation which allusion to some circumstances of his captivity excited in him.

It seems that on Saturday night, the 24th of October, about ten o'clock p.m., a company of Ashby's cavalry, numbering between thirty and forty men, and commanded by a Captain Thrasher, entered the village of Bath or Berkeley Springs, and surrounding the house of Philip C. Pendleton, demanded the surrender of his son, Edmund Pendleton, a gentleman whose high-toned loyalty had made him especially obnoxious to the revolutionary party. On being asked by whose authority the demand was made, the Captain replied, by authority of Colonel M'Donald, of Winchester, commanding this district. At the same time a detachment surrounded my cottage, and, knocking at the door, demanded admittance. A neighbor informed them that the house was unoccupied. I had been with the army for two months, and my family had taken quarters at the hotel with my father and sister's family. It thus appeared that Captain Thrasher had been sent for the purpose of arresting Edmund Pendleton and myself.

On the following morning—Sunday, 25th—upon the denunciation and urgency of some treacherous rogues in the village, the Captain took it upon himself to arrest my father, although he had had no orders to do so, and the prisoner's age and character might have secured for him exemption from so unnecessary an indignity. At the same time Thrasher entered the house, and, addressing himself to my wife, demanded my fire-arms. She resolutely declined surrendering them, and then retired to her room. The Captain followed her, and, entering her chamber unbidden, took my two hunting pieces—a valuable German rifle and an English double-barreled shot-gun. They then took the road to Winchester with their spoils and their prisoners, the latter traveling in Mr. Pendleton's private carriage, strictly guarded.

Thus they arrived at Winchester, and halted at the house of the rebel commandant. Mr. Pendleton was requested to enter, and after a brief interview was allowed to go at large on parole. My father was not invited to an interview, but after remaining for some time under surveillance at the door, was ordered to the common guard-tent in the militia camp. In his seventieth year, in feeble health, accustomed to all the appliances of domestic comfort and the delicate attentions of an affectionate family, he now found himself confined in a foul, unwholesome tent, without provision for lodging or food except such as might be furnished him by his destitute fellow-prisoners or equally destitute guards. To none of these was his name and character unknown, and every thing that their humble means afforded was cheerfully put at his disposal. A militia-man procured a bundle of straw as clean as could be found, which answered for a bed; another presented the ragged remnant of what had once been an over-coat, which served as covering. His portion of the prisoners' coarse, unsavory ration of corn-bread and bacon was deferentially served to him on a battered pewter plate, the only piece of table-ware belonging to the mess. The unaccustomed hardship to which he was thus subjected very soon told upon Colonel Strother's feeble constitution. On the fifth day, upon the recommendation of a surgeon, as he was informed, he was removed to more comfortable quarters in a private house, but still under guard.

The charges brought against him before the military court which examined his case were substantially as follows: (1.) He had, on the occasion of a recent election held in Bath, Morgan County, Virginia, in flagrant contempt of an edict of the rebel junta at Richmond or Montgomery (it makes little matter which), opened poll-books to record votes for a representative in the United States Congress; and as no one, even in this loyal county, was found bold enough to act upon his advice and suggestion, he took charge of the books himself and duly recorded the votes cast. (2.) He had advised and encouraged his fellow-citizens to resist the assumptions of traitors in authority, and had fed and otherwise assisted recruits for the United States army. (3.) He advised the militia of the county not to obey the summons of officers who had violated their solemn oaths to their government, and would lead them into open rebellion against its laws. (4.) He was zealously and persistently loyal to his country and her government, and refused to recognize the supreme authority of any State, corporation, municipality, or insurrectionary committee whatsoever.

This was probably not the precise wording, but contains the substance of the accusations. They were all proved, I believe, while some palliating circumstances were urged by friends and admitted. The prisoner denied nothing, and his admissions went further to complete the proof than any outside evidence that could be adduced. His defense was open defiance. It is quite likely the Winchester authorities were anxious to get rid of so unmanageable a case. At the end of two weeks Colonel Strother was released upon going through the formality of giving bond to appear at court when notified. The subject was never again called up. My sister, who had followed him to Winchester and remained there during his captivity, accompanied him back to Berkeley, where, on his arrival, his friends and neighbors gave him a triumphant reception. This brief narrative contains about the substance of what I heard on the subject while at Hancock. For the rest during my brief visit, which lasted but two days, we were all too much excited and absorbed with our national troubles to dwell long upon our personal griefs or vexations.

The news from the inside is important and interesting. The army is represented to be ill-supplied, undisciplined, diseased, and disaffected, deserting in large numbers whenever the opportunity offers. The country is left uncultivated, and the wastage of the armies unrepaired. Labor is falling into disorganization as well as law, society, and religion. The people, both in their public and private rights, are subjected to a despotism more remorseless and irresponsible than can be believed by those living in more fortunate communities.

The common soldiers, who are driven, half-starved, and shot—the common people, who are conscripted, plundered, threatened, and despised, are sick of the war, and will quit it when they dare. While, on the contrary, those living in comfortable localities remote from danger—exempts, speculators, blockade-runners, bomb-proofs, politicians, preachers, and women, are becoming more thoroughly convinced every day of the grandeur and stability of the Confederacy. The few who still are known to indulge in hopes of the restoration of Federal supremacy are objects of mingled pity and derision. The clergy, in the midst of all this anarchy, degradation, and suffering, promulgate the doctrine, which is greedily swallowed, that the Confederates are the chosen and peculiar people of God. In Greenbrier County immense armies have been seen in the clouds, of a pea-green color, and moving northward, which signifies that the war will come to a glorious conclusion next season. In Georgia certain springs, which dried up at the conclusion of the Revolution of 1776, have burst forth again, which means that the independence of the South will be shortly established.

My father describes a scene he witnessed while in the prison camp at Winchester. One Sunday morning a tall, bearded figure approached the centre of the encampment. He wore a black slouched hat, a blue tunic girt about with a belt holding two revolvers and a huge bowie-knife. His costume was completed by postillion-boots reaching above the knee, and heeled by a formidable pair of long-shanked spurs. On nearing a group of soldiers this extraordinary figure waved his hand and courteously, but with a tone of authority, demanded attention. A sermon followed, a melange of the camp-meeting and the hustings. The service concluded with a hymn and a blessing, and the heavy armed man of God departed.

It seems to be a very common opinion that, if amnesty were offered to all who would lay down their arms and return to their allegiance, it would detach large numbers from their armies. Yet it appears to me that the Government must first exhibit its power and its capacity to defend and protect its citizens by accomplishing some decided military success.

October 13, Monday.—This morning I saw my folks over the river on their way back to Berkeley. At the Virginia landing I met Adam with his banjo and my buffalo robe. Adam is a mulatto servant, a native Virginian, and is about expatriating himself for fear of the rebs. He desires to enter my service; and as he is a townsman and old acquaintance, an accomplished cook as well as a minstrel, I have agreed to take him with me.

With my recruit I took the coach for Hagerstown, arriving there about nightfall. I met Kneister and Wilen, Union men from Martinsburg, and through them received some information which induced me to believe that the force of the rebels at Manassas Junction is little more than a sham. Always overrated, it has been depleted from day to day by sickness and desertion until there remains little more than the skeleton of the grand army. This comes from a sympathizer too, lately returned from Richmond via Manassas.

October 14.—I left early in the omnibus line for Frederick City. The vehicle was abominably overloaded, so that I lost my temper; but as no one took the trouble to quarrel with me I presently righted.

There was an old lady of our company who was excessively querulous and troublesome about her three bandboxes. I was filled with contempt at the narrowness of that soul which could concentrate its interest on bandboxes in these tremendous times. And why contemptuous? was my business of more importance than her bandboxes? Does not woman with her soothing arts and dressy blandishments play as useful and important a part in the drama of life as man with his wars and statesmanship?

Why should drums and political orators be esteemed of more account than bandboxes? After these reflections I took some pains to assist my fair and fat neighbor in adjusting her precious charges, and received her acknowledgments with a glow of self-satisfaction. I had gained a victory, I had conquered a prejudice.

Oct. 15.—Arrived at Darnestown about three P.M., and found Adam in before me with the pony. Reported to head-quarters, and gave my news and observations to the commanding General. At night Adam entertained head-quarters with his banjo.

October 21, Monday.—It was quite frosty last night. About noon Adjutant Copeland informed us that General Stone was in Leesburg. This news from head-quarters produced a most agreeable sensation, as it promised movement, an idea always acceptable to a soldier, and especially so after a long term of inaction. About sunset it was rumored that the whole command was ordered to move immediately. I hastily completed a view of our encampment, which had amused my leisure during the day, and repaired to the general head-quarters to receive orders, Captain A—— being absent in Washington. Here I found every thing alert. Stone was not in Leesburg yet, but across the river, and his advance sharply engaged with the enemy. A brigade of ours under General Hamilton was en route for Conrad's Ferry. The rest of the command would move presently to a position at the mouth of Seneca Creek, opposite Drainsville, in Virginia. I immediately ordered the Topographical tents to be struck and the wagons loaded; but as it was presently suggested that the movement was only precautionary, it was probable we would soon return, the order was suspended.

Leaving our attendants in charge, I rode with the column to Seneca Mills, the site of Colonel Le Dew's late encampment. We arrived here about nine o'clock and found every thing quiet and deserted. The moon shone through a canopy of mackerel clouds presaging rain, and we felt the damp and chilly air from the river penetrating to our bones; no blankets, no fires, and altogether a cheerless prospect for a night's bivouac. After galloping about for an hour, endeavoring to find a convenient location for the different regiments, Captain Beckwith, our Chief Commissary, Captain Bingham, Quarter-master, and myself, agreed to ride back to our Darnestown quarters and get a comfortable night's rest. The distance, four miles, was rapidly accomplished by our overwilling horses, and we rolled into our camp beds about eleven.

October 22, Tuesday.—I was awakened about an hour after midnight by Captain Beckwith, who told me we had orders to report immediately to General Banks at Poolsville or Edward's Ferry. This order was bewildering, and induced the surmise that some grave disaster had befallen Stone's command. We were quickly mounted and on the road, speculating curiously on the probable events which occasioned these midnight manœuvres. By the way we passed four or five of our regiments, trailing wearily along their midnight march. We were passed also by some one in an open barouche from the direction of Washington, driving furiously toward the scene of action. By the time we reached Poolsville the evil presage of the clouds had been fulfilled, and the moonshine had been quenched by a leaden drizzle.

Stone's encampments lay around as when I had last seen them, but ominously silent and deserted. At length perceiving a solitary light at the school-house which contained the head-quarter offices, we approached and hailed the officer on duty, asking news of the fight.

"Bad enough," he replied; "the brigade which crossed at Conrad's Ferry is defeated and cut to pieces; half the force killed, wounded, and drowned; Colonel Baker is dead, Cogswell is dead, Baxter is dead, and those that have got back are entirely used up and demoralized. In short, another Bull's Run affair."

This was stunning, and next thing to incredible. Banks and Stone were both at Edward's Ferry, six miles distant. So we gloomily turned our horses' heads in that direction. We had scarcely left the Poolsville common before we met a long train of slow-moving ambulances, bringing sad confirmation of the disastrous tidings.

Accompanying the ambulances were numerous straggling soldiers on foot, wounded and unwounded, all unarmed, and looking cowed and jaded. The only human being we met who seemed to have a particle of pluck left was a ragged negro boy about twelve years old, a camp-follower, who marched to a martial quick-step of his own whistling, carrying a musket on his shoulder, twice as long as himself.

The wounded, brought across at Harrison's Island, had been transported to Edward's Ferry below by the canal, and were now on their way to the Poolsville hospitals.

In melancholy silence, rain, and darkness we reached the rendezvous at Edward's Ferry.

There, in an open field, beside a bivouac fire, we found General Stone and his staff. General Banks, with his military family, was hard by, enjoying similar accommodations. Officers and men, wrapped in their blankets, lay around on the wet ground, sleeping off the fatigues and excitement of the day. Stone received us with his accustomed urbanity, but the misfortunes of the day had told sharply upon him. He smoked incessantly, and had a haggard look and restless manner. I advanced to pay my respects, when he gave me a clear and rapid view of the position.

He had received orders from the Commander-in-Chief to feel the enemy at Leesburg, and observe what effect the advance of M'Call's force, from the direction of Drainsville, would have upon Evans. The General was in daily communication with the other side of the river, and was well posted in regard to the enemy's force and position. The enemy's force consisted of but four regiments of infantry, some squadrons of cavalry, and a light six-gun battery, in all between three and four thousand men. Stone had altogether nearly twelve thousand men, including cavalry and artillery. He had several fine batteries, and his troops were well disciplined and well in hand. Simultaneously with the Drainsville movement he placed five thousand men and a battery, under Colonel Baker, at Harrison's Island, just below Conrad's Ferry and opposite Ball's Bluff. Baker commenced crossing his troops on Monday morning in three scows prepared for the purpose.

Stone took personal command of the main body, seven thousand strong, and taking position on the Maryland Bluffs at Edward's Ferry commenced crossing just above the mouth of Goose Creek, in scows similar to those used by Colonel Baker. His batteries crowned the bluffs to protect the crossing, but the enemy made no opposition at either point. The river was swollen, however, and the crossing heavy work. Colonel Baker's advance reconnoitred the road to Leesburg, and approached very near the town without encountering an enemy. The Confederate commander, it seemed, had fallen back to a position on Goose Creek, apparently intending to abandon Leesburg without a contest. A prisoner informed me such were his orders from Beauregard. Changing his intention, however, he suddenly turned and attacked Baker in the woods between Leesburg and the bluff. The Mississippi and Virginia regiments, which composed Evans's command, were accomplished bushwhackers, and used their rifles with deadly effect upon the Federal lines, exposed in the open field and considerably inferior in numbers. But a small portion of Baker's command had crossed over when they were first attacked. These stood their ground manfully, sustaining the fight while reinforcements crossed in the three scows, a means of transportation entirely inadequate to the emergency. The rebels used small-arms only. The Federal artillery in the woods, with no range, was rather a source of weakness. So rapid and deadly was the enemy's musketry that the artillerymen abandoned their guns, and I was told that one of the wheels was entirely cut down by the bullets. Meanwhile as the men fell they were carried to the rear, as usual, by an unlimited number of assistants, who readily volunteer in this service to get out of range of fire. The three boats, instead of being exclusively used in crossing fresh troops to sustain the battle, were crammed and impeded in their movements with the wounded and their skulking attendants. One of them, overloaded, sunk on the passage, and several were drowned. Finally, the troops remaining on the island declined to cross, and less than two thousand men, all told, got over to the fight. Baker was killed in a gallant but unavailing effort to retrieve the fortunes of the day. The depleted ranks of the Federals broke, and the men escaped as best they could, having lost four hundred killed and wounded, and leaving five hundred prisoners and several guns in the hands of the enemy.

Stone, meanwhile, was crossing at Edward's Ferry, four miles distant, in full view of the battle, the smoke of which could be seen rising above the woods and the muttering of the musketry distinctly heard. He had hourly communication with Baker, continually inquiring after his welfare, and offering assistance, and continually receiving for reply that all was going well, and that no reinforcement was needed. The first acknowledgment of disaster received by him was after Colonel Baker's death and the irretrievable defeat of his command. Stone had twenty-five hundred men now over the river; their blazing camp-fires illuminated the murky sky and flashed over the swollen stream. Captain Stewart, his Adjutant-General, a gallant English gentleman, who had volunteered in our cause, had made a plucky reconnoissance during the day, and had otherwise rendered valuable assistance.

Thus matters stood between Monday and Tuesday, the 21st and 22d of October. Stone seemed apprehensive that the rebels had been heavily reinforced from Manassas. The river was swelling rapidly, and the difficulty of crossing increased from hour to hour. He has serious fears lest the force he has crossed will be caught on the point between Goose Creek and the Potomac and destroyed or captured. He has ordered them to make the greatest show possible with their camp-fires.

The Jehu who passed us on the road was General Lander, who, "smelling the battle afar off," had volunteered to "go up to Ramoth Gilead" with characteristic alacrity. A cup of coffee from Captain Stewart comforted and sustained me until dawn. The troops of Banks's command are arriving in better condition than could have been hoped after a long night march through mud and rain. The force which reached Seneca Mills came up by the tow-path of the canal. At daylight several canal boats were drawn from the canal into the river through the lift-lock, and the business of crossing the troops renewed with vigor.

In the course of this driving, drizzling day our force on the Virginia side was increased to about six thousand infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery of artillery.

It can hardly be thought presumptuous to claim that a calm observer of events may often arrive at clearer conclusions than persons better instructed and better informed, whose judgments may be disturbed by a sense of terrible responsibility. I saw at a glance that this miserable affair could be of no great importance in a military point of view. We had made a blunder, and lost nine hundred men and three guns—that was all. But that was not all. There were views of the subject that mere military technicality did not embrace nor military reasonings satisfy.

I instinctively comprehended to the fullest extent the pain and mortification which this disaster would inflict on the heart of the nation if it were left unretrieved. The people had shrugged their shoulders and laughed at the defeat at Manassas. They had expected a frolic rather than a battle, and were caught. Let that pass. We had now gone to work seriously, and half a million of men were mustered and organized. The resources of a great nation were lavished upon the furnishing and equipment of this army; upon it were concentrated their pride and hopes. The first column that attempts an advance is caught, massacred, and hurled back in bloody humiliation, and that, too, by an enemy ill supplied, poorly equipped, and contemptible in point of numbers. It will be futile to explain to the people or the world at large that the enemy always outnumbered us on the field, that our gallant troops were dribbled into action by regiments and companies, and that, with twelve thousand effective men available, we only managed to get eighteen hundred into action, to have them defeated and massacred.

Let this pass for one of the misfortunes incident to war. It is one which can be and should be immediately retrieved. The political and moral condition of the country demands it. We have now twenty thousand men on the ground; with the Drainsville column, thirty thousand. We should advance on Leesburg at once, wipe out Evans's miserable brigade, rescue our prisoners and captive wounded: this we should do at all hazards, if we do no more besides than play Yankee Doodle in the streets of Leesburg and retire to our old positions to-morrow.

These views, based more upon moral than military reasons, nevertheless met the approval of several clear-headed soldiers. They were suggested to General Stone, who replied that he was now ranked by General Banks and otherwise hampered by orders from Washington. What General Banks thought I did not know; but as he continued to push his men across the river during the day, and finally crossed himself with a portion of his staff, I conclude that he did not intend to yield the point tamely. His comprehensive mind and former political experiences must have suggested to him the impolicy of allowing the bloody game to terminate as it stood, so greatly to our disadvantage, when we had such ample means to turn the scale.

During the day, as the Generals stood together in council, I had an opportunity of observing Lander. He was furious at the slaughter of the Massachusetts troops. His glaring eye and firm jaw expressed determination in the highest degree. There appeared in his bearing more of fighting pluck than cool discretion; but I liked his temper. As he started over the river I remarked to a friend, "There goes a man who seems to be spoiling for a bullet!"

About four o'clock in the afternoon we heard a sharp crackling of musketry over the river, and hurrying to the summit of the bluff we saw our picket-guards scampering like sheep from a wooded hill where they had been posted, the enemy appearing in the edge of the wood, from whence ours had been driven, firing after them as they ran. The mass of our infantry lay concealed behind the bank next to the water. At the flight of the pickets two regiments immediately showed themselves, and formed in line of battle to the right and left of a section of artillery. The fugitives rallied and commenced skirmishing with the enemy, who showed themselves in some force at the summit of the hill. Presently our line and the two guns opened fire, which was briskly kept up for twenty minutes. We had a fine birds-eye view of the affair, undisturbed except by the occasional song of a rebel ball ranging far beyond its mark. Owing to the dampness of the atmosphere the whole scene was presently veiled with clouds of white smoke, so that we could see nothing of what was going on. General Stone exhibited intense anxiety during this action, apprehending that the enemy might have received overwhelming reinforcements and was advancing to a real attack. The enemy presently retired, without having developed more than a third of our force over the river. The attack was simply a reconnoissance made by Evans with a single regiment. About a dozen men were killed and wounded on each side. General Lander was brought back with a ball through his leg—a grave but not dangerous wound.

Just as this fight commenced Luce joined me and reported that the Topographical wagons were up. After the affair subsided we established our camp, got up a hot supper, invited some friends to join us, and had a comfortable night.

October 23.—General M'Clellan arrived last night. While at breakfast I observed a train of wagons moving eastward on the Drainsville road. I immediately reported the circumstances to General Banks, who took me to a neighboring bivouac and presented me to the Commander-in-Chief of the army.

This was my first interview, and as I conversed with the man in whom so much interest and responsibility were centred I instinctively noted the impressions made by his appearance and manner. He is not like his portraits that are in general circulation. His head is large and rather square; his complexion florid, with light red beard, and black hair close cut. In person he is rather below the medium height, square built, and heavy limbed. His general appearance reminds one quite frequently of the pictures and statuettes of the Emperor Napoleon; which I don't like, as I never heard of a great man that resembled any body else, or any other great man. The General's face is pleasing without being striking; his manner simple, unpretending, and rather engaging, without being impressive. He will control men rather through their personal attachment than by his superiority or force of character.

He seems a cool and clever soldier, but if he shows capacity as a statesman I shall be much mistaken. These observations were written after ten minutes' conversation and a few hours' study on the field.

The river was so much swollen and the wind blew so violently that no troops were crossed to-day, nothing except some engineers and intrenching tools. I fear that it is the Generalissimo and not the weather that has stopped the crossing. The Drainsville column retired day before yesterday, I believe. Can it be that all this drumming, marching, and manœuvring is to conclude in this lame and impotent manner?

Is the game-cock Evans, with his brigade of ragamuffins, to be permitted to remain in Leesburg, to carry off his prisoners and trophies, and crow insulting defiance in the face of three divisions of the Grand National Army?

God help us! it is even so. Captain A—, who returned from Washington to-day, tells me that our troops are to be withdrawn to-night.

October 24.—A clear, cold morning. Looking over the river, I perceive by the lines of deserted bivouacs that our retreat has been accomplished. So noiselessly withal that, although I slept within forty yards of the road, I was not awakened by the movement.

Shortly after breakfast a group of rebel officers, with a small cavalry escort, rode over the ground lately vacated by our troops, and spent half an hour in making a thorough and undisturbed reconnoissance of our position on this side. As they turned to leave they fired several pistol-shots across the river—a bit of bravado from some of the juniors, I suppose.

Well, it is all over, and what right have I—an assistant Topographer, without a commission even—to criticise and carp at the conclusions of those whose superior position and opportunities for complete and comprehensive information makes them so much more competent to judge? The right of free thought and free speech, so much prized and perverted by the American people, is not especially recognized in the military service, and even in civil life engenders much impertinence. Let us return to our maps and surveys.

When Galileo promulgated the theory that the earth revolved around the sun he was arrested, brought before a tribunal of the Holy Fathers, and ordered to recant his damnable heresies. He recanted, and admitted that his theory was contrary to the received faith, and all nonsense. Yet, after he made his bow and was about retiring, he inadvertently muttered, "E gira pure"—"It goes round nevertheless." I still think that the withdrawal of our troops on that occasion was a serious error.

A MAN'S A MAN FOR A' THAT.

A NEW VERSION.

"A MAN'S a man," says Robert Burns,
 "For a' that and a' that;"
 But though the song be clear and strong,
 It lacks a note for a' that.
 The lout who'd shirk his daily work,
 Yet claim his wage and a' that,
 Or beg, when he might earn, his bread,
 Is not a man for a' that.

If all who dine on homely fare
 Were true and brave, and a' that,
 And none whose garb is "hoddin gray"
 Was fool or knave, and a' that,
 The vice and crime that shame our time
 Would fade and fail and a' that,
 And plowmen be as good as kings,
 And churls as earls for a' that.

You see yon brawny, blustering sot,
 Who swaggers, swears, and a' that,
 And thinks, because his strong right arm
 Might fell an ox and a' that,
 That he's as noble, man for man,
 As duke or lord, and a' that:
 He's but a brute, beyond dispute,
 And not a man for a' that.

A man may own a large estate,
 Have palace, park, and a' that,
 And not for birth, but honest worth,
 Be thrice a man for a' that;
 And Donald herding on the muir,
 Who beats his wife and a' that,
 Be nothing but a rascal boor,
 Nor half a man for a' that.

It comes to this, dear Robert Burns—
 The truth is old, and a' that—
 "The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
 The man's the gold, for a' that."
 And though you'd put the minted mark
 On copper, brass, and a' that,
 The lie is gross, the cheat is plain,
 And will not pass for a' that.

For a' that, and a' that,
 'Tis soul and heart and a' that.
 That makes the king a gentleman,
 And not his crown and a' that.
 And man with man, if rich or poor,
 The best is he, for a' that,
 Who stands erect, in self-respect,
 And acts the man for a' that.

CHARLES MACRAY.

KEEP AWAY!

ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER.*

ONE-THIRD of a century ago, that is in the spring of 1833, Randolph Marcy, a tall young man, just graduated from West Point, was assigned to duty with Company D, Fifth U. S. Infantry, stationed at Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the then frontier Territory, now almost central State, of Wisconsin. The captain of this company was Martin Scott, famous as the hero of the "coon" story, certainly one of the best marksmen, perhaps the very best marksman, that ever lived. More than thirty years of active service, mostly upon the frontiers, have made Colonel Marcy familiar with the life and character of the peoples residing there. We doubt if there is another living man who has had so much intercourse with the Indian tribes of the great Western Plains.

The tribes of the Far West have scarcely a trait in common with those who once peopled the Eastern slope of the American Continent. The latter lived in permanent villages, subsisting more by agriculture than by hunting, and made their war excursions wholly on foot. The former are nomades in the strictest sense of the word. They have neither houses nor fields. Their dwellings are lodges, which they carry with them wherever they wander. Their food is wholly of flesh, saving a few herbs and roots which they find growing wild. With the Eastern tribes war was but an episode in their lives. With those of the West warlike and plundering expeditions are the business of their lives; peace is the exception. When first discovered by the Spaniards, three centuries and a quarter ago, the dog was the only animal of burden, as it now is of the Esquimaux. How they lived then we can only conjecture. Horses were first introduced upon the Plains somewhat less than three centuries ago. They rapidly multiplied; but can hardly have become common until within six generations. Now the Indians of the Plains are probably the most expert horsemen in the world. Horses and mules are their wealth; to steal horses is their occupation. The cleverest horse-thief is the model young man. Is-sa-keep, an old Comanche chief, once boasted to Colonel Marcy of his four sons; they were the finest young men to be found, and a great comfort to him in his old age; they could steal more horses than any other young men in his band.

The Comanches, or "Snakes," may be taken as the model and type of the tribes of the Plains. With the exception of the Dacotahs or "Cut-throats," and possibly the Pawnees or "Wolves," they are the most numerous and warlike. Yet, all told, the three bands into which they are divided number barely 15,000 souls. Still this band has for years harried all the northern States of Mexico, carrying their war expeditions often a thousand miles away from their homes on the Plains. When a chief wants to get up a large war-party he provides himself with a long pole trimmed with a red flag and eagle feathers, and rides through the camp, singing the war-song. Those disposed to join him mount their horses and follow. This is repeated from day to day until the war-party—or, as we phrase it, the "regiment"—is made up, when they set off.

But these great expeditions are rather exceptional, occurring only now and then; whereas it is quite necessary for a Comanche who wishes to be any body to have taken a turn into Mexico, and have come back with a few horses. So the usual way is for half a dozen young fellows to set out on their own hook. Each needs only a horse, a bow and arrows, a lance and shield. These every one is supposed to have. Now and then one has a gun; but the bow and arrow is the main reliance. The Comanche bow is less than a yard in length, scarcely half that of the old English long bow; but it is made of a very elastic wood, and at short range is a very effective weapon. It will send an arrow clear through the huge body of a buffalo. The shield is circular, made of two thicknesses of hide, an inch apart, the interval closely packed with hair; it is proof against any thing short of a rifle-ball, and even this will not go through unless it strikes fairly perpendicular. Thus provided they set out on a journey of a thousand miles or more, through a perfectly wild and desolate country, depending for subsistence wholly upon the game which they kill. They make their way to the northern provinces of Mexico, where they lie in wait near some hacienda until an opportunity occurs of swooping down upon a solitary herdsman. If he is wise he decamps at once, for the savages invariably kill all men who offer the slightest impediment to their operations, and carry off all the women and children as prisoners. They are sometimes absent from their tribes for two years before they have secured sufficient plunder to enable them to return with credit. A horse-stealing expedition to Mexico is to a young Comanche very much what a whaling voyage or a journey to the mines is to a young American.

Some eight years ago Von Tempsky, a German traveler, gave a vivid description of the condition to which the provinces of Durango, Chihuahua, and Zacatecas had been reduced by the inroads of these marauders. The open country, he says, is rendered almost uninhabitable. The towns and larger ranches are the only secure places; the silver mines can be worked only when protected by troops; merchandise can not be transported except under a strong convoy. During the government of Santa Anna a wealthy gentleman proposed to free these States from the Comanches. Upon his own estates he organized a band of rancheiros, who manifested their superiority over the savages, who soon learned to give him a wide berth. He then offered to raise at his own expense a company of guerrillas, and agreed that after two years he would pay for all damages inflicted by the Comanches. As payment he asked only the taxes formerly levied upon silver mines, the working of which had been abandoned in consequence of the Comanche incursions. This offer was declined. Von Tempsky relates an exploit of one of these rancheiros, which reminds one of the Conquistadores who followed Cortéz. He was a powerful man, and always rode a well-trained horse. In riding over his estate he wore a stout leather cuirass, but his only offensive weapon was a long, straight, double-edged sword. One day riding out alone, he saw a dozen Indians driving off some of his cattle, and dashed straight upon them. They thought a single man not worth noticing. A few bounds of his horse brought him upon one of these "man-spitters," and the first thing which the Indian felt was the guard of the long sword striking against his breast-bone; the blade had passed sheer through his body, and was sticking out from his back. The Indians now rushed upon him with their long lances. Some thrusts he parried, others struck harmless upon his leather cuirass. In a few minutes three more of these savages went down before the blows and thrusts of the good Toledo blade.

COMANCHE LODGES.

THE RANCHERO AND THE COMANCHES.

The others took to flight, pursued by the single conqueror, whom, however, they succeeded in distancing.

With the exception of some of the African tribes, whose business is slave-hunting, the Comanches are the most absolute race of freebooters on the face of the globe. Their hand is against every man, and every man's hand is against them.

"The mode of life of the prairie tribes," says Colonel Marcy, "owing to their unsettled and wandering habits, is such as to render their condition one of constant danger and apprehension. The security of their numerous animals from the encroachments of their enemies, and their constant liability to attacks, make it imperatively necessary for them to be at all times upon the alert. Their details for herdsmen are made with as much regularity as the guard details at a military post; and even in times of the most profound peace they guard their animals both night and day, while scouts are often patrolling upon the adjoining heights to give notice of the approach of strangers, when their animals are hurried to a place of security, and every thing made ready for defense.

"No people, probably, on the face of the earth are more ambitious of martial fame, or entertain a higher appreciation for the deeds of a daring and successful warrior than the North American savages of the Plains. The attainment of such reputation is the paramount and absorbing object of their lives; all their aspirations for distinction invariably take this channel of expression. A young man is never considered worthy to occupy a seat in council until he has encountered an enemy in battle, and he who can count the greatest number of scalps is the most highly honored by his tribe. This idea is inculcated from their earliest infancy. It is not surprising, therefore, that with such weighty inducements before him, the young man who, as yet, has gained no renown as a brave or warrior, should be less discriminate in his attacks than older men who have already acquired a name. The young braves should, therefore, be closely watched when encountered on the Plains.

"The prairie tribes are seldom at peace with all their neighbors, and some of the young braves of a tribe are almost always absent upon a war excursion. These forays sometimes extend into the heart of the northern States of Mexico, where the Indians have carried on successful invasions for many years. They have devastated and depopulated a great part of Sonora and Chihuahua. The objects of these forays are to steal horses and mules, and to take prisoners; and if it so happens that a war-party has been unsuccessful in the accomplishment of these ends, or has had the misfortune to lose some of its number in battle, they become reckless, and will often attack a small party with whom they are not at war, provided they hope to escape detection. The disgrace attendant upon a return to their friends without some trophies as an offset to the loss of their comrades is a powerful incentive to action, and they extend but little mercy to defenseless travelers who have the misfortune to encounter them at such a conjuncture."

On approaching strangers the Prairie Indians put their horses at full speed, no matter whether their designs are friendly or hostile. When a party is discovered approaching all that is necessary to ascertain their disposition is to raise the right hand with the palm in front, and gradually push it forward and back several times. This is the recognized signal for them to halt, and if they are not hostile they will obey at once; if hostile they disregard the signal.

"It is a safe rule," says Colonel Marcy, "when a man finds himself alone on the prairies, and sees a party of Indians approaching, not to allow them to come near him, and if they persist in doing so to signal them to keep away. If they do not obey, and he be mounted upon a fleet horse, he should make for the nearest timber. If the Indians follow and press him too closely, he should halt, turn around, and point his gun at the foremost, which will often have the effect of turning them back, but he should never draw trigger unless he finds that his life depends upon the shot; for, as soon as his gun is discharged, his sole dependence, unless he have time to reload, must be upon the speed of his horse."

Taken all in all, the wolf appears of all animals to furnish the most perfect type of the Indian tribes of the Plains. The Tonkawas, one of these tribes, appear not only to recognize the resemblance, but also to accept these animals as in some sense their far-away progenitors. One of their ceremonies, the "Wolf Dance," reminds us, in a way, of the "mysteries" of the Greeks and Romans. Major Neighbors, an old friend of Colonel Marcy, is, perhaps, the only white man who has ever been present at one of these dances, which are always conducted with the utmost solemnity and secrecy, and with as much pomp as their limited means permit. The Major, as Indian Agent, had acquired the favor of the Chief of the Tribe, who introduced him secretly into the lodge where the ceremony was to be carried on, and placed him in a position where he could see without being seen.

"Soon after this, about fifty warriors, all dressed in wolf skins from head to feet, so as to represent the animal very perfectly, made their entrance upon all-fours in single file, and passed around the lodge, howling, growling, and making other demonstrations peculiar to that carnivorous quadruped. After this had continued for some time, they began to put down their noses and sniff the earth in every direction, until at length one of them suddenly stopped, uttered a shrill cry, and commenced scratching the ground at a particular spot. The others immediately gathered around, and all set to work scratching up the earth with their hands, imitating the motions of the wolf in so doing; and, in a few minutes, greatly to the astonishment of the Major, they exhumed from the spot a genuine live Tonkawa, who had previously been interred for the performance.

"As soon as they had unearthed this strange biped, they ran around, scenting his person and examining him throughout with the greatest apparent delight and curiosity. The advent of this curious and novel creature was an occasion of no ordinary moment to them, and a council of venerable and sage old wolves was at once assembled to determine what disposition should be made of him.

"The Tonkawa addressed them as follows: 'You have taken me from the spirit land where I was contented and happy, and brought me into this world where I am a stranger, and I know not what I shall do for subsistence and clothing. It is better you should place me back where you found me, otherwise I shall freeze or starve.'

"After mature deliberation the council declined returning him to the earth, and advised him to gain a livelihood as the wolves did; to go out into the wilderness, and rob, kill, and steal wherever opportunity presented. They then placed a bow and arrows in his hands, and told him with these he must furnish himself with food and clothing; that he could wander about from place to place like the wolves, but that he must never build a house or cultivate the soil; that if he did he would surely die. This injunction, the chief informed the Major, had always been strictly adhered to by the Tonkawas."

What shall be done with such a people? Colonel Marcy says: "The only way to make these merciless freebooters fear or respect the authority of our Government is, when they misbehave, first of all to chastise them well by striking such a blow as will be felt for a long time, and thus show them that we are superior to them in war. They will then respect us much more than when their good-will is purchased by presents." We imagine that if the opinion of frontiersmen were asked it would be expressed in the following words of Jim Baker, a friend of Marcy, who has spent a quarter of a century among the Indians of the Rocky Mountains. He says:

"They are the most onsartineest varmints in all creation, and I reckon tha'r not mor'n half human; for you never seed a human, arter you'd fed and treated him to the best fixins in your lodge, jist turn round and steal all your horses, or ary other thing he could lay his hands on. No, not adzackly. He would feel kinder grateful, and ask you to spread a blanket in his lodge ef you ever passed that a-way. But the Injun he don't care shucks for you, and is ready to do you a heap of mischief as soon as he quits your feed. No, Cap., it's not the right way to give um presents to buy peace; but ef I war governor of these yer United States, I'll tell you what I'd do. I'd invite um all to a big feast, and make b'lieve I wanted to have a big talk; and as soon as I got um all together, I'd pitch in and sculp about half of um, and then t'other half would be mighty glad to make a peace that would stick. That's the way I'd make a treaty with the dog'ond, red-bellied varmints; and as sure as you're born, Cap., that's the only way."

Colonel Marcy suggested to him the idea that there would be a lack of good faith and honor in such a proceeding, and that it would be much more in accordance with his notions of fair dealing to meet them openly in the field, and there endeavor to punish them if they deserve it. To this Baker replied:

"Tain't no use to talk about honor with them, Cap.; they hain't got no such thing in um; and they won't show fair fight, any way you can fix it. Don't they kill and sculp a white man when-er they get the better on him? The mean varmints, they'll never behave themselves until you give um a clean out-and-out licking. They can't understand white folks' ways, and they won't learn um; and ef you treat um decently, they think you are afearad. You may depend on't, Cap., the only way to treat Injuns is to thrash them well at first, then the balance will sorter take to you and behave themselves."

During his thirty years' service on the borders Captain Marcy conducted several important exploring and other expeditions. On the 5th of March, 1852, he received the following order from the War Department:

"Captain R. B. Marcy, Fifth Infantry, with his company as an escort, will proceed, without unnecessary delay, to make an examination of the Red River and the country bordering upon it, from the mouth of Caché Creek to its source, according to special instructions which he will receive. Brevet Captain G. B. McClellan, Corps of Engineers, is assigned duty with this expedition."

Just ten years from that time Brevet-Captain G. B. McClellan, as Commander of the Army of the Potomac, was just entering upon his campaign on the Peninsula, and Colonel Marcy was his Chief of Staff. This expedition threw much light upon the physical geography of a region hitherto wholly unknown, and as yet known only by this. Perhaps the most notable single feature is the discovery of an immense bed of gypsum 350 miles long, and from 50 to 100 broad. Hitherto the largest bed of this mineral known within the United States was a deposit in Iowa, covering an area of two or three square miles—not one-ten-thousandth part as large as this on the Red River. The gypsum affects all the streams running through it to such an extent as to render the waters drinkable only under the pressure of extreme thirst, and the unavoidable yet constant burning pains in the stomach, attended by loss of appetite, and the most reticent and feverish thirst. A very good imitation of its taste may be made by dissolving a tea-spoonful of Epsom salts in a tumbler of water.

"We endeavored," says General Harvey, "to disguise the taste of the water by mixing coffee with it; but it retained the same disagreeable properties in that form that it had in its natural state. Although we were suffering most acutely from the effects of the unwholesome and repulsive water at the time, we were still under the necessity of using it. Several of the men were taken with violent cramps in the stomach and vomiting, yet they did not murmur. On the contrary they were cheerful, and indulged in frequent jokes at the expense of those who were sick. The principal topic of conversation with them seemed to be a discussion of the relative merits of the different kinds of heavy food drinks which could be procured in the cities, and the prices that could be obtained for some of them if they were worth much of our party. Indeed, it seems to me that we were not entirely exempt from the agitated of a similar subject; and, from the drift of the argument, I have no doubt that a moderate quantity of Croton water, cooled with Boston ice, would have met with a very ready market in our little mess. Indeed, if I mistake not, one of the gentlemen offered as high as two thousand dollars for a single bucket of the pure element; but, unfortunately for him, this was one of those rare occasions in which money was not sufficiently potent to obtain the object desired. We spread our blankets, and endeavored to obliterate the sensation of thirst in sleep; but, so far as I was concerned, my slumbers were continually disturbed by dreams, in which I fancied myself swallowing huge draughts of ice-water."

Passing the gypsum region, the expedition came, in their homeward way, by a different route, upon a country of great beauty and fertility. On the 1st day of July they reached the extreme head waters of the Ke-che-a-qui-ho-no ("Prairie Dog Town") River, the main branch of the Red River. It flows through a gigantic gorge, with huge escarpments of sandstone, rising on each side to the height of 800 feet; this gradually closes until the sides, only a few yards apart at the bottom, unite overhead, leaving a long narrow corridor beneath, at the base of which the head spring of the main branch takes its rise. This spring, bursting from its cavernous reservoir, leaps down over huge masses of rock, and begins its long journey to the Mississippi, of which it is one of the chief tributaries. Ten years from that day was fought the great battle of Malvern Hill.

The cañon of the upper Red River is certainly one of the most remarkable of any of which we have certain accounts; and it is only one of the many to be found in the Rocky Mountain range and its collateral chains. If we can place any reliance upon bare report, the great cañon of the Colorado—that "Colorado" which enters the head of the Gulf of California—presents a cañon more wonderful than any other on the globe. From vague reports this chasm is well-nigh two hundred miles long, and of fabulous depth. More than three hundred years ago Coronado, in the course of his adventurous expedition, came upon it. He declares that for several days he traveled along the crest of a lofty bluff bordering the cañon, which he estimated to be nine miles high. That is, pile Mont Blanc upon the top of the highest peak of the Himalayas, and then cut a gorge down from the top to the level of the ocean, and it will not be within a mile as deep as this chasm. He adds, that the river flowing at the bottom appeared to be about a fathom wide; but the Indians assured him it was half a league. Some of his men once attempted to clamber down the steep sides. They were gone nearly a day, and on their return had been able only to reach a rock, visible from the top, which seemed about six feet high; they declared that, upon reaching it, they found it to be as high as the spire of the cathedral at Seville, which rises 350 feet. These reports are, of course, simply absurd, for the ridge from which the adventurers looked down would then have been well-nigh three times as high above the ocean as the loftiest spot which the foot of man has ever trod, or to which he has ascended in a balloon. As late as 1858 Colonel Marcy was told by Antony Lereux, for whom he vouches as "one of the most reliable and best-informed guides in New Mexico," that he had once been at a point of this cañon where he estimated the walls to be three miles high—that is, equal to a gorge cut from the summit of Mont Blanc down to the level of the Mediterranean. Mr. Kern, whom Colonel Marcy quotes as "a very intelligent and reliable gentleman," declares that he had a view of the cañon from a neighboring mountain, and had "no doubt that the walls were at least 5000 feet in height." From this we are prepared to make large deductions; but after these are made we imagine that nothing at all approaching it is elsewhere to be found. It is certainly well worth the cost of thorough exploration. In 1853 Colonel Marcy proposed to the Government to perform this work; but there was then no appropriation which could be applied to this object, and his suggestion was not acted upon.

"Imagine," he says, "then, what must be the effect of a large stream like the Colorado traversing for two hundred miles a defile with the perpendicular walls towering five thousand feet above the bed of the river. It is impossible that it should not contribute largely toward the formation of scenery surpassing in sublimity and picturesque character any other in the world. Our landscape painters would here find rare subjects for their study, and I venture to hope that the day is not far distant when some of the most enterprising of them may be induced to penetrate this new field of art in our only remaining unexplored territory.

"A consideration, however, of vastly greater financial and national importance than those alluded to above, which might, and probably would result from a thorough exploration of this part of the river, is the development of its mineral wealth. That gold and silver abound in that region is fully established, as those metals have been found in many localities both east and west of the Colorado. Is it not, therefore, probable that the walls of this gigantic crevice will exhibit many rich deposits? Companies are formed almost daily, and large amounts of money and labor expended in sinking shafts of one, two, and three hundred feet, with the confident expectation of finding mineral deposits; but here Nature has opened and exposed to view a continuous shaft two hundred miles in length and five thousand feet in depth. In the one case we have a small shaft blasted out at great expense by manual labor, showing a surface of about thirty-six hundred feet, while here Nature gratuitously exhibits ten thousand millions of feet extending into the very bowels of the earth.

"Is it, then, at all without the scope of rational conjecture to predict that such an immense development of the interior strata of the earth—such a huge gulch, if I may be allowed the expression, extending so great a distance through the heart of a country as rich as this in the precious metals, may yet prove to be the El Dorado which the early Spanish explorers so long and so fruitlessly sought for; and who knows but that the Government might here find a source of revenue sufficient to liquidate our national debt?"

But passing from such speculations we must advert briefly to a most perilous expedition which was actually performed by Colonel—then Captain—Marcy. In 1857 he was attached to the expedition sent into Utah under the command of General Albert Sidney Johnston. The Mormons destroyed the army trains, devastated the country in front, and as winter opened it was found necessary to send a detachment over the snowy peaks of the Rocky Mountains into New Mexico to find supplies for the troops. The story of the expedition is briefly told in the Report of the Secretary of War for 1858:

"This expedition was intrusted to Captain R. B. Marcy, of the Fifth Infantry; and, without intending to make an invidious comparison between the services of officers where all are meritorious, it is but just to bring the conduct of this officer and his command to your especial notice. It may be safely affirmed that, in the whole catalogue of hazardous expeditions scattered so thickly through the history of our border warfare, filled as many of them are with appalling tales of privation, hardship, and suffering, not one surpasses this, and in some particulars it has been hardly equaled by any.

day of November, 1857, with a command of forty enlisted men, and twenty-five mountain men, besides packers and guides. Their course lay through an almost trackless wilderness, over lofty and rugged mountains, without a pathway or human habitation to guide or direct, in the very depth of winter, through snows, for many miles together, reaching to the depth of five feet. Their beasts of burden very rapidly perished until very few were left; their supplies gave out; their luggage was abandoned; they were driven to subsist upon the carcasses of their dead horses and mules; all the men became greatly emaciated; some were frost-bitten; yet not one murmur of discontent escaped the lips of a single man. Their mission was one of extreme importance to the movements of the army, and great disaster might befall the command if these devoted men failed to bring succor to the camp. They had one and all volunteered for this service, and, although they might freeze or die, yet they would not complain.

"After a march of fifty-one days they emerged from the forests, and found themselves at Fort Massachusetts, in New Mexico. During their whole march Captain Marcy shared all the privations of the common soldier, marching, sleeping, and eating as they did."

From Colonel Marcy's Narrative we shall make a few extracts describing some of the perils of the expedition. On the 11th of December they packed their mules and began the ascent of the western slope of the Rocky Mountains. They had proceeded but a few miles when the snow began to impede their progress. It soon became so deep that the mules could no longer force their way through. Up to this time they had marched with an advanced-guard, immediately followed by the pack-mules, the main party bringing up the rear. Colonel Marcy proceeds:

"I now placed the greater part of the command in front, in single rank, so as to break a track for the animals. This was, of course, very hard work upon a few of the leading men; and, in order to equalize the labor as much as possible, I directed that every man, as he came in front, should retain that position a certain length of time, after which he was permitted to turn out of the track and allow all the others to pass him, taking his place in rear. By these alternations the work was very much lightened, and after all the party had passed a good track was left for the animals. And they really required all our care, as, from the time we entered the mountains, they received no other sustenance than what they derived from the bitter pine-leaves. The effects of this novel and unwholesome forage soon began to manifest itself upon them. They became weak and exhausted, and at length began to give out and die. I was then obliged to caché, or hide, all our surplus luggage, which reduced the weight of the packs very considerably. Notwithstanding this, they continued to perish. One day we lost five, and another day as many as eight died out of our little stock. This gave me very serious uneasiness, as our supply of provisions was becoming very small, and I knew, after these were gone, our only dependence for subsistence must be upon our famished animals. Our beef cattle had nearly all been consumed, and our stock of bread was very limited. I felt the necessity of husbanding the strength of my men and animals as much as possible. I therefore ordered the command to throw away every article of baggage they had remaining, excepting one blanket each and their arms and ammunition. They cheerfully complied with the order, and we thus made another very material reduction in the weight of our packs, which enabled our enfeebled animals to proceed with more ease.

"The snow increased day after day as we ascended, until it was four feet deep, and was so dry and light that the men, walking in an upright position, would sink to their waists, and could not move. One of the guides made a pair of snowshoes, and attempted to walk upon them, but they sank so deep in the soft snow that it was impossible to use them.

"Our only alternative now, in the deepest snow, was for the three or four leading men of the party to lie down and crawl upon their hands and feet, each man following in the tracks of the leader, and all placing their hands and feet in the same holes. This method packed the snow so that, after a few men had passed, it bore up the others, and was sufficiently firm to sustain the mules after all the men had traversed it.

"The leading man was generally able to go about fifty yards before he became exhausted. Notwithstanding I reduced the rations one-half, our provisions were all exhausted long before we reached the top of the mountains, and we were then entirely dependent upon our famished animals for food.

"After this our only diet for twelve days consisted of starved mules as they became exhausted and could go no farther. Twelve of my men had frozen their feet so badly as to be unable to walk, and we were obliged to appropriate all our serviceable animals to carry them. I had given up my own horse to one of these men, and took his place in the snow with the others. We had not a single morsel of any thing left to eat except these animals. If we had had some salt we would have done better, but that was all gone. I was in the habit of sprinkling a little gunpowder upon my mule-steaks, and it did not then require a very extensive stretch of the imagination to fancy the presence of both pepper and salt. This lean meat did not, however, by any means satisfy the cravings of the appetite, and we were continually longing for fat meat. Although we consumed large quantities of the mule meat, yet within half an hour from the time we had finished our meals we would feel as hungry as before we had eaten."

They had got within about a hundred miles of Fort Massachusetts, and had but three good mules left, and were in a state bordering upon starvation. Two guides, Mariano and Miguel, were dispatched in advance to request that supplies should be sent back to meet the party. They managed to reach the fort, after killing and eating one of the mules. It was eleven days before the supplies reached them; their way had lain through a region so utterly desolate that for thirty-one days they had not seen a human being outside of their own party. At last two men were seen coming up on horseback, and soon Miguel and Mariano rode up, firing their revolvers and making other demonstrations of joy. "We knew," says Marcy, "from their fresh horses that they had reached the fort and that we were now saved; and the exhibition of joy manifest among the command exceeded any thing of the kind ever beheld. Some of the men laughed, danced, and screamed with delight; while others (and I must confess I was not among the former) cried like children. I had not slept half an hour at a time for twenty days and nights, and was reduced from 170 to 131 pounds in weight, and of course my nervous system was not under very good control." When, four days after, the expedition reached Fort Massachusetts the members appeared in sorry plight. "Not more than one half of the men," writes the commander, "had any caps, and but few had any remains of trousers below the knees. Their feet were tied up with mule-hides, pieces of blankets, coat-tails, and the like. I had set out from Fort Bridger with a wardrobe of stout material; but I had divided this among my destitute men until I was myself reduced to a scanty allowance. Among other garments I had remaining was a soldier's over-coat, from the skirts of which I was in the habit of cutting off pieces to patch my pants and stockings; and as rents in these were of everyday occurrence, by the time I reached the fort there was but very little left of my original coat-tails."

STAMPEDE OF HORSES AND MULES.

In spite of the utmost exertions of the Commander many of the half-starved men managed to get at more food than they should have had, and woke up next morning in excruciating torture; and one of them died next day. But the savage system seems somehow to be capable of adapting itself to the extremes of starvation and repletion. When Mariano reached the fort he took lodgings with a Mexican and at once called for a bountiful supper, and asked for more. Then he sat down, smoked his pipe for a couple of hours, and beginning to feel hungry again, paid two dollars for a third supper, which he thought would last him till morning. But during the night he woke up as hungry as ever, and called up his hostess and offered her five dollars if she would cook him a fourth supper. This dispatched, he found himself able to worry through the remainder of the night. This gastronomic feat, adds Colonel Marcy, "will not appear at all surprising to those who are familiar with Indian life." Mariano, upon coming to Taos, received five hundred dollars for his services, which the Colonel thought would supply him with all he wanted for a long time. But the very next morning he came in saying that his money was all gone, and he wanted to borrow five dollars.

THE GRIZZLY.

He had lost every cent at Montez. The desired loan was granted, with an injunction to keep away from the mount-bank. The half-breed was duly grateful for the good advice, which we imagine was wasted upon him; for he closed his thanks by a lift of the eyebrows, a shrug of the shoulders, and the hint, "Maybe some time me win, Messieur!"

The return journey to Utah was commenced at the middle of March, and abounded in adventures. Of these we have only space to speak of one of those sudden storms characteristic of the country. On the 30th of April the party was encamped upon the high ridge which divides the Arkansas River from the Platte. The day was bright and balmy, the trees had put forth their new leaves, and the fresh grass stood six inches high. At sunset the wind changed to the north; the weather grew suddenly cold. Soon it began to snow, and the storm increased to a tempest, against which it was impossible to ride or walk. The storm had hardly set in when one of the herds of three hundred horses and mules broke furiously away from the men who were guarding them, and ran straight before the wind for fifty miles before they were stopped. Three of the herdsmen attempted to follow the frightened animals. One made his way back to camp in a state of great prostration and suffering; another was found frozen to death in the snow; the third was discovered, after the tempest subsided, crawling about on his hands and knees in a temporary delirium. The tempest lasted with uninterrupted fury for sixty consecutive hours, during which it was impossible to move for any distance facing the wind and snow. One of the employés, who had gone two hundred yards from the camp, set out to return, but was unable to do so, and perished in the attempt.

Like most great hunters, Colonel Marcy seems inclined to undervalue the prowess of the animals which he conquers. Thus, of the Grizzly Bear, the monarch of the American forests, and certainly one of the strongest of beasts, he tells a number of stories from his own personal experience, which he sums up by saying:

"I believe that if a man came suddenly upon the beast in a thicket, where it could have no previous warning, he might be attacked; and it is possible that a large grizzly bear might attack a man no flock in the open prairie, and in some instances they have been known to make war upon men on horseback; but I have always observed that an acquaintance with the larger wild animals of our country makes them much less formidable than they are represented to us when in the distance."

Still, on the strength of an adventure of Jim Baker, the Colonel's old mountain friend, we feel warranted in the belief that a "grizzly," though only half grown, may be an ugly customer. Baker and Bridger, a comrade of his, one day while setting traps came upon a couple of young bears, not larger than well-grown dogs. It struck them that if they waived the advantage of fire-arms, and should "pitch in and sculp the varmints with their knives," it would be something to brag of. So they threw down their rifles and "went in," each selecting one of the cubs. The young brutes reared up on their haunches and showed fight. Rather a scientific display took place between Baker and Bear, Bruin warding off every knife-thrust with a skill which would have done honor to the Prize Ring. At length the bear rushed in, "meaning mischief." But the knife was too much for him, and he received a death wound under the ribs. The other bear was meanwhile having the best of it with Bridger, who cried out for assistance. But no sooner had Baker come up than Bridger ran off. Baker, however, went in again and killed Bear Number Two. But he said, in recounting the fight, "I'll never fight nary a nother grizzly without a good shooting-iron in my paws."

As for wolves, the Colonel thinks them hardly worth notice. He even pooh-poohs at Putnam's famous exploit of entering a cave and shooting a wolf. "Those who understand the cowardly nature of the wolf," he says, "and are familiar with its habits, are perfectly aware that such an undertaking is not attended with the slightest danger. I knew a woman who, in the night time, hearing a disturbance in her poultry yard, went out and met a large wolf carrying off one of her turkeys, of which she thought much, being the only ones within a hundred miles, and pursued the wolf, made him drop the turkeys, and run away. If any one should have any doubt regarding this statement," continues the Colonel, "I beg to refer him to my wife, who was the owner of the turkeys."

Colonel Marcy's long service on the border has brought him into constant contact with that peculiar class who form the extreme frontier population of the Southwest. "They seem," he says, "to constitute an anomalous and detached element in our social structure. Their sparsely scattered forest habitations being far removed from towns or villages, and seldom visited by travelers, exclude them almost entirely from intercourse with the civilized world, and they are nearly as ignorant of what is transpiring outside of their own immediate sphere as the savages themselves. They seldom or never see a newspaper, and could not read it if they did; and I honestly believe that many of them could not tell whether General Jackson, Mr. Lincoln, or Mr. Johnson is President of the United States at the present time." Of the many anecdotes which he gives of these people, we must find space, with considerable abridgment, for one:

"While marching a battalion of my regiment from Little Rock to Fort Towson during a very warm day in the autumn of 1848, I made a halt at a respectable-looking farm-house near the Choctaw line in Arkansas, and, seeing a woman sitting out upon the portico, I rode up for the purpose of making some inquiries regarding the roads. She returned my salutation, and very politely invited me to 'light and have a char.' I dismounted, took the chair, and complimented the good woman upon the neat and comfortable appearance of her surroundings. She said 'it was tollible far, considerin they had com'd thar and commenced deadnin the trees and mauling the rails only five years afore.' I should have imagined, however, from the very limited extent of her knowledge of the surrounding country, that she had but just arrived, or that she had been hibernating during the five years mentioned. As our road forked near the house, I asked her which of the two would lead us to a small town on our route about ten miles distant. She replied that 'she didn't adzactly mind, but she sort'r reckon'd her nigger gal mought tell me.'"

The "nigger gal," after one or two summons, appeared in the person of Jerusha, a venerable negress quite seventy years old, whose functions, as was soon manifested, comprised that of sense-bearer to her mistress. The "gal" on making her appearance was accosted with—

"'You lazy no 'count nigger, you jess tell this yere stranger whar these two roads goes to, right quick, do you hear.' Jerusha very promptly replied, 'Wa'al, Mass'r, I 'spects I'ze gwine to tell you all about it. Mass'r Jeems he 'lowed this yere left hand one he gwine down to Wash-un-tum, and that thar t'other one he gwine to the Choctaw nashum.' I then asked the woman of the house the distance to the nearest post-office; but of this she had not the remotest idea, and at once referred me to the servant, who at once gave me the information."

Soon the master of the house came in. He had been out hunting, and had brought home a couple of deer; the Colonel thought game must be very plenty in the neighborhood. Not so thought the settler. When he first came there "thar war right smart chance o' deer;" but now, though he had been out all the morning, he had only killed three, and had "busted" two caps at one which he did not get. After some conversation it appeared that the settler had been out, when a young man, with General

Jackson, and had been present at the battle of the Horseshoe, of which he said:

"I calkerlate, Mr. Hossifer, that war the most de-cisivest and the most san-guin-ariest fight you ever seen in all yer born days. We boys, we up and pitched in thar, and we gin the yaller-bellies the most parr-ticlar hail Columby. We chawed um all up; we laid um out cold'r nur a wedge; we saved every mother's son of um—we did that thar little thing, boss."

The special meaning attached to the word "saved" is worthy of notice. The whisky-bottle was of course produced, the host remarking that he "war not too proud to take a horn with a fellow-soger, if he war a regular." The social "drink" having been duly gone through, the settler wished to learn the latest news from the outside world. "There's narry paper," he said, "tuck in this yere settlement; but I hearn tell that Gin-ral Jackson are dead; maybe you mought heer'd some talk 'bout it as you com'd 'long the road, stranger." The military guest was quite able to assure the borderman that the rumor which had just reached the settlement was ut happily too true. Andrew Jackson had died three years before.

But these rude specimens of humanity are by no means destitute of faculties; and not unfrequently, under favorable circumstances, they are developed. Thus, so long ago as when Marcy was at West Point, a strapping youth from the remote borders, near the Cherokee nation, made his appearance provided with a proper certificate of appointment as cadet. How he reached New York on horseback; how he ordered half a peck of oysters for himself in the city, and how he labored up the hill at West Point, panting under the burden of his trunk, we have not space to tell. Enough that he made his appearance before Colonel Thayer, a rigid old martinet, who was then commandant at the institution, with the inquiry,

"Ole man, are you Colonel or Captain, or whatever you-call-um, Thayer?"

The officer replied that he was Colonel Thayer.

"Wa'al, now, look-ayere, Kurn," was the cool reply; "this yere hill o' yourn am a breather."

Four years after this uncouth young fellow graduated from West Point an accomplished gentleman and scholar, reflecting credit upon the institution, "and was afterward favorably known as the author of a History of Texas."

We can not close this paper without making some mention of Martin Scott, who was Captain of the Company to which Lieutenant Marcy was assigned upon leaving West Point. He was a native of Bennington in Vermont, and seems quite early to have become locally famous for marksmanship and pluck, the qualities just then most in request in our army. In 1814, when he was plowing in the field, a letter was brought to him, upon opening which he found it contained a commission as ensign in the Army of the United States. Why this appointment was conferred upon him, or by whose influence, he never knew. He had never made application for it. However, he did not look a gift-horse in the mouth; and being sent to the Western frontier soon found means to make his mark as the best shot of his day. The coon story may not be literally true; and Colonel Marcy can not vouch from personal knowledge, though he has often heard it vouched for, of the absolute truth of the story that he would take a couple of potatoes, fling them successively into the air, and put a pistol ball through both as they crossed each other, one going up and the other coming down. But here is one, for which we have Colonel Marcy's authority :

"He proposed to me, upon one occasion, that we should take an old-fashioned United States yager that he had, and determine which could load and fire three shots in the shortest space of time, and make the best target. Accordingly, a playing-card, with a spot or bull's-eye in the centre about the size of a dime, was attached to a log of wood, and placed at seventy-five yards from where we proposed to stand. Captain Scott then took the rifle uncharged, with the powder-flask at hand, and the balls and patches in his mouth, and he made the three shots 'off-hand' in one minute and twenty seconds. I then myself went to the target, and found one round hole directly through the centre of the bull's-eye. I was surprised at the precision of the shot, but observed to the Captain that the other two had entirely missed the target. He shook his head and called for an axe, when we split the log, and found the three balls in one mass, all having passed through the same round aperture directly in the centre of the card."

Captain Scott had the reputation of being rather "close;" that is, of taking very good care of his money. In fact at one time his fellow-officers attempted "to put him into Coventry" on that account; but as none of them felt that they were equal to him as a shot, they sent for a noted "fire-eater" to act as their champion. The bully insulted Scott; and a challenge was the inevitable consequence. Scott was thoroughly opposed to dueling, and had resolved to throw away his fire; but happening to hear his antagonist remark that he had a very disagreeable job on hand, to shoot a d——d Yankee, concluded that his forbearance would be thrown away. The consequence was that when the duel came off the bully got a ball through his lungs; which luckily did not kill him; but rather the contrary, for he was thought to have had the consumption before, but somehow the wound effected a cure, and he lived many years after the time when, according to all computation, he should have been dead.

Scott, if "close," was far enough from "mean," and did much for his family, many of whom were in poor circumstances. Once he came back to Bennington in great state, and took up his quarters at the hotel, where nobody saw in him the poor lad who years ago had gone from that quiet town. Looking from the window he saw a man driving a yoke of oxen. "A fine pair of oxen," said the Captain; "are they yours?" "No, they belong to a neighbor, I am not able to buy them." "How much will they cost?" The price being named, he took out the money, paid for them, and told the astonished driver that he liked his looks so much that he would make him a present of the cattle. The Captain then invited himself to visit the new owner of the oxen. The man said that he rented a little farm, and had hard work to get along, but would of course be glad to have the gentleman who had been so kind to him come to his poor house. The guest inquired the price of the farm, and said that he would like to buy that, and make a present of it to the friend to whom he had taken such a liking. Then, and not before, did the farmer discover that the generous stranger was his own brother.

Captain Martin Scott fell at Molino del Rey in 1847, gallantly leading forward his command into that fearful fight, thirty-three years after the time when he received the letter appointing him as ensign in the army.

MIDSUMMER.

Upon the heat-l walls the sun shines down
Fiercely and blankly, with unsoftened rays,
Sword-like above the noisy, dusty town,
Through the long summer days.

Only this glare and bustle meet mine eye,
Till o'er the glowing west the shadows creep,
And Night leads out her silent train on high,
Soothing the world to sleep.

All day my heart has been so full of dreams—
A stir of winds comes through the sultry air—
Far off my fancy hears a voice of streams,
And I again am there.

Ah me! the coolness of those mountain woods!
The beauty of the water's crystal sheen!
The long-arched aisles—cathedral solitudes—
With mossy carpets green.

The noise of running waters every where;
The sound of winds among the pine-tree tops;
The waterfalls that shower upon the air
A rain of silver drops.

The majesty of those eternal hills—
Deep glens beneath, and sunshine on their copes—
And the bright river lying calm and still Beyond the farthest slopes.

All these have risen up before mine eyes,
And my heart stood before them tranced and dumb—
As one sweet voice of many melodies
Called from the mountains, Come!

Oh, for a bird's swift wings! My own, my own,
My priestess Nature, at thy inmost shrine
Methinks I should be nearer to the Throne
Than in this lot of mine.

THE State of Texas is larger than the whole Empire of France. The greatest length of France is 664 miles; its greatest breadth 620 miles. Its total area, according to official tables published by the French Government, is 199,946 square miles. Texas, in extreme length, is 800 miles; its extreme breadth is 750 miles. Its area is 237,504 square miles. It has been said that the whole island of Great Britain could be laid down upon the State of Texas, leaving a border all around sixty miles broad.

This majestic domain was received into the American Union on the 27th of December, 1845. Its admission involved the United States in a costly and bloody war with Mexico, and the payment of ten millions of dollars in five per cent. bonds. Its population in 1860 amounted to 601,039, of whom 180,682 were slaves. Of this white population we may suppose that one in five were adult males, making 84,069. Of these probably one-half, including their patriotic Governor, Samuel Houston, were friendly to the Union. Thus less than fifty thousand settlers in Texas—the majority of them men of no property, no intelligence, and no consideration—had the effrontery to attempt to wrest from a nation of thirty millions of people territory equal to the whole Empire of France, and for which territory the Government had paid ten millions of dollars, and had conducted a sanguinary war at an expense which can not well be estimated.

On the 1st of February, 1861, a packed convention, which represented scarcely one-half of the counties in the State, assembled at Austin, and passed an ordinance, with seven dissenting votes, declaring "That Texas is a separate sovereign State, and that her citizens and people are absolved from all allegiance to the United States or the Government thereof."

Immediately upon this General David E. Twiggs, an officer in the United States army, who was in military command in Texas, joined the Secessionists, and voluntarily surrendered to them all the United States property which had been intrusted to his care. This consisted of thirteen forts, fifteen thousand stand of arms, eighty pieces of ordnance, fifty-five thousand dollars in specie, about twelve hundred horses, with mules, wagons, tents, provisions, ammunitions of war, to the estimated value of nearly two million of dollars. All the United States soldiers, 2500 in number, were taken prisoners, stripped of their arms, and only released on parole not to serve against the Confederate States until exchanged.

In response to this action of General Twiggs the Secretary of War, J. Holt, on the 1st of March, issued the following order, which was countersigned by Samuel Cooper, Adjutant-General of the United States. This was the last order issued by Cooper, who directly after entered the Confederate service as Adjutant-General:

"By the direction of the President of the United States* it is ordered that Brigadier-General David E. Twiggs be and is hereby dismissed from the army of the United States for his treachery to the flag of his country, in having surrendered, on the 18th of February, 1861, on the demand of the authorities of Texas, the military posts and other property of the United States in his Department and under his charge."

In reply to this a letter appeared in the Charleston Courier of May 18, over the signature of General Twiggs, addressed to James Buchanan, then ex-President, in which the writer says:

"Your usurped right to dismiss me from the army might be acquiesced in, but you had no right to brand me as a traitor. This was personal, and I shall treat it as such—not through the papers, but in person. I shall most assuredly pay a visit to Lancaster for the sole purpose of a personal interview with you. So, Sir, prepare yourself. I am well assured that public opinion will sanction any course I may take with you."

The rebel convention in Charleston, a few weeks after, passed a formal vote approving the conduct of General Twiggs in resigning his commission and turning over the public property under his control to the enemies of the flag he had sworn to defend.

The traitor General was, in May, by the rebel authorities, placed in command of the Military Department of Louisiana, and also received the reward of the appointment of Major-General in the Confederate army.

There was in Texas, at the time of General Twiggs's treason, a force of United States troops consisting of about 2500 men. They were organized in thirty-seven companies. Of these twenty-two were infantry, five artillery, and ten cavalry. These troops were mainly employed to protect the country from the invasion of savages. They were consequently very considerably dispersed over the wide territory. Twenty of these companies were on the Rio Grande. The remainder were stationed at various forts quite widely scattered.

As these patriot troops could neither be persuaded nor compelled to follow their General into the camp of the enemy many of them were permitted to return to the North. Some detachments were taken prisoners and released upon parole. They were, however, allowed to leave the State only from the port of Galveston and by the Mississippi River. Four hundred and fifty of these troops, under Major Sibley, had embarked on board some schooners at Saluda. A Texan force in some armed steamers came down upon them from Indianola and took the whole body prisoners of war. They were not released until they had taken an oath not to take up arms against the Southern Confederacy. This was on the 24th of April.

Soon after, on the 9th of May, eight companies of infantry, consisting of three hundred and sixty-six men, rank and file, were on the road, preparing to leave the State, about twenty-two miles west of San Antonio. They were under the command of Colonel Reeve. The rebel Colonel Van Dorn collected a force of fifteen hundred men, a portion of them cavalry, with a battery of flying artillery consisting of six 12-pounders, and took a strong position to intercept them.

It was in the beautiful month of May, when the whole of that sunny region bloomed with verdure and flowers. Though it may be too much to say that Texas had been mainly settled by vagabonds and escaped felons of the United States, it is certainly true that that wide and lovely realm, with its exuberant soil and genial clime, and which civilization and law had scarcely yet penetrated, had become the favorite resort of all the ruffians of this and of other lands. This was so eminently the case that Texas had long been popularly called "The Paradise of Rascals."

From such a community it was not difficult to collect a numerous band eager for any reckless adventure. Horses abounded, for the almost limitless prairies were covered with wild herds luxuriating in the fattest pastures. A large portion of the rebel band was mounted. The spectacle they presented is described by those who witnessed it as picturesque in the extreme. From the savages around these semi-savage men had acquired a taste for barbaric splendor. Many of the horses were festooned with gay trappings. There was every variety of dress and arms. Banners fluttered in the breeze. Music was loud and exultant; for these men knew full well that they were not marching to stern battle and wounds and death, but to the easy capture of a small band of gallant men whom they five times outnumbered. The horses pawed and neighed. Polished armor gleamed in the rays of the cloudless sun. And young rebel officers proudly sped over the field on their mettled chargers. The poor fools thought that it was merely boys' play to wage war against the Government of the United States. A few months awoke them terribly to the consciousness of their error. Ere the war terminated nearly every one of those deluded men bit the dust.

In that hot climate at that season of the year it was necessary, on the march, to avoid as much as possible the full blaze of the sun. On Thursday morning, May the 8th, at two o'clock, Colonel Reeve broke camp, and having reached a ridge of land near St. Lucas Springs, halted his command, barricaded the road with his wagons, and taking possession of a stone-house and some fences, posted his troops to await the expected assault. He did not then know how overpowering the force he was to encounter.

Soon two rebel officers appeared with a flag of truce, demanding an unconditional surrender of the United States troops as prisoners of war. Five minutes were allowed to give answer to the demand. Colonel Reeve must have been greatly perplexed. He might, after the surrender, find that he had yielded to a force which he was capable of resisting. By refusing to surrender he might expose his men to indiscriminate massacre from an infuriated force of relentless marauders. He, however, gallantly declined acceding to the terms unless he were permitted to send an officer to see whether the number of troops opposed to him was so large as to render it his duty to throw down his arms rather than expose his men to slaughter. Van Dorn consented, saying:

"You shall have an opportunity to see my troops. And the more you see of them the less you will like it."

Lieutenant Bliss, a young officer of the United States Army, distinguished for his bravery, mounted his horse and rode along the line of the rebel troops. As his eye glanced over their serried ranks the exultation of the foe burst forth in repeated cheers. He returned to his commander with the sad announcement that resistance would be utterly unavailing. Colonel Reeve was thus compelled to surrender his whole command unconditionally as prisoners of war, and to give his word of honor that he would report himself, with his men, at the rebel camp at Leon that evening at six o'clock.

The victorious rebels, greatly elated with their achievement, marched back to their camp, which they reached about three o'clock in the afternoon. At five o'clock Colonel Reeve arrived with his command. They pitched their tents on the spot designated for them, and stacked their arms. The next morning they were marched though San Antonio to a camp at San Pedro Springs, about two miles beyond.

As Governor Houston had refused to give his support to the traitorous measures which the rebels had so fiercely commenced, a popular Convention had voted him expelled from the gubernatorial chair, and had placed the Executive power in the hands of a more pliant man, Lieutenant-Governor Clark. On the 18th of June Clark issued a proclamation declaring it to be treason for any inhabitant of Texas to hold any communication with the people of the North, and announcing:

"That it will also be treasonable for any citizen of Texas to pay any debts due owing by him to a citizen or citizens of either of said States or Territories, or to contract with them any new debts or obligations during the continuance of said war."

All Northern citizens were ordered to leave Texas within ten days. Thus easily was this majestic realm apparently wrested from the United States, and passed over to a band of rebels who insanely engaged in the endeavor to subvert all free institutions upon the continent of North America.

The early exigencies of the war were such that but little attention could be devoted to the remote State of Texas. As soon as possible, however, a small naval force was sent to blockade the harbor of Galveston, her principal port of entry. Galveston was the most populous and commercial city of Texas. It is situated on a small island, at the mouth of Galveston Bay, about 450 miles southwest from New Orleans. This island, about thirty miles long, and half a mile wide, separates the bay from the often tumultuous waves of the Gulf of Mexico. A railroad bridge, three-fourths of a mile in length, runs across the shallow water of a portion of the bay to the main land. The population of the city was about 7000. It was composed mainly of adventurers who were seeking their fortunes in those remote realms. The great majority of them eagerly espoused the cause of the rebellion. At the eastern end of the island, at a spot called Bolivar Point, they erected batteries sufficiently powerful to command the bay against the entrance of any naval force we could then send there.

Our vessels, however, so effectually blockaded the port that the commerce of the little, bustling, traitorous city was utterly destroyed. Our British cousins could not creep in with their supplies of arms and powder; and no cotton could leave to add to the resources of rebellion in foreign lands. For a few weeks no occurrence of importance took place. The frowning batteries rendered it impossible for the vessels to enter the bay. And the vessels, keeping watch and ward outside of the bar, rendered ingress or egress alike impossible. There had been a tacit understanding that there should be no wanton firing which would merely endanger individuals.

Early in the morning of the 3d of August, 1861, the gun-boat Dart, in its cautious cruising, came within range of one of the shore-batteries. The rebel commander took deliberate sight of her with one of his heaviest guns. A slight puff of smoke rose above the breast-work; there was a thundering report, which swept over the ocean, and a shot came booming along which, though aimed directly at the steamer, fortunately did not strike her. The challenge thus given was promptly accepted. In an instant a puff of smoke was seen issuing from the bows of the steamer as she moved slowly onward, and a shell, with return compliments, was hurtled screaming through the air. For some time this interchange of shots was continued, though with great deliberation.

As the rebel batteries were in the rear of the town and close to it, our gun-boats could not open fire upon those batteries without endangering the inhabitants by every shot they should throw. Captain James Alden had on this account humanely abstained from provoking a contest. He was therefore much surprised at the temerity of the rebel commander, Colonel Moore, in commencing an attack, when he could not but know that the return fire would inevitably reach the women and children in the streets of Galveston. After this exchange of shots for some time, the Dart withdrew and reported facts to Captain Alden in the South Carolina.

Curious to know whether the rebels, under these circumstances, were insane enough to provoke a fight; a larger force was got under way about 5 o'clock in the evening, and stood in for the batteries. As soon as the steamers were within range of the shore-guns the rebels again opened fire. Captain Alden sent back a few return shots, and then with extraordinary humanity withdrew, as he knew that both shot and shell would endanger the helpless people in the town. But twelve or fourteen shots were exchanged. Fragments of shells and one 32-pound ball entered the city. One shell fell among a group of men who were on an eminence watching the conflict. It cut one man in two, and slightly wounded two or three others.

It does not appear that the inhabitants of Galveston deserved any special consideration. The Galveston News says:

"During the firing the city rang with the shouts of the people from the roofs and balconies at every discharge from the batteries, and even the ladies participated in the enthusiasm of the excitement, manifesting the utmost anxiety to see our shot strike the steamer and sink her."

The British and Hanoverian Consuls, residing in the city, had the effrontery to remonstrate against our ships returning the fire of the batteries, assuming that it was the bombardment of the city without giving the customary notice. To this Captain Alden indignantly replied:

"We were no sooner within range of their guns than they opened their fire, when we, after exchanging a few shots, retired, preferring that it should appear that we were beaten off rather than continue a contest where, as the result shows, so many unoffending citizens must necessarily suffer. In conclusion, let me add, that no one can regret the injury done to unoffending citizens more than I do. Still I find no complaints of my acts of the 3d instant coming from the military or civil authorities of Galveston. And, with due deference to your consideration and humanity, I must respectfully remark that it is the first time I have ever heard that the women and children and unarmed citizens of an American town were under the protection of foreign Consuls."

On the night of the 7th of November of this year there took place in these waters one of the most daring adventures of the war. The rebels had an armed schooner in the bay, the Royal Yacht, which was acting as a guard at the entrance of the harbor. She was armed with a 32-pounder, and had a crew of about twenty-five men. Some distance farther up the bay, moored to a wharf, under the guns of Pelican Island Fort, there was a rebel man-of-war steamer, the General Rusk, which carried four guns and a large crew.

On the 7th, Lieutenant James E. Jouett went aloft, and, after a careful survey of the harbor, proposed to Captain Eagle, of the United States frigate Santee, that he should take two launches and a volunteer crew, and in the night, with muffled oars, row by the guard-schooner and cut out the General Rusk.

"I will not," said he, "attempt the General Rusk unless I can surprise her. If I am discovered by the schooner I will abandon my design upon the steamer and fall back and take the schooner. It would be madness to attempt the steamer if discovered."

Volunteer crews, of twenty men for each launch, were soon found. Lieutenant Jouett was in command. Lieutenant John G. Mitchell took charge of the second launch. The crews were dressed in blue frocks with white cap-covers, that they might recognize each other in the dark. Each man had his specific duty assigned him. Loaded shells, port fires, fire-balls, and slow matches, were all got ready. Immediately after dark the launches were hoisted out, and the guns placed in them with ten charges of shrapnell and ten of canister. Every man was armed with a cutlass and a Colt's revolver. At just half past eleven the crew started on their perilous enterprise. The wind and the tide were both against them. They, however, pulled lustily for two hours and a half, steering widely to the northward, to avoid the guard-schooner, hoping to get ahead of the Rusk, and then to drop down upon her. They had passed the schooner, and were prosperously approaching the steamer, which was all unconscious of its danger, when both boats suddenly grounded heavily upon a shoal, which was not laid down in the charts. In their endeavors to get off they were discovered. Signal-lights were exchanged from fort to fort, lanterns were run up, and the steamer was all alive with excitement like that in a nest of wasps suddenly disturbed. The adventurers in the two frail launches were now exposed to the fire of the Rusk and of all the four forts. As it would be madness under these circumstances to attempt to take the steamer, Lieutenant Jouett gave the order, "Pull for the schooner. Second launch will board her on starboard bow, first on starboard beam."

As they turned the wind and tide which had before opposed was now with them. In five minutes they made the schooner now directly before them. The men pulled silently, though vigorously, at their muffled oars. Not a word was spoken save the low and almost whispered orders of their commander, "Give away, men. Ready with the gun, Mr. Carter."

The watchful sentinel on board the schooner caught sight of them, but knowing not whether they were friends or foes, in a stentorian voice shouted three times, "Boat ahoy!" The eventful crisis had come in which minutes are as hours. "Fire, Mr. Carter," exclaimed Mr. Jouett. The primer was damp and the gun missed. Then came the rapid, excited order, "Give away, quick; trail oars; stand by to board!" At that moment Mr. Carter had again primed; the gun was fired, and a shell pierced the Royal Yacht at the water-line. But by the recoil of the gun the boat was driven back several feet, thus frustrating their boarding. Also, at the same instant the crew of the schooner poured into the boats a volley of bullets, which fire our men returned with their revolvers with such effect as to drive many of the rebels below. All this occurred in less time than it takes to read it. Both launches were now alongside of the schooner, and the men sprang on board. The desperate, bloody, hand-to-hand conflict was soon over.

As Lieutenant Jouett was rushing forward upon the crew a rebel thrust a sword-bayonet fastened to a pole through his right arm into his side, pinning his arm to his side, nearly knocking him from his feet, and having him at that advantage endeavored to thrust him overboard. But Lieutenant Jouett seized the pike with his left hand, broke it, without pulling it from his arm, and struck at the man's head as he dodged below. The deck was soon cleared, and the whole crew driven down the hatch. It is to be borne in mind that this scene of tumult and death occurred in the midst of midnight darkness. In the confusion of boarding the lanterns had gone out. There was now no time to be lost, since the whole harbor was aroused.

Lieutenant Jouett, as he pulled the pike from his side, nearly fainted from loss of blood. Finding his sight growing dim he summoned all his mental energies to triumph over physical disablement, and sprang vigorously forward to finish his work. The prisoners were all below, and refused to come up to take their places in the boats. There was no time for parleying. A military persuasive was sent down to them in the shape of a shell, loaded with eighty balls. The appeal was irresistible. They came tumbling up "like mad." In the conflict one of our men had been killed and seven wounded. The wounded were taken in one of the boats and the prisoners in the other. The gun was spiked, the small-arms and flag taken, and the vessel set on fire fore and aft. She was in a sinking condition from the effect of the shell which had penetrated her, and therefore could not be brought out.

The night was very dark, the sea rough, and they were six miles from the Santee. There were more prisoners in the boat than well men. Lieutenant Jouett had heroically concealed his wound, lest the prisoners should be emboldened to rise and take the boat. His voice was failing him, and he could feel the hot blood gushing from his side. He thrust two of his fingers, with his flannel shirt covering them, into his wound, and thus he sat for three weary hours cheering his exhausted men at the oars. The day was just dawning as they reached the ship.

It was indeed a brave undertaking—we can not say chivalric, for the rebels have spoiled the word—to undertake to cut out a ship under four forts, and in the vicinity of a large town. The adventure proved a great success, though all was not accomplished which was hoped for. Thirteen were taken prisoners. How many were killed is not known, as it is said that many leaped overboard and swam for the shore.

Slowly yet surely the National Government was gathering its strength to avenge its outraged authority, and to reclaim that vast realm over which rebellion had ventured to unfurl its flag. The citizens of Galveston trembled in view of the doom which was certainly impending. The largest guns they had on the island were 32-pounders, whose range did not exceed two miles. Nothing in the way of reinforcements could reach them by sea; and it seemed next to impossible to transport over weary leagues of hill and vale, river and morass, guns of a larger calibre. But the United States Government would soon have a fleet at the mouth of their harbor with guns afloat of the largest bore, and which would throw shot and shell three or four miles. Thus at our leisure we could lay the city in ashes, and blow their batteries into the air without receiving a harmful shot in return.

Appalled by this prospect the rebels concluded to evacuate the city. They consequently commenced removing their hospital stores and all public and private property of a movable kind to Houston, about forty miles in the interior. These measures were adopted with the utmost precautions to avoid surprise. At the same time the desperate attempt was undertaken to transport a battery of four Columbiads and several rifled cannon from Alexandria, on the Red River, to which place the ordnance had been conveyed from New Orleans, across Northern Louisiana to the Sabine, a distance of about eighty miles, and thence a couple of hundred miles through Texas to Galveston. A force of between two and three hundred oxen were employed, and for a time they accomplished about ten miles a day. They, however, encountered such obstacles that the enterprise was abandoned.

In the mean time Texas was contributing very efficiently to the support of the rebellion. Her exuberant fields had produced crops in such fabulous abundance that it was said that Western Texas alone was capable, at the lowest rates, of feeding and foraging the whole army of the Confederacy could means of transportation be furnished. Thousands of cattle were sent across the Mississippi, and immense supplies of grain. And by the middle of July, 1862, out of a voting population of but sixty-four thousand men forty-five thousand rushed or were driven into the rebel ranks. The conscription was so merciless that this number was soon increased to sixty-four regiments.

Some faint idea may be formed of the terrible relentlessness of this conscription from the following facts, taken from the Galveston Union, a German paper published in Galveston after its occupation by the Union troops.

On a small stream called Johnston's Creek, near the origin of the Grand Cape and the Piedruales, there was a very industrious and thriving little settlement of American and German families. There was no village, but their farms were scattered along the banks of the stream and over the prairie. In their sublime solitude, all equally rich and equally poor, and dwelling in humble cabins, they were banded together for protection against marauding Indians. The future was bright before them, with promise of ever-increasing comforts and opulence. So far as there can be Arcadian simplicity and peace in this lost world of ours, these settlers, "from strife and tumult far," on their fertile acres and beneath the most genial sky enjoyed that blessing.

Faint rumors had reached them of the war, when one morning some officers of the Confederacy appeared among them to collect war taxes, and to organize them into military companies for drill. Money was an article unknown among them. They lived so far from each other on their large farms that to meet to drill would leave their families without protection to the vagabond Indians prowling around. Moreover, they took no interest in the rebel cause, for all their sympathies were with the National Government, from which they had received only benefactions.

But treason had no heart of mercy for those who would not espouse its cause. A notorious ruffian, by the name of Duff, with a company of ferocious vagabonds, was sent to drag these men from their homes into the rebel ranks. Mr. Oldham, Senator from Texas, made a speech in the rebel Congress, remonstrating against the recklessness with which the Texans were torn from their homes.

"The best troops of Texas," he said, "you have transported east of the Mississippi, brought to Virginia, put into the hottest part of the contest, where they have been decimated; and now three-fourths of each regiment from Texas sleep in their graves, or have been discharged on account of sickness. Let this Government continue to draw on the fighting population of Texas to keep up these regiments, and Texas will be ruined, irretrievably ruined."

The doomed men fled for refuge to the mountains. One man alone, Frederic Degener, was left behind. The watchful eye of his wife descried the approach of the foe. With a loud cry she gave the alarm. With the fleetness of a deer he commenced his flight. The rebel gang pursued and discharged fourteen shots after him. Fortunately he escaped. The marauders plundered his house, but condescended not to burn it down over the heads of his distracted wife and children. From house to house these miscreants roved with savage ferocity, plundering and burning, and cursing those who had escaped as abolitionists—the most terrible term of reproach which the lips of rebeldom could coin.

The wives and children of many of these ruined families joined their husbands and fathers in the attempt to escape to Mexico, hoping in that land of anarchy and violence to find refuge from the misery with which the Confederacy was overwhelming them. This sorrowing band of fugitives soon numbered sixty-eight men. They necessarily traveled slowly. The implacable foe pursued. They were overtaken one morning before daybreak by a gang of two hundred mounted rebels. The fugitives fought with the energies of despair. They were overpowered, and every man was slain excepting twelve who made good their escape. Several of these were afterward captured and immediately hung. A few escaped across the Rio Grande, after spending weary days of exposure and hunger among the mountains. Of these sixty-eight victims of rebel atrocity but five were Americans. All the rest were Germans.

Dr. Adolph Douai, a distinguished German traveler then residing in Texas, writes of this massacre of Union men, which was continued throughout Texas:

"We know personally of most of these unfortunate victims who have been murdered so mercilessly, not because they rebelled against the Government, but because they would not act against the Union, and would rather fly to Mexico. These murdered Union men were some of the greatest benefactors of the State. They had done the hardest pioneer work in it, clearing it from wild beasts and Indians. They had saved it to civilization through more than one period of pestilence and famine. They furnished the proof that they could cultivate sugar and cotton without the least danger to health, and had increased the riches of the country millions of dollars. Hundreds who succeeded in making their escape rove about the woods, having lost every thing. Hundreds are now chased like wild beasts through the wilderness of Northwestern Texas, and succumb because of the most horrid tortures, their fate being never known to their fellow-men."

On the 17th of May, 1862, Captain Henry Eagle, then in command of the squadron off Galveston, sent in a flag of truce, demanding the surrender of the town. He stated that a large naval and land force would soon arrive amply sufficient to compel the surrender, and that he wished to save the effusion of blood and the destruction of property. The rebel General Herbert returned the very appropriate reply, that when the land and naval force made their appearance the demand would be answered.

Previous to the movement upon Galveston it was deemed expedient to close some adjacent ports and destroy some batteries which were affording protection to blockade-runners.

MASSACRE OF FUGITIVES.

About three hundred miles southwest of Galveston, at the mouth of the Nueces River, was the little hamlet of Corpus Christi. From its harbor many small craft were running over to Havana and bringing back such stores as the rebels needed. On the 12th of August the United States yacht Corypheus caught sight of one of the rebel armed vessels. Chase was immediately given, and from a Parrott gun shot were thrown, booming over the waves, with such accurate aim that the rebels ran their vessel ashore and set her on fire. The crew of the Corypheus landed, extinguished the fire, and hove the vessel off. Two other vessels they drove ashore, to which the rebels successfully applied the torch.

The next day a flag of truce was sent to the rebels, demanding the evacuation of the place by the military, but consenting that the inhabitants should remain, and that their private property should be respected. The rebel commander refused these terms, and asked for forty-eight hours that he might remove the women and children. This was generously granted him. On Saturday morning, August 16, the bombardment was commenced by the rebels opening fire at the early dawn from a battery which they had planted behind the levee. At intervals throughout the day the conflict was continued, the gun-boat Sachem and the yacht Corypheus keeping up a vigorous fire. The rebel batteries were frequently silenced, the gunners retreating and hiding behind the levee. As soon as our fire ceased, there being nothing to fire at, the gunners would return and again open upon the ships. Both vessels were repeatedly struck.

On Monday morning the very bold deed was performed of landing a 12-pound gun with thirty men, under Alfred H. Reynolds, to take a position from which they could rake the rebel battery. At the same time the schooner Reindeer, William Baker in command, steamed to a point from which they could mow down, with a storm of grape and canister from a 24-pound howitzer, any force which might be sent to charge the heroic little band which had landed.

Mr. Reynolds, with his gun, advanced to within musket-range of the enemy and opened a rapid raking fire with shell. At the same time the steam gun-boat Sachem poured in upon the foe a terrible fire of shells from her 32-pounders, while the yacht was no less efficient with her Parrott gun. The conflict had now risen almost to the dimensions of a battle, when a body of one hundred and sixty infantry were seen deploying to charge our heroic little band. But the eye of the Reindeer was upon them, and they were greeted with such a discharge of shrapnell and canister that they were scattered like withered leaves by the gale.

The enemy's battery was now silenced, and his only hope was in the capture of Reynolds's gun. Suddenly a squadron of cavalry, about three hundred in number, appeared, charging at full speed down upon the little band of thirty men. But the patriots had a powerful ally in the Reindeer. The schooner poured such a scathing storm of canister into their ranks, peal following peal in swift succession, that neither man nor horse could stand it. The column, staggered by the smothering assailing, reeled and fled mangled and bleeding.

As our whole force did not exceed one hundred men we could not hold the town. Lieutenant J. W. Kittridge, however, who was in command, observing that the cavalry had emerged from the streets of the town and had retreated back again to the shelter of their streets, shelled them out, driving them back into the plains. Our triumphant little fleet of five vessels, having inflicted this severe punishment upon the rebels, now anchored in the bay. While all the officers and men behaved heroically, exposed to the fire of a battery completely sheltered behind earth-works, Amos Johnson, commanding the Sachem, William Barker of the Reindeer, and Mr. Bellows of the Corypheus, received special commendation. Though the vessels were often struck it is remarkable that but one man was wounded, and that slightly.

About one hundred miles east of Galveston, at the mouth of the Sabine River, was the port called Sabine Pass, where the enemy had a small battery of four guns to protect their blockade-runners. On the morning of the 23d of September the steamer Kensington and the schooner Rachel Seaman, under command of Frederick Crocker, arrived at the mouth of the river, where they found at anchor the mortar schooner Henry Janes, Pennington commander. The two vessels crossed the bar, and, notwithstanding a vigorous fire from a rebel battery of four pieces, speedily silenced their guns. A boat expedition was then sent up the Pass to attack the battery in the rear. But the enemy got scent of the danger and fled. The schooners then took a position from which they utterly destroyed the battery, and received the surrender of the town. Then came a series of romantic adventures, each of which accomplished some important object, and convinced the rebels that they had roused the energies of a foe whose chastening hand was terrible.

The Kensington started for the River Mermementau, fifty miles east of Sabine, to destroy an unfinished battery and capture some blockade-runners there. They pursued in the launch a rebel steamer and two schooners, which were lying up Lake Calcasieu, watching an opportunity to run the blockade. The party which remained at Sabine destroyed a large railroad bridge, thus securing themselves against any land attack. They captured two British blockade-runners, the Velocity and the Adventure. The character of this unrecorded service may be inferred from the following extract from the report of Commander Crocker:

"I shall start up the Lake Calcasieu for the steamer, and hope to take her. In which event I propose to arm her, and go up the Mermementau River until I take the steamer there. Upon these two, if I get them safely to Sabine, I propose to place our Parrott guns and howitzers, and make a dash up the Sabine River, where there are several steamers and schooners and no batteries. If I am successful there, I shall return and go up the Nechez River, where there are still more steamers and vessels, and where, at the town of Beaumont, there is a large railroad bridge, on the main line of Texas, which, destroyed, will stop all communication between Eastern and Western Texas. All this is defended by only two 24-pounders in battery, and those I hope to overpower with the Parrotts. In which event I shall take or destroy all above, and thus completely use up one of the most vicious and active of the secession ports."

The expedition up the Calcasieu River and Lake was eminently successful. The launch was accompanied by twelve men and two officers. They proceeded up the river eighty miles, and were absent four days. Having captured the steamer Dan, of which they were in search, they returned in the steamer with the launch in tow. Stopping at the town of Charleston, on the lake, they burned a large steamer lying there, and also levied upon the town a contribution of sweet-potatoes and beef. Many strong Union men were found. They informed Commander Crocker that a large party of rebels had collected in ambush to attack them with rifles and sharp-shooters as they should pass below. The very simple and effective precaution against this danger was adopted of seizing ten or twelve of the inhabitants of the place, who were posted around the man at the wheel. Thus they passed unmolested down the river. As soon as they had reached a place of safety the prisoners were released.

The closing of Sabine Pass proved to be a very important event. All kinds of munitions of war in large quantities had been run in here, and an immense amount of cotton had been exported.

And now the hour had come for the capture of Galveston. On the morning of the 8th of October Commander Renshaw approached with four steamers so as to command the city with his guns. The Harriet Lane was then sent over the bar, with a flag of truce, to demand the surrender of the place, allowing them one hour to decide. After standing in some distance a rebel shot was fired to bring the steamer to. She immediately anchored to wait for a boat from the shore. There was so long a delay, indicating that the rebels were merely trying to gain time, that Captain Wainwright sent an executive officer to inquire into the cause of the tardiness and to explain the object of his visit.

After much parleying the officer was permitted to land. He informed Colonel Cook, the rebel commander, that Captain Wainwright had a message to deliver from the officer in command of the naval squadron in the offing. The Colonel promised to send a proper officer to receive it. Thus the interview ended, and the messenger returned to the ship. Still there was delay, the reason for which it was not difficult to understand. At length a sail-boat was seen pushing out very leisurely from the city with a white flag flying, beating against the wind. Captain Wainwright, indignant at such trifling, weighed anchor and steamed outside of the bar to communicate the result of his mission to Commander Renshaw. The sail-boat, with the white flag, was still to be seen in the distance. As it was deemed important to make the attack upon the forts that day, to save time the whole force was got under way with the view of meeting the boat. But as soon as the vessels had got within range of the hostile batteries the foe opened fire. It was returned with such vigor that in a few minutes every gun was silenced, and the gunners were seen scattering in all directions.

The sail-boat, with the white flag, had now put back. Commander Renshaw was not a little embarrassed how to act in the emergency. The whole city lay within easy range of his guns. Just then he was met by half a dozen discharges from two short 24-pounders immediately between him and the city. Commander Renshaw, in his report to Admiral Farragut, says:

"Here was a dilemma. A white flag, sent by my own request, was within half a mile of me. To have silenced this insignificant battery would have necessitated firing through the most thickly populated part of the town, where all the consular flags were flying, and with the almost certainty of killing some woman, child, or alien, which catastrophe all these consuls would make a handle of to try and impress their Governments with the idea that we were carrying on this war like barbarians, and possibly cause some embarrassment to our Government.

"True, it may be said, in a strictly military point of view, their having first fired upon me from the town gave an undoubted right to return that fire. And I have not a doubt that I disappointed the rebels very much by not having done so; their object being to provoke such a result. But, on the other hand, let it be taken into consideration the many motives that governed me in taking the course that I did; not the least of which was, that no advantage would be gained by destroying the city at that time, when I knew that should negotiations for its safety fail I would be in no worse position than I then occupied, while by granting a truce of four days I would deprive the foreign consuls of all cause of complaint and stop the mouths of humanitarians."

Influenced by such considerations, Commander Renshaw made the signal to his fleet, "Cease firing," and hoisting a flag of truce, cast anchor. The sail-boat, perceiving this, turned and soon came alongside. It contained a major and captain of the rebel army. They were informed that the unconditional surrender of the city was demanded. The summons was carried on shore. Soon a messenger returned with a positive refusal, adding that the responsibility of destroying the town, which was entirely at the mercy of our fleet, and of endangering the lives of women, children, and aliens, rested entirely upon the commander of the National squadron. The rebel messengers also stated that the yellow-fever was prevailing in the city.

After a long colloquy Commander Renshaw consented to a truce of four days, that the women, children, and aliens might be removed. He stated, however, that there was to be an explicit understanding that they were not to increase the defenses of the city, and that every thing was to remain as it was at that time. "Certainly," was the reply, "that is nothing more than you have a right to demand." Unfortunately these terms were not reduced to writing.

Soon a deserter brought to the fleet the intelligence that the rebels were removing, by night, the guns from one of the batteries. Two patriot officers were accordingly sent on shore to charge the rebel officers with a breach of faith. They replied that they understood the terms to be that they should not increase their defense, not that they should not weaken it by removing their guns. In view of the misunderstanding it was deemed best to allow the truce to continue and to permit them to take the guns, which were but four in number and were not of much value.

The people who escaped to our ships from the terrors of rebel conscription indicated that the middle and lower classes cherished strong Union sentiments. They gave a fearful account of the reign of terror to which all had been subjected. Press-gangs were ranging the country, driving every man between the ages of eighteen and fifty into the ranks.

As we had not then and there a sufficient force to send a body of men on shore to occupy the city, Commander Renshaw simply sent a few men with a flag to be raised for half an hour, to show our absolute possession of the place. He also brought his ships before the town with all his guns double shotted, prepared signally to avenge any insult. The city was thus held until the 1st of January, 1863.

The naval force at this time holding Galveston consisted of the Westfield, Clifton, Harriet Lane, Owasco, Sachem, and Corypheus. A small force of National troops, consisting of but two hundred and sixty, rank and file, commanded by Colonel Burrill of the Forty-second Massachusetts volunteers, occupied a wharf in the town. It seems that notice had been given by some friendly lips to the commanding officers of both land and naval forces that an attack was about to be made upon them, and it is not easy to account for the want of preparation in which we were found.

About 3 o'clock in the morning of the 1st of January, it being bright moonlight, several rebel steamers were seen descending the bay. The Harriet Lane advanced to meet them, and encountered two at the same time. One of these, the Bayou City, was armed with a 68-pounder rifled gun, was barricaded with cotton bales for a height of twenty feet from the water-line, and was manned by two hundred troops.

The other, the Neptune, was similarly barricaded, carried one hundred and sixty men, and was armed with two small brass field-pieces. The conflict on both sides was conducted with the utmost bravery and desperation.

The Neptune was soon sunk by her powerful antagonist in about eight feet of water, she having backed, while in a sinking condition, upon the flats. But the Bayou City ran into the Harriet Lane, grappled her by catching under her guard, and poured in terrible volleys of musketry from her numerous and well-protected crew. At the same time the crew of the Neptune, which had grounded near by in shallow water, also delivered a rapid and deadly fire. This storm of bullets from three hundred and sixty muskets, rapidly fired, at the shortest possible range, by men entirely protected by cotton bales, soon drove the crew of the Harriet Lane, but about one hundred in number, from their guns. The rebels from the Bayou City, with yells and like swarming wolves, bounded on board the patriot steamer.

Her commander, Captain Wainwright, though wounded, refused to surrender, and died manfully defending himself with his revolver. The assailing force was too strong to be resisted. All opposition was speedily quelled, and the noble steamer, unharmed, and with all its armament in perfect order for immediate action, fell into the hands of the rebels. It was, as it were, but the work of a moment. Such is war, such its vicissitudes. The rebels were now in power upon those waters, and our whole little squadron seemed to be at their mercy.

While this catastrophe was occurring upon the water a still more awful scene of disaster was taking place upon the land. As we have mentioned, two hundred and fifty men of the Forty-second regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers were on the wharf. But three companies of the regiment had as yet arrived. They were at the end, near the water, with no possible means of retreat or escape from an overpowering force. In the bright moonlight the rebels came rushing upon them in bands of strength which could not be resisted. With howls of exultation they swept down upon the doomed patriots. They were shot, sabred, stabbed, driven into the sea. They fought, as Massachusetts men ever do fight, with bravery which could not be surpassed. It was all in vain. How many were slain in that dreadful midnight hour is not known. The few survivors were taken prisoners, and hurried back forty miles in the country to Houston.

The moon had now gone down, and it was very dark. It was not safe to attempt to retake the Harriet Lane, as our own troops, unarmed and helpless, were crowded upon her decks. The Owasco moved cautiously up and exchanged a few shots with the enemy's artillery upon the shore. The channel was narrow, and she frequently grounded. She could only bring one 11-inch gun to bear upon the foe.

In the mean time the deadly howitzers of the Harriet Lane were turned upon her, and the guns of the other rebel steamers, and she was also assailed by such a merciless peppering of musketry from the swarming rebel troops on the boats and on the shore, that she was driven back with every one of her rifle-gun crew wounded and one killed. The Sachem also took energetic part in the contest.

The account we receive of these scenes is confused, for the event itself was full of confusion, darkness, and bewilderment. From the various and contradictory account of the details I have thought it safest to follow the official report of the Court of Inquiry ordered by Admiral Farragut to investigate the disaster, though some who profess to have been eye-witnesses give very different statements. For instance, Magruder, the rebel commander, and the official report of the Court of Inquiry states that the conflict commenced about three o'clock in the morning. But the correspondent of the Houston Telegraph, who professes to have been present, says that he timed it, and it was exactly eight minutes before five. The official report says that the Neptune was sunk, and that the Bayou City alone boarded the Harriet Lane. But the New York Tribune correspondent, giving the narrative as he received it from the lips of one of General Hamilton's staff, says that both the Bayou City and the Neptune boarded the Harriet Lane. The description he gives of the capture is truly eloquent, though it will be seen that it is slightly different from our narrative:

"The doomed vessel, her steam not up, unable to escape, was the centre of a perfectly infernal fire dance. Seen from the Mary A. Boardman the spectacle assumed an aspect at once grand and terrific. Overhead and around night was slowly retiring before day; the dim light prevalent being rent by the frequent flashes of cannon, the soaring aloft of shell, and the omnipresent short-lived blaze of musketry, while the hellish discord beggars all description. Prominent amidst it, one heard the sonorous boom of the 11-inch gun of the Owasco, the bellowing of the batteries, and the volleys, shrieks, and detonations pervading the town.

"But our struggle is nearing its end. The rebel steamer and ram have closed at length, on either side of the Harriet Lane, boarded her, and a bloody struggle is raging on her deck. Her invaders, maddened, it is said, with whisky, fight like infuriate devils, precipitating themselves headlong on the guards, swarming fore and aft, and pouring an incessant hail of small-arms from above and below upon the devoted crew. They contend with an enemy apparently unwilling either to give or take quarter. Sternly they are met, sternly resisted. Gallant Captain Wainwright is killed, and of his one hundred and thirty men all but ten or twenty share his fate, and the Harriet Lane is captured by the enemy."

Commodore Renshaw's flag-ship, the Westfield, was armed with two 9-inch guns, four 68-pounders, and two rifled guns. The moment the Harriet Lane, from her post farther up the bay, signaled danger, the Westfield got under way to run up abreast of the town. Swept by the current she ran upon a shoal at high tide and there remained immovable. It was a thousand-ton boat, one of the best of the squadron, with a rudder at each end and double boiler.

ers. There she lay, at this critical hour, helplessly imbedded in the sand.

The Clifton, a New York boat of the same general character, came to her rescue, and tugged and tugged in vain. Abandoning the effort as hopeless, the Clifton steamed toward the Harriet Lane, which was about three miles distant. The rebels opened upon her with two heavy guns which they had suddenly, during the night, mounted on an old abandoned battery. The Clifton, which had two, 9-inch guns, four 32-pounders, and one pivot rifled gun, vigorously replied with her whole armament. The Mary Boardman made an attempt to release the Westfield. But after snapping a hawser asunder, and the tide rapidly falling, she relinquished the endeavor.

It was now half past seven o'clock. The rebels hoisted a white flag on the Harriet Lane. This steamer was so fastened to the Bayou City that it could not immediately be released. The rebel account in the Houston Telegraph says:

"It became plainly evident that unless the Bayou City and Harriet Lane could be separated the enemy would escape if they wished. To gain time, therefore, a flag of truce was taken to the Clifton, and Clifton, now lying close upon her, sent a demand for a surrender."

The flag of truce came on board the Clifton, informed her chief officer of the capture of the Harriet Lane, the death of her commander and first-lieutenant, and the killing and wounding of two-thirds of her crew. The rebel officer, Major Smith, demanded the surrender of all the patriot vessels, consenting, however, that one should be permitted to leave the harbor with the crews of all the rest; and threatening, in case these terms were not accepted, to steam down the harbor with the Harriet Lane and capture them all.

Lieutenant Law, of the Clifton, replied that he was not the commanding officer, and that he could not imagine that such terms would be accepted. He, however, offered to take Major Smith in his gig over to the Westfield, that he might tender his proposal to Commodore Renshaw. Flags of truce were now flying from our vessels and from the parties on shore. The rebels, in the mean time, were getting their artillery in position and preparing the Harriet Lane for action. Commodore Renshaw refused the proffered terms, and ordered all the vessels to get out of port as soon as possible. As the Westfield could not be floated he prepared to blow her up.

It was then about a quarter past nine o'clock. Fifteen minutes were allowed for the crew to leave the ship, with such articles of baggage as they could at the moment seize upon. The Mary A. Boardman was about 500 feet off, ready to receive the crew as they were rapidly transferred in three boats. In about twenty minutes one hundred and fifty men were conveyed from the one vessel to the other. To the admirable energy, prudence, and presence of mind of Captain Wier and Major Burt, the rescue of the crew is greatly attributed.

One cutter, containing the last of the crew, now only remained alongside of the Westfield. At the distance of but a few yards there was another boat, laden almost to the water's edge, proceeding to the Mary A. Boardman. The Commodore and two others remained last on board the ship to apply the torch to the slow-match. The ship had two magazines, and was crowded with a supply of powder, shells, and ammunition. Commodore Renshaw stood quietly on the fore-deck, just over one of these open magazines. The cutter, with but two oarsmen and eight or ten passengers, was alongside, waiting for him to apply the match and leap on board. His two companions, Engineer W. K. Green, and Lieutenant Charles W. Zimmerman, had taken their seat in the boat. He applied the match, and stepped down the stairway to enter the boat, when, by some casualty which can now never be explained, a white puff of smoke burst through the hatchway, followed by an explosion so tremendous as to shake both air and ocean like the upheaval of an earthquake. A volcanic flame ascended to the clouds in the form of an inverted cone, filled with shot and shells, and every conceivable form of fragments of wood and iron. In this awful billow of ruin both boats with their contents instantly disappeared. Innumerable shells exploded in the air, adding to the sublimity and horror of the scene. The crowd on board the Mary Boardman gazed with awe upon the appalling spectacle. As the fiery missiles fell "in hideous ruin and combustion down," the ocean, throughout a circle 500 feet in diameter, was agitated as if these were raining down upon it a storm of the fabled bolts of Jove.

One only of the powder magazines had exploded, utterly demolishing the forward half of the Westfield, and leaving the remainder of the boat a shattered wreck. But a few minutes elapsed ere the whole ship seemed to burst into flame—shells were exploding, and shotted cannon going off. The Mary Boardman put on all steam and hastened away from the presence of so dangerous a neighbor. At the same time the rebel gun-boats were seen coming down the bay. Nothing remained for our discomfited squadron but precipitate flight.

Lieutenant Law was now commanding officer. The Owasco was his only efficient vessel. As he did not consider this as by any means a match for the Harriet Lane, it was decided best to abandon the blockade. Though this disaster could exert but a trifling influence upon the general conduct of the war, it was an achievement of which the rebels could be justly proud, and which a patriot can not reflect upon but with chagrin.

A rebel prisoner narrates the following incident as occurring on board the Harriet Lane. We presume it to be true, though of course we can not vouch for it:

"Almost the first men struck down were Captain Wainwright and Lieutenant Lee, who both fought with a desperation and valor that no mortal could surpass. When bleeding and prostrate upon the deck they were still dealing death among their enemies. One young son of Captain Wainwright, only ten years of age, stood at the cabin-door, a revolver in each hand, and never ceased firing until he had expended every shot. One of his poor little hands was disabled by a ball shattering his four fingers. Then his infantile soul gave way; and he burst into tears, saying: 'Do you want to kill me?'" The little hero was taken prisoner.

Immediately after the disaster at Galveston a conflict took place in those waters which, though apparently a deplorable defeat, proved in its results one of the most signal achievements of the war, and developed that marvelous heroism which has ever characterized the American navy. As soon as the tidings reached New Orleans of the great reverse which our arms had encountered in Galveston bay, the Hatteras, under Commander Homer C. Blake, was sent with a few other vessels to attempt to retake the place. The Hatteras arrived off Galveston on Saturday, January 10, 1863. At half past three o'clock Sunday afternoon, while at anchor with the fleet, under Commander Bell, a strange sail was seen far away in the southeast which was supposed to be a blockade-runner, making the land in preparation for running in during the night. The Hatteras was signaled to give chase.

Commander Blake immediately got under way, and soon ascertained that the strange sail was a steamer, which fact he signaled to the flag-ship. The strange steamer was then under canvas, and floated from her peak apparently the English red ensign. Lieutenant Blake pressed the chase until sunset, when the stranger furled her sails and came to, taking such a position as to give a full view of her spars and of a small portion of her hull. It was now nearly seven o'clock, and quite dark. It had, however, become evident to nearly all on board the Hatteras that the fancied blockade-runner was nothing less than the redoubtable rebel pirate Alabama, of English build, with English armament, and English gunners. Should this prove true there was no alternative before Lieutenant Blake but to fight her at the most desperate odds, or to make an inglorious surrender. Commander Blake was equal to the hour and instantly adopted the heroic resolve.

The ship was cleared for action and every man was at his post. As the Alabama was vastly superior to the Hatteras in structure and in armament, Lieutenant Blake was fully aware that the only chance for him was to bring the vessels into the closest quarters, and with desperation of courage to endeavor to carry the foe by boarding. The unknown vessel was now lying to, broadside on, waiting for the Hatteras to come up. When the Hatteras had got within about 75 yards the stranger was hailed, and asked what vessel it was. The reply was returned, "Her Britannic Majesty's ship Vixen." And to the return question "What ship is that?" the answer was given, "The Hatteras."

The propeller of the suspicious stranger was now turning, and it was observed that she was apparently endeavoring to gain a position for a raking fire. The Commander instantly frustrated that movement and said that he would send a boat on board. In a moment after this the stranger shouted out, through the darkness, "This is the Confederate steamer Alabama," and instantly poured in a broadside from her starboard battery. The fire was as promptly returned. The frenzy of battle was instantly at its height, every nerve on both vessels being strained to its utmost tension. The Alabama had six long 32-pounders, one 105-pounder rifle on a pivot, one 68-pounder with double fortified pivot, one 24-pounder rifle. The Hatteras had four 32-pounders, two 30-pounder rifles, one 20-pounder rifle, and one 12-pound howitzer.

Commander Blake, as the battle was fiercely raging, endeavored to close with the Alabama to board her. But the superior speed of the rebel craft enabled Semmes to thwart all such designs. The vessels were, however, within thirty yards of each other. Thus for twenty minutes did the frail Hatteras lie exposed to the tremendous pounding of the formidable buccaneer. Soon after the commencement of the action the Hatteras was set on fire by exploding shells. The fire rapidly worked aft to the magazine, which was composed of light pine planks above the water-line. The men at the magazine remained at their post as long as powder could be passed up without exploding.

Every broadside from the Alabama hurled upon the Hatteras four hundred and eighty pounds of iron, while at the same time one hundred and thirty-six riflemen were sweeping its decks with unerring bullets. Still not a man flinched. The flames were now rushing up the hatchways; there were but two inches of pine between the fire and the magazine.

During these terrible moments when the ship was on fire, and shells were tearing through her sides and exploding with awful destruction, when the engine was destroyed, and the engine-room and deck enveloped with scalding steam, the steward of the ship, a colored man, performed an act of calm and deliberate heroism which should place his name very high upon the roll of honor. Under the passage-way there was stored a large quantity of small-arms and ammunition. As shell after shell exploded, setting the light material on fire, the room became very hot and filled with smoke. The order had been given to "drown the magazine."

The steward remained unflinchingly at his post, dashing water upon the ammunition, until the close of the action. When asked if he did not find his position rather warm and dangerous, he replied:

"Yes; but I knew that if the fire got to the powder them gentlemen on deck would get a grand hoist."

Another negro, the Captain states, got a musket, and through the entire action there could be heard its regular discharge. Every broadside the Hatteras received was returned with a cheer, and with an immediate response with our own feeble guns. Every man seemed inspired with the same firm resolve which animated the soul of Commander Blake.

So many shot and shells had entered the Hatteras at the water-line, peeling off the thin plating of iron, that the vessel was now rapidly sinking. The forward part was under water; the fire raging below; flames bursting up through the hatches, and every moment it was expected that the fire would reach the magazine; still not a man left his gun. All were willing to go down or up rather than strike our flag or allow it to fall into rebel hands. It was only at this time, when not a gun could be brought to bear, that Commander Blake, feeling that he had no right to sacrifice uselessly the lives of all under his command, reluctantly gave the order to fire a lee-gun in token of surrender. As the ship was rapidly sinking the port-guns were thrown overboard.

With the aid of the boats of the two vessels the surviving crew were all safely conveyed on board the Alabama, and in ten minutes the Hatteras went down, bow first, with her pennant still flying at the mast-head. All her armament and stores sank into the ocean's depths with her, and the rebels gained but a fruitless victory. In the rebel account of this conflict we find the following description of the injuries inflicted upon the Alabama:

"We had one shot through the stern, passing through the lamp-room, smashing every thing to pieces; one shell a few feet abaft the foremast, passing through the bulwarks, ripping up the deck, and lodging in the port without exploding. In truth, had it exploded I would hardly have written you this. A second shell struck a few feet forward of the bridge, and tore up the deck. A third and fourth in the main rigging, one striking a chain-plate and doubling it; both entered the coal-bunkers, but only one exploded. A fifth shot passed through our midship boat, and, striking the smoke-stack, passed through and through, scattering iron splinters around like hail. A sixth and last struck the muzzle of the after broadside gun."

Strange as it may seem none were killed on the Alabama, and but one wounded. On board the Hatteras two were killed and five wounded. The men, as they were taken on board the Alabama, were put in irons; the officers paroled. The rebel steamer, which, as we have before said, was English in build, armament, and crew, now made for an English port. The vessel had been so roughly handled that it was nine days before she reached Kingston, in Jamaica. Never before did men look so earnestly for the appearance of one of our vessels of war. At Kingston the Alabama remained thirteen days for repairs. Those repairs cost in gold eighty-five thousand dollars, signal proof of the heroism with which the Hatteras had fought. Captain Blake writes indignantly, "During this time John Bull's minions had the pleasure of insulting men who, if they ever have the pleasure of meeting them on the ocean, will remind them that the insults are remembered."

The following correspondence, which is highly honorable to both parties, explains itself:

"To the Commander of H. B. M. ship Greyhound :

"Lieutenant-Commander H. C. Blake, of the United States Navy, presents his compliments to the Commander of H. B. M. ship Greyhound, and desires to learn whether or not he may consider the playing of 'Dixie's Land' by the band of the Greyhound, upon the arrival of the Confederate steamer Alabama, on the evening of the 21st instant, as a mark of disrespect to the United States Government, or its officers who were prisoners on board the Alabama at the period indicated. Lieutenant-Commander H. C. Blake respectfully requests an early response.

"United States Consulate, Jamaica."

To this note an answer was returned which greatly honors the commander of the Greyhound. Had all the English officials manifested the same spirit, friendship instead of the bitter animosity would now have existed between these two great nations:

"Commander Hickley, R.N., presents his compliments to Lieutenant-Commander Blake, U.S.N., and has to acquaint him that on the evening in question he was on board the A—, dining with Captain Crockett. Shortly after the time of the officer of the guard reporting the Alabama's arrival he heard the drums and fife of H. M. S. Greyhound playing, among other tunes, the tune of 'Dixie's Land,' that he immediately repaired on board, causing other national tunes to be played, among which was the United States national air; and severely reprimanded the inconsiderate young officer who had ordered 'Dixie's Land' to be played, calling for his reasons, and writing and forwarding them forthwith, with his report to Commodore Hugh Dunlop, C.B., who severely reprimanded the officer.

"As the officer in question had no idea that any U.S. officer or man was on board the Alabama, it must be evident to Lieutenant-Commander Blake that no insult was intended.

"H. M. S. Greyhound, Port Royal, Jamaica, January 24, 1863."

After much delay a vessel was chartered, which transported the officers and men of the Hatteras to Key West. Thence by steamer they were conveyed to New York. We have spoken of this apparent disaster as truly a victory. The Alabama had been for weeks cruising on the south side of Cuba for the purpose of intercepting and capturing our California steamers. She had nearly exhausted her provisions and coal. A fresh supply must be had and another cruise projected. She had captured the Ariel, on which she found a paper giving the details of the sailing of Banks's expedition conveyed by a single gun-boat.

It was dangerous for the pirate to enter the ports on the Gulf, where coal and provisions could be procured, so he conceived and adopted the plan to run down to Galveston, where he knew we had a number of merchant steamers blockading. These he was confident of capturing without any resistance. From them he would supply himself; then run up the coast into the mouth of the Mississippi, destroying our light blockading vessels up to that point, where he expected to fall in with and capture and parole the Banks expedition. He designed, then, to run up along our coast, destroying transports and other vessels that he might fall in with. With these plans in view he appeared off Galveston; and but for the heroic fight which Lieutenant Blake gave him he might have accomplished all.

Semmes told Lieutenant Blake that he had not the slightest idea that he would venture with the Hatteras to fight the Alabama; and he said to another officer that "Commander Blake had more d——d assurance than any man he ever saw." The Alabama received such rough treatment that, instead of storing away coals and provisions at her leisure, she had to put all her pumps in motion to keep the ship afloat. She was compelled to go to Kingston for repairs, and then to steal away from there in the presence of a large squadron sent to intercept her. The plan of campaign which we have given was detailed by Semmes himself to Lieutenant Blake.

Blockade-running was now pushed with great vigor. It was principally done by schooners to and from the Brazos River, taking out cotton and bringing back materials of war. In February of this year Lubbock, the rebel Governor of Texas, stated, in his message to the Legislature, that the State had contributed 68,500 men to the Confederate armies, and that there remained in the State only 27,000 men between the ages of sixteen and sixty. In November he stated that the number furnished amounted to 90,000 men, and consequently there were only 5500 left between the ages of sixteen and sixty. He urged that there should be no exemptions whatever, and that every man, including aliens, should be forced into the army. So terribly in earnest were these bold, bad men to sustain the institution of slavery, by which they could compel poor men to work for them without wages.

We have before spoken of Sabine Pass. The Sabine River, which is about five hundred miles in length, is the dividing line between Louisiana and Texas. The stream, about five miles before its entrance into the Gulf, expands into a lake about eighteen miles long and nine wide. The outlet from this lake into the Gulf is called Sabine Pass. The city was situated on the right bank of the river, near the mouth. The Pass was considered as a point of great strategic importance as a base of operations either against Western Louisiana or Eastern Texas. It was about two hundred and eighty miles west of the Mississippi, fifty miles east of Galveston, and sixty miles from Houston, the capital of Texas.

Early in September an expedition was fitted out, under General Franklin, to occupy this Pass, which was then in possession of the rebels. It was understood to be defended by a battery of field-pieces with two 32-pounders, en barbette, and two gun-boats which were also rams. The attacking force consisted of four thousand men, under General Franklin, who were conveyed in transports, and four steamers, the Clifton, Sachem, Arizona, and Granite City, under Lieutenant Crocker. The fleet moved from the rendezvous, off Berwick Bay, piloted by the gun-boat Arizona, Captain Tibbetts. General Godfrey Weitzel, who had already won renown, commanded the first division of the corps.

There was a blockading vessel stationed off the Pass. As the fleet steamed rapidly on all eyes kept a bright look-out to discover the vessel. But no vessel could be found; and at three o'clock on the morning of the 8th they hove to and ascertained that the fleet had run quite a distance beyond the Pass. The blockader happened to be absent on a cruise, and by this mishap a day was lost. The fleet could, of course, be seen by the rebels steaming along the coast, and thus the foe was apprised of the danger.

It was arranged, as the plan of attack, that the four gun-boats should advance upon the batteries into close range, so that, while their heavy guns were pouring in their fire of shot and shell, one hundred and fifty sharpshooters, occupying selected positions on the vessels, should pick off the rebel gunners. As soon as the batteries were silenced and the rams driven off the transports were to come up and land their troops to secure the conquest. There were some large vessels there which had been on the blockade, but which could take no part in the engagement, as their extensive draught of water would not permit them to approach within gunshot of the batteries.

At six o'clock in the morning of the 8th of September, before the plan of attack was finally settled, the Clifton entered the bay and opened fire upon the fort. The object was to draw the fire of the rebel batteries so as to uncover their position, and ascertain the weight of the opposing force. In the mean time Generals Franklin and Weitzel carefully examined the shore of the Pass, to select the most eligible point for disembarking the land-force. As the Clifton steamed up the Pass, carefully reconnoitring the region, she occasionally threw a shot from her huge rifled guns at the only earth-work which was visible. There was no response. The Clifton steamed up within easy range of the guns of the fort, examined the face of the work, which was from one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards in length, and returned to her consorts without eliciting a shot.

The order of battle was now arranged. The Clifton, Arizona, and Sachem were to engage the rebel works. The Granite City, whose armament consisted of a broadside of small brass guns, was detached to cover the landing of General Weitzel's division of five hundred men. They were New York troops, crowned with the victory of Port Hudson.

It was about four o'clock in the afternoon when the gun-boats steamed forward on their arduous mission. The Clifton led. The Granite City followed as convoy to the transport. General Banks, which was to land the advance of the land-force. The Sachem and the Arizona steamed off to the right, to take positions nearly opposite the battery. The conflict was opened by a shell from one of the 9-inch pivot guns of the Clifton, which exploded inside the rebel works, creating a volcanic eruption which proved the terrific power of the missile. Another shot instantly followed with the same effect.

The Sachem now opened her broadside of 32-pounders. The Arizona also came vigorously forward, with volley after volley. Between thirty and forty shot and shell were thrown into the fort before the foe responded with a single gun. Some even thought that they had evacuated the works, while others regarded the silence as ominous of the storm which was soon to burst forth. No sign of a foe could be seen; no indication of life on the shore, save the movements of a little steamer which had two or three times, during the morning, run up and down from the city to the fort.

The silence of the foe proved but the calm before the storm. A puff of smoke rose above the parapet, a heavy boom rolled over the waves, and a solid shot whizzed directly over the Arizona, striking the water just beyond. This was instantly followed by another shot aimed at the Sachem, and another at the Clifton. The battle tempest was now fairly ushered in, and it raged and roared with fearful fury. The Clifton and Arizona, to bewilder the aim of the foe, kept in constant motion, steaming slowly forward and backward, yet pouring in upon the hostile works an incessant fire. The Sachem pressed steadily forward, hoping to pass the battery and to assail it in the rear, which was supposed to be unprotected.

To thwart this manifest design the rebels doubled their fire against the dauntless little steamer, thus exposing her wooden walls, at short range, to heavy batteries behind earth-works. The huge shells of the Sachem fell with bewildering rapidity and marvelous accuracy of fire upon the foe, bursting in the midst of them, and often tearing great holes through the parapet, apparently sufficient to admit the passage of a stage-coach. But the rebels fought with the fearlessness and desperation which characterized them in almost every conflict during the war. "If their fire slackened," writes an eye-witness, "an instant after one of those terrific explosions, which seemed to shake the very earth around them, it was instantly resumed with increased rather than diminished determination."

The Sachem had thus far escaped the destruction with which she was so imminently menaced, and was moving with unflinching and apparently sure steps to the position she was seeking to gain. A few minutes more would place her beyond the range of the rebel guns—the battery would be exposed to a fire which it could neither answer nor withstand, and the day would be ours. Just then, when all eyes were riveted upon the noble little craft, and victory was upon the point of lighting upon our banners, a solid shot struck the steamer amidships, crashed through her sides, and caused her to tremble from stem to stern. It was a fatal wound. The ball had penetrated the boiler. Instantly the steamer was enveloped in a cloud of scalding vapor, and the Sachem floated a helpless wreck upon the wave. Such are the fortunes of war. So closely do victory and defeat tread upon the heels of each other. The crew, thus disabled and smothered by the steam, could take no farther part in the fight, and the flag was lowered.

The enemy were probably aware that the Arizona drew too much water to get to close quarters, and they therefore now concentrated their fire upon the Clifton. It was a kind of challenge to which the heroic little steamer gallantly responded. With three rousing cheers a full head of steam was put on, and the Clifton ran swiftly down toward the battery, sweeping the parapet with double discharges of grape from her pivot guns. The heavy shot and shrieking shell aimed at the Clifton ricocheted across the water, almost reaching the transport, General Banks, which was following in her wake—convoyed, as we have said, by the Granite City. The transport was seeking the assigned point for the disembarkation of her troops.

The Clifton was now within five hundred yards of the battery. As she attempted to throw her bow around and take a broadside position she struck the bottom, and with such force as to drive her far into the thin and yielding mud. At this moment an undiscovered battery, within easy range, opened fire upon the doomed craft, the broadside of the steamer presenting a target which even bungling gunners could scarcely fail to hit. The steamer commenced backing, still keeping up an incessant and very effective fire from her bow and port broadside guns. The boat was in a terrible position, and the battle raged with the utmost fury. The rifled guns of the steamer were very rapidly loaded and fired with double discharges of grape. There was still a good prospect that the Clifton and Arizona might silence the battery and enable the troops to land, when an unfortunate shot struck the boat near the centre, passed directly through the boiler, and left her also a stranded wreck. In the scene of confusion which ensued the flag was lowered, while for a short time the firing continued. A fearful shower of grape now swept through and over the steamer from the hostile batteries, and the white flag of surrender was run up, upon which the firing ceased. One account of the conflict says:

"The battle was now to all intents and purposes ended. Further resistance seemed utterly hopeless. But still the brave Croker could not endure the idea of giving up his vessel, and ordered his men to fight on. Without his knowledge, however, some one of the party struck the white flag, and the enemy instantly ceased firing. When informed of this the Captain ordered the deck to be cleared, and loading the after pivot gun with a 9-inch solid shot, he fired it through the centre of the ship, from stem to stern, tearing the machinery to pieces and rendering it utterly worthless to the enemy. After doing this and spiking all the guns the Clifton surrendered."

The regular crew of the Clifton consisted of one hundred and ten men. She had on board besides seventy-five sharpshooters. All were captured but seven men who swam ashore, ran down the beach, and were taken off by a boat from the fleet. About thirty were killed or wounded. The loss of the enemy can probably never be known. It must, however, have been large, as our heavy guns poured in upon them a terrible fire, often sweeping the parapet from end to end.

There was now but one available gun-boat left, the Arizona. The expedition had failed beyond redemption. The Arizona backed down through the narrow channel while the transports moved rapidly out of the bay. The Arizona ran aground, and with difficulty was kedged off but not until midnight. The loss of the armament of the Clifton was deemed a serious calamity, as she was armed with one of the most powerful batteries of rifled guns in the service. The transport fleet with its convoy returned to Brashear City.

Wherever there is disaster we naturally look to find blame somewhere. But the result of a battle often depends upon apparent accidents, and none are more conscious of this than the most successful generals. So far as we can judge the enterprise was well planned and heroically conducted. There is scarcely a battle in the whole war which has been more stubbornly contested than that of Sabine Pass. Heroic action is not always rewarded with victory. The fate of armies and of nations is often beyond all human control, and dependent upon contingencies over which man can exert but a trifling influence.

Thus matters remained in Texas for some time. We had no force which could then be spared to garrison any positions on the land, but our fleet kept up a vigorous blockade of the Texan ports. There were many exciting adventures in chasing blockade-runners, capturing them, driving them under the guns of the forts, cutting them out, or when they had been run ashore blowing them up with shells or applying the torch.

Early in November, 1863, an expedition was sent out which took possession of Brazos Island without opposition. From that, as a base, a fleet of transports conveyed nineteen hundred troops to Mustang Island. On the evening of the 16th twelve hundred of these men, with two howitzers, were landed upon the island about twenty miles from Aransas Pass, where the rebels had a fort. The remainder of the expedition then, under cover of the night, rapidly steamed up to the fort at the Pass. While the land-force, having made a very rapid march, drawing their guns by hand, moved upon the fort in two columns on the right and left, the Monongahela, under J. H. Strong, threw in fifteen shells. The enemy, with such a premonition of the storm which awaited them, without attempting any resistance ran up the white flag and surrendered. The garrison consisted of one hundred men. Their battery of three large guns and a howitzer, the small-arms of the prisoners, a quantity of military stores, one hundred and forty horses and mules, one hundred and twenty-five head of cattle, and one schooner and ten small boats, fell into the hands of the victors.

The toil and heroism and endurance of war are often more signally manifested in the weary march than in the frenzied hour of battle. This adventure was admirably conducted. By landing the troops at a distance in the surf, and pressing them forward rapidly in that midnight march, the rebels were taken by surprise and had no opportunity to reinforce the garrison. The land and naval force co-operated with great harmony. General T. G. Ransom in his official report says:

"The co-operation of the naval forces under Commander James H. Strong in the Monongahela, merits and receives my entire approbation. He advanced, soon after daylight, and searched for the enemy's works, making excellent practice with his guns, bursting 11-inch shells in the enemy's camp. The conduct of the naval party under Acting-Ensign H. W. Grinnell and ten seamen from the Monongahela in charge of the two howitzers, was of the most satisfactory character. Captain L. P. Griffin, naval aid to General Banks, afforded me much valuable assistance and advice. The sailing of the fleet was under his direction, and the plan of landing through the surf was adopted through his advice."

The Rio Grande is the dividing line between the United States and Mexico. On the left or Texan side of the stream, near its mouth, lies the little city of Brownsville. On the opposite or Mexican banks is Matamoras. The rebels had made Brownsville a very important dépôt for supplies and munitions of war by the way of Mexico. On the 2d of November, 1863, they very suddenly evacuated the place on learning that a powerful expedition was approaching to give them the chastisement they merited. In the hottest haste they ran every thing they could across the river. The garrison buildings and all the stores which could not be removed were committed to the flames. The New Orleans papers state that a general sacking of the town took place. With a few exceptions every store, private and public, was gutted. During this scene of drunken riot a fight took place among themselves. Several of the wounded were left behind, and were found by our troops when they entered. A few days after the evacuation the National fleet arrived, and the Stars and Stripes were unfurled over the place, protected by three thousand men and sixteen pieces of artillery.

Our troops, however, were so greatly needed elsewhere that it was not deemed expedient to leave them to garrison these distant posts. After a few months' occupation they were withdrawn, and the duty of guarding the extensive coast again devolved entirely upon the navy. But Texas was finally won by the world-renowned campaigns of Sherman and of Grant. When the tidings reached Texas of the surrender of Lee's great army to Grant and of Johnston's to Sherman, it was manifest to every mind that the conflict could not be prolonged in Texas. The rebel general, E. Kirby Smith, who was in command of the Trans-Mississippi Department, in the following terms, on the 21st of April, 1865, announced to his army the surrender of General Lee:

"The crisis of our revolution is at hand. Great disasters have overtaken us. The Army of Northern Virginia and our Commander-in-Chief are prisoners of war. With you rests the hopes of our nation, and upon your action depends the fate of our people."

He then urged them by every consideration he could invent to persevere in the struggle which he, of course, knew to be utterly hopeless. He had but few troops, and our whole majestic force could be concentrated to overwhelm him. Every private in his army understood this. Soon each man began to consult for his own safety by throwing down his arms and making a bee-line for his home. The brave words which Smith uttered did not deceive them.

Three days after this General J. B. Magruder made a fiery speech at a great war meeting in Houston, in which he vociferated, in strains characteristic of rebel oratory, the following bravado:

"Come what may, I shall stand by my country, and I will never be a slave to Yankee power. I had rather be a Comanche Indian chief than bow the knee to Yankeeedom. I do not feel at all discouraged at the present position of affairs."

About the 1st of May some rebels of Washington County, Texas, called upon General Magruder with a plan for military organization, of which the following are some of the sapient measures:

"First. That all exempt males capable of bearing arms, from about thirteen years old and upward, shall organize immediately for the purpose of serving during the emergency of an invasion.

"Second. That they include all the male slaves of military age that each owner may be able to bring or send to the field. Each owner to have the control of his own slaves, to organize and drill them, and to remain with and fight by them when required.

"That it be the duty of each citizen to supply for every adult female, now of his family, suitable weapons for personal defense and for the protection of the children."

At a meeting of the citizens of Fayette County and of Fort Bend County, it was unanimously resolved, "that under no circumstances will we ever submit to reconstruction or reunion with the Yankee nation." But in spite of all this bravado the rebel officers were soon making arrangements for a surrender. On the 23d of May the rebel General Brent, with several staff officers, reached Baton Rouge to consult with the patriot General Canby upon the terms of surrender for Kirby Smith's army. On the 26th the arrangements were concluded for the surrender of all the Confederate forces in the Trans-Mississippi Department, including the men and material of the army and navy. Three weeks after General Magruder's brave resolve to become a Comanche Indian rather than yield, he issued an order imploring his troops to remain "steadfast in their duties, by which they will probably make a very advantageous settlement with the enemy. When that settlement shall have been made they will be marched by regiments, battalions, and unattached companies, with all the facilities which the present organization affords, to the neighborhood of their homes, and then be honorably discharged or indefinitely furloughed."

But the lawless Texan rangers, deeming that the rebellion was played out, and knowing full well that not one single dollar of pay could be expected from the beggarly treasury of the defunct Confederacy, decided it to be not worth while to remain in camp any longer. General Smith returned to his headquarters at Houston only to find that his troops were disbanding and dispersing to their homes. They had individually adopted the doctrines of secession, and cast themselves upon their own reserved rights. Their discomfited leader exclaimed pathetically, "I am left a commander without an army—a General without troops!" He, however, as he mounted his horse and left for Mexico, uttered the following words of good advice to his troops:

"Your present duty is plain. Return to your families. Resume the occupations of peace. Yield obedience to the laws. Labor to restore order. Strive both by counsel and example to give security to life and property. And may God in his mercy direct you aright, and heal the wounds of our distracted country!"

The peace-loving people of Texas were now exceedingly anxious for the arrival of the National troops. A large portion of the Texan army was composed of a wild and reckless race of men, who recognized scarcely any of the restraints of religion or of law. Their dispersion was the signal for a carnival of robbery. They broke up into hundreds of gangs, and wandered in all directions pilfering and plundering. Officers and soldiers were alike engaged in this game of grab. There was surely some excuse for the common soldiers. By the most merciless conscription they had been driven into the army. For months they had received no pay, and now they were dismissed hungry, ragged, and in beggary. In Houston the troops made a regular raid upon all the army stores. Guns, blankets, clothing, equipments, every thing was seized. The Houston Telegraph says:

"They made a clean sweep, taking every item of Government property worth carrying away. The estate of the Confederacy seemed to be administered on without regard to law. The only recognized claim was that of those who presented their own claim."

An ample military force was sent by the National Government to Texas, to secure order and to protect the well-disposed in their endeavors to reconstruct the State. All the important posts were garrisoned, and again there was peace from St. Croix to the Rio Grande. Texas was redeemed. The storm of war had passed away. Its desolations were awful. But in the fury of the tempest the blighting institution of slavery was swept from the land. The State of Texas, with its fertile fields and sunny skies and vast expanse, has now a career of prosperity opening before it which no imagination can picture.

ABSALOM MATHER.

I.

"Jesus lo'es me, this I know,
For the Bible tells me so."

SO sang a little blue-eyed maiden who calls me father, in the twilight of a winter evening not very long ago, while I accompanied her sweet voice with the old-fashioned melodeon in the sitting-room at my father's house in the village of Keyes, where I was born. That day I had heard the later part of the story of Absalom Mather from the young man's own lips. The story of his earlier life I was already familiar with, for I was residing in Keyes at the time he ran away from his home, and I had known him from his little childhood, and his parents for many years. When I went to bed that night, and the little maiden nestled asleep on my arm, I was thinking over that story of Absalom's, and the sweet cadences of my little Clara's song still echoed in my brain:

"Yes, Jesus lo'es me; yes, Jesus lo'es me;
Yes, Jesus lo'es me; the Bible tells me so."

Ah! if little Absalom had been reared under an influence so gentle as that breathed in this child-song, his might have been a different story; nay, it would have been.

Undoubtedly Mr. Hosea Mather was a most upright, honorable, well-intentioned man; but the humanities were buried in him beneath a load of inherited prejudices of the harshest sort. He believed himself a model man in every respect. Could any man point to a stain upon his integrity—to a flaw in his religious armor? No. And his parents were like him, he could tell you. When was a Mather known to shirk any stern religious duty? Through what great sin of his own or his ancestors God's wrath was moved, that he sent his servant a son so wild, so wicked, so intractable as this Absalom, Hosea Mather could not tell you. It is true that Absalom was a very bad boy in contradistinction from the good boy of the Sabbath-school book. The child felt goaded toward wickedness as toward a refuge, by the cold, prim formalities of his home and the absence of love in his father, the presence of bitter severity.

Absalom's mother died in giving him birth. A step-mother succeeded her at the end of a strictly proper period. No doubt she also meant to do by her husband's son her whole duty; what that was in her eyes may be inferred from the fact that she was bred in the same formal, frigid school of piety with the boy's father. She shared her husband's sense of the wickedness of Absalom. He remembers still the words and the dismal tune with which she sung him to sleep in his youngest days:

"To all that's good averse and blind,
But prone to all that's ill,
What dreadful darkness veils our mind!
How obstinate our will!
Conceived in sin, O wretched state!
Before we draw our breath,
The first young pulse begins to beat Iniquity and death."

Absalom was popular among his mates. Every body liked him, the boy thought, except these two stern rulers of his home. He was precocious beyond his years, and held in his nature a most deplorable love of rollicking mischief for its own sweet sake. His father whipped him without mercy on all occasions of dereliction from strict duty, even of demeanor; and as, with a lad like this, such occasions were very frequent, you may understand that his floggings were frequent too. Those who forget the sorrows of their childhood—and I think most people do—never realize the capacity for suffering that children have. There were whole months together in the life of this little boy when the days were so utterly miserable and unhappy that he looked forward eagerly to the night—the merciful, healing night, when he could lay his poor little curly head on his pillow and wander unharmed in dreamland. He had no joy but in dreams; it was with him just as it may be with a felon in prison, or with a slave who has known freedom and happiness. For when he could break away from his master and get out among his mates the boy was invariably happy.

There came a time, when Absalom was ten years old, that his father took him from his school, and declared that he would "take him in hand" himself, and "break his wild spirits, with God's help, or know the reason why." What new horrors these stern words implied Absalom shuddered to think. They struck like ice to his heart, and he turned his eyes imploringly up to his father, only to read relentless determination on the stony face.

What grave offense had the boy committed to awaken this bitter resolution? One of appalling enormity, I assure you. He had run away from home one night, and accompanied some bigger boys to a theatrical performance given at the Euterpe Hall by a company of strolling players. Crawling in at a back window, near midnight, he was stealing up to his bed in his stocking-feet, when a strong hand grasped his arm in the darkness, and the voice of his father said, addressing his wife:

"Hannah, bring a light."

There was the scratching of a match on the wall, and the dim flame of a tallow-candle displayed the trembling culprit in his captor's hands. A fearful flogging with a rawhide followed; and then Absalom was sent whimpering to his bed, with the awful assurance that if this course of evil-doing were continued its consequences would be specific—floggings here below, and everlasting fire in the world to come.

A ball-room, and equally a private party where there was dancing, were no less criminal than the theatre itself in Mr. Mather's eyes. As for the circus, Absalom was plainly given to understand that it was the earthly representative of that hell to which he was speeding. It was fortunate that the boy did not believe his father to be telling the truth; if he had, it is probable he would have had little fear of the hell which was pictured in colors of such dazzling beauty; and little love for that heaven which was exemplified on earth by dreary, dreary sermons, which no bad boy could understand, whatever the good boys might—by Sunday cold dinners, and a death-like hush all over the house, with a Testament or a Sabbath-school book as an enforced companion in a dismal corner, and the hateful hours of that hated day drag, drag, dragging their slow length along.

But there was one lower depth of sin for this wretched boy to sink within. His father taught him with special emphasis the solemn fact that "girls"—a generic term—were, in their relations to him, Absalom, incarnations of evil. To desire their companionship was to be given over into the hands of Satan at once. To fall in love was the cardinal sin. His father gave love the title of idolatrous worship, when its manifestation was girl-ward. Mr. Mather had married without it. In Absalom's mother he had married a fortune; in his second wife he had married a housekeeper and a sister in the Lord; in neither case had he been influenced by the carnal idolatries of love.

Now it must be said of this atrocious boy that he liked the girls very much; and while his father's instructions gave him the most dreadful sensations of guilt, they were nevertheless wasted on him. He had a gnawing suspicion at his heart that he was in love with a certain young lady of twelve summers, named Emmy Paddock, whose life he had on one occasion saved. Since he could not have feminine society openly and honorably, he had it in stealth. As every body liked him, he was persistently invited to winter-evening parties by his companions, but he was never, of course, allowed to go; and as his "Sunday clothes" were kept under lock and key, there was no going surreptitiously. But for outdoor parties in the moonlight, sliding down hill in winter, or boating on the river in summer, the aforesaid Sunday clothes were not necessary; and Absalom often played truant. It was at one of these boating parties that he immortalized himself by saving Emmy Paddock. Emmy's big brother was with her, but he was rowing, and Absalom being deemed too small a boy to handle the oars (an assumption indignantly disputed on his part), was seated in the stern with Emmy. She, leaning over at an inopportune moment, fell into the water; and Absalom, catching two handfuls of her dress, roared out "Woman overboard! stop her!" and valorously dragged the frightened miss into the boat again, safe and wet.

This gave the capsheaf to Absalom's stack of popularity, and he was more emphatically than ever voted a glorious good-fellow, and afraid of no one. Nevertheless, he was very much afraid of his stern father.

There came a glorious winter night when half the girls and boys in that school district were gathered on Hibbard's Hill for a grand coasting frolic. In the afternoon of that day, as Absalom was looking out of a window of his prison, he saw Emmy Paddock across the street beckoning to him. The occasion was opportune; his jailers were both out of sight for the moment—the father down in the village and the step-mother in an upper chamber. Absalom seized his cap and ran out.

"Coming out on the hill to-night, Absa?" said the girl.

"Slidin'?" queried Absalom, eagerly.

"Yes, all the boys an' girls are going to be out. You don't come out any lately, Absa. What keeps you?"

"Oh, I don't know," fibbed the bad boy, confusedly; for he knew too well what kept him—or rather who kept him.

"Well, you better come," said the temptress, moving away. "I'm going to be there; and George Atwell, and all the boys an' girls."

"By thunder!" cried Absalom, "I will go. I'll be there, Emmy, sure."

Mrs. Mather, from the chamber window, saw this paralyzing spectacle, and reported it to her husband when he came home. At the tea-table Mr. Mather said:

"I want to know, Sir, what you meant by going into the street and conversing with that girl this afternoon."

"What girl, Sir?" said Absalom, biting his bread-and-butter and dropping his eyes upon the morsel.

"No prevarication, boy!" exclaimed the father, sternly. "Answer my question. What were you saying to her?"

Aware of the futility of efforts to avoid this formidable catechist, Absalom answered that the girl said there was famous sliding on Hibbard's Hill, and there was going to be a lot of girls and boys out to-night, that's all.

"You will take your book and sit with me this evening," said the father.

"I—I promised I'd go out, Sir," said Absalom, with distress in his face.

"Did you hear what I said?" in a loud voice.

"Yes, Sir," timidly.

"Then make no remarks. Take your Bible, after tea, and read it till your bedtime."

Absalom knew there was no appeal; but he was determined he would go. There would only be a flogging, any how. He stuffed his cap and tippet under his jacket and sat down to read as directed. A half hour passed in silence, broken only by the occasional hemming of the father. Absalom arose quietly and laid his book on the table, open, as if he was just going into the next room a minute for a drink of water or what-not. Mr. Mather looked up over his spectacles, glanced at the open book, and pursued his reading. The boy slipped out the back-door, climbed the fence, and sped away as fast as his legs would carry him to the Hill, where his comrades hailed him with shouts of welcome. Fred Paddock, Emmy's big brother, had got out an old cutter belonging to his father, and had dragged it to the top of the hill; but they would not run it down till Absalom came. To him was accorded the place of honor as chief steerer on the right, Fred Paddock taking the front place on the left; and behind our hero, George Atwell was lieutenant. The cutter was filled with girls, while boys clung on the sides and back wherever they could. The word was given, and away she went, the girls screaming with laughter and the boys shouting. The snow was one hard, glary crust of ice, over which the heavy cutter shot rapidly, while the boys struggled in vain to steer it.

"Can't git no purchase at all on this crust!" sang out Absalom.

The cutter took a wrong course and ran side-long with a heavy crash against the stone-wall at the right. Several of the children were hurt, but only two seriously. George Atwell broke an arm, and Absalom Mather a leg. With the assistance of his comrades, Absalom made his way home. His father greeted him with a terrible countenance.

"Where have you been, Sir?"

"My leg's broken, father!" pleaded the boy, in great pain.

"Served you right," said Mr. Mather, sternly. "Boys, you go home! You deserve a severe flogging, Sir; and you shall have it so soon as your leg is well. For the present, God has punished you for your disobedience and wickedness."

"Did God break my leg, Sir, because I disobeyed?" asked Absalom, wonderingly, as if he feared God were another master suddenly developed as an aid to his cruel father.

"Undoubtedly," said Mr. Mather. "He saw your disobedience, and directed this accident as a striking illustration of his anger."

"I wonder," said the wicked boy, in the simplicity of his soul, "what God was mad at Georgey Atwell for then, for He broke his arm, and I know his father let him go out on the hill. He lets his boy play whenever he likes, after school-hours."

This was only a specimen of the hardihood with which Absalom Mather sometimes met his father's religious teachings.

Doctor — (my father) was sent for, the broken leg was dressed, and Absalom was confined closely to the house till the warm weather of spring. No prison convict could have been rendered more miserable during this time than this boy was. I am far from being sure that Mr. Mather regretted the accident. It is more probable that he thought it an interposition of Divine Providence to enable him to get absolute and unlimited control over his son. The boy was helpless. Ah, if there had been a little gentleness, a little, a very little love, to do its work on him now, his story would not have been so sad a story! But Mr. Mather was all iron. How far he succeeded in establishing his rule through the aid of this accident you will see.

Absalom was well at last; and his father announced to him that the time had come for the infliction of the long-delayed flogging for that act of disobedience last winter. This man always kept his word, you understand. He bade the boy go to that garret-room which had been the scene of so many castigations, and wait his coming. Absalom looked up in a momentary wonder, remembered the promised punishment, and did as he was bidden.

In the garret he sat down upon a box of old papers, and meditated. At his foot lay a card, and he picked it up idly. There was some writing on it—these words: "Marshall Manville, Nashville, Tenn." All that Absalom knew concerning his dead mother, was that her maiden name was Manville; this he had learned from the record in the family Bible. As he looked at this card the thought flashed across him that Marshall Manville might be his mother's father or brother. While he sat there, Mr. Mather came into the room, and saw the card in his boy's hand. He took it and read it; an angry light glittered in his eyes, and he tore the card in pieces.

"Strip!"

The boy took off his jacket, and the rawhide fell across his shrinking shoulders, which were protected only by a thin cotton shirt.

"This is the last time you whip me," said Absalom.

"What do you mean by that, Sir?" said the father, with another cut of the cruel whip.

"I mean that I'll run away," said the boy, firmly. "You're worse than a slaveholder. You make a slave of your own boy. You whip me just like they whip their slaves. I'll go where the slaves live; see, if I don't! I'll sell myself for a slave before I'll live with you. They won't whip me worse than you do."

Mr. Mather seemed almost paralyzed with horror for a moment; then he burst out with a torrent of invective.

"Leave me if you dare!" said he. "Run your wicked race to the end. Nothing will conquer your ugly spirit, it seems. Go out into the world; I wash my hands of you! Disgrace me by that step, and from that moment you are no longer my son. Never show your face in my house again."

Mr. Mather was very angry. He went down into the sitting-room where his wife was, leaving Absalom alone. The boy put on his jacket, went to his own room, made a little bundle of things, and descended to the sitting-room.

"I'll say good-by to you, Sir, if you like," said he. "I'm going now."

"Oh, dreadful, dreadful!" cried Mrs. Mather, holding up her hands in dismay. She had been informed of the scene in the garret.

"Go back to your room, Sir!" shouted Mr. Mather.

"No, Sir, I'm going away, as you told me to;" and the boy started for the door. His father sprang forward, seized the young rebel by the collar, dragged him to a dark closet, and shut him in there, fastening the door with its bolt.

"Oh dear, dear, dear!" cried Mrs. Mather, "what a dreadful boy! What will you do with him, Mr. Mather?"

"Do?" said the enraged parent; "I'll conquer him at any cost—at any cost. Yes, if I have to chain him to his bedpost like a wild beast, I am determined to do my duty, although it is a bitter trial."

They listened a moment to hear if the rebel was crying; but all was still as death in the closet. After a few minutes Mr. Mather left the house. He had not gone far when there came three or four solid and well-directed flat-foot kicks upon the closet door; the button burst off, and Absalom came out. Mrs. Mather ran shrieking out of the room. The boy left the house quickly, and in half an hour was out in the country, walking rapidly along the railroad track, bundle in hand. Before sundown he was ten miles away from home.

II.

Two years later, on a pleasant spring day, a couple of gentlemen sat in a lawyer's office in Wall Street, conversing. The office-boy was cleaning out the grate at the moment, and as he arose to leave the room with a scuttleful of coals and cold ashes the lawyer chanced to remark:

"When do you return to Nashville, Mr. Manville?"

The boy started, and dropped the scuttle with a crash upon the floor, scattering its contents. The two gentlemen turned to look at him.

"Marshall Manville, Nashville," he blurted out, staring at the stranger.

"Well, my lad?" said he, good-naturedly.

"Are you Marshall Manville, Nashville?" said the boy.

"I suppose so," said the stranger, smiling. "And what of that?"

"Then you knew my mother."

"Did I?"

"Yes, Sir; and perhaps you are my uncle. My name is Absalom Mather, and my mother's name was Charlotte Manville."

"How do you happen to be here?"

Absalom told his story in a few words, and the Southerner asked him if he would like to go to Nashville. The boy was only too glad. They left the city together in a few days.

Mr. Marshall Manville proved to be Absalom's mother's cousin, a lawyer of high standing in Nashville. He had once offended Hosea Mather by expressing views on the slavery question from a Southern stand-point, and all communication between them had ceased years ago. But the Southerner took a strong liking to Absalom—said he greatly resembled his mother in the face. He had no children of his own; and from that time forward Absalom became as a son to him.

It was natural that the boy's love should go out so strongly as it did toward his new father, who was so kind, so indulgent; and Mr. Manville found it an easy task to shape all Absalom's views in his own mould. The lad was already prejudiced against the lovers of reform—Abolitionists, temperance men, religionists—for he had learned to look with a distrustful eye on every good thing that met his father's approval. Boys reason only a posteriori. Absalom knew his father to be a firm anti-slavery man, himself a brutal task-master. Here in his new father's house he saw slave servants, who gave no signs of suffering under the galling chain. Mr. Manville treated his slaves well. They were never flogged, as the boy remembered he had been. They had more liberty, apparently, than he had had. They always spoke well of their master. Excepting old Tenah, the cook, who had a husband in Kentucky somewhere, all Mr. Manville's slaves gave token of perfect content.

Old Tenah, by-the-way, was something of a character. She was a strong, square-built negress, as black as coal, and with tight-curling wool on her head, in which there was no speck of gray. Her face was seamed and wrinkled with old age; but hers were all kindly wrinkles. No one could look into old Tenah's face without warming toward her, with her sad, sweet eyes—those wells of beauty which so often dwell in the face of the pure-blooded Guinea negro, and give a touch of the poetic to the blackest countenance. In this woman Absalom Mather, reared in the strictest of religious families, first beheld illustrated the beauty of the Christian religion. Tenah loved her Bible and her God, and tried to shed that love on all who would permit her to. From the first, Absalom became a great pet with this pious old creature, and he learned to love her in his turn; wrinkled old negress that she was, she was "irresistible." Great was her grief over Absalom's story when he one day related it to her.

"Why, why, why!" ejaculated Tenah, in alternating gusts of emotion, first at the cruelty of the father and then at the restiveness of the son; "dat wuz too bad, honey, dat wuz! But yer mus'n't blame de good Lord 'case yer fader wuz too ha'sh wid yer. De Lord lubs all his chillen; He does so."

Thus it chanced that the severity which drove Absalom from his father's home was not allowed to harden his heart, through the softening influences brought to act upon it by an ignorant slave whose whole creed was love.

Six years passed, and Absalom was a tall and handsome youth of eighteen. During all this time he had held no communication with his father, nor with any one in his Northern home. He no longer looked upon it as his home; he never expected to see it again. He had entered upon a new and beautiful life, and was a favorite in the highest social circles of Nashville. His comrades were the flower of young manhood in that city. At this time the rebellion broke out.

Of course Absalom sympathized with his friends and fellows. The city blazed with excitement. There were enthusiastic meetings, at which orators glorified their cause with eloquent and soul-stirring language. Their fevered denunciations of Northern sentiment, its bigoted reformers, its tyranny of prejudice, found quick response in the boy's heart. His father stood before him, an incarnation of that oppression which the South charged upon the North. No statement was too extravagant for him to believe.

"Let Abraham Lincoln assume the Presidential Chair," shouted an Alabama Congressman at one of these night assemblages, "and five hundred thousand Wide-awakes, drilled in secret in the use of arms, will march over the border, lay waste the plantations, set the negroes free, and amalgamate the fair daughters of the South with the buck-niggers from off the plantations, before your very eyes! Southerners, are you ready to submit to your fate like cowards?"

"No! never! never!" rose a thrilling cry in answer to the orator, and in that shout no voice was louder than Absalom Mather's, horrified by this dreadful picture—whose untruthfulness he could not know—in which he saw the doom of many a beautiful maiden of his acquaintance; and Absalom's old love for "the girls" had not yet forsaken him. It scarcely needed the voice of beauty to induce him to enter the ranks of the chivalry, and go out to battle for Southern rights.

What the Seventh Regiment was to New York before the War the Rock City Guards were to Nashville—the pet and the pride of the city. Absalom was a member of this organization, and marched away with the regiment of which it formed a part—the First Tennessee, commanded by Colonel, afterward General, Maney, of the "Confederate Army." Scarce any man of that regiment believed that this was to be more than a holiday march; and before young Mather's eyes there glowed an inspiring picture of the day when, with his gallant comrades, he should return in honor to Nashville, to be welcomed by enthusiastic crowds; to be greeted by the same sweet smiles, the same fluttering of perfumed handkerchiefs, that cheered their departure; luxurious banquets would be spread, and garlands of flowers would strew their path; their glories would be blazoned in the newspapers and rehearsed in song; with banners flying and music pealing they would return to the homes they had marched forth to defend, and among the fair faces lining the streets he would look for the one he held dearest, and note the glad pride in her eyes.

Ah, how different from this boyish dream was the bitter, bitter truth! And with what a different heart Absalom Mather returned to Nashville at last!

The First Tennessee fought bravely in a wicked cause at Perryville, Kentucky, on the 8th of October, 1862. They contested the field for hours with the gallant First Wisconsin, and were defeated, after suffering almost annihilation under a terrible cross-fire. Young Mather was shot in the face, and frightfully mutilated; but he survived, and was one of the thirty men who constituted all that remained of the First Tennessee regiment when Johnston surrendered his ragged army to Sherman in April, 1865.

Absalom Mather returned to Nashville with his health shattered, his clothing rags, his pockets empty, his heart unutterably sad. No banners, no music, no welcoming huzzas, no fair ladies, no banqueting, no glory—only shame, despair, desolation!

But Absalom was changed, almost beyond recognition. It was a high-spirited, proud-stepping, healthy, handsome youth who marched out of Nashville four years ago. It was a humble, broken invalid, with a scarred and distorted face, who returned to-day. It was a narrowed, North-hating, South-loving, and yet inexperienced heart that he had borne away. It was a softened and enlightened heart—a freedom-loving, slavery-hating heart—that he brought back. Why he returned to Nashville at all he could scarcely tell; he had a faint idea of finding friends, perhaps. He looked only for some member of Mr. Marshall Manville's household, however; and he found Tenah. The rest were gone or dead.

There were those who would have helped young Mather, no doubt; but to these he spoke so bitterly that they turned their backs upon him.

"Don't talk those old lies to me!" he would cry, with husky, vehement voice. "Lies! I tell you, lies! See what they have brought us to!"

"A Yankee born—what could you expect?" they would sneer, and leave him.

I said Absalom found old Tenah. The loving negress greeted him as one raised from the dead, and tears of joy chased over her ebony face while she kissed the poor bony hands again and again. Tenah had become the possessor of a snug little house, and her "ole man" had joined her, and they were living together for the first time in thirty years. She offered Absalom a home with her; and he accepted it.

"Mas' Abs'lom," she would say to him, sometimes, "wha' fer makes yer set dat way, sough-in' like yer heart was done broke, honey? Yer make d' ole woman feel mighty bad, yer does. It ain't case yer fought agin de good Uncle Abe, I hopes, honey? Yer didn't ought to feel dat yare way now. De good Lord forgibs dem dat 'pent ob dar sins, an' I knows yer 'pents—I knows yer does."

"It isn't that, Tenah," said Absalom, shaking his head sadly. "It's worse than that."

"Sakes now, chile; what kin it be, den? Woan't yer tell ole Tenah what's a troublin' yer? Do, now, Mas' Abs'lom; p'raps I mought comfort yer, now; who knows? Woan't yer tell me, chile?"

"Bless your kind old heart, Tenah, it's past your comfort, I think," said Absalom, looking down on the old negress as she knelt on the floor at his feet. "It's my father I'm thinking about. Oh, for one touch of my wronged father's hands before I die! The end of my life seems near, Tenah, and I long to throw myself at his feet and be forgiven. My heart yearns toward him strangely now."

"Den why don't yer gwo, chile?" quavered Tenah, the tears rolling down her cheeks. "Lord bless yer, I knows yer fader 'ud jump out his skin, he'd be so glad yer'd come back, an' he'd cry out, 'Dis my son wuz dead, an' is 'live ag'in—he wuz loss, an' he is foun' ag'in.' I'd gwo to-morrer ef I wuz you, chile."

"Look at me, Tenah!" said the young man, drawing his lean length up; "can I walk a thousand miles without food or shelter? Who would shelter me?"

That night, as he lay in his humble bed in old Tenah's house, he heard the aged negroes engaged in a long and subdued consultation. The next morning the result of the conversation was made apparent.

"Mas' Abs'lom," said old Tenah, with the air of one about to make a long speech, "dis yare war's made some mighty cur'us turnin's an' oberturnin's, a fact, sure! Now, dar wuz you, comf'ble an' happy, an' free an' 'trong; an' dar wuz me an' my ole man, in de chains ob slavery. Now hyar is we, free an' happy, tanks to de good Lord an' de ole Abe; an' hyar is you, pore an' 'sconsolate. Now afore de war, dar wuz my ole man a savin' up his money fer to buy his free wid, an' along come de war an' he got his free fer not'in, an' I got mine too, hallelujah! an' so he burrid de money in de groun', an' I's got um in dis yare ole stock'n, an' we's boddered mos' to deff w'at ter do wid um. An'—an'—lors, lors, ole man, stop yer snivelin'!" burst out old Tenah, her eyes swimming in tears; "an' w'at we wants fer to do, honey, is jist dis yare—we—oh, lors!—dare, gwo 'long—take de money, Mas' Abs'lom, an' gwo an' see yer fader, an' tole 'im ole Tenah sent yer, honey!"

Absalom said nothing—for he was nearly choked with emotion, poor lad!—but he shook his head.

"W'at!" cried Tenah, drying her eyes on her apron, "yer woan't, chile? Wha' fer? Now, dat's yer pride, honey! Dat's jist yer ole pride, dat I tort wuz all gone wid your 'pentance. Yer is too proud ter take de niggers' money; de Lord forgib yer!"

Why prolong the scene? I protest my own eyes are so weak I can hardly see the paper on which I am writing. In a word, Absalom yielded; took the money with humble, hearty thanks, and went his way.

III.

A tall, gaunt youth got off the cars at Keyes station at sundown of a pleasant summer day, and looked about with a strange interest on the old scenes that he had left a dozen years ago. He walked slowly up the street, carrying a ragged gray blanket on his arm. His clothing was sadly dilapidated, and his pantaloons were the same worn pair of Union blue that he had on when he came back to Nashville,—for this article of dress was a not uncommon thing among the rebel soldiery in the latter part of the war.

He hardly recognized the changed aspect of the streets. Here was a hill in times ago; whither had it vanished? Where were those other hills that used to lie off yonder to the left? The whole scene seemed to have been leveled and smoothed, somehow. Keyes was plentiful with hills when he was a boy; what had become of them? New buildings greeted him on every hand. What wondrous changes had taken place in Keyes! Here was where Hibbard's Hill used to be; covered with houses now. The old lane had risen to the dignity of a street. His cheek flushed at sight of his father's old brick mansion—once the pride of the street on which it stood—now overshadowed by many finer residences.

How fast his heart beat as he laid his lean hand on the familiar gate of his father's grounds! It was still light out-of-doors, but the curtains of his father's house were drawn, and the lamp-light shone through—just as it used to do when he was little. As he stood there a moment, looking about him, a young woman came by, pushing a little carriage before her in which a baby lay sleeping. She looked hard at the gaunt young man—hesitated, stopped—pronounced his name in a wondering tone.

"You know me?" said Absalom, gazing eagerly in her face.

"Are you truly Absalom Mather?" said she.

"What is left of him," he answered.

"Have you forgotten Emmy Paddock?" she said, extending her hand.

He grasped it with eager gladness. He remembered what came of speaking to little Emmy Paddock on this spot, years ago.

"Come and see me," said she. "I live in Berkeley Street, opposite the school-house. My name is Mrs. Belton now."

Absalom watched her out of sight. This cheered him. He went around to the wing door of his father's house, and rapped. The door opened. They were at tea—the picture as unchanged as if he had left it last night.

"We have nothing for you," said Mrs. Mather, holding by the latch of the door, and about to close it.

"Stop!" said Mr. Mather. "It is a soldier, I think. Come in. Hannah, give the soldier a chair. What can I do for you, my friend?"

"Father!" said the poor boy, in a half moan, "don't you know me?"

"Who calls me father?" said Mr. Mather, turning pale.

"Your own son," said Absalom. "I have come back, father, to pray for your forgiveness."

There was a moment of painful silence, in which the father glared upon his son. Then he spoke:

"What have you been doing in the past four years?"

"Fighting against my country, father," said Absalom, pleadingly. "I have done great wrong, and I am bitterly repentant."

Mr. Mather arose from his seat.

"And you dare to come to me in your day of degradation, after your years of wickedness—to me, whom you have wronged so basely! I have no words to waste on you. You are no son of mine. Take yourself and your rags into the streets; you have earned your punishment; I care little what it is. Go!"

"Father!"

"Call me that name again, and I'll throw you out of my house. You lead a life of crime till you are covered with filth and rags, and then you come to me to hide you and nurse you. Viper! Begone, I say!"

With trembling hands poor Absalom gathered up his ragged blanket, and went slowly out—crushed, overwhelmed. He showed no proper spirit, this young man. I confess that he was a most degraded specimen of humanity in that hour. The best we could say for such a wretch would be this, "Go, and sin no more."

To you, my respectable reader, these words would come like a slap in the face, no doubt. But they were all this young man wanted—all! Ah, he was sunk very low; he craved these words—with what a gnawing hunger!

Wearily he walked down the street, with its long avenue of shade trees. Whither should he go?

He had money enough. He had saved Tannah's store with jealous care. He would not use a cent, save as he must. He had now fasted since morning, and felt hungry and tired. There were three handsome hotels in the flourishing village. "Too fine for me!" he sighed. He remembered that in old times there used to be, across the river, a low, cheap hotel, that he would have been ashamed to enter when a boy. Now, it was his refuge—provided it were still there; and if it were not—

What a vivid picture was that which crowded upon his brain, of the deep, still waters of the river, rolling in darkness under the long bridge he must cross! He could sleep there, perhaps.

The old bakery under the paint-shop had its door invitingly open, and he saw the long rows of white, soft bread on the shelves. He went in and bought a loaf. The baker (not the old baker, Uncle Greenleaf, Absalom thought—a new-comer) stared hard at him. Such a looking creature was seldom seen in that neat and prosperous village.

"War's used you rough, comrade," said the baker.

Absalom looked up, cheered by the kind tone; but at the instant he thought, "the tone is not for me; if he knew I was a rebel he would spurn me." He moved away in silence.

"Hold on!" cried the baker. "Don't go off that way! That's a queer wound you've got in your cheek. Look 'ere!" and the baker, turning his right cheek to the light, pointed to a similar wound in his own face. "Might be the brother of mine, eh, comrade? Where'd you git yours?"

"Perryville," said Absalom, munching a piece of his bread; and his mind ran back with a flash to that day of battle.

"What! Perryville!" cried the baker, coming out from behind his counter and extending his hand. "Why, shake hands, old chap, there's where I got mine. What regiment was you in?" pumping Absalom's lean hand cordially.

"First Tennessee," said Absalom.

The baker stared, and cried, "What! a Johnny?" stopped pumping, and held the rebel's hand but loosely.

"Yes, drop it!" cried Absalom, bitterly; "fling it off, and kick me into the street. I deserve it."

However, the baker did not do any thing so rash. He released the hand very gently, and said,

"Sit down. Sit down, Johnny, and tell us who you are, and what you're doing here?"

Absalom complied, and related his history in full, something as I have told it—with many a bitter self-reproach, and even with sobs—unmanly sobs. Oh, he was very degraded! Strangely enough, the baker's eyes moistened too, and he had use for a large red silk pocket-handkerchief, which he had to go behind the counter after, having left it lying on a barrel of crackers.

"Johnny, do you see that flag?" The baker pointed to the stars and stripes hanging in his window. "Now, here's all I want you to do. Go round there and kiss the old flag. Do it?"

Absalom's answer was to obey, with impressive solemnity.

"That's enough, old fellow! Your own flesh-an'-blood may go back on you, if they like. I won't! Here's my hand; and when I shake yours as I do now, I shake the hand of a repentant sinner and a loyal man. That's enough for Jo Belton. You've told me your story, and I'll tell you mine in two words. I was in the First Wisconsin in that battle of Perryville, when I got this in my cheek that's the twin of yours. You was on the wrong side, and I was on the right side. Perhaps it was you shot me, and perhaps it was me shot you. Who knows? I am a Wisconsin man born, but when the war broke out I was living here in Keyes, a journeyman in this shop. "I went back to my own State to enlist. After I got my discharge I came back to Keyes, bought this bakery, and married the nicest girl in the village. My wife was right here in this shop an hour ago, with the little feller. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll take you up to my house to-night, any how. You say you want to go to work. You don't look very strong, but I guess you can knead dough; and here's a place for you in my shop, if you want to be a baker."

Absalom's heart was too full for words. He pressed Jo Belton's hand with a warmth that spoke volumes, while again tears crept down his worn cheeks.

A happy home was that to which the baker took our friend—a cozy, white-painted cottage, into whose front-door Jo Belton walked with the air of a proprietor, and not of a mere tenant. He left Absalom in the parlor, and went out to tell his wife they had got a visitor.

"Who is it, Joey?"

"Oh, a brother soldier from the West," said Belton. "Is the front chamber all ship-shape?"

"Yes," said the wife.

"Then I'll show him up. He'll want to comb his hair. Set out a lunch, Em. He hain't been to supper yet."

He took Absalom up into the chamber.

"There, Johnny," said he; "but no—I won't call you Johnny any more; you're a Union man now—come down stairs as soon as you wash off the travel dust."

Left alone, what does Absalom do but fall on his knees and thank his God for this good friend, thus wonderfully sent him in his weariest hour of pain? And then, after doing what he could to make himself presentable—which was not much, it must be admitted—he descended.

"My wife, Mr. Mather," said Belton, proudly, as Absalom entered the room. "Hallo, Em! What's that mean? Why, you know each other, do you? Well, well—wonders never will cease. First, he's got the twin-brother of my game cheek, and then he got it at Perryville, and now he knows my wife! Well, well."

"We were children together," says the little woman; and then she gives her husband a look that says she don't understand at all what Absalom is doing here when his own father lives just around in Broad Street. So the story has to be told again. Emma sheds a tear or two on her own private account, and relieves herself by kissing the baby, who lies asleep in his cradle. And the friends hold pleasant chat till bedtime.

I wish I could say now that Hosea Mather, seeing his son laboring humbly and with a contrite spirit, seeing also the magnanimity of that noble Union veteran, Jo Belton, went one day to the shop where his son worked, held out the hand of forgiveness to Absalom, and felt it grasped by his boy's hand, floury from the dough. But Mr. Mather avoids his son, and has never entered the bakery. This in spite of the visit Jo Belton made him one night, and the long and earnest talk they had together; in spite also of the arguments of his pastor in Absalom's behalf. What the father did do was to send a chilling letter to his son, extending his forgiveness formally, and concluding thus:

"Any pecuniary necessities will be relieved on application by letter to Yours, &c., H. MATHER."

Absalom returned his thanks to his father, told him the story of old Tenah, and solicited a contribution of five hundred dollars for her benefit. The money was furnished, and Absalom sent it to the good old negress, with a most affectionate letter, which I trust some good Christian reads to her every month or so, to her ceaseless delight.

TWO CAN PLAY AT THAT GAME.

I.

THREE figures on a shady piazza, two women and one man (the true American proportion), an opening in the vines through which appears a distant blue mountain, an intervening stretch of garden, meadow, and stream—such is the picture. I might fill up the fore-ground by telling you that one of the women is beautiful; that the man is a pale clergyman, with a brown-covered novel in his hand; that the other woman is scarce a woman, a girl of fifteen,

"Standing still with waiting feet,
Where womanhood and childhood meet."

It is a warm morning, and the ladies are in the gossamer white negligées so becoming to women of every age; that "sweet neglect" of the poet, which is, after all, attained unto only by the most exquisite of all arts, neatness and luxury combined. The clergyman himself in this sweet seclusion has broken his shell of black, and come out in the delicious impropriety of a cool white linen coat; but so deep is the shadow of the vines that these high lights are not displeasing.

"Read aloud, Mr. Herries," said the beauty; "give us a good thought this warm morning!"

Mr. Herries read: "Youth is a mistake, Middle Life a struggle, Old Age a regret."

The beauty laughed. "I thought you were reading a novel, not a homily."

"So I am; but novels are the vehicles by which homilies travel nowadays."

"If youth is a mistake, let us keep making it," said the girl.

"Oh, Grace," said Mr. Herries, "don't be so clever!"

The beauty sighed. Middle Life was not far off, yet still her peerless beauty remained untouched; she was smooth, radiant, calm, her cheek had still the softest bloom, her eyes held in their clear blue the love light of seventeen. Her figure, tall, swaying, delicate, was yet rounded to the perfect line of grace; her teeth, the signet of female beauty, were like pearls—

"like a slice of fresh cocoa-nut"—"like unto a flock of sheep on Mount Gideon in which there is not one wanting." Such was Constance Howard, a widow, the step-mother of the girl Grace, the lady of Estecourt Manor-House, to which, and to its inmates, we respectfully invite your attention for an hour.

"Mrs. Macdonald, Miss Stoddart, Mr. Greyson, and Mr. Fellowes, come to-night," said Mr. Herries, "and my happiness goes. I am in one of those most fortuitous conditions of human life when man is blest, and I don't want to be disturbed. However, I promise to be amiable if you will describe to me every one of these people, and allow me to go away in three days if I do not like them, to come back when you and Grace, having felt the insufficiency of society, return to your muttons and to me."

"Do not speak of muttons, Mr. Herries, in the same breath with Mrs. Macdonald. She is a genius, an enthusiast, a reader, a thinker, a spoiled pet of society—amusement for the moment, a study for a lifetime! You are the most fortunate of men to have brought to you one of the nonpareils of the nineteenth century; a woman whom men cross the ocean to see; whom to see is to adore; who, like Récamier, though always loved, has never loved; who drinks in admiration as the rest of us drink black tea; a woman of too much brain and too much heart; and, greatest wonder of all, though such a pet of your sex, admired always by her own."

"Goodness gracious me!" said Mr. Herries, as Mrs. Howard stopped for want of breath. "what time does the first train leave? But tell me, is this paragon happy?"

"Alas! no. And Miss Stoddart is a clever girl of six-and-twenty, fond of literature and spiritualism, very pretty, feminine, and attractive, but also with too much brain."

"Now, my dear Mrs. Howard, you are getting oppressive. I must really ask you to throw in a little stupidity. I can not stand so much 'brain.'"

"Well, Mr. Fellowes, then, is one of those pleasant people without any too much brain, with accomplishments and good manners; one of the caryatides of society, who silently hold up the structure—"

"Thank Fate for Mr. Fellowes, then."

"Mr. Greyson I do not know. I invite him as a friend of Mrs. Macdonald. I hear he is very clever, a man of forty, a widower, and 'very delightful,' whatever that means."

"Clever again!" groaned Mr. Herries.

"Are you afraid we are going to be too frivolous, Mr. Herries?" said Grace.

"No, my child; I only fear we shall be too profound."

"Mr. Greyson forty!" said Grace, with disdain.

"Tread lightly, Grace," said Mr. Herries.

"My withers are not unwrung when you say forty!"

"How does Mrs. Macdonald spend her time, mamma?" said Grace.

"In excessive dancing, flirting, in charities, in reading, in spasmodic religious fervors, in charming society, in every way which an excessively pretty, well-dressed, and well-appointed woman of the world can do, with dignity. She entertains with perfect grace and hospitality; is always ready to sympathize with you in joy and sorrow; the dearest friend in affliction, the truest defender of an absent friend, the best talker, and the best thinker in the world."

"A woman worth saving," said Mr. Herries.

Grace sighed heavily over her drawing.

"Come here, mamma, and help me. A horse's head—a horrible horse's head! a nightmare! Oh dear! I shall not drive Rosa Bonheur out of the field this year."

"There is a shadow in the sky," said Mrs. Howard.

"And one on my spirits," said Mr. Herries.

"Here I am resting from my labors under your most agreeable roof, and in your refreshing society, and only afraid of Grace's preternatural smartness, which is excusable on account of youth, and which, please Heaven, she will recover from; and you threaten to let loose on my uncovered head the arrows of Diana and Minerva also."

"See the rain come down!" shouted Grace.

"How beautiful!"

And soon the mountain-side began to bend and wave its mighty green arms under the summer shower. The rain-drops came heavily and fast, as if wept from a great broken heart. The air grew chill, and the bright sunshine disappeared behind the gray curtain of clouds.

"I feel a presentiment of evil," said Mrs. Howard.

"Manuel, with letters, mamma."

An immense negro with white hair stood in the doorway with a salver of letters.

"That periodicity of time we call post-time" was indeed most interesting at the remote Manor-House of Estecourt, and soon the three were silently engaged in deciphering plaid and striped letters, surrounded by monograms and borders, and were watching with grave countenances the kaleidoscopic changes of correspondence.

The clouds grew darker. The rain poured down an unrelenting stream. Suddenly, as the darkness seemed visibly to enwrap them, came a scream, so loud, mournful, and discordant, that some soul seemed rent from its garment and flung forever on the shores of Hades. The three started from their seats pale, trembling, terrified. The servants started from their various retreats. Manuel reappeared at the door.

"Guess him screech-owl," suggested Manuel.

"It is crazy Miss Bowen over the river," suggested the cook.

"Go, Manuel; go, Monica; look every where; find if some one is hurt. Mr. Herries, I know I may ask you to search the shrubberies."

Every one started at this request of Mrs. Howard. Grace staid by her mother, and throwing her arms around her said, softly,

"Once again, dear mamma."

II.

Estecourt Hall looked very calm, stately, and hospitable to Mr. Greyson as he walked out the next morning before breakfast to take a survey of the premises. It had belonged to Mrs. Howard's father, who after a youth of toil in the West Indies came home to enjoy his money, his country, and his only daughter, Constance. Why he had chosen to bring her up in great seclusion and then to marry her to Mr. Howard, a man as old as himself, a widower with one daughter, he never explained, nor can he. The marriage was not happy, but it had been honorable, peaceful, and "eminently respectable." Mrs. Howard found herself at twenty-five possessed of all her own and Mr. Howard's fortune, with the single encumbrance of Grace, who loved her step-mother with almost passionate affection. Children always love the beautiful and the genuine, and Mrs. Howard was both.

It is not improbable that Mr. Greyson reviewed all these facts as he walked over the well-kept gravel walks of Estecourt; admired its long, low outline, its generous extent, its romantic, old-fashioned porch hung with vines, the stately trees, the air of intense quiet and seclusion imparted by an overhanging hill behind the house wooded to the top. Turning from the house he saw across the high-road, which skirted the park, the bright, noisy river, rushing, like all mountain streams, impetuously on over its rocky foundations. On every side of him was high cultivation, bordered by nature in her mildest mood. At this moment a window opened and a fair head put itself forth to give greeting to Mr. Greyson.

"A lovely morning!" said the lady.

"An enchanting spot!" said Mr. Greyson. "Pray tell me, Mrs. Howard, how such a house came to be built."

"So far off?" laughed Mrs. Howard. "I can tell you. My father had passed his life either in crowded cities or the extreme solitude of a West Indian plantation. He preferred the latter life, and when he came home to remain he built this place, partly an English country house, partly a West India planter's home."

"A delightful cross in architecture," said Mr. Greyson.

Soon the whole party were assembled in the breakfast-room, which commanded from its bow-window the view up the valley with the blue mountain in the distance. As all breakfast rooms should, it opened to the east, for the sun is necessary to charm away the vapors of the night. The conversation was of course of yesterday's journey, of the country about them, of each other's adventures since they parted in town, and of the coming watering-place season; for the summer was yet young.

Mr. Greyson had Mrs. Howard's right, Mr. Fellowes her left hand; while Mr. Herries was exposed from his end of the table to Mrs. Macdonald's brilliancy on the one side, and to Miss Stoddart's softness on the other. As for poor Grace, she breakfasted early with her governess, and was probably by this time deep in the nouns which have their termination in -um. Manuel brought in golden honey and hot rolls, strawberries and cream, and every body who chose went to the side-board for chicken and all the luxuries of a country breakfast.

"Mrs. Howard," said Fellowes, "how soon have I to go away?"

"What a dreadful question?" said Mr. Greyson. "I was just determining to stay forever."

"I have not slept before last night for a month," said Mrs. Macdonald.

"And I fear," said Mrs. Howard, "you will do little else but sleep here."

"Mrs. Macdonald has already murdered sleep," said Mr. Herries, "for me; I have not slept a wink since I saw her."

"Ah! you say that to me, but you look at Miss Stoddart," said Mrs. Macdonald.

While the gentlemen departed for their cigars, Mrs. Howard sat chatting with her lady guests—then took Helen Stoddart with her the rounds of the garden, the croquet ground, the pigeon-house, and the stables, into which they peeped to see if little White-Stocking, Mrs. Howard's mare, would do for Miss Stoddart's riding.

"I am a coward—a dreadful coward," lisped pretty Helen, just a little affectedly.

"Then Mr. Greyson, who says he likes riding, shall accompany you."

So they walked round to the quarters of Manuel and Monica, built away from the main building after the sensible Southern fashion, where Monica, in a towering yellow turban, received a few hints from Mrs. Howard as to the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker.

Meantime Mrs. Macdonald sat in the hall, in the most superlatively lovely costume of white and lilac ribbons, looking over the new books; and to her presently came in the still aromatic Greyson from his cigar.

"The scent of the roses," said she, laughing.

"Am I offensive?" said he, still carelessly advancing.

"By no means, although I like honey-suckle better."

Mr. Greyson atoned for his Havana by breaking her a spray of honey-suckle, and sitting down beside her, said,

"You did not tell me how beautiful she was."

"How could I, since she is so much more beautiful than any body?" said Rosa Macdonald, laughing.

"But I suspect these smooth, velvet women. They have no hearts, have they?"

"I shall not generalize. I have found very good kernels in all sorts of nuts."

"What is that but generalizing?"

"Here comes Grace. Good-morning, dear. What! Drawing-board in hand?"

"Yes, Mrs. Macdonald. Mamma likes to sit on the west piazza, and I bring my drawing there that she may see to me."

So the young girl proceeded to arrange her easel and pinned up the unfortunate horse's head. Mr. Greyson stepped behind her.

"You know the old Romans put a horse's head on their tombstones, don't you?" said he.

"Hence the term 'old horse?'" said naughty, slangy Grace.

"They started on a journey of which they did not know the end," said a voice, softly, behind the vines. Mr. Herries joined the group. Presently Mrs. Howard and Miss Stoddart came up the garden walk, and Mr. Fellowes opened the piano in the adjoining parlor. The ladies soon dropped into their seats, took out their crochet, descanted on the great social problem why crochet and croquet should sound so much alike, and why they and Bézique all jumped out of the ground together.

"Gunpowder and the Art of Printing, you know," said Mr. Greyson; "all great movements for the benefit of the human race are either dual or triune."

"Now what the mischief does that mean?" said Mr. Herries, softly, to Grace.

"Hush!" said Mrs. Howard, "listen to the music."

Mr. Fellowes was playing the "Spirito Gentil."

Miss Stoddart looked abstracted and romantic. Mrs. Macdonald slightly bored, Mrs. Howard perfectly tranquil, when Grace burst out with,

"Oh, my horse's head! Come here, mamma. It will be on my tombstone before long."

Mr. Herries crossed over to Mrs. Macdonald and engaged her in an animated talk over Maurice and Kingsley. Mr. Greyson talked in a low tone to Miss Stoddart, and looked at Mrs. Howard. Mr. Fellowes stopped playing and came out on the piazza.

Mr. Herries proposed reading a funny paper from a magazine, and at two o'clock when they separated to dress—a very little—for an early dinner, Mr. Greyson observed to his hostess that, if he who had said "Man never is, but always to be blest" had ever spent a morning on her piazza, he would have altered that immortal epigram, or have contradicted it forever.

The after-dinner drive at Estcourt Hall was as much of an institution as it is at Newport. Mrs. Howard, without fussiness and with every appearance of letting every body alone, always contrived that every body should be well paired and well accommodated for this, the great dissipation of the day. So Mr. Greyson found himself, he hardly knew why, booted and spurred to ride with Miss Stoddart. The rest of the party just filled the barouche.

"Did you ever see such a weird old negro as Manuel?" said Miss Stoddart.

"An African, I believe, brought from Cuba by Mr. Estcourt."

"Every thing is unusual here, isn't it?"

"Yes," said Mr. Greyson, "especially the Sleeping Beauty who presides."

"Do you call Mrs. Howard a sleepy beauty?" said Helen, mischievously.

"No. I called her a Sleeping Beauty."

"And you think she could be wakened?"

"I did not say so, Miss Stoddart."

Now White-Stoddarting was a gentle-going animal, and the afternoon was very lovely; Mr. Greyson was an attractive man, and Helen, Heaven forgive her! meant to do a little flirting on her own account. So, as men are but as wax in a woman's hands, Mr. Greyson found himself becoming tender and communicative, and Helen promised him in her turn a most interesting, overwhelming communication on Spiritualism.

The two parties stopped to look at a beautiful waterfall (Mrs. Howard had just twelve lions around Estcourt, and this was one; so she invited her guests for fourteen days, and letting Sundays take care of themselves, she showed a lion a day); and Mrs. Macdonald won Mr. Herries's heart by her ardent, appreciative love of nature and a happy quotation from Robert Browning.

At a late tea Mr. Greyson reminded Miss Stoddart of her spiritualistic communication, and she promised to tell the story in the parlor, "by the light of one candle."

"Then it is frightful, is it?" said Grace, with an agreeable shiver.

"No, not very; but a dim light becomes its complexion," said Helen.

Mr. Herries looked troubled; he did not like to have Grace's very precocious mind disturbed by any morbid experiences, and he hoped her mamma would send her to bed. Mrs. Howard seemed not to have heard a word of this conversation. She was talking across Mr. Fellowes to Mrs. Macdonald, of a certain Mrs. Appleby, who was making a great stir at Newport.

"They say," said Fellowes, "that she beats her husband, paints her cheeks, and drinks brandy and water."

"Oh, shocking!" said Mrs. Macdonald; "she is simply fast and foolish."

"I am avenged!" said Fellowes.

"I long," said Mrs. Howard, "to go once again to a watering-place to see these monsters, who are so courted to their faces and so abused behind their backs."

"You have promised to come, you know, to Cape Bender in August," said Mr. Fellowes.

After music and Bézique, Mr. Greyson solemnly blew out all the candles but one, and turned down the lamp to its lowest ebb.

"Now, Miss Stoddart," said he, looking around the miserably dismal parlor, "do your worst."

Mrs. Howard turned a little pale. "Not a ghost story, I hope?"

"No, a very curious fact in Spiritualism," said Miss Stoddart, gravely.

"About two years ago," she continued, "I was in very delicate health—"

"I do not doubt that," groaned Mr. Herries.

"And fell in with a medium, who promised to cure me. She was a young girl of my own age and full of intelligence. She could throw me into a trance, or go in one herself, with perfect ease. She could invoke the spirits of Byron, of Shelley, of Keats, and, indeed, one evening we felt sure we had a visit from Dante."

"Didn't he leave his card?" said Mr. Fellowes.

"Or at least turn down a leaf of the Inferno?" said Mr. Greyson.

"That is exactly what he did," said Miss Stoddart, solemnly.

"At last, however, getting tired of the poets, I said to my friend, 'Now I am going to my room and to my port-folio; I shall bring down a letter in my hand, and you shall tell me who it is from.' As I went up stairs I determined to get the letter of a young cousin of mine who was foully murdered by robbers in Texas, and as we never knew exactly how he fell, I hoped that my friend would be able to tell me.

"I came down stairs to find my friend in a trance. The intense sympathy of our two minds had already informed her of what I was thinking, and she was already following the track of my murdered cousin. She talked of vast arid plains which he had ridden across, and of the fertile beauty which now surrounded him. All at once she grew pale, and trembled violently.

"'They are after him,' she said, 'those gamblers from the hotel at San Antonio. They saw him put money in his belt; he is lost, he is lost!' Then again her speech disappeared in inarticulate murmurings. 'Ride faster,' said she, 'ride faster, ride faster!' At this moment she gave a loud scream and sunk on the floor."

As Miss Stoddart said these words a shriek, wilder and more wonderful than that which she described, sounded in their ears. Again it came, as yesterday at noon, so now at night. The effect was horrible. Miss Stoddart was the most composed of the party, for she fed on shrieks, but Mrs. Macdonald was pale and trembling, and Mrs. Howard was found in a dead faint in her chair, with poor little Grace in tears kneeling before her.

As soon as the waiting-maids and flaçons arrived the gentlemen departed to search again the grounds and shrubberies. Mr. Herries and Mr. Greyson took their good-night pipe together after the decks were cleared, and talked it over.

"It is an owl, a maniac, or a rogue," said Mr. Herries.

"But our hostess does not believe in the supernatural, does she?" said Mr. Greyson.

"Every woman does," answered Herries.

III.

The next morning every one had recovered from the fright but Mrs. Howard. She and Grace had heard these shrieks before, and they had presaged death.

The tact of Mr. Greyson was never more amiably displayed than on this morning as he tried to chase the shadows from the beautiful brow of Constance. He engaged Mrs. Macdonald in a brilliant wordy fight over social ethics, and quoted gay little paragraphs from his letters. Every body wrote to Mr. Greyson (and he to every body, on the most fastidious paper, all monogram and heraldic device), and he knew all that was going in the fashionable world.

"They say Mrs. Appleby and Finny the gambler are having a great flirtation at Cape Bender," said Mr. Greyson.

"Dreadful!" said Rosa Macdonald.

"And yet you women take up with these men whom we would not speak to, and expect us to enter the lists and contaminate ourselves by worshiping at the same altar!" said Greyson.

"Physician, heal thyself," said Mrs. Macdonald. "When I see you men pay us women the compliment of keeping yourselves free and clear, even in public, from entangling alliances with women whom you abuse most plentifully to us in private, I will forgive Mrs. Appleby if she draws even the admirable William Greyson into the net where she keeps all her queer fish."

Miss Stoddart began to consider her visit to Estecourt as a failure. It was very evident that Mr. Greyson was deeply in love with Mrs. Howard. A moonlight night and a late drive in the basket-wagon had brought them to a very confidential pass. Certainly, Rosa Macdonald was enchanted. Mr. Greyson was a fascinating man, a very commanding man in many ways. He had excellent blood in his veins, and had felt the fine spur of necessity for exertion in his youth, had conquered fortune, and now stood on the heights of intellectual and professional eminence, a man any woman might be proud to win. He had, too, a deference for the sex, which is almost a lost art now, like that of "Majolica." Even the place where respect for women is taught is almost swept from the earth.

Mr. Greyson had some weaknesses, too. He was very easily imposed on by women. A bad nature in woman was a thing which he believed in only in theory. So the worldly, the venal, the insincere, and false, had him much in their power, as they have every generous and superior man. He had another weakness not quite so noble as this. He was proud of that shadow of a shade, a reputation for success with women.

So between his generosity and his weakness Rosa Macdonald, who had a most sincere friendship for him without love, had a very hard time, and determined to marry him off without delay to a woman who was in every way his equal, and perhaps in some things his superior.

"You will write me," he said to Constance; "I do not need to be told that you write beautiful letters."

"Yes, I shall perhaps write you. Yet we meet so soon at Cape Bender."

"But the charm of a letter! You would not deprive me of the delight of seeing in black and white that you do not exactly hold me in disdain?"

"I shall write you," said Constance, raising a pair of beautifully brilliant gray eyes, and turning their splendor full upon him.

Thus they parted. There was no engagement; yet Constance had given her heart fully to this earnest, passionate, pleading man, who had told her often enough that he loved her. Not alone by words, but by the more subtle language of lovers, which has never been written down.

A few days after leaving Estcourt Mr. Greyson wrote Constance the following letter:

"MY DEAR CONSTANCE,—It seems a great leap for me to make, to address you by your Christian name! You, so beautiful, so distinguished, so far from me. You, whom men dare not approach; so coldly fair, so proudly fair. What does the poet say? You know, for you know all the poets, and are one yourself (though you never will make me a Browningite, so don't try). And yet can I call you anything else? Can I begin stupidly, 'My dear Mrs. Howard, we had a delightful visit at your house, and I thank you for your hospitality.' No, I can not; for I am going to demand a still more generous hospitality; I want you to take me into your heart, as you did into your house. I want to be your friend, your treasured and important friend—never to be turned out, winter or summer; never to be regarded as a nuisance rainy days; never to be refused because the house is too full for me. And, oh! never to be frozen because it is cold!

"I feel that it would be an impertinence to say more now. You know me so little; I am so unworthy of a woman like you, the like of whom I never saw. I will not praise your beauty, that is patent to all men's eyes; but where did you get your knowledge, your elegant conversation, and your manners of entire and perfect polish? Let me tell you this last is a very rare gift for our countrywomen. And, above all, I have read the verses and the sketches you lent me, by which I see you are an authoress of no common power; my dear friend, you are a 'lusus naturæ.' Clever without pretense, beautiful without vanity. Learned and yet no pedant! Was ever woman like to this? Yes, she is young, and her name is Constance! She has been married; yet I believe her heart has yet to awaken to its truest and its first love.

"I was very 'distract' all the way down, as you may imagine. Miss Stoddard said I was sleepy, Mrs. Macdonald said I was stupid. In fact I was sad and jealous. Do you know I hate that parson fellow, that hanger-on of yours, a very sly Cream Cheese that. Do you know I think he is too authoritative and dictatorial in your house? Unless, indeed, its fair mistress has given him a hope, which he evidently wishes to believe she has, that he may sometime be its master.

"I beg of you, Constance, not to be so kind to him if you do not love him. Your manners are singularly flattering, make them cold to all the world but me.

"Here I am lecturing you as if we had been married a year! Gracious Powers! How dare I say that!

"Write me, I beg of you, Fair Lady! at Effingham, whither I go for a week before we meet (I think you said the 12th of August) at Cape Bender.

"I am—I know not what—your slave, your friend, your—at any rate—Yours,

"WILLIAM GREYSON."

As Constance Howard finished this letter she dropped it into her lap, as many a woman has done before her, and felt an aching void at her heart. It had said a great deal, but it had not said what she wanted said. It was unsatisfactory in the depth of feeling. As she read it again (for the fiftieth time) under her favorite tree, down by the river, she felt that she was a most unreasonable woman not to have liked it wholly.

The next day she got a little book from Mr. Greyson. The next day two or three lines in pencil written in a railroad dépôt.

Strange to say these pleased her more than the letter. The third day nothing; and that day seemed six weeks long. So she determined to answer the letter:

"DEAR MR. GREYSON,—Many thanks for the long letter, the book, the few penciled words from Bentley Station; you know Estcourt Manor, and can well imagine the stillness (that could be felt or cut with a knife) which settled down on us after you left. Even Mr. Herries (whom you abuse most unwarrantably, and who had hated to have you come) was very hard to rouse after you left. I took a long walk with Gracey and him through the Silent Way (that walk you so much admired), and I assure you we said little to deprive it of its title.

"How very nicely that man writes (of course I am thinking of Arthur Helps, not of you) whose book you have sent me! yet there are but three writers who really move me much in the present day, and one of them writes only letters.

"It would be absurd of me to pass over all your gorgeous description of me. All the more pleasing to me that I know it is not true, but only the glamour you throw over every thing that is called woman! You see Rosa has betrayed you! I do not so willingly forget the long talks we had together; the confidences you saw fit to make me, and those you drew from me, are a bond of future friendship. We seem to have been friends for years, yet what do we know of each other in such little matters as—say temper—principles—in fact every thing?

"My friend Browning says—but you don't like him, so I will not quote him. I am sorry to see by your note in pencil that you are not well. Do take care of your cough. These summer influenzas are no trifles.

"Adieu! we shall soon meet.

"Your friend, CONSTANCE HOWARD."

Mr. Greyson to Mrs. Howard:

"What a cold and almost contemptuous note you wrote me! Yet how charmingly you write! Dreadful woman, where do you keep the fire which sometimes plays in your eyes! In one week now we shall meet. 'Come to these yellow sands.' In the mean time others talk of you, but I think a great deal. Yours, W. G."

Mrs. Howard to Mr. Greyson:

"I shall arrive with Gracey, Manuel, horses, carriages, lady's maid, and considerably more dust than any thing else, to-morrow at Cape Bender. Please notify my host, as we call the landlords in this country, or more properly the inn-keeper, of my arrival, and please be invisible yourself until the dust has been brushed off.

"So my letter was cold! You can not make any such complaint against the weather, and do remember (since you do not like Browning) the lines of a great poet:

"There's both passion and pride

In our sex, she replied,
And this (could I gratify both) would I do,
An angel appear to all others beside,
But still be a woman to you."

"Truly yours, in a desperate hurry,

"CONSTANCE HOWARD."

When Mrs. Howard's carriage drove up to the long, low, rambling piazza at Cape Bender, the usual group of idlers came forward to inspect the newly arrived. She was greeted soon by Mr. Fellowes and other acquaintances, but no Mr. Greyson appeared. She had not intended to be obeyed on this point, and was disappointed and a little angry, when he was seen slowly approaching the group where she stood. As soon as he could, without attracting attention, he drew near and took her hand in both of his. It was a way he had when fond of a person, and it spoke volumes. As he did so, so quietly and unostentatiously that it would not have been observed by any but the persons engaged in the act, Mrs. Howard became aware of a pair of basilisk black eyes, a pair of heavily rouged cheeks, and a scent of patchouli very near her. She looked up to catch an expression on a woman's face which seemed like a curse. A tall, well-dressed woman was watching Mr. Greyson and herself with the mingled ferocity and cunning of a tigress.

At dinner Mrs. Howard appeared in soft white robes, fresh and lovely and simple as ever; and perhaps she was not quite unmoved by the murmur of admiration which went through the dining-hall as Manuel, with some ostentation, preceded Gracey and herself to their places at the long table-d'hôte. In two days Mrs. Howard was unanimously voted at Cape Bender as the most attractive woman of the season.

IV.

Now there are two ways of being the "most attractive woman" at a watering-place. The ladies and gentlemen are one thing, and the fast men and dubious ladies are another. Mrs. Howard had the first on her side. Mrs. Appleby had the second on hers. Mrs. Appleby was the rouged basilisk, Mrs. Howard was the gentle dove. Yet the gentle dove had the wisdom of the serpent; she also had beauty and youth, which are good weapons for gentle doves, and help them along amazingly. So there was the spectacle offered of a very pretty "fight"—a "fight," mind you, in which one party played only the defensive.

Mrs. Appleby sought an introduction to Mrs. Howard, and covered her with endearments. She praised her beauty, her wit, her cleverness, but she abused her maid. Such hair-dressing, such dreadful gowns, such shocking taste! Finny, the gambler, agreed with Mrs. Appleby that Mrs. Howard had "no style."

Then came in another casus belli. Mr. Tom Truefit, the great millionaire from Boston, who had been having a great flirtation with Mrs. Appleby, incontinently deserted her and went over to Mrs. Howard; left off his flashy waistcoat, and begged Mrs. Howard to make a party for his yacht: in fact behaved very badly to Mrs. Appleby.

So Mrs. Appleby let loose the dogs of war and attacked Mr. Greyson.

For the first few days Mr. Greyson had been devotedly at Mrs. Howard's side. They had driven together, walked, talked, and, in the language of watering-places, had "flirted." Tom Truefit was in despair, and declared that Greyson was a little, undersized, beggarly lawyer, who could not pay his boot-bill.

But those days to Constance! How sweet, how memorable they were! How fondly did Greyson unfold his future plans to her, as he had unfolded his past experience! How deeply he seemed to love her, how proudly approach the admired and distinguished woman as if she were his own! As they drove through the fresh sea-breeze how admirably he marked her deepening color; how he never tired of praising that complexion which he said she had obtained in some fraudulent manner from a sea-shell!

Nor will he ever forget the eloquent face that looked fondly into his. It was a virgin heart, in spite of her experience. It was a fresh mind though richly stored. She was in love for the first time. He had found the key to unlock this treasure-house, and she gave him the precious jewel of a pure and good woman's love.

She was so good, so true, and so unworldly that she did not hear the serpents hissing about her, she did not know the clouds which encompassed her.

The first—"no bigger than a man's hand"—was the disappearance of Mr. Greyson with Mrs. Appleby one fine evening when he had asked Mrs. Howard to meet him on the piazza for a talk. It went on. Mr. Greyson began to explain, to say, "I can say no more as a gentleman;" giving the idea that Mrs. Appleby made such violent love that he could not quite put her off.

Constance gave him a look as if he had struck her. He had, in a most vital part.

It is not in woman to show defeat. She was never more beautiful nor more brilliant than the last evening of her stay at Cape Bender. The guests of the house gave a fancy ball. Mrs. Howard for once forsook the plain and simple dress which most became her, and unlocking her stores of rich jewelry came out as a marquise. Mrs. Appleby came as a Circassian, with short dress and Turkish trowsers; Mr. Greyson as a monk, and Mr. Fellowes as a dervish. Tom Truefit assumed the character of a Mephistopheles, instead of coming as he should as Cæsus.

Tom followed Mrs. Howard like her shadow as she came in, radiant, on the arm of Mr. Greyson. She dropped his arm as he led her to her place. Then said Greyson:

"You will grace my supper to-night, Constance?"

"No," she answered.

"How, then, have I offended you?"

V.

Reader, I once saw a beautiful child, a boy of five years, standing in a doorway in crowded Broadway. He was so pretty, with his golden curls, that I stopped to admire him. As I did so I saw a virago come down stairs quickly and strike him a heavy blow! He turned and looked at her (I am afraid she was his mother) with such an expression of grieved surprise (for he had done nothing wrong) that I felt the indignant blood rush to my cheeks, and hot tears filled my eyes. And yet what could I do? What can any of us do against this world-wide, this undying injustice?

And just such a look of "grieved surprise" did Constance Howard give to the man who, stealing into her heart—that noble, true, and loving heart—had used the position to break it.

The beautiful Mrs. Howard went next morning in a blaze of glory. All the beaux "saw her off," and she departed smiling and gayly.

It was attributed to that certain miasma which does arise at Cape Bender occasionally, the long and fearful illness which Mrs. Howard suffered after leaving there. She recovered without loss of beauty, but there is a veil of sorrowful reserve about her still.

As for Mrs. Appleby, she has gone to her own place. Found out and disgraced, there are "none so poor to do reverence." Even the butterflies of fashion have deserted her, and she begins to fight with feeble arm the one losing battle, when reputation has fled, of watering-place "belleship."

When Rosa Macdonald met Mr. Greyson again she said, grimly:

"Oh, fool! and for Mrs. Appleby!"

"Do not say so," said Greyson. "You can not know how much I loved Constance, how I valued her friendship, her love! I have lost it: it is enough!"

The "shrieks" were Manuel's. As a West Indian negro he had a right to "second-sight," and had frequently "bayed the moon" when he deemed any misfortune approaching. He confessed, while Mrs. Howard was very ill, to Gracey his share in the "warnings," and had fully repented of his sins, when he fell in an epileptic fit, and died before he could be scolded.

Miss Stoddard, however, has never adopted this story. She still adds the "shriek" to her other narrations, as a brilliant and telling point.

A RESULT OF "THE LAMBETH CASUAL."

I.

THIS day fortnight Phibbs invited to dine with him at Delmonico's Badger, Foxglove, and myself. I am Simeon Storker. It was the upper Delmonico's—the Fifth Avenue Mansion—where Phibbs appointed rendezvous, and the hour was 6 P.M. I have known Phibbs for a number of years, slightly. I now know him better than ever; but I shall continue to know him slightly hereafter. Phibbs has a very taking way with him. He would sell his grandmother, if he had one; or play practical jokes on President Buchanan. Yet his manners are so bland, his conversation so alluring, that you can't keep out of the fellow's society, though you're provoked with him half the time. Not that this dinner was any joke. No—far from it. A reality, vividly enjoyed, but momentous in its consequences!

We sat down, at a handsome table in a private room, to Mill-ponds on the half-shell, turtle-soup, Spanish mackerel, ortolanes en écaille, lamb and pease, game-pie, and a dessert of the finest pastry, fruit, confections, and conserves. Our wines all the way through, and our coffee and chasse-café, were beyond praise. Phibbs has many talents as a host; among the rest—money.

Taking our cigars (the wine and brandy, by accident, being left on the table) we played a few games of whist, and may have drank a little. Whist tiring we renewed our cigars, and sat talking together upon various congenial subjects—eventually upon literature. We have none of us ever been in the literary way—this way, you know—until I this day put pen to paper, that I might record grievances indeed worthy of a voice. Still we have always been devoted to literature en amateur. As we conversed we may have drank a little again. Presently said Phibbs, between puffs:

"I see the Harpers have a book out by Greenough."

"An autobiography of Greenough the sculptor?" asked Badger.

"No; another man entirely. A book by James Greenough—no, by-the-way, his name is Greenwood—one of the best boys' books of adventure since Robinson Crusoe—Reuben Davidger by name."

"Well, who's James Greenwood?" asked Foxglove.

"Why, don't you know the man that wrote 'The Lambeth Casual'?"

"Oh!" "Ah!" "Aw!" said we, severally, for all had read "The Lambeth Casual," and knew him as well as Dick Turpin, Benjamin Franklin, or the Town Pump. Knew how he went in a "cabrioly," and jumped out on the wrong side, and was discovered with as little thatch as complies with the statutes regulating decency outside the Lambeth Palace of the poor. How he was taken in—or rather, taken up, for the welcome of the poor looks much like an arrest. How he went into the greasy puddle, to see what foulness human nature can contract in a great town. How he pigged in with the poorest, accepting the loaf and making it over to a chum. How he came home and wrote about it. If he did it because he wanted to study the poor for their own sake, he was a philanthropist; if from motives of curiosity, an experimentalist; but, from any point of view, a clever writer. Yes, of course, we had all read "The Lambeth Casual."

"Let us drink to him," said Phibbs.

So we drank to him—confound him!

Then followed considerable enthusiasm—a finding of hats—a lighting of fresh cigars—a last drink of the evening—and our exit from Delmonico's, two by two.

It was, I thought, a balmy night—though I have since heard that it rained all the time—and the moon was shedding her radiance on tower and tree, unless I labor under a misapprehension. I know that I called Badger's attention to the effect of some moonlight on the New York Club steps. Foxglove, who always insists on being ridiculous, would explain it by gas and a wet scraper; but Badger said it was beautiful. I did not call Phibbs's attention to it, because I was convinced he was intoxicated, and wouldn't appreciate the subject. I know, for my part, that a walk never began more pleasantly. We were going up Fifth Avenue, and had not finally decided whether to stop at the Forty-second Street Reservoir and ask the man in the wall for lodgings, on the ground that we were members of the Croton Board, or continue on to the Central Park, and see the sun rise over Williamsburg. "Weehawken, you mean!" said Foxglove. "Oh! of course—I beg your pardon. I was thinking of where it set!" Then I began to think that Foxglove had taken too much. But every thing was orderly, and no one would have noticed any thing if it hadn't been for that Phibbs. Just as he got in front of Saint Shanghai Phibbs stopped, with the reflected gleam of gas and wet marble irradiating an already cheerful face, and said:

"I'll tell you what let's do. Let's be philanthropists! You have thought me morose, perhaps—perhaps overcome of wine; 'twas not so. I spoke not during our walk thus far, because I was thinking that the work of other Lambeth Casuals is needed. The field is not all reaped yet. Let us begin to reap the rest. Let us examine all the different institutions by personal inspection."

"The institutions of our beloved land!" said Foxglove.

"Just so. Who's an orphan here?"

Badger, who was thirty years old and bereft of rich parents in infancy, in a voice of deep emotion said he was.

"Then you go up to the Orphan Asylum, and demand admission on that distinct ground."

"I will," said Badger, feelingly. "I'm one of the people, taxed for the institution, and an orphan—threefold claim. An orphan—a melancholy orphan! I will go directly!"

"Hold on, Badger!" said Phibbs; "let's all start even. See what to do with the rest of us. Is there any body here who possesses marked dramatic talent?"

"I have," says Foxglove, stepping forward with alacrity (just his cheek!). "When I was a little boy I once thought of running away with a circus!"

"Why, you precocious villain! How did you hope to succeed in such a grand larceny?"

"I mean in letting a circus run away with me. Avoiding that error, I grew up with a fancy for amateur theatricals, and in my life I have played many parts—hm!"

"Were you ever the manager of an Amateur Theatrical Company?"

"I was, Sir; and played Faulkner in the Rivals."

"Then you're the very man I want! Go to Dr. Dinkie's Asylum in —th Street, feign madness, be admitted, and see how the insane fare. Then return and write about it. You can unite your report with Badger's 'Interior of an Orphan Asylum.'"

"No, I think I shall publish it as a separate pamphlet—if I go—"

"Besides, think how it will cultivate your dramatic nature! What fire, ease, and grace will hereafter characterize your stage insanity (take your Lear, to wit) after you have studied the genuine variety on the spot. Why, you don't fear that you can't counterfeit madness, do you?"

"Oh no! no! nothing of the kind! I've played Meg Merrilies, and I read Ophelia so as to bring tears. What are you going to be?"

"I'll choose pretty soon. I'm trying to decide between several fields of usefulness. Now that you're going to Dr. Dinkie's, and Badger to the Orphan Asylum, I think, on the whole, Storker had better try the Station-House. That's an institution which decidedly needs looking after, for it possesses a power capable of great evil if wrongly managed. Go you, Storker, and see if there are not some miserable captives lodged in the secret dungeons of the Precinct, and if there be, lead them forth and show their wrongs the light of public opinion! Why, your book (or your pamphlet, if you wish to be more terse) will be the most interesting one of the four."

"Do you think so?" said I, in a bewildered manner.

"Yes, indeed! and I'll tell you how we'll manage it. We'll wait till we get in sight of a policeman, then you shall knock off my hat; he will arrest you; you'll be taken to the Station-House; you'll pass the night there; you'll be brought up in the morning, and when you're discharged you've seen more of life at a less expense than you could in any other way on the continent. But first let us walk up and leave Badger at the Orphan Asylum."

I don't remember what Asylum it was; somewhere near Central Park, but in a locality which seldom echoes to human footfall night or day, and peels its flags with astonishment at the boot of a stranger. It was in a respectable but semi-pastoral outskirts where orphans would be likely to grow up with a theory that the cruel world mainly consisted of goats. I remember there was some discussion as to whether this was a whole or a half orphan asylum; Foxglove, absurdly as usual, declaring, in his theatrical way, that if the latter were the case Badger could not hope to gain admittance, while Badger as stoutly urged, Phibbs supporting him, that if it was a half-orphan Asylum he, on the strength of double bereavement, should demand a large room to himself without any other orphan in it, and two beds. To end the discussion he scrambled up the steps and rang the bell till a venerable-looking priest came to the door with slippers and in uncanonical muslin. He evidently regarded Badger with surprise—to which the hour might be conducive, St. Shanghai having just gone 12. But seeing a person of gentlemanly bearing who desired an interview with him at once upon matters of paramount importance, he admitted Badger; and on our saying we wouldn't come in, having merely stopped to drop our friend, he bade us good-night and shut the door.

We then went across town for the purpose of conducting Foxglove to his Asylum. At a restaurant, before reaching the place, we took a dozen Shrewsbury's apiece on the half-shell—to correct their over-refrigerant effect, joining each other in a light punch afterward. Fifteen minutes afterward we left Foxglove in the keeper's hands as we had Badger in the priest's; Phibbs remarking that we lived in the immediate vicinity—giving a number unknown to the Directory—would be over in the morning to see the Doctor; wouldn't trouble him to-night; but a paroxysm had come on, we had lost control, and were afraid the lunatic wouldn't keep till to-morrow morning—the effect of which was greatly increased by Foxglove's saying, in the most patronizing manner, to the man,

"Oh, it's all a joke you know, my fine fellow—I'm doing it on purpose—I'm no more crazy than you are! Come to-morrow sure, Phibbs?"

"Oh yes! we know! we know! Now I'm sure you'll come along like a good little gentleman." And so saying the keeper took Foxglove over to the ward under his arm like a deranged parcel, he meanwhile laughing at us, beckoning to us, and particularly dwelling on the fact that we were to call for him in the morning and make it all right.

It was nearly one o'clock when we crossed Fourteenth Street on our way down the Avenue; and the morning air ought to have brought enough coolness with it to keep me from doing the dreadfully rash thing that Phibbs had proposed. But the fact was, we'd been talking about that confounded "Lambeth Casual" all the way from the last asylum; and to the enthusiasm of his example alone do I ascribe an imprudence which could not have originated from exhilaration, as I had drunk very little all the evening. I, a family man, too, who ought to have known better at my time of life! But—Well, the first policeman we saw after getting off the cars stood on the Brevoort House corner. He was looking straight at us, the way those fellows always do at that time of night, as if you were the very figure for an arrest, and he possessed private information of a complete set of housebreaker's tools in your coat-tails, besides matches for arson in your vest-pocket.

"Now!" said Phibbs, "could any thing be more fortunate? It will be instantaneous! Now, a good one at the hat, and then I'll run!"

It was an evil moment—I consented, and smote. Phibbs ran, the policeman came over and took charge of me. I felt myself led along by a silent power in blue, whose tactile sense of the distinction between coat-sleeve and skin was so undeveloped that when a Cuvier arises for policemen this animal will occupy a place among the zoophytes. He went on a few steps, and seeing that Phibbs did not follow, halted and called,

"Comerlong!"

"I haven't time to-night—just as much obliged," answered Phibbs, politely, from a distant, but not inaudible, sidewalk. "My friend will see you home."

"If I had another man here I'd fetch ye!" returned the blue power. "Whoser goin' to complain against this here case of assault? What's yer name, and where do ye live?"

"I'm afraid to mention my name aloud in the street—just in by steamer—citizens don't know I've arrived—'fraid they'd get up and give me a torch-light procession—never like to give trouble."

"Where d'ye live, I say?"

"On the Hook, near Walker—business office at the corner of Root-Hog and Dey—see my name on the scuttle. Good-night, my boy! Glorious career before you—all right in the morning!"

"What institution are you going to investigate?" cried I to Phibbs, feeling the first vacillation in my purpose, as he walked away and left me alone with the power in blue.

"Oh!" cried Phibbs, "I've decided to devote myself to Home Missions. Weep not for me. I always was self-denying. Stick it out, old boy! We'll make it all right in the morning. Good-night!"

And the echo of Phibbs's boot-heels grew fainter and fainter till they were lost in the low hum of the more eastern avenues.

I will now succinctly narrate what befell Badger, Foxglove, and Myself. And first, Myself.

II.

Before I could say Jack Robinson, whose name was a synonym for curtness utterly incommensurate with my policeman, I found myself in the presence of a disagreeably large man, also in blue, and was dazzled as well as pervaded by an atmosphere seemingly compounded in equal portions of gilt buttons, cold soup, and gas. The disagreeably large man stood inside a low cage of oak slats which looked terribly insecure, and as if at any time, thinking of his native jungle, he might break forth and arrest a small boy before help could arrive. He looked at me with the same satisfaction that one of the tawny Numidians, lashing his tail behind the den-bars of the Colosseum, looked on a fat Christian led past by the jailers of Imperial Rome. There was a pleasant hope that it was Burglary expressed in his eye; and in his pen, taken with alacrity, I could already perceive a nervous twitching to write the initial B of that crime in the charge-book.

"Assault—knocked gentleman's hat off—refused to complain—ran away—prisoner been drinking."

"Assault aggravated?" asked the tall man, snatching at a last straw to make a hardened case of me.

"Well—skasely," replied the silent power in blue.

The tall man looked at me with such disgust as the Numidian lion would have bestowed had he discovered, on overhauling the Christian, that he padded, and was but poor picking after all.

"In liquor and fighting," said the tall man, blotting that charge on the book with a dejected air. "Take him down!"

He waved his hand. The silent power in blue, remorseless as a Remora, once more established connections with me, and I perceived myself approaching a grated door. The door opened with a very unpleasant lock-ey sound—the atmosphere began losing in buttons and gas, but gained decidedly in cold soup. We descended a pair of cellar stairs, to a white-washed hall of contracted dimensions, like a Greenwood vault, fitted up with state-rooms, and into one of the state-rooms I was conducted, with instructions "if I wanted to sleep to lie down there!"

I looked to see where "there" was, and beheld a shelf rather smaller than my coffin will be, for I weigh 205, and a man doesn't usually turn round and run to lean after he's forty. Still, reasoning that it was high time to go to bed, and knowing that en philosophe was the only way to treat the matter, I lay down sideways, and thought of General Grant and Robert Bruce's spider, to keep my mind steady and the part of me that still projected from toppling over.

I soon discovered that I was not alone. An insolent person in the state-room on the right, whom I afterward confidentially learned from himself to be the celebrated Cow-heeled Thompson, and in quod for "pushing queer" on a "yokel"—whatever those may be—asked me if I had a piano in my room, and would I sing "Jolly Red Nose" in that same sweet voice which used to warble at Sing Sing? On the other side of me was a young man who amused himself during the entire night in framing such elaborate and curiously polished imprecations upon the entire police force, with all their uncles, aunts, and second cousins, that I had to allow the accuracy of the comment made by a Western man in the third cell, under a charge similar to my own. After listening to the youthful Demosthenes for ten minutes, he said, through his bars:

"Wa'al, stranger, if them rams'-horns had failed, I'd hev advised them to get you to go an' give one good cuss at Jericho!"

During the night other occupants were gradually added to our cemetery, and before the glow-worm of the gas-jet in the hall had paled its ineffectual ray we were entirely full.

I had slept in the Tyrol and at Mooshead on ground as hard as my present floor, but that piece of deal whereon I now lay was the hardest thing I ever slept on. The ground has little indentations and protuberances; if you can manage to fit your own hard places into the one, and your soft places into the other, after a day's hunting, you never miss a mattress. But oh, that plank!—merciless to a Nonconformist as Laud himself! Compromising nothing with your most cherished elbow-joint—making no allowance for shoulder-blades—and so harshly abrading the side of your hip-bone, that in the morning you can only say, "Ilum fuit!" It is a black and blue jelly now!

After an hour of torture on my part, during which I acquired experience which to this day makes me pity cold chickens in a safe and plates on a dresser, some keeper, moved by an impulse conclusive to my mind of secret membership in the Humane Society unrevealed to his superiors, lest he should be expelled from the force, came down to my door and pushed a horse-rug through the bars, saying, "We don't give that to every body!" It looked as if they did, but I refrained from saying so, because I was gratified at the man's prompt recognition of the fact, known by all my intimate friends, that I'm scarcely what you'd call an ordinary person. I thanked the man, and only refrained from giving him twenty-five cents because it might have hurt his feelings and made him think I wanted to bribe him.

I padded all my most aggravating projections with the horse-blanket as well as I could, and with my rolled-up coat for a pillow again addressed myself to sleep. Enough light came from the gas-jet into my niche to show the spots on the wall—so I counted them. Then I thought of Pestal, but being unfortunately ignorant of musical notation, had to abandon the idea of a Lay on the wall. I traveled from Pestal to Baron Trenck, and wondered what he would have done in a room like mine, without mouse or mouse-hole. I compared myself to Richard Cœur de Lion—but instead of Blondel there was a dripping Croton pipe outside my door to make music for me. I thought of Louis Napoleon in Ham, and compared him to that other trichina in ham—the German nation swallows the one, the French nation the other; in both cases the effect on muscularity is the same, and unless the parasite gets Père-la-Chaîné in a stout capsule, the patient dies in great agony. I thought of Ethan Allen in his cage, and, with a look at my bars, envied the teeth that bit nails in two. I could have pitied Jeff Davis—if I hadn't read his bill of fare in the Times.

Then passed through my mind thoughts of captives groaning out their souls in the Hunger-Hole of Hans Von Stein, but for me no Othmill came; I saw the Vizier in his lofty tower, but at my base knelt no loving wife with the friendly beetle, the rope, the twine, the silken thread, and the nose-anointing gher. Ah, Mrs. Storker! Estimable woman, partner of my bosom, could you but see your unhappy husband now! Of little avail, in case like mine, were pack-thread and buttered beetles! Who can assist a man to descend safely from a cellar window? and on those bars of what use were any beetles without a wedge? Alas! my Susan, was it for this that your own fair hands ironed my shirt-frill? Could you have seen the bland starch with which I started forth wilting under the dungeon damp where I brought up—could you have beheld this board musing the back-hair over whose parting you watched solicitously, as the benign gods over that of Hector and Andromache, what adequate expression could you have found, even with your usual excellent command of English, O most endeared and accomplished female!

Happily she had no idea where I was. A cold chill came over me! Would she not know to-morrow? Would there be any reporters in court? Would it be in the papers? Ha! I might give an assumed name!—I would—I must! But what if any one should recognize me? It is this which constitutes the Terrible! Oh, that Lambeth Casual! Oh, that Phibbs!

Sleep and sweet dreams come to the relief of my exhausted frame. When I wake it is six o'clock—simultaneously a gray light breaks through the barred window and a blue policeman through the barred door.

I am ushered up stairs again. I wash my face in a basin which, under inspection of at least two senses, favors a conviction that it is interchangeably used for this purpose and as a tureen for the cold soup before referred to. I mention soap, but the idea seems so ridiculous to the Metropolitan mind that I feel mortified, and withdraw the expression. Happily I carry a pocket-comb, but, as I use it, can not avoid seeing discontent on the Metropolitan face at the weakness of a city government which permits a person under arrest to use such a luxury, the majesty of the law jeopardizing its vindication by allowing a prisoner the advantage which lies in smooth hair, and never being safe unless a well-developed black-eye exists to divert the current of popular sympathy, while nothing but a red nose and two teeth knocked out can be said wholly to satisfy the stern ends of justice. Lacking these corroborations of my hardened condition, I felt myself the object of severe Metropolitan displeasure.

Brushing from my black dress-suit with my handkerchief such dungeon-dust as I could reach I sallied forth in a policeman's company, congratulating myself with all my heart that I had never made the acquaintance of more than half a dozen early risers. Though I trembled at every corner lest I should be surprised by somebody I knew, I got to Jefferson Market unrecognized, and drew a long sigh of relief as I went up stairs, and through a very sparsely-occupied court-room, past the Justice's seat, and by a green door into the room where the recent arrests sit till called for.

I must not omit to say that upon being asked for my name I had given that of John Smith. This, to be sure, was not a very original proceeding. But how absurd it looks to see an the police reports (if it came to that) Mortimer Herbert or Sidney Clarendon brought up for appropriation of tea-spoons! You'd have known they were prigs from their sensation-novel names if you hadn't heard a word about the spoons. So it seemed to me that the wisest course was to call myself just what I did. It was non-committal. No one could pretend to swear it was assumed, and yet there was a chance in my favor which, combined with my well-known impressive carriage, could not fail to have its weight with the Judge. I might be some eminent man hiding a lark of genius beneath the mantle of John Smith. All this flashed through my mind in an instant when the demand was made for my name, and instantaneous as was the process it still further included a recollection how a certain John Smith, whom boys love next to Robinson Crusoe among the heroes of adventure, was also the most fortunate of captives, getting out of scrapes with an ease, if possible, more marvelous than that with which he got into them, and never making a serious miss but once in his life—when he let Rolfe get Pocahontas instead of taking her himself.

The room which I entered through the green door had an aisle running down its middle, with pews on each side of it capable of accommodating three people apiece, if the attraction had been of the nature to draw a large house. The room was about thirty feet long by twelve broad, was lighted on one side by barred windows, and looked altogether like some poor relation of a Quaker meeting-house which had married out of the Society, and, falling upon evil times or bad habits, was finally driven to consort with Cow-heeled Thompson or other hardened persons like John Smith. I can make that last remark in a tone of cool irony now, but thinking what Susan would say at the time I ground my teeth after a manner which, had Phibbs been present, would have chilled him to the bone.

As the door closed behind me I was welcomed by an audience large but discriminating. Their sense of the ludicrous was keen—a talent which I was happy to observe among the lower classes. It especially struck them that I should have put on my best clothes to be arrested in, and numerous offers were made to me for the usufruct of the suit during the period that, as I was congratulated, nothing but striped breeches would be the fashion with me. I was also invited to leave my watch until I returned, on the ground that them keepers steal so dreadful at Sing Sing. Moreover, the fact that I was evidently a man of position, family, and mature years, so far from inspiring a feeling of reverence with these people, rather added to their merriment. A high hat which I wore, being of white felt, led me at first to be mistaken for Mr. Greeley; but a gentleman who was in for stealing cabbages, and afterward acquitted on the ground of having a mania for vegetables, corrected the mistake of the audience, saying that he knew the philosopher well, and had often sat in convention with him.

The shouts of welcome ceased as I selected my seat, and in a dignified but not haughty manner sat down in it. I rested my elbow on the pew-back, and, head on hand, began making a study of my neighbors.

All colors were represented there, from the freshest Saxon pink and white to the sootiest Nigritian, and about a dozen distinct nationalities. There sat the poor wretch just crawling into the grave, and only stealing bread, as it were, to help him to one day's further pull across the edge; while by his side laughed riotous health, with years to give the grim jailer and win his game yet. The faces were, some of them, utterly repulsive with every kind of ugliness, but there were others as prepossessing as you find in any average community. Perhaps what surprised me most was not the extremes of age or temperament appearing, but the vast social arc described there. I might almost call it an entire circle. There was the dainty boot from Hunt's; here a bare black foot; yonder the heel-trodden slipper, pasty with mud, which had come to its present Baxter Street owner from a Fifth Avenue ash-barrel and the sack of a chiffonnier. The most elegant broadcloth contrasted with the last remains of a fashionable London outfit from "'Igh 'Olborn;" while men with massive gold chains and diamond studs lounged just across the aisle from others without a pocket for the watch or a shirt for the buttons. I reached the acme of astonishment when I found among the little coterie of upper-crusters, who were huddling together, dormouse-fashion, on the front benches, to keep each other's respectability warm, at least three people whom I knew by sight and name perfectly well in the best society, and who as evidently recognized me.

Let B——, the banker, have no fear that I intend to peach on him. No, dear B——! not even does my own discreet Susan wit of your presence in that unusual place of business; and may I always have my corns stepped on if, meeting thee in church, on 'Change, or at the festive board, I tread on thine even under the table. I am very sure, B——, that thou wilt never care to say where thou metst me; and, having this confidence in human magnanimity, feel quite indisposed to harass thee with recollections of our interview. So, likewise, whenever I meet thee, ——, the counselor—Melius Dii concedant omen!—I will not refer to the opportunity once enjoyed by thee of studying the virtues of that bulwark of liberty, the habeas corpus, from the outer, as thou wast already one of its most discriminating defenders on the inner side!

It would fill Charles Kingsley and Tom Brown Hughes with confidence in the masculine vitality of America to learn that of all the gentlemen caught in this piebald crowd every one was charged with fighting; though the value of that fact to Dio Lewis and physical statistics may be lessened by the fact that they were all alleged to have been also under the spell of Bacchus.

That is the modern expression for what the Police Reports, with the charming simplicity of a pre-Augustan age, call "Drunk and Fighting." This may indicate any degree of elation which a policeman's early education leads him to think improper. I understood from persons present that a County Down policeman would arrest you for sniffing as you passed the Louvre after 12 o'clock at night, while a "Metropolitan" from Galway or Connaught would recognize in the worst case only "a touch of the wakeness," and send the beguiled banqueter home in a carriage to his own bed. So one can see that an intimate acquaintance with the family antecedents of the policemen of the precinct is necessary to any gentleman who wishes to become intoxicated on a given beat. All the gentlemen I met on this melancholy occasion had been arrested upon this charge; yet I know, for they told me themselves, that they had scarcely taken any thing.

Finding that the process of justice was somewhat slow in the Court outside—not more than one every ten minutes being called through the green door to plead to his charge—we endeavored to treat the matter with proper philosophy, and began whiling away the time in conversation and anecdote.

I got so much interested in a story one of my fellow-sufferers was telling that I did not hear the name "John Smith" until the door-keeper had called it twice. As I started up to answer the summons I saw that I had a namesake—the ugliest negro I ever saw, club-footed, lame in one hip, with a face an elephant seemed to have stepped on—an ebony Quasimodo—a Manfred from the Mountains of the Moon.

"What art thou up for, my mysterious Döppel-ganger?"

"Shovin' the queer, boss! Dey say I'se a pal o' Cow-heels; yuh, huh!"

Oh, Smith! John Smith! that you should have come to this! I knew that there were a great many of you; but this is too, too much! I now wished I had called myself Algernon Sidney, Mortimer Fitz-Clarence—any thing out of a book—any thing but Smith. Why, when I answered to that name I should go out in a roar!

"I see there's another of you," said the door-keeper, with an affable nod at me.

"Yes;" said I, with a ghastly smile, "if it's all you want of the family, I'll go."

"Is that your brother?" shouted a distant butcher-boy, who, to my dismay, had caught the conversation.

"Bedad, Billy," replied another, "will you stop botherin' the man? His brother is it, and him bears the same name as himself!"

"It's his youngest, it is; but shtayin' out late over night has blached the ould gentleman, and the bye got black in the face a-crying for his father. Plase, Sir, if you lose the child, would ye mind adoptin' an orphan?"

With this modest request, there presented himself by my pew as rich a specimen of red-headed impudence as ever had a twinkle in one eye, wore half a hat, and was fourteen years old. I was attracted to him to the extent of a ten cent stamp; but declined to adopt him, less from any intrinsic objection than as a precedent.

The next time the door-keeper appeared he called for "John Quincy Adams." J. Q. A. still kept up the Revolutionary reputation of his forefathers, having on the previous night so smitten an adversary that he turned a complete cart-wheel with acrobatic facility. I regretted only to see that Adams was not quite up to the family traditions in respect of personal beauty and neatness of attire.

Just after he had gone my attention was drawn to a man in a dark green alpaca frock and somewhat shabby pepper-and-salt pantaloons. He seemed about thirty years of age, and had an excellent face, although it bore on it marks of last night's dissipation. Though joining occasionally in the talk of our group, close notice of him showed me that he felt deeply dejected, and as he walked away after laughing with apparent heartiness at a joke from one of the party, I unostentatiously followed him. He turned, and, as I suppose, seeing my sympathy in my face, said softly:

"I laugh, but I tell you I feel awfully sore."

"What are you up for?"

"Same as all of you. I am a stranger from Iowa; went out with some friends last night; missed 'em somewhere; got into the street alone; didn't have any idea that I'd indulged too much; found myself here. There's the long and the short of it!"

"Oh well, they say it may be very likely only a fine!"

"Yes, but that's another thing—till I find my friends I haven't the money to pay my fine!"

I led away the conversation from this topic to general ones. I always like to trot a man off his engrossing theme and see how he goes across country; I couldn't tell whether this one was a swindler or an honest man in trouble till I saw his swing and style of action on the rough but solid ground of our average experience. I talked with him for fifteen minutes—found him a man of education as well as a college graduate; a person of refined tastes and tender conscience; and was just hesitating whether to believe that Jeremy Diddlerism could possibly act a part with skill so marvelous, when his suddenly moist eyes showed that he had reverted to the original subject, and he said, like one musing:

"I would not care if it weren't for—for her. If I'm imprisoned and my wife knows it—it will—it will break her heart!"

Then I couldn't stand it any longer.

"I've got the best of wives myself, stranger (I say 'stranger' because I believe that's considered the proper thing to say in your part of the country), and I wouldn't have Susan know where I am for all the postage stamps you could paste on the pavement between here and home. Let me shake hands with you, Sir. Your sentiment does you honor, Sir. I trust I take no liberty in saying that if you are fined I shall give you my direction and pay the amount, leaving you to return it at your convenience."

I will not dwell on the astonished gratitude with which he received my offer. It was more convincing for his sincerity than any seeming delicacy which might first have coquetted with the favor and then accepted it.

I felt so happy to think I had been able to lift off one load even in such a place as this that I waited my turn with great composure. I was not even startled when I discovered that "Zenobia" was a mulatto woman, who, since the fall of Palmyra, had got reduced to going out to do washing, had a baby, and was up for stealing from one of her employers starch to thicken the pap for it. An Aurelian in blue came to the green door, poor Zenobia went out carrying the baby, and what became of either hardened offender, the thief or the equally guilty receiver, I have never since discovered. While meditating on Human Fate and the doctrine of Compensation, I heard "Thomas Jefferson" called, and saw an evil-eyed sneak thief slouch to the door with a brass skin over every feature of his coarsely subtle face. Evidently that case was soon disposed of, for the green mouth of Draconian Justice gave another gape five minutes later, and uttered the words "Daniel Webster." Oh, shade of the Immortal! An omnibus pick-pocket! I could not refrain from rising and addressing the audience:

"Gentlemen," was my remark, "if I had earlier known that I was in the Senate of the United States and the companion of so many dear to the Muse of History, I should have enjoyed your company better."

Cries of "Hi! hi!" and "We'd rather have yer room, ole hoss!" drowned any thing else I may have intended to say. Just at this moment the green door opened again and I heard a call for "John Smith." No one else moved amidst the laughter raised by recollections of the last spirit which that name's spell evoked, and seeing, like Mr. Blair on a certain occasion and many other great men on divers occasions, that my time had come, I wrung the Iowa man by the hand and told him that if I got off I'd wait for him.

"Oh, thank you! do—do! Thank you—I know you will."

The green door shut on his pleading face, and with a very few morning loungers, none of whom, thank Heaven, I knew—sitting on the audience benches behind me—I presently stood face to face with Justice. I mean Mr. Justice L——, not the female member of the family who has something the matter with her eyes. He keeps his open wide enough, you may wager!

I attempted to look as if I were calling at the bar merely to inquire if the Judge could vouch for the character of the respectable policeman at my side, but broke down in the attempt to realize the conception of wanting to take such a domestic into my family. I do not, however, mean to convey an idea that my carriage lacked a certain impressiveness. No, quite the contrary.

The clerk repeated the charge, the policeman who had arrested me told his story as correctly in respect to facts as could be expected from one ignorant of the arrangement with that Phibbs, and the Judge said:

"Well, Smith, let's hear from you."

Before this I had thought, "Oh, if I only had the eloquence of Badger! the dramatic force and fire of Foxglove! Then would I plead with Justice like Sheridan, with the voice of Gough and the cothurnus of Talma!"

But the instant I heard that simple invitation, "Smith, let's hear from you," I realized that "straightforward does it" nine times out of ten, and determined that without note or comment I would my plain, unvarnished tale deliver. I tersely stated the dinner, the subsequent enthusiasm, and (had the Judge read "The Lambeth Casual?"—he smiled and nodded) the subsequent ridiculous proposition of Phibbs, and my performance of it with full approbation of the man assaulted, as still further evidence of which I cited the manner in which he chaffed the policeman and refused to complain.

The policeman was obliged to corroborate my testimony on the last point. Judge L—— looked at me carefully, but seemed at last to be satisfied with the truth of my statement—his appreciation of its reality causing a perceptible twinkle in his eye—and then whispered to the policeman. I then caught the words, "Trifling offense—no harm," and just as I was hoping to get off with a let the Judge said:

"Well, Smith, try and do better time; you can go—understand Latin? next Voll. Pros."

I was free! Not only American free scot-free. I had gained my experience of the Metropolitan Police Force at the cheapest rate at which it is possible to become acquainted with that glorious public institution—an indignant soul and one night in infernally unfurnished lodgings. Talk not to me of that Judge's laxity who draws it mild with unintentionally betrayed middle-aged gentlemen like myself. Why, the misery that poor young fellow still in there has endured, during the stony long night, thinking of his wife, is more punishment for him than a year at Blackwell's Island would be for a coarser-hearted man! I can't answer for the rest of you gentlemen behind the green door; but I'll go bail for myself and the mate from Iowa that neither philosophic nor convivial experiment will hereafter have strong enough attraction to show us the wrong side of that portal.

Pursuant to promise I returned from the balcony to a seat in the audience and waited for my friend.

He came out looking ghastly pale, and most reeled against the policeman in charge, but I felt hopeful, for I saw that the Judge interpreted it correctly, not as drink, but grief, mortification, and anxiety; and when the fellow's eye, searching eagerly through crowd, finally caught mine, his color came again, and his reassured smile thanked me more than bushels of compliment. There was no complaint against him—it was plain from his face that any more penalty than last night in the cell would be Draconian measure to mete an unintentional offender—so to his utter bewilderment he was let off on the same terms as "John Smith"—videlicet Ego.

I stepped out into the aisle and congratulated him as he came down with more than my usual warmth to a stranger. We walked out together into the open and comparatively un-policemanned air of Sixth Avenue. I couldn't get my companion to take even an oyster-stew with me. He seemed to feel a pride in not using for his physical needs a man who had volunteered himself to save his honor. I respected the feeling, but ached to give the poor fellow some breakfast. I don't see why he should look at that matter in such a strict light. Breakfast isn't a generosity! Why, it somehow seems to strike you like a common human duty, you know. But no breakfast would Iowa touch. He'd hunt up the friends he was with last night—they might like to breakfast with him, he remarked, cheerily. There was much of the in-born gentleman in him, and I hope his friends kept a good hot omelette for him. We walked together as far as Clinton Place; I turned there to Broadway and found his road took him down Sixth Avenue.

"So we part here?" said Iowa.

"Yes, for the present. I have a happy knack of meeting people who interest me again."

"Well, you've done me such a service."

"Happily it was not needed."

"No matter; you stood ready to do it all the same. I shouldn't wonder if you had saved my wife's life and mine to-day. I feel as if you were one of the few friends I have ever had in this world. I feel as if a promise to you would be particularly sacred. Here, I give you my hand that I have put into my mouth for the last time that which steals away the brains. Will you accept my promise, Sir?"

"I will."

"It's all I have to give, and I'll make it worth something. I won't ask your real name, but I'll give you mine" (here Iowa confided one which have good reason to trust will not always lie in obscurity). "May you never want help; but you do, may it be where I'm not distant. Good-by."

He wrung my hand; and though my own poetic tastes and prepossessions in Iowa's favor would lead me to give this episode a more satisfactory dramatic ending, the fact is, we have not met since and had any startling recognitions; but he has probably gone home to his wife to be a good man, which I take it is just as well in the long-run as having a romantic termination.

I now bent my steps toward Phibbs's with a settled determination if possible to avoid violence. I think giving him a piece of my mind is the clearest statement of what I intended to do when I got there.

Reaching the house, I was informed that he had gone up to Jefferson Market ten minutes before. I trembled like a guilty thing, and was on the brink of a terrible indiscretion, just catching myself before I said to the servant, "Oh! your master must have passed me on the way." The fact was, I hadn't yet got rid of the feeling that every thing about me had been read in the morning papers.

Glad that I had been able to scorn Phibbs's assistance, and reserving the inverted patriarchal benediction prepared for him till another occasion, I repaired to my beloved, yet now, alas! reproachful home, resolved to confess that Phibbs and the rest of us had made a night of it, but not to say—and O, benignant Heaven! not to be asked—where!

My prayer was wonderfully granted. My married daughter had come in from Yonkers just after I left; and there was a note on my study-table, saying, please might she keep dear mamma overnight, and wouldn't I come up for her the next afternoon? So my charming Susan, being all the while out of town, will never be the sadder for my experience on that confounded deal-board in Greenwood.

III.

It was my next duty to go in search of Phibbs's two other miserable victims. Foxglove in an Insane Asylum, Badger in an Orphan's Home—I wondered why it hadn't seemed so ridiculous to me last night!

On arriving at the Asylum where we had left Badger I had the door opened for me by a domestic, who I think could only have answered the bell in the absence of the regular maid, it being evident that they kept her especially to frighten bad orphans who neglected combs and soap. This Dreadful Warning drew her hand across her face and mopped it with her apron, counted all the buttons on my waistcoat, and settled a doubt in her mind as to the result of a fight between two billy-goats in the field across the way before condescending to answer the question whether a Mr. Badger chanced to be there, with a concise and staggering

"No, he ain't!"

"Was the Reverend Father Superior in?" was my next attempt.

"He ain't nuther," said the Dreadful Warning.

I was about to turn away with the impression that Badger had seen his ridiculous error on the preceding evening and returned to his chambers shortly after we left him, when a door opened at the further end of the hall, and one of the prettiest young faces I had ever seen—and I've known fine women in my day—peeped out, with a pleasant glimpse of cozy boudoir for a back-ground, saying:

"Mary Ann, ask is it a friend of the gentleman who came late last night?"

"D'ye hear what she says?" said the Warning, in an austere, drill-sergeantly voice.

"Madam!" said I, advancing toward the charming creature, "you speak of Mr. Badger. Were it not frivolous on such occasion to quote poetry I might say, 'Myself and misery know that man.' I am now anxiously in search of Mr. Badger. Surely you will assist me if possible—I know I could not seek kinder aid—good-heartedness sparkles in your every feature."

She looked at me half-mockingly, half-wonderingly, with a pair of big blue eyes. She was very pretty! I half began to think that this explained it—yes! Badger lay concealed in the house, and had given up all intention of leaving it—showed his taste. Presently she laughed a glorious little laugh, as if she only wished she could tell me something so very funny—then said,

"You're a good physiognomist. I am well disposed. In proof, see that I have not gone out since breakfast lest I might miss somebody who called, to whom this would be of importance."

At the word "this" she put in my hand a card of Badger's, with the following penciled on its back:

"They allow me but an instant to write unobserved. Meet me at the Tombs, the U. S. Comm'r's, or Ludlow Street Jail. BADGER."

Gracious Heavens! this was folly! Jail? What for? Could he be crazy? I looked about to assure myself that we had not confounded the two asylums, and left Badger to become insane instead of Foxglove.

Then, too, the dreadful mystery might be solved by supposing that Badger was a bold bigamist or a haughty highwayman, who had been all these years concealing the nefarious secret from his bosom friends. But no! I could not think thus of Badger, who plays on an accordion, and is all gentleness.

"May I ask—if—may I ask a question?" said I.

"If it be one which I have a right to answer."

"I desire no fairer judge than yourself. Reply or not as you please: is my friend, indeed, out of the house?"

"Your friend tells the truth," replied the young lady, with dignity. "The most likely place to find him, I have no doubt, to be one of those addresses which he gives."

"Is he in danger? May I ask this further?"

"I no more know than you, Sir, where he is."

"But I don't ask where—I ask is he in danger—is he in immediate danger?"

She laughed again with such bewitching roguishness as she answered, "No—she fancied not," that I could not refrain from saying, as I bowed myself out of the hall-door,

"Yes, he is! he has seen you!"

The upshot of the matter was, that I finally got signs of Badger at the U. S. Commissioner's. My worst fears for him were realized. He was on trial for a capital charge—a criminal charge —a charge involving property and life. When I saw Badger in that pen I congratulated his parents on Badger's being an orphan. They were better off. Oh, Badger! how could you?

In this virtuous frame of mind I obtained admission to the bar by a request to speak with Badger's lawyer, and presently obtained the following history of that eminent criminal's movements since we left him at the Orphan Asylum:

As soon as the priest had closed the door he eyed Badger closely but kindly, and said,

"A case of conscience, I suppose?"

"Exactly so," said Badger, not yet having made up his mind how to apply as an orphan, and snatching at an opportunity to put it on the highest moral ground.

"Walk into my parlor, Sir, if you please; my sister and her daughter are sitting up late to finish things for our fair; they will entertain you a few moments while I walk up to my dormitory and robe. I will come down to the parlor, and you may rise whenever you wish to see me in private."

A moment more and Badger found himself in a brightly-lighted room, where a matronly lady and a young girl sat at work on pin-cushions, kettle-holders, dolls, afghans, and other articles which go to make up the paraphernalia of a charitable festival. They bowed and smiled as the priest spoke his name from behind the door, and the priest went up stairs to exchange his deshabille for some more sacerdotal garments.

Whatever Badger may have been when he came to the Asylum, the sight of that girl completely sobered him. He thought she was the loveliest little creature he had ever seen. He felt as if he wouldn't make a fool of himself before her for any sum you could mention. The longer he conversed the more he was charmed with her, and when the Reverend Superior presented himself, Badger had resolved to act after a fashion which would enable him to see her again.

"You are very happy in your family, Father," said he, as they went up stairs.

"Yes; I hope I shall be able to keep my sister and her daughter with me, though they sometimes pine to return to County Galway, where my brother-in-law died. Walk in here;" said the priest, as he reached the landing and showed Badger into his bedroom.

When the door was shut Badger made a clean breast of the entire lark, and told the Superior that when he saw the refinement of that parlor and those ladies, as well as the kindness and frank hospitality he had received at that unusual hour, he had been recalled to a sense of honor, and could only take the course of a true gentleman, namely, to apologize for the trouble he had given. "This," said Badger, "is the case of conscience on which it relieves me to communicate with you."

At this Badger rose to go; but the priest, who seemed to be much taken with his frankness, and, as he said, saw him to be by nature a perfect gentleman, insisted that he should test the hospitality of the Orphans still further by considering the lateness of the hour and accepting a bed with him instead of going all the way back to his lodgings. Badger could not long resist such an invitation—giving him, as it did, the hope of meeting the pretty girl at the breakfast-table. On consulting the ladies of the household it was found that the only change necessary to be made for the accommodation of Badger consisted in the young lady giving her room up for the night and occupying that of her mother. This arrangement being presently completed, Badger said good-night, and being shown to his couch, was presently wandering through delightful dreams of the young face that suddenly had dawned on him like a destiny.

He did not know exactly how long he had been asleep, but subsequent circumstances led him to think it was about three, when he dreamed that he was Macbeth, attending a spiritual circle and getting knocks from Duncan's spirit on the door; then thought somebody was amusing himself with throwing coal-scuttles down stairs; and finally woke to the conviction which two fists and a club had been trying to substantiate on the hall-door for the last two minutes. While lying still to debate whether he, a guest, ought to go to the door or not, he heard the venerable Father descend the stair and slide the bolt. Thinking the house might have been discovered to be on fire, Badger arose, came to his own door and listened.

There was a low conversation between the priest and a burly fellow who carried a heavy cane in his hand. Seeing that there was no immediate cause for alarm, Badger lay down again, leaving his door ajar. The voice of the burly man grew louder, and presently the door of the ladies' room opened and a voice came from the upper hall:

"Brother, what's the matter?"

"Nothing serious, my child," answered the priest, looking up over the balusters. "Only a gentleman from the Government, who has come to arrest Fenian leaders whom he has been informed lie secreted in our house. I think he must have mistaken the house."

"Hiss'n't this 'ere the Orphan's 'Ome?"

"It is."

"Then there hain't no mistake. Hive ad hinformation that Ed Centre Toole and General O'Googhan—both on 'em 'aving participated in the hinvasion of Er Majesty's Provinces—are now concealed 'ereabouts. They're not naturalized citizens, but traitors to their hown horiginal government. They may come hunder the Hextradition Treaty—then they'll be 'ung; hany way 'ere's a warrant for 'em, and they've got to go afore the Commissioner."

"But, my dear Sir, I assure you there's no such person in this house!"

"Seein's believin'—I'll take a look."

Accompanied by his posse, the naturalized citizen who was not a traitor to his horiginal government, but managed to do a good little turn for Britain while he discharged his duties to America as an under-sheriff, followed the worthy father all over the house; opening bureau drawers which could only have contained the object of his search upon the assumption that a Fenian was something which folded up like a napkin or slid together like a spy-glass, and filling the house with a wail of closet hinges that had not been oiled or opened for a month. He even insisted on visiting the children's dormitory, where he poked a lantern under each separate cot, causing in some highly imaginative orphans who woke up an impression that their cruel step-mother, the world, had got tired of supporting them and had sent a man to burn them up in their nests like field-mice.

The dormitory gave on the same landing as Badger's room. The priest, head catch-poll, and party came out from searching it close by Badger's door. As they passed it the fellow said he thought he'd look in there.

"That's a lady's room—my niece's room! Respect common decency!" said the Father Superior, quite oblivious for the moment of the change which had installed Badger there.

"Poh! Let the lady get in bed and cover 'erself hup! Can I come in, mum?"

He knocked and waited a minute—then, getting no answer, pushed through the door and approached the bed. What answer could Badger give? The unhappy man cowered under the bed-clothes, but enough of him stuck out to warrant the deep sigh of satisfaction with which the officer said:

"Well, boys, we've got 'im. Father Docherty, you come of an 'airy family. Your niece 'as a pair o' whiskers I wouldn't mind wearin' myself."

"Saints preserve us!" exclaimed the Superior, stepping forward, "Mr. Badger! I had forgotten about him entirely. Why, my man, that's only a gentleman who stopped in to pass the night with me—he's an American—born in this country—does business down town—"

"Then it's the most convenient thing in the world, for I'm on my way down town myself, and he can go along and sleep close to his business. Jump up, Toole!"

"But I tell you his name is Badger!"

"That's entirely true," said Badger.

"Well, d'y'e want to know my name? I'm Dog. So now, Badger, come out of your 'ole, if you don't want to see these 'ere teeth, which I don't like to use 'em unnecessary."

Seeing the minion of despotism implacable, Badger arose and in a semi-somnambulistic state dressed himself. He had only time to write the words he left for me and wring his hospitable entertainer's hand when he was hurried from the house. After passing the rest of the night in Ludlow Street he turned up where I found him.

When I arrived his lawyer had just started the question of his identity, and the prosecution not anticipating such an issue, had been compelled to send out for witnesses upon that point.

After conversation with me, Badger's lawyer called me upon the stand, and I had the pleasure of swearing that Mr. Badger was not the great Toole. I was then asked did I know Toole, and upon my replying that I did not, I was further asked how I could have the effrontery to say this was not Toole. This view of the case seemed so bewildering that I hesitated for a moment whether it might be Toole, but casting my eyes toward the prisoner, to refresh my mind on his identity, as it were, I was distinctly and sternly informed by the prosecution that I needn't look there, as they were perfectly aware of my secret understanding with the prisoner. I replied with warmth that both the prisoner and myself were gentlemen, which naturally led to a greater familiarity than the cross-examining lawyer could ever hope for with that class.

"I appeal to the Court," said the Counsel, "for protection against this most violent and perjured witness, and suggest to his Honor the Commissioner, whether, as we know nothing of his antecedents, he may not be O'Googhan, who, though still thought at large, has the matchless effrontery to appear for his accomplice's aid in this place of justice!"

As he sternly looked me through I began feeling as if I might by mistake have secreted O'Googhan somewhere on my person, and moved uneasily from leg to leg as if I would shake him down into my boots—a certain indication of guilt which did not escape the prosecution. I began to feel uncertain as to how far I had committed myself, and being, thank Heaven! but slightly acquainted with the inside of courts, was not sure whether circumstantial evidence could be so construed as to have me hanged immediately. While the cold drops stood on my forehead several eminent dry-goodsmen, for whom Badger had previously sent to Park Place, entered the court, nodded and smiled at the prisoner, and were triumphantly placed on the stand to corroborate me.

"The case has not a leg to stand on, Mr. Mincer," said the Commissioner to the Prosecution. "This prisoner is evidently not the man named in the warrant, and must therefore be discharged."

"I think we might hold him as a witness, Mr. Commissioner."

"I think not, Mr. Mincer."

"Will you please to note an exception?"

"I will, Sir."

Badger and his friends were by this time halfway to the door.

"I would move, Mr. Commissioner, that the witness be bound in sureties to reappear if further needed."

"I think I have no show to grant the motion," said the Commissioner, urbanely.

Badger and his friends had by this time reached the door, and, going out, received from the Prosecuting Counsel a backward look of longing which seemed to indicate a belief that if we'd only given him time he could have found something to hold us in habeas corpus, quare clausum fregit, or somewhere.

IV.

Separating from his mercantile friends and his lawyer at the Broadway gate of the Park, Badger joined arms with me, and exchanging recitals as we went, we set out together on an expedition to ascertain the fate of Foxglove.

On reaching the Asylum, and sending in our cards to the Doctor as friends of Mr. Foxglove, we were told that Mr. Foxglove and his keeper were at present having an interview with another friend in the Doctor's presence, but that if we would be very quiet we might walk up. A dreadful sense of awe choked me as I ascended the stairs, and I could hear Badger's knee-pans smite together as a sort of echo to the ugly noise which the key made in the lock when we were admitted to the Lunatics' main hall. We passed several doddering old men, and the usual happy man who considers himself "the Boss of the Universe," and were finally led by the attendant into a side-chamber where—there stood Phibbs! Badger and I both shook our fists at him at once.

"Don't excite the lunatic!" said the Doctor, monitorially; and, upon coming fully into the darkened room, I saw that distinguished ornament of the Insane Profession, Dinkie, seated on a sofa at the side of poor Foxglove. Phibbs stood near the sofa, and accosted us:

"I seem to have kept just behind you all the morning till now—"

"And decidedly the safest position for you too!" said I, once more involuntarily making up a fist.

"Gentlemen, think of the lunatic!" said the Doctor, sternly.

"Well, Foxglove, old fellow, how do you feel to-day?" said I, offering my usual morning hand. Badger also extended his own.

He looked at us piercingly as if he would read us through, then turned to the accomplished Dinkie, and said:

"My dear, are these the parties that called the other day—on that little matter, you know—about collecting the water-rates on our property in the moon? Yes. They are. The late John Jacob Astor says so. Know then, rash young men, that I am Belisarius."

"Dear me, but that's well done!" said Badger, shivering.

"Then 'twere well an 'twere done quickly. Asmodeus, I come. But tell me; what shall I say to the Purple Prophet of the Parallax when he demands why on Oriental altars incense burns no more? The nine Muses are dead, and being in their nine graves, wit ye, are thus in the nine holes, and count no more honors. Save nightingales' tail-feathers, say I, you never can tell when a poet may die. I'm the last poet that ever shall be. Yet a vassal like this Dinkie can refuse me buttered eggs—did it this morning while she was sowing the earth with radiant pearl; in my embodied state I should have called it breakfast-time. Dinkie!"

"My unhappy friend!"

"You're an ass!"

"You perceive his hopeless condition, gentlemen!" said the Doctor, mournfully. "Oh, gentlemen, gentlemen, what a fearful responsibility you take upon your souls when you trifle with human reason by exposing to such influences as these a sensitive organization over-persuaded in a moment of excitement! Look at this terrible result! Did you never hear of sympathetic insanity? Why, it's as catching as small-pox!"

Up to this moment neither Phibbs, Badger, nor myself had realized the dreadful truth. As it flashed over us we all three sank down upon the nearest chairs, and with groans of dismay hid our faces in our hands.

"Has he parents?" asked the Doctor.

"He has an aunt, but no children," said Badger, absent-mindedly.

"Second cousin to the King of Jerusalem, and grandmother, on his wife's side, to the Bishop of Bungo. Ho! my chariot, menial! The soup is cooling on the tables of the north star, haste or I shall be late for the fish; and the moon has asked me to go a block out of my way with a pair of slippers for her nephew in Arcturus."

"Oh, this is terrible!" spoke Phibbs, remorsefully.

"It is indeed," said Dr. Dinkie. "What are you going to do about it? Have you considered how to break the news to his wife?"

"He's a bachelor," said Phibbs. "Could you keep him here? How long before he'll be well?"

"Ah, who can tell?" replied the Doctor, shrugging his shoulders, "these sympathetic cases are often incurable."

Phibbs, as well he might, groaned again from the very bottom of his boots.

The next moment and poor Foxglove was in a fearful paroxysm. His keeper had discovered him trying to kill himself by swallowing vest-buttons. When detected he was furious, and made a rush at us all, with his eyes glaring vengeance.

When he was secured again the Doctor resumed:

"Whether this victim of your heedlessness and sin shall ever be restored to his reason doesn't affect the question whether you have committed a serious crime. You have frightened a man out of his reason. I am not sure but my duty to society requires that I should make a statement of the facts to the authorities, or at any rate through the newspapers."

"Oh, Doctor! for Heaven's sake manage it some way without that!" was the gist of our universal exclamation.

"I'd prefer," added Phibbs, "if it could be arranged by our signing a bond or something of that sort, to be chargeable for him while he has to stay here."

"Hm," said the Doctor. An idea seemed to strike him; he relapsed into meditation; then abruptly addressed me:

"Do you give to benevolent objects?"

"Sometimes," said I, in surprise.

"Did you ever give to an Insane Asylum?"

"No, I can't say that I ever did."

"Or you?" (addressing Badger). "Or you?" (to Phibbs).

Both answered no.

"Then," replied Dr. Dinkie, "it's high time for you to stop neglecting one of the greatest charities of the nineteenth century. I might insist on your depositing with me funds sufficient to carry your unhappy friend through the entire year; but I will let you off upon your paying one quarter in advance—two hundred dollars. Here's the Subscription-Book. Say 'We herewith give to Dr. Dinkie's Institute the sum set opposite our names.' This form secures privacy: your unhappy victim's name does not appear."

The writing done, Phibbs said, "Shall we pay it now?"

"If you have it with you; our terms are strictly in advance."

We managed to make out the two hundred dollars between our several pocket-books, and promising the Doctor to call again that evening with an express-wagon containing trunks from his lodgings, shook hands with poor Foxglove, who called us Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; and asked us, if convenient, to carry his compliments to Genghis Khan.

"Now," said the Doctor, "let us leave the lunatic to sleep. Keep wet cloths around his head and avoid exciting topics, Michael. I beg, gentlemen, that you will accompany me to my parlor. Lunch waits there. You have had a fatiguing night and morning; a little refreshment will do you good. Come in, and for a while at least forget the harrowing scene for which you have been responsible. The cold chicken is over there, and here are the ham sandwiches."

None of us having yet had any breakfast to speak of, we could not but acquiesce in the correctness of the Doctor's prescription, though our minds were too burdened to let us eat much. We spent ten minutes at the table, and the Doctor then bowed us out with an expression of sympathy that went to our very hearts.

We had not gone many paces when we felt a series of familiar slaps on the back, and, turning, beheld Foxglove "in the fashion as he lived!"

"Heavens! the unhappy man has escaped!" cried Phibbs.

"Not unhappy, by any means," said Foxglove. "I'm a little ahead of you, I reckon! Chaff me about my dramatic talents again, will you? Three men as well fooled as I ever saw in my life! In the plot as Dinkie was, he could hardly help laughing. He may laugh! He's got the best joke of the season, and two hundred dollars for his Asylum! How d'ye like selling people now, Phibbs?"

It was one of those moments when silence alone is eloquent—when we find we have gone very cheap. Phibbs recovered from the intensity of the situation with a prolonged whistle, and this being interpreted by a stage-driver as the signal to halt, Phibbs mechanically stepped into the vehicle and was borne down town. He said nothing—but there was really nothing to say.

V.

Badger is the only one of us who has ever forgiven Phibbs. His spirit toward Phibbs, considering all things, is quite Christian; but that I ascribe to the fact that he spends several evenings a week under the hallowed influence of the Orphan Asylum, Father Docherty's sister and niece having done him so much spiritual good that one of the ladies at least feels it her duty not to go back to Galway.

A MAY-BASKET.

JULIA MAYO, at the opera that night, with Tom Ridley at her right hand, was in a state of supreme satisfaction; or what that queer, quizzical brother of hers would term, "in high feather." The reason for this exaltation of feeling does not appear self-evident at first, for there are a hundred better-looking men about than Tom Ridley. A hundred better looking, and of finer fashion; and every body who knows Miss Mayo knows she values these things. But there are other things Julia Mayo values.

Tom Ridley is new; he is just returned from a five years' residence abroad, where, in a certain science, he has earned a modest reputation; made a name of which men speak respectfully. He has earned a fortune too, more than modest people say; but of this Tom himself will say nothing.

Is it not self-evident now, why a bright and clever girl like Julia Mayo should be in "high feather" with such attendance?

Two or three of her own sex have not scrupled to hint that Julia was "setting her cap" at Mr. Ridley since his return.

It would not be strange, I am sure, if she did, nor strange if Mr. Ridley was caught by the cap; for it is a very pretty one—a most bewildering crown of lace and velvet and flowers; what Julia calls "a love of a bonnet." And beneath it is a very pretty face—a face full of freshness and brightness in tint and texture, and animated with sense and spirit. Perhaps not the "spirit" Browning meant when he described Evelyn Hope as "Made of spirit, fire, and dew."

But then the Evelyn Hopes are the seldom flowers, which rarely grow in the world's hot-beds; and Julia Mayo is a slip of the world's own setting.

But while we are talking about her, she is talking to Tom Ridley; and the lace and flowers atop that pretty, fluffy mass of crimped hair quiver and quake with her graceful motion, and in the midst of her talk she drops a little smiling nod of recognition, now here, now there. And at one of these Tom asks:

"Who was that lady to whom you bowed just now?"

"Which lady?"

"That one across the house there, in black."

"Oh! don't you know? I thought her an old acquaintance of yours. Why it's Anna Dearing."

"You don't say so!"

The tone of Tom's voice was that of energetic surprise.

"Well, I suppose she has changed. She was quite pretty when you went away, I believe; though I wasn't out myself then, and don't remember much about it." And Julia thought, with a little natural complacency, of her two years' advantage in youth and freshness.

"Yes, she was called beautiful, and she could not have been more than eighteen then. But I should not have known her now for the same person, though I was conscious all the time of something familiar—a resemblance I thought to somebody. Bless my soul, how singular this matter of change is! Here are you, now, Miss Julia, brighter than you were at sixteen."

Julia bloomed brighter than ever with smiles and blushes at this, and Tom Ridley thought to himself, "How very pretty she is!" But pretty as she was he couldn't keep his eyes from wandering across the house to Anna Dearing's changed face. He remembered her as fresh as a June rose—all sparkle and joyousness and bloom. And here in place of the round contour was an irregular though most delicate outline, and not a trace of the bright color. Out of the eyes, too, had gone the gay sparkle, and left instead a sad inscrutable look, which fitted well with the proud, down-dropping lips. What had come to the girl, or what had gone from her? He might have put something like these questions to his companion perhaps, but looking at her and catching the contrast of her serene unlined face, he seemed to change his purpose; and in a moment more the curtain rose, and a famous voice was hushing all other voices in its waves of melody. But Tom Ridley, as Dick Mayo rather inelegantly but tersely expressed it, wasn't one of those who "stand on their heads about the opera;" consequently he had other thoughts and interests running through his brain at this moment than those connected with Norma. And as he was always a great fellow to harp on one string, he kept at that vexed and unanswered question—the singular change in bright and blithe Anna Dearing. It was simply at this time a matter of curiosity with Tom Ridley, for he had never been specially interested in the young lady, though she had been a toast and a paragon with his classmates five years ago. And the chance was, if he had come back and found her the same bright and blithe Anna Dearing he wouldn't have bestowed a thought upon her. But Tom Ridley had a curious analytic vein running through his composition, and it made him a student of human nature. And when once he had got a clew to a character which promised mystery or depth worth searching for, he could not let it go. So there he sat hammering away at his speculations, while the tide of song drifted by him almost unheeded. But at last the curtain drops upon the final act, the famous voice has finished its singing for that night, and there is a general a murmur of dilettante criticism, a shawling and cloaking and hooding; a few fond "good-nights;" a great many sentimental and coquetish ones; and the opera is over. Home goes the fair Julia to put her "bronze brown hair" into crimping-irons, which will emerge on the next morning a soft and fluffy mass, than which nothing is more fascinating to the beholder, nor more ruinous in the process to the growth of the bronze brown hair.

And home, or rather hotel-ward, goes Mr. Ridley, to drop his speculations in a sound sleep, and to quite forget them for the next few weeks in a nearer interest of stocks and bonds and investments. But nothing is ever quite forgotten, quite dropped out of the way in any human mind, I take it; least of all such a mind as Tom Ridley's. The link is taken up whenever the subject returns, and it will be sure to return sooner or later. It returned to him one morning oddly enough or naturally enough perhaps, since there is manifest destiny in all things, when he was in the presence of Miss Mayo. He had become—partly from a business connection with her father, and partly from a cordial discovery of a kind of relationship, a far off intermarriage between the Ridleys and Mayos—an everyday visitor. He had no nearer kin in the city, and it was a pleasant thing to have a home-feeling any where, which he certainly did where good Mrs. Mayo reigned, and where so pretty a girl as Julia Mayo persisted in calling him "cousin." So it was at the lunch-table there that the subject of his opera speculations came up again.

It was Julia herself who brought it up.

"Mamma," she said, "I went to see Anna Dearing this morning."

Mrs. Mayo was all kind, motherly interest at once, and wanted to know all about it, for she was "so sorry for the Dearings."

"Sorry, why?" spoke up Ridley.

"Oh, didn't you know? Why, they are quite poor, and live, nobody can tell how, in a sort of hand-to-mouth fashion, I suspect," answered Mrs. Mayo.

"No, I didn't know. But where's Mr. Dearing?"

"Dead. He died insolvent. It must have been a great blow to them every way, for they don't seem to have any relatives to take an interest in them and look out for them."

"But Anna's a trump though!" broke out Dick Mayo, in his sudden, unlooked-for way. "She cuts her cloth according to the pattern she has, and it's a mighty small pattern we all know, and contrives by hook or by crook to live like a lady and act like the happiest of 'em. You hear stories of her screwing and pinching, of her doing law-copying when she can get it, and the Lord knows what other handiwork; but you never hear any complaint from her. She never tells you any of these stories. If she came in here now she would be the life and the soul of us; not one of your giggling frothy sort to follow the lead of any of our small-talk, but a generous and genial creature, whom all the snubs of fortune can't bring down. I say she's a trump!" And with a hearty, almost defiant ring in these last words of his, Dick concluded. Julia laughed a little lady-like laugh at Dick's impetuosity, with a little secret annoyance at what she termed Dick's rough manner. And then she said, in her serene way,

"I pity Anna."

Dick's manner did not improve at this. It certainly was rather rough as he retorted:

"Pity her! Why don't you do something besides pity? That's the way with you women. You have plenty of words, but few deeds. Do you think a man would see a good fellow down and not try to help him up?"

"For mercy's sake, Dick, do you want me to offer alms to Anna Dearing as though she were a beggar?"

Down Dick's throat there gurgled a deep, disgusted laugh as he drank his ale.

"Give her alms! I'd like to see you try it, that's all! But, Ju, there are other ways men can help each other than by giving alms to a friend."

Suddenly Julia woke up out of her serenity.

"Dick!" she exclaimed, with a sharpness in her voice that showed temper, "why don't you give yourself to this wonderful friend, you seem to admire her sufficiently. That would be the best help in your power, doubtless."

There was a curious gleam and flash over Dick's face, and then he answered in his quietest tone:

"I thought so too, but it seems I was mistaken, for she wouldn't take such help of me."

There he sat, the splendid, audacious fellow, cool and unflushed after this extraordinary confession, looking quite as if he had said the most ordinary thing. For his hearers but one believed that this was other than Dick's oddity. Julia gave a little start of surprise at first, and Mrs. Mayo reflected it, and wondered Dick would make such speeches. But Tom Ridley, grave and thoughtful Tom Ridley, believed in it. There was something in his own nature which throbbed responsive to the splendor of this audacity. Something more akin to the bluff and hearty manhood with its vein of deep, rich sentiment than this mother and sister would have appreciated; for though of the same blood, they had no deep acquaintance with Dick Mayo. He lived so far below the surface they could not reach him.

And so, as is often the case when persons so wide apart are thrown together, it happened frequently that a grand confession or a splendid truth was only "one of Dick's odd speeches."

And now as he sat there idle and easy, quaffing great draughts of ale, and otherwise comporting himself in a very unsentimental fashion, he had certainly none of the signs of a rejected suitor. But Tom Ridley, who could understand how easy a thing it was for this grand fellow to dare to make any protest or tell any truth, could understand as well how little he would express his feeling or condition by ordinary signs.

And while Tom is speculating upon this Julia is "running on" in her accustomed vivacious manner. How very tame and commonplace it all seemed after this deeper vein he had struck. So very tame and commonplace that he was fain to make his adieu as soon as possible. And going down the street he kept thinking of that splendid, audacious fellow and Anna Dearing. So this was a woman who might say:

"If Shakspeare loved me, and I did not love him, how could I marry him?"

You may be sure it was not long after this that he found his way to "this woman's" home. He did not ask Miss Julia to go with him—his instincts were truer than that, nor did he mention his purpose to that "splendid fellow;" for this he was too delicate; but quite alone one evening he rang the bell at a little old-fashioned house in an old-fashioned street. And Anna Dearing herself answered the bell.

He thought with a sharp pang of pain—how could he help it?—of the night he had bidden her good-by five years before, for then she stood smiling by her father's side. What a contrast—that wide, bright house, and this dark and narrow one, where pinching poverty was the only guest! No wonder that her face had lost its bloom and brightness, and her eyes had got that steadfast look of inscrutable sorrow, fighting single-handed with such a guest. But when he went into that small sitting-room, where a little fire burned brightly in the grate, and Mrs. Dearing welcomed him with the warmth of an old friend, and where, sitting opposite to him, Anna talked with that gracious genial interest of which Dick Mayo had so valiantly spoken, he could see no sign of the struggle of her life. She was bright and blithe again; but it was the brightness of a brave, tried spirit, the blitheness of a strong soul, which had the courage to turn its back upon the shadow and face the sunlight at every opportunity. And here was her opportunity. Here was an old acquaintance, come back out of five years with his life stamped—a man who had made his mark; and with her warm sense of appreciation, Anna Dearing was ready to lay down her load and enjoy her little hour with him. How fresh her intellect was, how clear and true her thought, how healthy her impressions! And how was it she could have kept herself so free from bitterness through the straits she had passed? That was a marvel. "Bright and blithe Anna Dearing," he thought over and again, as he sat in her presence, and yet when he left her he remembered that there was scarcely a trace of the gay brightness that had once made her a belle. This was something deeper than gayety, and more fascinating to Tom Ridley than any thing foregone. It was a fascination that did not diminish as the acquaintance between them ripened, as evening after evening he sat in the little parlor and listened to her voice. It did not diminish, but rather increased, until this cool, grave fellow was thoroughly captive. But there was something inscrutable in Anna Dearing—he had caught the glimpse of it in her eyes when he had first seen her at the opera: something inscrutable, which he had not yet fathomed. Candid, and cordial, and sympathetic, and full of a certain kind of frankness, yet he looked vainly for her to bestow any confidence upon him—to trust him with any of the personal undercurrent of her life. She was ready always with whatever of wit or humor there was at her command—ready, too, with any matter of general interest. She showed him all her brightness, in short, but never her shadow. And in the mean time he saw the contour of her face grow sharper, and that inscrutable look of suffering deepen in her eyes. If she would not trust him as a friend, how could he expect she would receive him as a lover? This was the daily argument he held with himself. If he could have received the smallest token of such trust from her, in any response to his cordial effort to strike beneath the surface, he would have spoken out all there was in his heart. And so in this perplexity the winter drifted by, and his hope drifted with it. As March came coldly in, blowing its great gales up and down the streets, it seemed to him that the look of patient pride and pain deepened in the face whose every change he now watched so eagerly. And one night, for the first time, he noticed an appearance of abstraction about “bright and blithe Anna Dearing.” Listening to him once or twice, he saw her eyes wander from him, as if some perplexed thought was holding her in bondage from which she could not escape. He longed to break down the barrier of silence and entreat her to confide in him—to let him comfort her in some way. But, sweet as she was, that singular reserve she kept was insurmountable. So strongly impressed was he that there was some crisis at hand that he followed up this visit by another, and still another, in quick succession. In this time the look of worry had increased upon her face. There was a tense and quivering nerve of pain throbbing somewhere. He went again on the fourth evening, determined to force through this hoar-frost of pride, and ask her to put trust in him as a friend—to let him do her such service as a man might. Fortune favored him. She was alone, and unwillingly he touched upon a string that vibrated to an old tender memory, and so startled her into a certain self-betrayal. They were speaking of mutual friends—classmates of his in those other days.

“Do you remember, or did you know,” he said, “that Carlton and Moore and Haswell gave you King Henry’s pretty love-title, ‘Dearlyling’; partly for your name, and because it suggested a suitability to you?”

Her face flushed all over.

“Did I know it?” she cried. “Oh, Mr Ridley, it was my father’s pet name for me—‘My Dearlyling!’” Tears were in her eyes, but she would not let them fall, and there was such passionate pathos in the sudden fervor of her voice that her listener thrilled with sympathy. Out of this mood he leaned forward, and, taking her hand in his, said earnestly, “Miss Dearing, I came here to-night to entreat you to tell me what it is that troubles you—at least to ask you to allow me the privilege of a friend to serve you in any way a man might.” There was such grave authority, as it were, in his tone and manner, that it could not but be impressive; but how would she take it? Would it avail? he inly queried, in the breathing-space that ensued.

For a moment there was visible indecision, and then, quite in her ordinary way and voice, but with a gathering color on her cheek, she made answer:

“You are very kind to take such an interest, Mr. Ridley, and I thank you for your desire to serve me, but there is nothing you can do; and I am sorry my vexation has been so apparent as to trouble you; but since it has, I will tell you the cause of it, for I am afraid you may have overrated it. It is only that we are obliged to change our home—to give up this house; and for several reasons this is perplexing and annoying. Not that it is dear to us by any past association, or very pleasant in itself; but it belonged to my father’s landed property, and we thought we might, or at least we hoped to keep it, but circumstances over which we have no control render it necessary to give it up.”

Quite naturally and calmly, as she had begun, she ended, with only that one sign of unusual emotion—the spot of flame upon her cheek; but it was impossible to pursue the subject for the present; he felt that at once, and was wise enough to refrain from any further words. But it was something to have won even this partial confidence from her. He would wait, and bide his time to act. In the mean while, from what she had told, he understood what she had left untold. “And we thought we might, or at least we hoped to keep it.” These words at once revealed to him the whole dilemma. The “circumstances” were nothing less than the inevitable canker of mortgage. They had hoped to avoid this, or they had striven to redeem it perhaps, and had been unsuccessful. What a story it told!—a story of constant endeavor, of growing anxiety, of hope against hope, and now, the bitter end, of failure. And with an endurance and simplicity that seemed almost ironic, she had said—“It is only that we are obliged to change our home.”

Only obliged to change a home! Only obliged to submit to the worst of privations and loss! Only obliged to drift farther out upon poverty’s cold tide, and lose hold of the last spar of comfort!

With these thoughts and conclusions flashing through his mind, he sits there quite coolly, exchanging words with her upon indifferent topics, while heart and soul are throbbing with but one purpose. Ah! if with a word he could gather her to his breast and shield her from all this, how quickly he would speak! But she had rejected such a man as Dick Mayo—that “grand fellow,” who always seemed to him to have some of the best attributes of a hero. She had rejected that great heart, and the help of that manly life, because she was one of the women who could say, “If Shakspeare loved me, and I did not love him, how could I marry him?” How then could he hope that he might meet a different fate? For she had given no sign. And if he risked his fate, and met denial, he knew that all chance of serving her as a friend would be lost. So this man, who compared himself humbly with another man, set himself faithfully to the most unselfish service of friendship, without expectation or hope of reward in any way.

Only once again that evening did he touch upon the subject she had so calmly dismissed. And then he turned as he stood in the doorway and asked: “When do you leave here?” It was an abrupt question, abruptly put, and unlike his thoughtful way; but it had the effect of bringing him a direct and unpremeditated answer, which was just what he wanted. They would not leave until the last of May, she told him. The last of May! It was now the last of March—two months to find some method by which to serve her need. And any one who could have seen that firm, fixed face of decision, would have felt sure that he would not fail in accomplishing his undertaking.

It is superfluous to relate the detail of his patient persistence, and the steps he took to follow out his thought and purpose. It was a simple and direct purpose:—first, to discover, through careful and discreet inquiry, the amount of this unfortunate mortgage; then to make use of the discovery. And here lay his greatest perplexity. Gifted with business tact and worldly sagacity he had no doubt of carrying the first point; but with the last he had to deal with an exaggeration of pride and reserve which would make it impossible for him to deal openly and directly. There was nothing left, then, but stratagem; for to serve her in her need, though it were against her will, he was determined. Perhaps there were few persons to whom this alternative could have been more distasteful than to Tom Ridley, for he was singularly open and straightforward in his actions, though guarded always, of course, by a manly discretion. He had, too, little or nothing dramatic about his mind, which made it still more difficult for him to adopt any course that required concealment or finesse, however graceful and captivating might be the form, or how worthy and needful the cause itself. So it was that long after his discovery of the primal fact he sought, for days and days he waited and waited for some inspiration to dawn upon him in relation to his further action. All manner of curious and impossible plans would, one after another, start up, to be dismissed in derision. He so heartily hated clap-trap, and every thing that approached the sensational, that it would be a difficult matter for him to fix upon any thing.

“And here is all this delay and dilemma,” he exclaimed, in a kind of impatient indignation, on one of these days of perplexity, “for a paltry five hundred dollars! Once a man could receive an estate from a friend, and be not overburdened or humiliated by the gift, but in these later times we have fallen upon a kind of a mean suspicion and a low estimate of friendship. But it shall go hard with me but I will find a way to overrule this state of things, in the present instance, at any rate!”

And he did find a way.

It flashed upon him in a very odd manner, and at a very odd time and place—for it was at the Mayos. He had dropped in to lunch—as, somehow, he had lately got out of the habit of doing—and Miss Julia was pouring tea for him, and chatting away in her brightest manner, and looking her very prettiest; and Mrs. Mayo was full of cordial inquiries of where Mr. Ridley had been all this while; and Dick, that splendid fellow, was in his best and most brilliant vein, sending forth from behind that great mustache startling suggestion and witty sally—when a small fac-simile of Dick, a younger member of the family, whom every body supposed was at school by this hour, came bursting into the room, as boys of twelve are apt to do, and insisted upon a private conversation with his elder brother. Whereupon Dick, after listening to a whispered word or two, rose with a good-natured laugh and went out with him. He was gone but a few moments—about long enough for Julia to remark, in her slightly annoyed tone, that “Dick always spoiled Harry,” and for Mrs. Mayo to offer a little mild defense; and then the door opened, and he appeared again with the good-natured laugh yet lingering on his lips.

“Dick, you spoil Harry indulging him in plunging into a room, pell-mell, like that!” said Julia, reprovingly.

“Do I? Well, never mind now,” Dick answered, with that careless air of indifference which was more trying to Julia than his roughness. “Never mind that now; but look here! Isn’t this pretty well, Ridley, for a twelve-year-old?” and he held out, between his thumb and finger, a little fluttering object which to Ridley was an utter mystery.

“What is it?” he asked.

“What is it? Why, man, have you entirely forgotten the time when you were a youngster? What is it!”

“It’s a May-basket, Mr. Ridley, don’t you see?” and Julia leaned forward as she spoke and transferred it from Dick’s thumb and finger to the shining silver door-knob. And then she said, laughing: “Not so exclusively a juvenile matter either, as Dick would have you suppose, Mr. Ridley”—Julia had taken a little state upon herself of late, and dropped the title of “cousin”—“for last May-day this was left at my door, filled with the loveliest flowers." And Julia lifted up from a little buhl table the quaintest conceit of a basket—a costly trifle of frosted silver and mother-of-pearl.

"And last May-day I hung a May-basket at somebody's door, and much good came of it," confessed Dick, suddenly, in that reckless, half-jocose way of his. And at once Tom Ridley felt all that he meant, and knew the door had been Anna Dearing's; but while a thought of kindly sympathy went through his mind for this good fellow, another, and far more absorbing and exciting thought, was flashing through his mind. This was his "way"—the way that he had been looking for all these weeks. For what could be a prettier stratagem than this; to leave at Anna Dearing's door some charming little toy of a May-basket, like the one he had just seen, of silver and mother-of-pearl? And what if beneath the burden of flowers there should lie another offering? It was what many a friend might do—certainly the simplest thing in the world—a festival-gift or remembrance, no more; and she could scarcely reject that. Thinking thus, he scarcely heard Dick tell his story of Master Harry's little pink-and-white token, which that young gentleman had adjoined him to ornament with certain arabesques and other dainty picturing, in which Dick's hand was known to excel. No, Tom Ridley scarcely heard this, nor Julia's half gay and half vexed badinage upon his abstraction. And when very shortly he rose to go, he did not see that Dick's clear, keen eyes were upon him with a thoughtful observation. Nor, perhaps, if he had seen it would he have cared, nor even have minded much perhaps, if he had known Dick's shrewd guess at a partial truth; for it can not be denied that Dick Mayo had by those shrewd instincts of his come at this partial truth in his observation—that he had said to himself, "Ridley has taken a hint from this May-basket talk; he's certainly going to follow my last year's example. I wonder—I wonder if it can be Anna Dearing?"

But little as Tom Ridley would have minded this knowledge on the part of such a manly fellow as Dick Mayo, he did not even suspect or think of its possibility, because his mind was utterly absorbed in what he was to do.

"How stupid and disagreeable Tom Ridley has become!" Julia exclaimed, in a huff, as the door closed upon him. "He was really quite a charming person when he first came home!"

"Ridley's something better than charming," her brother answered, thoughtfully. And then, in a more mischievous tone: "And staying away from here certainly doesn't make him stupid, though it may disagreeable!"

"I saw him walking the other day with Anna Dearing; perhaps he goes there," said Mrs. Mayo, innocently.

"Perhaps he does—perhaps he does," Dick uttered slowly, and there came into his eyes that keen, clear look again—a look of conviction touched with a mortal sadness. But Julia's face was dark and haughty, and there was a sneer upon her lip which was not pleasant to see. And while she idled away that balmy April afternoon, and speculated and pondered with angry disdain upon the conquest she thought she had missed, Anna Dearing, little thinking that she could be an object of envy or disdain, was hard at work over her daily tasks. And these daily tasks were no light matter. There were several pages of copying to do—she would have been glad if there had been more in their present need—a few finishing strokes to put to some little sketches in oil—small undertakings, yet full of great importance to her—and then a long walk, which might or might not prove successful in the end. This was enough to fill one afternoon—to fill it with anxious thought, too, and weary, weary care! And when night came she was very tired and very sore at heart, for success had failed her again, as it does seem to fail, again and again, at the darkest points of life sometimes. So she put the pretty unsold pictures aside, and tried to keep her courage up by saying to herself that she should certainly have better luck next time; but this was sorry comfort, and did not help her much! It was the last day of the month—the last of April—a soft and summerish night; so soft that she had sat down by the open window as she came in, to cool the fever of her weary brain.

"What were they to do?" she wondered, vaguely, as she sat there. In a few weeks they would be homeless—or, at least, with only such a chance home as her slender earnings could give. Alas, it was very bitter! And as this bitterness surged through her mind, the balmy breeze blew by with an almost forgotten scent of arbutus—that special flower of May. And looking out she saw a little group of boys and girls returning from the woods, with hands and arms full of this blossomy treasure. Wafting in to her, too, came their blithe, eager voices, talking gayly of their spoils and merry plans of pleasure. To a less noble person than Anna Dearing this happiness, in which she had no share—and which, indeed, offered contrast to her own sad lot—might have brought added bitterness. But, instead, it was as if the soft spring-tide wind had come to her with some tender whisper of comfort. "I know what I will do," she said, gently, to herself. "I will go away somewhere into the country. Mother will like it better than any place here now. And there I will work as I can. I can certainly find something to do." And this thought went with her to her couch that night, and followed her in her dreams, and altogether made her more tranquil than she had been for days before. Throwing up her window the next morning, there beneath she saw in the early sunshine another youthful party wending their way toward the country. And there across the street—it was a very quiet, old-fashioned street—a little flock had just hung one of those parti-colored paper baskets, and were now scampering off—after a prodigious pull at the bell—for safe but not unseen hiding. It was like a picture torn out of her own child's-book of life and held up before her. "And it wasn't so very long ago that I enjoyed all this just as they do!" she said, softly, to herself, with a breath of color blown into her cheeks and a far-away look in her eyes. And it was at this moment that somebody gave a prodigious pull to her bell, which startled her not a little, and put to flight her pleasant memories.

"It's the man I spoke to yesterday about taking those things to the auction-room, I suppose," she explained to her mother as she went down. But she was mistaken. It was not the man to whom she had spoken yesterday; it was an express courier with a package for her—a box marked definitely with her name and residence, so there could be no mistake. Who could be sending her a box? And she stood studying the handwriting of the direction, as people will a letter sometimes. And then she bethought herself and opened it, when in a breath the mystery was clear. Violets, and arbutus, and every wild or garden scent that ever grew, wafted up to her their heavenly odors. Somebody had sent her a May-basket! She lifted it out. The prettiest May-basket she had ever seen, looking as though it had been woven by fairy fingers, and filled by fairy hands. Could it be that the McLeans had returned, for who else would remember her like this? and last year they had sent her just such choice dainties. It must be the McLeans. They had come back sooner than they had intended, and this was the token of their presence. For a moment all disappointment, care, and anxiety were banished in the pleasure of being thus remembered.

"See, mother!" she said, brightly, as Mrs. Dearing entered the room. And Mrs. Dearing looked and admired and confirmed the opinion of her daughter: "Of course it was the McLeans."

And then it was that Anna prepared to remove the flowery treasures from their delicate receptacle.

"The sender never meant they should remain here; that is certain, mother, for see how frail this work is, and how white!—like those little East Indian baskets of ivory Aunt Ellen used to tell about." She took the flowers out, one by one, and laid them in a glass dish filled with water. One by one, and there, at last, she comes to a white inclosure lying seal upward.

"Ah, mother! here at the bottom is a note; that is so like Mrs. McLean. Now we shall know the whole story."

Mrs. Dearing was busy over her coffee-making, and waiting to hear the contents of the note.

"Well, what is it, Anna? why don't you read it?"

"There is nothing to read, mother; look here!"

There was a change in Anna's voice, a hushed tone as it were, and in her face a pale wonder which instantly arrested her mother's attention.

"Anna, you frighten me, what is it?"

And then Anna Dearing came round to her mother's side and showed her the contents of that white inclosure. It was no note, no written word from Mrs. McLean, but a roll of bank-bills which met her astonished gaze. She took it from her daughter's hands and counted it over mechanically. Then she looked up with a new light in her eyes.

"Anna, it is enough to pay off the mortgage. Mr. McLean was your father's oldest friend. We can surely accept this from him."

Anna Dearing was morbidly proud, perhaps, but she was not ungracious; and this delicate conveyance of so greatly needed a gift from her "father's oldest friend" was not a deed she could quarrel with or reject. Instead, her whole nature was melted within her.

"And only think, mother, but last night I was fancying that we hadn't a friend in the world." They looked up at each other a moment, and then neither could see for tears. It was a blessed relief, and not for one instant did they question its source. Full of delicate reserve and tact themselves, they thought they understood the whole matter. They thought it was very plain that this "old friend," ascertaining their strait on his arrival, had at once acted upon it in this manner without heralding his own presence in any way. He was always a little eccentric, always disposed to do things quietly and differently from others. So they would bide his time, and wait his pleasure to thank him. In the mean time no hearts could be more thankful than theirs. And in the mean time down the lakes of Lucerne Mr. McLean and his party were sailing, with no thought of them, and with no knowledge of their strait.

It was well they did not know this at the time—that they fully believed in the agency of "this old friend;" for thus, unquestioning, they made use of the help that was sent them, and the little home was saved. A poor little home enough, scarcely worth the amount of mortgage, perhaps, but it was their own.

Of course the time must come, sooner or later, when the truth would be discovered to them—when they would know that, on that lovely day of May, the friends they had supposed so near were still on a foreign shore, with no knowledge of their strait, and perhaps with little thought of them. Sooner or later this time must come. And it did come very suddenly and curiously, as such things almost always will. The money, as I have said, had been made use of in a happy, unquestioning spirit, with the supposition that it came from her father's oldest friend; and then they waited for further sign of this friend. Day after day, week after week went by, without bringing this looked-for sign, until at last both Mrs. Dearing and Anna felt a vague uneasiness in the midst of their surprise. It was so odd of the McLeans. And out of this surprise Anna spoke one evening to Tom Ridley, who, after a brief absence from the city, had resumed his old habit of dropping in upon them. It was a perfectly commonplace inquiry, and conveyed no particular meaning to him. Had he seen any thing of the M'Leans since their return, for she believed he was a friend of theirs?

"The M'Leans! when did they return? You certainly must be misinformed, Miss Dearing, for I had a letter not long since from them, dated at Lucerne; and they could not be here unless they started at once, which, however, I am sure they did not do, for Mr. M'Lean makes mention, now I think of it, that they were going on to Rome for a week or so, and then would return to Lucerne for the summer."

"When was your letter dated? Pardon me, but I have special reasons for asking," she inquired quickly. Entirely unsuspecting of her reason, he hunted, first in one pocket, then another, and finally handed her the letter open at the page of dating. It was the first of May. For a moment she was silent through intense astonishment. Then in a bewildered tone she murmured, as if to herself, "The first of May, I can not understand it."

Still unsuspecting, he said,

"What is it you can not understand, Miss Dearing? Perhaps I can help you."

"No, it isn't likely, thank you," she replied, recovering herself in a measure. "If they were in Lucerne the first of May, they could have known nothing—I beg your pardon," she interrupted, confusedly; "but something came to me on that day which I was sure could only be from the M'Leans."

As she finished speaking she looked up into his face. So utterly taken by surprise was he that a fiery flush sprang to his very brow, and his eyes fell beneath hers. In an instant she saw it all—the long desire to serve her, the May-day artifice, and the little absence from town till the matter was tidied over. Startled, bewildered, and excited, she rose up from her chair, hesitated a moment, and then sitting down again, bent her head into her hands and burst into a passion of tears.

"Anna, Miss Dearing, forgive me! I know I have deceived you—have been intrusive, presumptuous perhaps; but how else could I serve you? and how could I see you suffer, even as a friend?—how could I?" And here all his long reserve was borne away upon a more resistless tide. He did not stop now to consider success or failure. His mind was clear only upon that one point—to open his whole heart to her, and let her judge him as friend or lover. His words were not many, but they were very eloquent. Listening to them, Anna Dearing could not fail to appreciate that he meant what he said, and that he was capable of serving her as he averred, either as friend or lover. No woman, after such hearing, could refuse such friendship as this, but how would it be with the other? How would it be?

She lifted her head as he ceased speaking and looked up into his face. His heart thrilled as he met that glance, for there was something in her eyes he had never seen there before.

"Forgive you," she said, in a low, intense voice—"I have nothing to forgive. I have only to acknowledge the most generous and delicate friendship."

He rose from his seat now and came round to where she was sitting. "And is there nothing else," he asked—"nothing else than friendship?"

Again she lifted her eyes, and again for one moment he caught that glance. Soft, tender, and impassioned it shone through her tears. And suddenly he knew that, though she had given no sign before, she had loved him all the while!

It was one of the "Faust nights," and a great crowd was assembled, waiting for the curtain to rise, while the orchestra's flute, violin, bassoon, were making that dulcet music to which hundreds of little hands and feet always keep time. So Julia Mayo's slender fingers went beating out the measures half unconsciously, as her eyes ranged the house. At her elbow was that young dandy—Arkwright; the handsomest man of his day. And leaning out upon the cushioned bar her brother Dick hummed the orchestral changes.

Altogether Julia was pleasantly situated, and enjoying herself according to her wont when suddenly something jarred the music all out of tune for her. This something was: "Look there, Miss Julia. There's Ridley—Tom Ridley and his fiancée, Miss Dearing. What, you didn't know? I congratulated him last night."

And then Arkwright skipped lightly to another subject; but Julia didn't follow him. For the time her mind was intent upon that group just entering. Tom Ridley and his fiancée, and Mrs. Dearing. Julia Mayo was never in love with Tom Ridley. This handsome fellow at her elbow was much better suited to her. Why, then, should that cloud pass over her face, and the music be out of tune for her? Ah, why? Can any body answer? Can any body tell why ambition rules half the world, and conquest seems better than constancy sometimes?

And can any body tell why Miss Julia, in a moment more, smoothed out that ruffled brow and turned with that riant air to her brother, saying: "Oh, Dick, Mr. Arkwright says that Mr. Ridley is engaged to your old favorite, Anna Dearing. Isn't it nice?"

Dick Mayo gave a great start. Then he answered, grimly:

"Nice? Well, I shouldn't have thought of it in that light."

Arkwright did not understand this, and he leaned forward, asking: "Why, Mayo, don't you like Ridley? Don't you think him worthy of Miss Dearing?"

Dick Mayo lifted those deep-set, searching eyes of his to the questioner. "Think him worthy? I think Miss Dearing worthy of the first gentleman in the land. And I think Mr. Ridley worthy of Miss Dearing!"

Arkwright looked a little astonished, and Dick settled himself in his seat again; and sent those brave, kind eyes across the house in a glance of greeting. And as Anna Dearing and her lover met that glance—that cordial smile just touched with melancholy, they said to each other, as if with one mind: “He is a grand fellow.” And that was all they ever said. But Tom Ridley, sitting there, thought again of those words: “If Shakspeare loved me, and I did not love him, how could I marry him?”

WILMINGTON DURING THE BLOCKADE.

BY A LATE CONFEDERATE OFFICER.

AFTER the capital of the Confederacy there was not in the South a more important place than the little town of Wilmington, North Carolina, about twenty miles from the mouth of the Cape Fear River, noted in peace times for its exports of tar, pitch, turpentine, and lumber. The banks of the Cape Fear had been settled by Sir Walter Raleigh's emigrants and Scotchmen, and to this day you find the old Highland names, and see strongly-marked Scottish features among the inhabitants. The people still retain many of the traits of their descent, and are shrewd, canny, money-making, and not to be beaten at driving a bargain by any Yankee that we ever saw. They are hospitable, intelligent, and polished; many old families, who for years have lived in affluence and luxury, residing there, who have intermarried with each other until they form a large “cousinhood,” as they call it.

Previous to the war Wilmington was very gay and social. But the war had sadly changed the place—many of the old families moving away into the interior, and those who remained, either from altered circumstances or the loss of relatives in battle, living in reticacy. When we first knew it, Major-General W. H. C. Whiting was in command. He was an old army officer, who for a long time had been stationed at Smithville, near the Old Inlet at the mouth of the river, where prior to the war there had been a fort and a garrison, though for some years disused. Whiting was one of the most accomplished officers in the Southern army. He was a splendid engineer, and having been engaged in the Coast Survey for some time on that portion of the coast, knew the country thoroughly, the capability of defense, the strong and the weak points. His manners were brusque, but he had a kind and generous heart. He was fond of the social glass, and may have sometimes gone too far. He was not popular with many of the citizens, as he was arbitrary, and paid little attention to the suggestions of civilians. He was a very handsome, soldierly-looking man, and though rough sometimes in his manners, he was a gentleman at heart, incapable of any thing mean or low, and of undaunted courage. Peace to his ashes!

On Whiting's staff were three young officers of great promise: his brother-in-law, Major J.

H. Hill, of the old army, now an active express agent at Wilmington; Major Benjamin Sloan, his ordnance officer, now teaching school somewhere in the mountains of South Carolina; and Lieutenant J. H. Fairley, a young Irishman, who had been many years in this country, and who hailed from South Carolina. Fairley was noted in the army as a daring scout and very hard rider, withal one of the quietest and most modest of men. He is now drumming for a dry-good house in New York, instead of inspecting the outposts. We wonder if he recollects the night when the writer hereof picked up a rattlesnake in his blanket at Masonboro Sound.

Whiting scarcely ever had enough troops at his command to make up a respectable Confederate Division. In '64 he had at Wilmington Martin's Brigade, which was a very fine and large one, composed of four North Carolina regiments, remarkably well officered; two or three companies of heavy artillery in the town, doing provost and guard duty; at Fort Caswell, at the mouth of the Old Inlet on the Western Bar, a battalion of heavy artillery and a light battery; at Smithville a similar battalion; at Baldhead, opposite Caswell, an island, Col. Hedrick's North Carolina regiment, about 600 men effective; at Fort Fisher Lamb's North Carolina regiment, about 700 effective men; a company at Fort Anderson; a company of the 7th C. S. cavalry at the ferry over New River, 60 miles northeast of Wilmington, on the Sound; two companies of cavalry, a light battery, and a company of infantry at Kenansville, 40 miles north of Wilmington and 7 miles west of the Weldon Railroad. These, with two or three light batteries scattered along the Sound, from a little above Fort Fisher up to Toprail, constituted in the spring of '64 the whole Confederate force in the Department of Cape Fear.

With this force, and Whiting's skill and bravery, we military men thought we could hold Wilmington. For we justly regarded the General as one of the few eminently fit appointments that the War Department had made. It certainly made some curious selections, e.g., the placing of the dashing, impetuous Van Dorn in command of a Department—the last place in the world he was suited for—instead of giving him a cavalry command of 10,000 men and placing him in the Trans-Mississippi Department. Had the latter been done the Federals would have found Van Dorn a troublesome customer in Missouri. But in Whiting we had implicit faith. So, though there were constant rumors of expeditions against the place we scarcely believed they were coming, so long had the thing been delayed, and, in fact, an attack was wished for by the youthful Hotspurs to relieve the monotony of the garrison life at Caswell, Baldhead, and Fisher. Wiser people knew better. In fact we had lapsed into a dream of security, or thought, at least, the evil day was far off. We ate, drank, and were merry, and there was marrying and giving in marriage, as in the days before the flood.

It seemed singular to us that the United States should so long neglect to close the only port almost of the Confederacy into which every "dark of the moon" there ran a half dozen or so swift blockade-runners, freighted with cannon, muskets, and every munition of war—medicines, cloth, shoes, bacon, etc. Through that port were brought till January '65 all the stores and material needed by the indefatigable Colonel Gorgas, the Confederate Chief of Ordnance, the most efficient bureau officer the Confederacy had. Through it came those famous Whitworth and Armstrong guns sent us by our English friends. Into Wilmington was brought by Mr. Commissary-General Northrup that rotten, putrid bacon called "Nassau," because it had spoiled on the wharves of that place before reshipped for Wilmington. It was coarse Western bacon, bought by Confederate emissaries at the North; and many a time have we implicated curses both loud and deep on poor old Northrup's devoted head as we worried down a piece of the rancid stuff. We must say, in all candor, that he was impartial in his distribution of it, and ordered it given to both Confederate trooper and Federal prisoner. Northrup himself ate none of it; he lived on rice—of which he would buy a hoghead at a time from the Commissariat. We became so riveted in our taste by eating it that at last we came to prefer it to good bacon, and liked the strong, rancid taste. We could not afford to permit our stomachs to eat up any shivers, and forced them to stand any and every thing by breaking them into it.

But the cargoes of those white painted, bird-like looking steamers that floated monthly into Wilmington, producing such excitement and joy among its population, unfortunately for the Confederates did not contain Government stores and munitions of war alone, had as the bacon and much of the stuff bought abroad by worthless Confederate agents were. The public freight compared with the private was small. By them were brought in the cloth that made the uniforms of those gaily-decked clerks that swarmed the streets of Richmond with military titles, and read the battle bulletins and discussed the war news. From that source came the brand, buttons, and stars for that host of "Major" who were truly fifth wheels, and did not even have the value of "following the Colonel around"—with which the Confederacy was afflicted. From it came the fine English brandies, choice foreign wines, potter mounts, and confections, jellies, and anchovy paste, etc., that filled the pantries and store-rooms of many of the officials at Richmond, and were spread out in such profusion at the dinners or suppers or dejeuners given by the "inner circle" (as it was called) to officials when the "circle" wanted any of their pots promoted or assigned to good positions. From it came the loaf-sugar, coffee, tea, etc., that staff-officers, blockade-runners, and their relations and friends luxuriated in, while the ragged, dirty Confederate soldier, market in hand, hooded or soaked in the trenches before Richmond and Petersburg, watching the foe with stout heart but faint stomach; starving on a handful of meal and a pint of sorghum molasses, probably varied every other day with the third or quarter of a pound of Mr. Commissary-General Northrup's savory "Nassau Bacon." Meanwhile his wife and little ones suffering in their far-off Southern home for the necessities of life. It was this that broke the spirit of the Southern army, and caused such numerous desertions from General Lee's camp during the memorable winter of '64 and '65.

In fact there were numbers of Confederate officers, during the period blockade-running came under our view, whose sole business it seemed to be to lay in in that way stocks of groceries and dry-goods, and by speculating and shipping cotton from Wilmington and Charleston to lay by gold in case of an evil day. Many of these came out of the war rich men, and doubtless with comfortable consciences, for who respects or likes a poor man? We will say, however, that we never heard of but two officers of high rank who were accused of this; and one thing was very certain, that Henry Whiting's skirts were clear of such transactions, and that he left his family badly off. It was the small fry generally who engaged in this discreditable business, or the neglect of their soldierly avocations, men who had been either in the retail grocery or dry-goods business before the war, and who could not keep their hands from such pickings, or get over their old "store" habits. It was seldom you caught a West Pointer at this trading business, poor as most of them were, though it must be confessed that two or three of them did fall from grace in this particular.

Talk about Yankees worshipping the almighty dollar! You should have seen the adoration paid the Golden Calf at Wilmington during the days of blockade-running. Every body was engaged in it save the private soldiers and a few poor line and staff officers, who were not within the "ring," and possessed no influence or position there by which they could grant favors.

When a steamer came in, men, women, children rushed down to the wharves to see it, to buy, beg, or steal something. Every body wanted to know if their "costumes"—the proceeds of the sales of cotton or boxes of tobacco sent out—had come in. No people were more en-cited than the women, expecting gloves, parasols, hoop-skirts, corsets, dresses, and bonnets, silks and endives: for these things became frightfully scarce and dear in the South during the last year of the war. The first people aboard of course were the agents—on such occasions very big men. Then swarmed officials and officers, "friends" and "hangers-on," hunting after drinks and dinners, and willing to accept any compliment from a box of cigars or a basket of candy down to a bunch of bananas or a pocketful of oranges. Happy the man who knew well and intimately the steward of a blockade-runner, or could call the cook his friend, and get a part of the stealings from the pantry or the drippings from the kitchen!

How it made those bluff, coarse, vulgar Englishmen stare, who came in as pursers or officers, to see well-dressed gentlemen thus degrading themselves by sponging and loafing and disgracing their uniforms! We have seen many a fellow, bearing a commission, for hours eying from a stand-point on the wharf a blockade-runner as a cat would a mouse, and then just about lunch-time drop aboard to enjoy the Champagne or porter, the sardines or Parmesan and English cheese. We never heard them express it, but we can imagine the intense disgust that such men as John Wilkinson, Robert Carter, and other old navy officers, who occasionally commanded such ships, must have felt at this method some of their Confederate brethren had of living at other people's expense.

As for ourselves, we never had the pleasure of this sort of thing but twice. Once by invitation of our friend George Baer (alias Captain Henry), who immortalized himself by writing that celebrated protest as to the capture of the Greyhound, and by his escape from his captors in Boston. Baer invited us to a fashionable 10 o'clock breakfast on the Index, which he then commanded, and the consequence was we nearly stuffed ourselves to death, and came near having an apoplectic fit. The second time we went by invitation on board the Advance to dinner, and were treated like a "snob," as we deserved to be, for our pains. We shall never forget the cool stare of the steward when we had the audacity to ask for a second piece of pie. We ate it—humble pie indeed—and that awful man's look, which we shall never forget to our dying day, though it came near killing, cured us of any propensity of dining and wining on board blockade-runners. We loved fresh meat and Champagne dearly, but we never sought it again in that quarter.

Wilmington during that period swarmed with foreigners, Jews and Gentiles. In fact, going down the main street or along the river, you might well imagine you were journeying from Jerusalem to Jericho. As to the falling among thieves we will make no mention. The beggars at the gangways of the newly-arrived steamers were as thick as those in Egypt crying "buck-sheesh."

At every turn you "met up," as our tar-heel friends say, with young Englishmen dressed like grooms and jockeys, or with a peculiar coachmanlike look, seeming, in a foreign land, away from their mothers, to indulge their fancy for the outré and extravagant in dress to the utmost. These youngsters had money, made money, lived like fighting-cocks, and astonished the natives by their pranks, and the way they flung the Confederate "stuff" about. Of course they were deeply interested in the Confederate cause, and at the same time wanted cotton. The Liverpool house of Alexander Collie and Co. had quite a regiment of these youngsters in their employ. Fine-looking fellows, with turned-up noses, blue eyes wide apart, and their fluffy, straw-colored, mutton-chop whiskers floating in the wind, to the great admiration of their chère amies, the handsome quad-room washer-women, on whose mantle-pieces and in whose albums were frequently to be found photographs strikingly resembling the aforesaid young foreigners. They occupied a large flaring yellow house, like a military hospital, at the upper end of Market Street, and which belonged to a Mr. Wright. There these youngsters kept open house and spent their pas' and the Company's money, while it lasted. There they fought cocks on Sundays, until the neighbors remonstrated and threatened prosecution. A stranger passing the house at night, and seeing it illuminated with every gas-jet lit (the expense, no doubt, charged to the ship), and hearing the sound of music, would ask if a ball was going on. Oh no! it was only these young English Sybarites enjoying the luxury of a band of negro minstrels after dinner. They entertained any and every body, from Beauregard and Whiting, or Lawley, the voluminous correspondent of the London Times, down to such "bummers" as Vizitelly or the most insufferable sponge or snob who forced his society upon them.

But alas! there came a day when these Masters Primrose, with brandy-flushed faces, faded away, and were scattered like their namesakes before a chilling northeast wind, and Wilmington knew them no more. We doubt not that the population of Wilmington, both white and colored, miss and mourn them sadly.

Of course there were many American houses, and American agents representing English houses, some of whom would fain have aped the hospitality of these young Britishers if they could; and others who upon no account would have done so. There were Crenshaw and Brothers, Confederate Government Agents; Ficklin and Finney, Agents for the State of Virginia; Mitchell and Gervy, of Charleston, Agents of the Bee Line; Salomons and Co., of New Orleans; and a host of others of less importance, or no importance at all. Of course they all made fortunes—some at the expense of their country, some at the expense of their companies; which latter, in consequence, often had small dividends to make.

The tribe of Benjamin was very well represented at Wilmington, as you may imagine, the unctuous and oleaginous Confederate Secretary of State having well provided for "his people." A great many gentlemen of strongly Jewish physiognomy were to be met with on the streets, in very delicate health, and with papers in their pockets to keep them out of the army from the Secretary of State, but still in hot pursuit of the "monish." When the conscript officer became very zealous and pressing they fled away to Nassau and Bermuda. We recollect, upon one occasion, when a very distinguished naval officer in the Confederate service was going to run the blockade, three men, representing themselves as being intended for the crew of a Confederate cruiser abroad, presented themselves with notes from a high Government official, requesting that passage be furnished them to Nassau. Lieutenant J—— told them:

"Gentlemen, if I take you under these circumstances, you can not go as passengers; you will have to go in the forecabin, as common sailors."

"Very well," said they; "any way will do."

So they went out with the nominal purpose of joining the crew of the cruiser that was being fitted out in Europe. When the vessel got to Nassau, in a few days one of the party had his sign up as a practicing physician; the other had gone into business in a store; and the third came to Lieutenant J——, and begged him to take him as his steward.

"Why," said the officer, "you are a gentleman by birth and education; you are not fitted to be a steward—a waiter."

"Never mind," replied the unhappy impecunious individual; "I am out of money, and must do something."

There were many other such instances of refugees from conscription. In Richmond they used to get through the lines in coffins. At Wilmington scarce a steamer went out without some "stowaways," whom it was not always possible to smoke out, or without some weak-kneed individual who, by hook or crook, in some mysterious way managed to get a passport and to escape the conscript officer.

The Confederate Government used to send some queer agents abroad at the expense of the people. A Mrs. Grinnell was sent out by the Surgeon-General—so she stated—to get bandages, etc., which nobody else, we suppose, but Mrs. Grinnell could get. She was an Englishwoman, of that class and with those manners which any man, if he has traveled much, has often seen. She gave herself out as a daughter of an English baronet, and had first come to New York several years prior to the war. Then there was Belle Boyd, who represented herself, we believe, as an agent sent out by Mr. Benjamin. She was captured, with our friend George Baer, on the Greyhound. Another was a Mrs. Baxley, of Baltimore. She represented herself, we believe, as an agent of old Mr. Memminger—that compeer of Gallatin and Neckar—who, by-the-way, ever since the surrender has been hiding away somewhere up in the mountain fastnesses of South Carolina, in mortal terror; and who, whenever he hears of even a bureau agent in the shape of a chaplain being in the neighborhood, immediately hies himself off to his retreat, not to reappear till the representative of the United States has departed the vicinity. The fact is, the United States ought to send old Mr. Memminger a free pardon and grant him a pension. He did about as much as any other man we know of to break down the Confederacy. Mallory should be taken care of for life. And as for Benjamin, the United States never can repay the debt of gratitude it owes him for having, by his unfortunate counsels, assisted it in the destruction of "the rebellion." They should send a public ship to bring Benjamin back to his sorrowing country, which so deeply mourns his loss.

Mr. Mallory's navy was always the laughing-stock of the army, and many were the jeers that the Confederate "mud-crushers" let off at his iron-clads, formidable things as they were, had he managed properly the Confederate navy. Captain Lynch was the flag-officer of the Cape Fear squadron when we first went there. His fleet consisted of the iron-clad ram North Carolina, which drew so much water that she could never get over the bars of the Cape Fear River Inlet—except, possibly, at the highest spring-tide, and then the chances were against her ever getting back again; the Raleigh, another iron-clad, not completed till late in the summer of '64; and two or three little steam-tugs. They all came to grief. The North Carolina, the bottom of which was neither sheathed nor prepared to resist the worms, was pierced by them till her hull was like a honey-comb, and finally was sunk opposite Smithville. The Raleigh, after going out and scaring off the blockading fleet at the New Inlet, was beached and lost on a bar near Fort Fisher in returning. The tugs were burned on the river subsequent to the evacuation of the town.

Whiting and Lynch from some cause or other never were on good terms, jealous of each other's authority, we suppose. It finally came near culminating seriously. There had been an order sent by Mr. Mallory to Lynch, in pursuance of an act of the Confederate Congress, not to let any vessel go out without taking out a certain proportion of Government cotton. Lynch was commander of the naval defenses of the Cape Fear. By some oversight the Adjutant-General's office at Richmond had sent no such order to Whiting, who commanded the Department, and consequently the port and its regulations. One of Collier's steamers was about to go out without complying with the law. Old Lynch sent a half company of marines on board of her and took possession. This Whiting resented rather haughtily as an unwarrantable interference with his authority as Commander of the port, and marching in a battalion of the Seventeenth North Carolina Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel John C. Lamb, ejected the marines, and took possession of the steamer and hauled her up stream to her wharf. Lynch said he did not care how far Whiting took her up the river, but he vowed if any attempt was made to take her to sea he would sink her, and he shotted his guns. Matters looked squally and excitement was high. A collision was feared. They were both summoned to Richmond to explain, and both returned apparently satisfied. Lynch, however, was shortly afterward relieved, and Commodore Pinckney took his place.

We had often wondered why the port was not more effectually closed. To tell the truth it was hardly closed at all. Many of the blockade-runners continued their career till the fall of Fisher. An experienced captain and good engineer invariably brought a ship safe by the blockading squadron. Wilkinson and Carter never failed—good sailors, cool, cautious, and resolute they ran in and out without difficulty many times. The great danger was from the exterior line of the blockaders some forty or fifty miles out.

But owing to the configuration of the coast it is almost impossible to effect a close blockade. The Cape Fear has two mouths, the Old Inlet, at the entrance of which Fort Caswell stands, and the New Inlet, nine miles up the river, where Fisher guards the entrance. From the station off the Old Inlet, where there were usually from five to six blockaders, around to the station off the New Inlet, a vessel would have to make an arc of some fifty miles, owing to the Fryling Pan Shoals intervening, while from Caswell across to Fisher it was only nine miles. The plan of the blockade-runners coming in was to strike the coast thirty or forty miles above or below the Inlets, and then run along (of course at night) till they got under the protection of the forts. Sometimes they got in or out by boldly running through the blockading fleet, but that was hazardous, for if discovered, the ocean was alive with rockets and lights, and it was no pleasant thing to have shells and balls whistling over you and around you. The chances were, then, that if you were not caught, you had, in spite of your speed, to throw a good many bales of cotton overboard.

The wreck of these blockade-runners not unfrequently occurred by being stranded or beached, and highly diverting skirmishes would occur between the blockaders and the garrisons of the forts for the possession. The fleet, however, never liked the Whitworth guns that we had, which shot almost with the accuracy of a rifle and with a tremendous range. The soldiers generally managed to wreck the stranded vessels successfully, though oftentimes with great peril and hardship. It mattered very little to the owners then who got her, as they did not see much of what was recovered—the soldiers thinking they were entitled to what they got at the risk of their lives. But a wreck was a most demoralizing affair—the whole garrison generally got drunk and staid drunk for a week or so afterward. Brandy and fine wines flowed like water; and it was a month perhaps before matters could be got straight. Many accumulated snug little sums from the misfortunes of the blockade-runners, who generally denounced such pillage as piracy; but it could not be helped.

We recollect the wrecking of the Ella off Baldhead in December, '64. She belonged to the Bee Company of Charleston, and was a splendid new steamer, on her second trip in, with a large and valuable cargo almost entirely owned by private parties and speculators. She was chased ashore by the blockading fleet, and immediately abandoned by her officers and crew, whom nothing would induce to go back in order to save her cargo. Yankee shells flying over, and through, and around her had no charms for these sons of Neptune. Captain Badham, however, and his company, the Edenton (N. C.) Battery, with Captain Bahnson, a fighting Quaker from Salem, N. C., boarded and wrecked her under the fire of the Federals—six shells passing through the Ella while they were removing her cargo. The consequence was that for a month afterward nearly the whole garrison were on "a tight," and groceries and dry-goods were plentiful in that vicinity. The general demoralization produced by "London Dock" and "Hollands" seemed even to have affected that holy man, the Chaplain, who said some very queer graces at the head-quarter's mess-table.

Seldom, however, was there any loss of life attending these wrecks. But there was one notable case of the drowning of a famous woman, celebrated for her beauty and powers of fascination. We allude to the death of Mrs. Greenhow, so well known for many years in Washington circles. Before she even crossed the Confederate lines she had undoubtedly rendered valuable service to the authorities at Richmond, and was in consequence imprisoned by the Federal authorities in Washington. After coming to Richmond and laboring in the hospitals there for some time she sailed for Europe from Wilmington, and it was on her return trip that she was drowned, just as she reached the shores of the South. She had lived past her beauty's prime, had drank deep of fashion and folly's stream of pleasure, had received the admiration and adulation of hundreds of her fellow-mortals, and had reached that point in life when those things no longer please but pall on the senses. Her time had come. The small boat in which she was coming from the vessel, which was beached just a short distance above Fisher, upset. Mrs. Greenhow, after sinking several times, was brought to shore, but soon after reaching it died. It was said that the gold she had sewed up and concealed about her person had borne her down and was the cause of her death; that had it not been for that weight she would have been saved. Her body was brought to Wilmington and laid out in the Sailors' Church, where we saw her. She was beautiful in death. After her funeral her wardrobe and a great many articles that she had brought over for sale, and which had been rescued from the wreck, were sold at auction in Wilmington. It was very splendid, and the "venture" she had brought in for sale was most costly. It was said that an English countess or duchess had an interest in this venture, and was to have shared the profits of the speculation.

But the storm was soon to rain on our devoted heads. Those white-painted steamers, clipping the water so nimbly, with the British and Confederate flags flying, with their brandies and wines, their silks and calicoes, their bananas and oranges, and gladdening the hearts of the dwellers on the bank of the Cape Fear, were soon to disappear from its waters, and the glory of Wilmington to depart.

Day after day we had watched the blockading fleet with the naked eye and a glass, and often thought what a lonely time those fellows must be having, and longed for some northeast storm to send them on the coast, in order that we might have the pleasure of their acquaintance. Cushing's, by-the-way, we came very near making, when that daring officer came up the Cape Fear in June, we think it was, '64, passing through the New Inlet by Fort Fisher with a boat's crew of some eighteen or twenty sailors and marines, and, landing half-way between the town and the fort, concealed his boat in a creek, and laid perdu on the Wilmington and Fisher road, waiting for Whiting or Lamb to come along. A mere accident enabled us to escape him; and though of no importance ourselves, we had papers with us at the time that would have been highly interesting to the United States Government. We all of us admired his courage, and thought it deserved success. We well remember delivering Cushing's message (repeated to us by the old citizen whom he caught and released) to General Whiting, that "he had been in Wilmington, and would have him or Colonel Lamb shortly."

On December 24, '64, the armada commanded by Butler and Porter appeared off the coast. That day the United States forces under Butler landed, and the bombardment of Fisher commenced, and such a feu d'enfer as was poured on that devoted fort was never seen. Coming up the river from Smithville on a steamer that afternoon we witnessed it, and such a roar of artillery we never heard. Those large double-enders seemed to stand in remarkably close to the fort, and deliver their fire with great accuracy, knocking up the sand on the ramparts. It seemed a continuous hail of shot and shell, many of them going over Fisher and dropping in the river. But Fisher was a long sand fort, stretching in an obtuse angle from the river bank around to the mouth of the New Inlet, that opened into the ocean. It was over a mile from point to point. Though it was thus heavily bombarded for two days, little or no impression was made on its works except to give them a ragged appearance, and very few casualties occurred, the garrison sticking mostly to their bomb-proofs, which were very complete. Whiting was there in command in person, having been sent there by Bragg, of which latter personage present.

On Saturday night, Christmas-eve, Butler's powder-ship was exploded. It appears to have made no impression on the fort or the garrison, but we must confess those 300 tons of powder going off made us, though twenty miles off, feel very weak in the knees, and shook our nerves considerably, for we did not know what it was at first, nor what had occurred. About 2 A.M. we were quietly asleep in our quarters with our wife and little one by our side, when this terrible explosion occurred. It must have been heard with greater effect in Wilmington than at the fort, possibly from the fact that the wind was setting in that direction, though the town was twenty miles off. There came in the dead of night that awful noise; the earth seemed to heave, the house shook violently, as if the walls were going to fall out and the roof coming down on us. The baby slept quietly on in its cradle; our better-half clung to us, and hysterically insisted that we should say the Lord's Prayer. Though very familiar with it and the rest of the Bible, to save our lives we could not recollect it. Butler's powder-ship had completely knocked all of our memory out of us. We do not believe we could at that moment have told our own name, so completely had the terrific noise upset us.

The next day, Christmas, was Sunday, and all day Porter's guns were thundering away at Fisher and shaking the windows in Wilmington, where the citizens were offering up their prayers for our protection from the enemy. Communication with Fort Fisher by land or telegraph was then cut off—the messages had been sent up to that time. Toward night sensational messages commenced to be brought up from below—one to the effect that the enemy were on the parapet at Fisher (in truth and in fact they never got closer than the stables, at least two or three hundred yards from the fort). Bragg sent Mrs. Bragg away that night at 9 P.M., in a special train, up the Weldon Road, and an officer who saw him at about 11 P.M. reported that the old gentleman seemed to be quite unnerved, and that his hand was very tremulous. Of course there was a great exodus of civilians from the place the next morning early, the fact that Mrs. Bragg had gone off acting as a key-note of alarm to others. By mid-day, however, Monday these sensational reports and stories were all quieted by the authenticated news that the enemy had re-embarked on the fleet, and that the attack had ceased. Then the fleet sailed, and every thing quieted down. The general impression was that there would not be another attack till after the spring equinox, in May, say, or the June following.

When Whiting returned to the city Bragg still continued in command, and his friends and himself evidently took the credit of having foiled Butler's attempt. Bragg was a friend and favorite of Mr. Davis. He had sided with General Taylor in Taylor's quarrel with General Scott, and Mr. Davis was a man who never forgot his friends nor forgave his enemies. He seemed determined to sustain Bragg at all events, though the feeling throughout the whole army, and in fact the South, was against that General. When Wilmington was known to be threatened, and Bragg was sent there, the Richmond Examiner simply remarked, "Good-by, Wilmington!" and the prediction was verified.

Whiting, after the first attack, wrote to Bragg, advising that in case of another attack, which would probably be made, to prevent surprise he would advise that Hagood's South Carolina brigade, numbering over 2000 effective men, be thrown into Fort Fisher, the garrison of which consisted of one raw, inexperienced regiment that had never smelled powder except in the first attack, and which did not number even over 700 effective men. Hagood's troops were veterans, and had been in many a battle. He also advised that the three other brigades of Hoke's division be placed along about the spot where the Federals had first landed, and be intrenched so as to prevent a landing above the fort. Wise precautions if they had been adopted. Bragg indorsed on the letter of advice from Whiting that he saw no necessity in carrying out those suggestions. It was the failure to carry out those suggestions that lost Wilmington. Had they been followed Wilmington would not have fallen when it did, nor Fisher have been taken. Instead, Bragg brought Hoke's division up about a half mile back of Wilmington, over twenty miles from the fort, and had a grand review there, in which he paraded himself in a new suit of uniform presented to him by his admirers in Wilmington.

Whiting's prediction about a surprise was shortly to be verified. Thursday night, the 10th of January, '65, the fleet again appeared off Fisher, this time through Bragg's imbecility, to do its work effectually, and Friday morning the citizens of Wilmington were aroused by the booming of Porter's cannon a second time opening on Fisher. When the news came up at midnight that the fleet had again appeared, the band of Hoke's division were in town serenading, the officers were visiting, and the men scattered about—Bragg no doubt asleep in fancied security.

Of the capture of Fort Fisher, and the subsequent inevitable loss of Wilmington, I shall not speak. These events have passed into history. My purpose has been simply to portray the aspect of Wilmington when blockaded.

MY CROSS.

WE sat alone, grandmother and I. She was my father's mother, and had left a comfortable home of her own to come to us when my mother died. I was only ten years old then, and during the eight years since she had hardly let me find out what it was to be motherless. Father had never married again—partly, I think, because he had loved my mother with all his heart, and had no room left in it for any new-comer; and partly, doubtless, because grandmother had made his home so entirely comfortable and homelike that he had never experienced those thousand little domestic discomforts which sting so many widowers into matrimony.

The room we sat in this spring afternoon was the very heart of home, and looked so. A large, low room, with oak wainscoting and old-fashioned windows. There was a carpet on the floor of sombre but warm colors; on the walls, at one side, oaken book-shelves, well-filled; some plants on a stand at a south window; brackets here and there, with little vases and ornaments, some of which had been my mother's; low easy-chairs; and on the hearth a bright open fire. Grandmother sat at one side of the round table between us, sewing steadily and placidly. The long seam up the middle of a sheet her work was, I remember, and it made me almost angry to see how steadily she plodded along it, how contented she was to fill up each day with its own commonplace tasks. I grew nervous. My embroidery cotton knotted, then broke, then the eye came out of my needle. I took a new one, and pricked my finger with it. I threw my work down, at last, with something like temper.

"Grandmother," I exclaimed, "what a disappointment life is! But then we are not meant, I suppose, to find our happiness here!" and when I had said that I seemed to myself to have given a religious coloring to my emotions, and felt a little more self-complacent.

The dear old lady smiled slightly—I caught a twinkle of humor in her eyes, though she kept it out of her voice—as she answered, gravely:

"It is a lesson we all learn, as we get on in life, Helen; but not every one has the wisdom to discover it at eighteen."

"Every one would, I think," I said, hotly, "if every thing on which they set their hearts had disappointed them. Life looks to me as barren as the Great Desert."

Grandmother laid down her work for a moment, and gave me a searching, inquisitorial glance.

"Have you and Joe been quarreling?" she asked.

Joe Scarborough was my lover. I had been engaged to him six months. I did love him. I was proud of him. He was a great, strong, manly fellow; a gentleman, all through, though he was a farmer's son, and understood rotation of crops better than changes of fashion.

"No," I said, "Joe and I have not quarreled. Joe won't quarrel, but he is doing me great injustice."

Joe was grandmother's prime favorite. She took up the cudgels at once in his defense.

"That is not like him, Helen; and now, of all times, I should think he was too sad for injustice."

She said "now, of all times," because last week his father had died very suddenly, and she knew that Joe had loved him more than most sons love their fathers. He had such a great, warm heart that all his feelings lay deep—all his affections were stronger than most men's.

I answered her with a question:

"Grandmother, if you had accepted one kind of life, would you feel bound by such a pledge to accept another entirely different? If a man promised you to do one thing, and then coolly told you that he had made up his mind to do another, would you not think it injustice, or perhaps imposition?"

"I think," she said, gravely, "that circumstances alter cases, and I can't pronounce on this case until I understand it."

"When Joe asked me to marry him he told me he fully realized that neither my tastes nor my habits would fit me for being a farmer's wife; and that he should never have thought of asking me to be one. Do you think I'm any more fitted now?"

"I can't say that you are," and the smile which emphasized my grandmother's remark said more than the words did. I understood by it that she thought I had not been improving—growing fitter for any life-work worth doing. It sharpened my temper yet more.

"Well," I said, "your paragon—"

"You mean, I presume, your lover," she interpolated.

I took no notice, except to change the phraseology of my sentence.

"Joe promised to go to town next fall, and get into business. He said that he was going to be a merchant. For my part, I was willing to wait until he could get a salary large enough just to live on, and then I would have shared his lot cheerfully, and helped him all I could, and done without luxuries until the time for them came. That would have suited me. I should have been in the midst of stir and bustle—the rush and movement of life. I could have helped him to rise—I know I could."

"And what is it now?"

"He came last night to tell me that he had changed all his plans. He means to give up going away, and settle down there at home, to take care of his mother and sister. He says, as he shall never be any differently situated, there is no use in waiting, and he wants me to marry him and come home there."

"What did you tell him?"

"That I would take till to-night to think of it. I had promised to share a different life altogether; I wasn't fit for this one, and he knew it."

"Yes," grandmother said, quietly, "he must have known it. But I suppose he was willing to put up with all your imperfections, and make the best of them, for the sake of the love he bore you. You know he might get a wife a great deal more efficient and helpful than you would be."

"Let him, then!"

I said the words defiantly, but I strangled something which was almost a sob at the thought of Joe—my Joe—ever caring for, being helped by, some other woman.

Then I took up my embroidery again, and grandmother stitched away at her sheet, and both of us were silent. I was thinking how I loved Joe, and how I hated farm-work; how fussy old Mrs. Scarborough was, and how stiff and poky Joe's sister Angeline. I don't know what grandmother was thinking; but, after a while, she said, gently:

"We all have some kind of burden to bear, Helen. We can not please ourselves all through life, and then hear the Lord's 'Well done' at the last. He disciplines us with trials, every one—sends each child some cross to carry—why can not you take this for yours?"

"I think old Mrs. Scarborough and Angeline would be too heavy for my shoulders," I answered, tartly. "I don't like them."

"Joe does," uttered grandmother with mild suggestion.

I took refuge in pettiness, and said, flippantly:

"Then Joe may enjoy all the charms of their society without interruption from me."

Grandmother sighed, as she fastened her thread at the end of the long seam, and went out into the kitchen to see about supper. I got up and looked in the glass. I was pretty, and Joe had been right when he said I was unfit for a farmer's wife. I had done nothing but please myself, so far in life. My father was the doctor of the little country town, and there had never been any thing to do at home which grandmother and her one good strong maid of all work were not equal to. My idle life had made me luxurious and indolent. It seemed to me that no love on earth could be strong enough to reconcile me to buttermilk and dishwater. I remembered the farmers' wives here in Hillsbury—meek, faded, washed-out women—who never read, never rode, never sang—who seemed to care only to drag through the slow, unchanging round of each day, and get to bed early at night. If they had ever loved their husbands, their lives now gave them no time for romance or sentiment. Lives! It was not living at all. Of course, if I married Joe I should sink into just such a woman. I looked at my face—bright, young, handsome, as I could not help knowing it was—at my hands, where no rude service had left its imprint. No, I would not marry Joe—mine should not be a marriage in haste for which all my after-life should be one long repentance. This decided, I went up stairs and put on a dress he liked—tied my hair with the "bonny blue ribbons" he always praised. I don't know that I was capable of the conscious cruelty of intending to be as lovely as possible, in order to make him feel his loss the more. What I said to myself was that, at any rate, his last recollections of me should be at my best—I would have a picture photographed on his mind which the useful wife to come should find it hard to rival.

I went down to supper with a good appetite for warm griddle-cakes and fresh maple sirup. I did not begin yet to understand myself or know what I was doing. I was glad that business took my father away after tea, and that grandmother was considerate enough to find something to do in the kitchen. I made the fire bright in the sitting-room, lit a lamp, and put a little glass, filled with some crocuses which I had found in a sheltered corner of the garden, on the round table. Then I stood at the window and watched the early moon rise as I waited for Joe.

He came soon, walking with such firm step, wearing such an expectant look, smiling so brightly, when he saw me at the window, that his very manner piqued me and strengthened my resolution.' Was he, then, so sure? Did he think he had only to map out a new life for me altogether different from my hopes and expectations, and my love for him was certain to make me fall in with it at once? I forgot how many times I had told him that his love was more to me than any thing else in the world—how much right I had given him to trust in me. I opened the door for him, and let him kiss me as usual. I could not help it—this one, last time.

"Helen," he said, as we came in together—"I have wanted you so, all day. I have missed him wherever I turned, and the thought of you was my sole comfort. Now that I have begun to think of being married at once, I wonder that I could have borne the idea of waiting, as we had planned before."

I wished that his voice were less tender—that his eyes were not so full of loving trust. I must make haste and tell him my decision, before I grew too weak—too much a woman.

"Joe," I said, and I tried so hard to be firm that it gave my voice a cold, resolute, defiant ring—"I have thought it all over, and if you must stay at home I can not marry you. It would make me miserable, and I know you do not want to do that. You said, in the first place, that you knew I was utterly unfitted to be a farmer's wife, and that you would never have asked me to marry you if you had not planned out a different career for yourself."

"I know, Helen—but afterward I grew surer of your heart, and understood better what love meant. And now I have no choice. I must stay at home and take care of things for mother and Angeline, or the farm would never give them the comforts of life. It would be a good while before I could make enough in any new business to help them. I must do just this thing and no other—so I thought you too would be ready to make the best of it."

How his great, sad, loving eyes looked at me, saying more than his words said, and how I hardened my heart against them!

"Joe," I said, "I do not think you understand me. I have thought it all over, and I can see it but in one light. Look at the women round us here in Hillsbury. See what lives they live, and what their lives make of them! I can't live so. It would make me hate myself, and you. I should want to die. I do love you, Joe. Don't use the power my love gives you to urge me into a life where I could never be useful or happy, or make you so."

How the trust, and hope, and light faded out of his eyes as they looked at me. How blank and fixed, almost like a dead face, his face grew! He seemed for a moment like one whom a heavy blow had stunned; then a flash of his old, manly pride flamed up in his eyes. He uttered no lamentation—not even a remonstrance. He only asked, with a dignity which awed me:

"You have weighed the matter well? You are sure you have made up your mind?"

And when I said I was sure, he got up to go.

"My duty remains the same, Helen. I can not change that, for it is God's ordering. I won't stay to pain you. Child, let me kiss you once more."

He had risen to go, and he took me suddenly in his arms. I would not have freed myself if I could. I felt his heart beating in great, panting throbs against my side. For a moment his lips pressed mine as if they would breathe out the whole love of his life, and then he let me go, and went out into the windy, desolate April night. I stood at the window and watched him going home—with such a different mien from that which had angered me before—going home to his grief and his loss, his sister bereaved like himself, his mother who was a widow.

That night I slept little. I did not realize just what I had done—of how much of my life and soul I had bereft myself; but one thing I felt intensely—I could not stay in Hillsbury, where I should see Joe constantly. By-and-by when I was stronger I would come back, but for the present I must take refuge somewhere. It was Saturday night, so I could do nothing until Monday, but I made all my plans. My father was well known in the neighboring towns, and I thought I could secure a situation to teach school in some of them without difficulty. I would get away by this means for the summer. By the time school was out we should have over-lived the worst of it, both Joe and I. Then, perhaps, I would come home.

I mentioned the matter at breakfast next morning. My father uttered an exclamation of surprise, and I could see at once that he was prepared to oppose my plan. But grandmother interposed mildly between me and a refusal.

"I am glad you have thought of it, Helen," she said, approvingly. "It is excellent discipline for any girl, and I think it's just what you need. James, you could find an opening for her easily enough, couldn't you, you know so many people?"

"Why, yes," my father answered, reflectingly, "if I thought it best for her to go. There is Colonel Cushing of Montclair, who wrote me last week to see if I knew of a teacher. But it's such a strange freak for Helen."

"There's wisdom in freaks, sometimes," grandmother said, mildly. The conversation dropped there, but with her on my side I felt pretty sure that my point was gained.

I went to church that day. I dreaded it, but nothing but sickness ever excused Hillsbury people from church-going. Joe was there, sitting in his black gloves and plain black clothes, beside his mother and Angeline in their deep mourning. Mrs. Scarborough looked all worn-out with sorrow—her face chalk-white in her close black bonnet. I pitied her, but I did not like her. Angeline, it seemed to me, was stiffer than ever. I felt, when I came near them in going out of church, as if a wind from the frozen pole had crossed my track. Joe spoke to me with grave courtesy—he would not have done more than that at such a time if the words of the night before had been left unsaid; but oh, how I missed the smile, heart-warm and involuntary, the quick gleam from the loving eyes which had welcomed me always, ever since I had promised to be Joe's wife! That Sunday was a long, sad day; I was glad when it was over.

In two weeks more I was settled at Montclair, teaching school. Colonel Cushing was my head committee-man—a gentlemanly, polished widower, with two little girls who were the most interesting of my scholars. I found teaching school a great deal easier and pleasanter than I had imagined—partly, perhaps, because it was summer, and the older pupils, who might have troubled me somewhat in winter, were otherwise occupied—but chiefly, I am sure, through Colonel Cushing's efficient protection, which interposed from the very first between me and all annoyances or signs of defense.

He lived in the finest place in Montclair, and Montclair was a far more pretentious village than Hillsbury. His great mansion, surrounded by elegant grounds, and furnished with every thing that taste could suggest or luxury demand, was like a revelation to me. I thought I knew then what I had been wanting—what suited me. I felt at home in these elegant rooms. This, indeed, was something better than the easier of a merchant's clerk and his wife even in the city. I felt a vague thrill of ambition. I thought that it might not have been a bad thing for me, at least, that Joe had been prevented from carrying out his first plans—that I was free.

I could see from the first that Colonel Cushing liked me, though he had too much tact and taste to stifle me by any premature declarations of it. He contented himself with making life pleasant for me—trying to see how pleasant he had it in his power to make it. When the time came—for I "bearded round"—for me to be a member of his household, which a widowed sister superintended, he spared no pains to make the days white better ones in my calendar. At other times he would come for the little girls in his elegant bérouche, and take me with them for a drive among the splendid hill scenery, or along the pleasant, low-lying river. Or he would send me strawberries, red and glowing with the life of summer—are-heries, bedded in cool, green leaves—or flowers such as grew in no other garden in Montclair. Remember that I was only eighteen, that I knew myself to be handsome, and discovered myself to be ambitious.

I can claim credit for one thing—I never forgot my own dignity, or made one unbidden effort to attract Colonel Cushing. Indeed there was no need. His attentions grew constantly more and more marked. I was flattered by them, certainly. It gave me a new idea of my own power to have such a man so entirely devoted to me. I thought of Mother Scarborough and Hillsbury latter with a smile of superiority. Clearly my destiny did not lie there. I fancied myself, in my little day-dreams of girlish vanity, walking through those splendid rooms as mistress—wearing jewels, and laces, and soft, rich silks—my girlish prettiness set off by such adornments until I could hardly recognize Hillsbury Helen in the bright vision. I think these dreams came to me with more charm and potency every day. They were beginning to fill my imagination full, and I lost sight in them of every thing lying beyond: forgot that to such a brilliant lot could come, as well as to lowlier ones, days of pain and weariness, sore troubles and heartaches, by-and-by death itself; that here, as well as elsewhere, I should need the support and strength of tenderest mutual love. For I did not love Colonel Cushing; he could never be to me what Joe had been. In my brightest visions he figured as an accessory—a stoutly, gracious gentleman, whose homage did me honor, to bear whose name would make me a power in the world; but I did not love him. And as yet he had never asked for my love, though I felt with a woman's intuition that the hour was drawing nigh.

I sat one afternoon, late in July, on a low ottoman in his drawing-room, looking out toward the west, where a crimson sunset flushed the sky, and singing softly snatches of old ballads which the Colonel loved to hear. We were all alone, he and I—alone with the gathering twilight, the soft summer wind, which came through the wide-opened window, the stars that began to shine solemnly in the far heavens. I saw that, despite the Colonel's love for ballads, he was getting impatient. His sister had gone up stairs with the children. She would be through with prayers and good-nights soon. We should not be long alone, and I knew—how do women know such things?—that he wanted to make the most of his opportunity. Still I sang on. It was perversely partly—partly a vague, vexing dread of the future which lay so near. If he asked me to be his wife I knew that I should say yes, but some dumb, blind instinct within me clung still to freedom.

While I sang a servant came in with letters and papers—the evening mail. Colonel Cushing just glanced at them, and putting the rest in his pocket, handed one to me.

"A letter, Miss Helen, but don't read it now—let me talk to you instead."

"In a moment. It is grandmother's handwriting. If you don't let me look and see whether any thing is the matter I shall not be a good listener."

He was too true a gentleman to insist on having his own way, and I laid my letter close to the window. It was the first one grandmother had written me that summer—quaint, old-fashioned, tender—how like herself! I glanced over it by the lingering sunset light until I came to these words:

"You will want, I think, to hear about Joe. His horses took fright yesterday, as he was mowing. He was thrown from his mowing-machine, and severely hurt. Your father doubts if he will ever recover."

I strained my dim eyes over the paper to see if I had made any mistake. No, it was all plain—too plain. Joe, my Joe, might be dying. We have heard stories, all of us, about the sudden intuitions of drowning men, in which they live over and understand a lifetime in a few seconds. I think it was something like that which came to me—liker, perhaps, to the awakening thrill with which, after death, our souls will rise to the new life. I think we shall know then, in one electric flash, just how much and how little this world has been worth. For the first time in my life I understood my own soul—its needs, wants, longings—but I was conscious of only two ideas. One, that I was intensely thankful that I had not bound myself to Colonel Cushing; the other, that I must go to Joe. Only one course of action occurred to me, and that was to tell the Colonel the entire truth. I did it in as few words as possible. I did not trust in vain to his generosity. When I had told him all, he said to me with a strange, grave tenderness:

"Helen, did you know that I loved you? You had grown to be the hope and the object of my life. I think if it had not been for this other love you would have cared for me. It is like you—like just what I thought you—to tell me the truth as soon as you knew it yourself."

"But I must go to him, Colonel. Can't some one take my place?"

"I would, if that were necessary, rather than keep you here against your will," he answered, soothingly. "But there will be no trouble. I will arrange about dismissing the school for a few days, and in the mean time procure some one to take it, for I do not think you will wish to come back."

"Oh, how good you are—how generous!"

"I would be good to you, Helen. If you could have loved me, I would have been very tender of you. But I will never talk about that any more. I will be your kind, trusty, middle-aged friend, and manage every thing for you just as your father might."

If my heart had not been too full of Joe his sad gentleness must have won it. As it is, he did win my gratitude, and a friendship that will last our lives through.

The next afternoon I reached home. I went into the room where grandmother and I had talked, that spring day, and found her there, sitting by the round table, sewing placidly as of old.

"Grandmother," I said, "I have come. I am going to Joe."

"I thought you would," she answered, in her kind, low tones. "I believe I understood you last spring better than you understood yourself."

My heart misgave me a little as I knocked at the Widow Scarborough's door. Angeline opened it, with her funereal looks, dressed in her unmitigated mourning. She held the door in her hand, and did not ask me to walk in.

"I have come," I said, meekly, "to see Joe. I heard of his accident, and came home from Montclair to be with him."

"He has good care," she answered, ungraciously, "and we don't let company see him; but you may walk in, and I'll speak to mother."

She let me go into the best room—an apartment cold and uninviting as her own manner. I heard a confused sound of whispering voices outside, and then Mrs. Scarborough came in where I sat. I read denial on her face—resolution stiffened her lips. She looked at me with almost an expression of dislike. Instinct suggested the only way to make my peace with her. I was capable of any sacrifice of pride if only I could get to Joe. So I told her, humbly enough, how mistaken I had been when I parted from him—how dearly I had loved him in spite of all—and begged her not to drive me away from him.

Perhaps the thought of what Joe himself would say, if he ever recovered, influenced her somewhat. At any rate she gave an ungracious assent at last.

"Your father's in there, now," she said. "You can go in, if you are sure you can be still. Remember it won't do to have any cryin' or takin' on in there."

So I took off my bonnet and went in. Father just nodded to me. He was counting Joe's pulse-beats, and he wore an anxious, doubtful look.

When he left I followed him into the entry.

"Father," I said, "I went away because I did not want to marry a farmer, and I've come back because I love Joe. Can you save him for me?"

"God only knows, child. He was hurt terribly; but there's a chance—just a chance."

Just a chance! Those words were my strong staff during the dreadful days that followed. If human love and care could save him he would be saved.

He did not know me; his head had been hurt in his fall, and he was delirious. This made it so much harder for me. I could not strengthen myself with the feeling that I was a comfort to him. Then, too, in his frenzy he would call sometimes upon my name; reveal in some wild sentence, as he never would have revealed it otherwise, how he had suffered at our parting. And all this made Mrs. Scarborough and Angeline so much the more bitter against me. I think a dozen times during the first week they would have sent me out of the house, but for the consideration that Joe might recover and blame them for such a resenting of his wrongs.

After a while it seemed to me that my patience began to soften them. They treated me with more kindness, and sometimes left me to watch alone beside Joe. On one of these rare occasions I sat and looked at his worn, wasted face until my grief overcame me utterly, and bending my head down on the side of the bed I burst into a passion of weeping. At last I felt a feeble touch upon my hair, and Joe's voice—oh, so weak and faint, but his own natural voice again, thank God, said :

"Helen! Can this be Helen?"

I forgot all Mrs. Scarborough's cautions about disturbing him. I just threw my arms around him, and sobbed out :

"Oh, Joe, only get well, and forgive me! I found out that your life, whatever it is, must be my life, for the world is nothing at all without you."

A sudden, passionate joy kindled his face. One cry—"Oh, Helen, my love, my love!"—and then his head fell back in a deathlike swoon.

Somehow I was not frightened. The excitement had been too much for him just now, but I felt in my heart that it would not kill him. I believed in joy as Heaven's own balm of healing. I went quietly to work without calling any one to restore him to consciousness; and when Mrs. Scarborough came in, half an hour afterward, he was lying with his hand in mine, at rest and in his right mind.

"Mother," he said, with fervent joy and resolution, "I am going to get well. I think Helen has saved my life."

After he was able to walk about he asked me, one day, when I would be ready to marry him, and I told him I would be ready whenever he said. You see my pride was gone now, and my love reigned triumphant.

"When I am well again," he said, thoughtfully, "I have been thinking that it might be best for me to make a home for you where we could be quite by ourselves. I ought to have remembered, last spring, that you might not like the idea of coming to live with mother and Angeline. Of course they could never be to you what they are to me."

I considered the matter for a few silent moments. I knew it was best for Joe to stay there—that it was what he really in his heart would prefer—should I be selfish enough to change his plans?

"No," I said, at length, "if you will let me choose, for the present we will live here. I know them better now than I knew them then, and have none of the same feeling about it. I think to stay here will be best for you, and therefore best for me."

His smile of gratitude repaid me for any sacrifice at the root of my decision.

When I told grandmother that he had proposed to have a separate home for us, she smiled as she answered :

"So you won't have to take up that cross after all?"

"Yes, I have made up my mind to it. I knew that it would be best for Joe, and so I insisted upon it. I love him well enough now to share his fortune just as it is."

So we were married one fall day—one of those splendid, prismatic days when the air is full of soft haze which catches hues of rainbow brightness from the sunbeams—and I went home with Joe.

I did not invite Colonel Cushing to my wedding, but he heard of it somehow and sent me his bridal gift—a set of choice engravings simply framed. They hang on the walls of my sitting-room, a perpetual joy, and a reminder of one of the truest and most generous men I ever knew. Sometimes when we are looking at them together, I say to Joe :

"I couldn't have helped loving him if I hadn't already loved you."

But he is never jealous; nor, in truth, do I think he has occasion.

I have been married three years, and daily have seen fresh reason to be thankful that I bear my own cross and no other. Mother—I call Mrs. Scarborough so now—has developed delightfully as a grandmother, and Angeline is a model aunt. Between them both they aid me so much, and care for me so kindly, that Joe declares I have yet to acquire the meek, faded, unquestioning face proper to the wife of a Hillsbury farmer.

ST. MARK'S EVE.

TO all in America I respectfully beg leave to dedicate my tale. To all those who are seeking to enter into the holy estate of matrimony I present the first portion, and those who have already known the troubles and joys, the cares and bliss of a connubial life, will find the latter part applicable to themselves.

I beg of all not to despise it for the homely dress it will be arrayed in. I mean it to be so, the plain common garb fitted for the everyday use of life—spun and woven from home-made materials. I am writing this as if I was perfectly sure of its being accepted by that formidable person, "the Editor," who is oftentimes by no means easy to suit. Thus much by way of preface.

Dora Newby, the subject of my tale (I can not call her heroine), was the only child of her father—a substantial, well-to-do farmer, and a widower. As a matter of course, Dora grew up petted and well-nigh spoiled. She was naturally inclined to be self-willed, petulant, and selfish; and the want of a mother's guiding, and a kind, easy father's spoiling, in no little measure increased and strengthened all her failings. She grew up wild and untaught, save what it pleased herself to learn by occasional fits and starts. She grew also prettier with every passing year, until she reached the age of eighteen, and was then a petted, spoiled young woman with plenty of admirers, for she was the village heiress as well as its belle.

Dora did not believe in having only one string to her bow. She wanted more, and she kept two always on hand. A large well-built man named Smurthwaite, and a little smart active one named Benjamin Richmond were her two favored swains. She tyrannized over both of them, and kept them in a constant state of uncertainty, encouraging now one, now the other, as the humor suited her, and this not for weeks or months only, but for years. Five long years she kept them both attached to her, until their patience was well-nigh tired out.

Dora was quick enough to see this, and had half resolved to make up her mind and determine in the favor of one or the other when fate itself decided the matter for her sooner than she intended.

Newby Grange was an old-fashioned farmhouse, with all the old appliances of large closets, wide chimneys, and capacious brick oven. This oven was in the sitting-room, and heated by a flue from the large fire of the kitchen. The sitting-room had two bay-windows overlooking the garden, and these bay-windows were the places where her love-making generally went on.

As I have said, five years' courtship had been the hard, unrequited servitude of both her followers, when one day, a Saturday in the sunny month of June, Ben Richmond was seen by the watching, expectant Dora coming up the garden-path to pay his usual weekly visit, with an unusual look of resolve and determination on his face. It was so. The long, hot walk had tired him, and he had come fully determined that day to know his fate, either to be accepted or rejected without any longer fooling. Dora intuitively felt that to-day, at least, she could no longer trifle, and felt annoyed at the thought of being driven up into a corner; and partly from pique, partly from willfulness, determined to say no, shortly and flatly, to his request.

All in vain were poor Ben's earnest entreaties and passionate pleadings; all in vain his long, weary waiting, and he gave it up well-nigh in despair.

He made, however, one last attempt, one final appeal, when, in the midst of his talking, they heard the garden gate creak on its hinges, and, looking out, saw the tall form of John Smurthwaite striding up the path.

Now it so happened Smurthwaite had come as well that very day, big with the same resolves that possessed Ben. Here was a to-do. Well did Dora know how Smurthwaite had vowed that if ever he caught Ben in the act of poaching, as he termed it, on his ground he would indict on him such bodily punishment as he would not easily forget.

There was no lack of courage in little Ben, but still he felt and knew he was utterly unable in physical strength to compete with Smurthwaite. What was to be done?

Poor Ben! fear of punishment, and still greater fear of any appearance of cowardice before Dora, tugged hard at his heart. Dora herself decided the matter. She wished no fighting or disturbance, at least in her presence.

"Here, quick, Ben," she said, trying the two cupboard doors in the room, "come in here until he goes." Alas, the doors were both locked and the keys up stairs in her bedroom.

"Whatever shall I do!" she ejaculated; her eye lighted on the large old-fashioned oven—the very place, she thought, and opening the door in crept Ben. Scarcely was he safely stowed in when Smurthwaite entered the room.

Long, very long, he sat, and, like Ben before him, plead his cause and urged his suit with no encouragement from Dora. He was interrupted, however, in the midst of his most pathetic appeal by a loud thump, where from he could not tell. "What is that, Dora?" he inquired. "Only the rats," was the answer. Again he began his entreaties, again to be interrupted by another louder knock and the sound of a voice shut up and half-smothered.

"For God's sake let me out," it cried; "I am roasting alive!"

Dora remembered all too late that it was baking day, and the servant in the kitchen, all unwitting of the strange occupant of the oven, had drawn out the damper and let in the heat.

Ere Dora could reach the door it flew open and out tumbled Ben, hot and angry, before the astonished gaze of Smurthwaite.

"John," said Ben, as soon as he could speak, "take my claim to Dora. I have done with her. I always heard love-making was warm work, but never so hot as I have found it. Good-by, Dora, I do not choose being made a cake of like to-day:" and he left them. Smurthwaite and Dora both laughed; they could not help it; and as he felt how ludicrous any more attempts at love-making would be, he also very shortly after left. Left, and never returned again, and so Dora lost them both.

Young ladies all, take my advice. Keep one string to your bow, if you find it a good strong serviceable one, and do not play with two until both break.

For a few months Dora was loverless, when, at length, a third appeared in the person of John Vannote, and, after a short, a very short probation, was accepted; for time was passing with Dora, and both her former admirers had taken to themselves partners less obdurate than herself, and Dora did not care to live and die an old maid.

John Vannote and his wife soon, too soon, however, found out how unsuited they were for each other—too soon for their happiness, too late, however, to remedy it. They were both alike in disposition, equally selfish, and each loving their own self the best.

It was a sore and grievous disappointment to both John and his wife that no children blessed their union. God withheld this great gift and blessing from them. No little prattling voice was given them to break the solitude of their fireside; no wee, toddling feet pattered over the floor. This golden link was wanting to unite the fast rusting and irksome fetters with which they had bound themselves together, and great was the trouble of both, and loud Dora's murmuring thereat. And what should have but drawn them closer together for mutual comfort and sympathy became an additional cause of dissatisfaction and discontent.

And so, day by day, the little love each had for the other cooled and was fast dying away. Day by day each one grew more and more intensely selfish, less and less careful of each other's comfort and happiness, and more miserable and wretched—fretting ever more and more at the strength of the chain which bound them together.

I am writing no fanciful, childish story. God knows my purpose and tale is serious enough, and one of too frequent occurrence. In every little act of their daily lives they very soon got to thwart each other. Very quickly no mutual concessions were offered. Scarce a meal passed by without quarreling and squabbling about some little unimportant trifle. Each had the same likings, and each resolved to gratify them at the expense of the other. In a few words their lives became grievous and burdensome, both to themselves and all connected with them; and they very quickly grew to positively dislike each other.

And so the months passed until it came near the eve of St. Mark. Now in the North of England there is a great deal of superstition attached to this night. It is very generally believed that the ghosts of all who will die the ensuing year walk in solemn procession at the midnight hour down the road their coffins will hereafter pass to the church-porch. This eve falls on the 24th of April.

Leading to the village church in the place where these two lived were two roads—the one the public road through the village, and another, a by-path, across some fields.

When the 24th of April came round in due course of time, it occurred to John Vannote that he would go that night and see if his wife's ghost would make its appearance. It so happened a similar resolve possessed Dora. Of course neither of them betrayed by word or sign their intention to the other. The day passed and night came. After tea John fidgeted about for some time, and then left the house for the ostensible purpose of foddering and looking after the cattle. Dora, as soon as his back was turned, put on her bonnet and shawl and went out too, on a pretended visit to a neighbor. The night was a moonlight one, but the moon's light was obscured by passing clouds.

As soon as John had finished tending the cattle, half-ashamed of his errand, and fearing to meet any of his neighbors, he made his way across the fields to the church-yard. Dora, more timid, chose exactly at the same time the road through the village. The one arrived at the church-yard gate just as the other reached the stile from the fields into it. Silently and quietly they both, unknown to each other, went into the porch; they reached it, and just then the moon shone out for a few moments, full and clear in each other's face. They both stared at each other—a long, steady look, and then the moon's light was withdrawn behind a cloud; and when it again shone out the church-porch was empty—both had as silently returned home, each thinking they had seen the other's ghost.

The table was laid for supper when John Vannote came in, and his wife Dora sitting sewing by the fire. Some hot sausages and mashed potatoes were warming by it—his favorite supper. Astonished at the unwonted attention to his comfort and taste, in silence he drew his chair to the table, and both sat down and proceeded to eat it. One sausage remained after each had been fairly and equally helped. Each of them, heretofore, would have claimed and sought to have it. To Dora's astonishment John very quietly took it, and laid it on her plate without a word. As quietly she removed it back to his. The servant looked on astonished at this unaccustomed proceeding on both their parts. Again and again was the same thing done—each attempting to force it on the other, and both nearly quarreling about making the other take it. The same feeling actuated both—each thought the other doomed ere very long to death, and felt, for the short time yet left them to be together, they could afford to be kind to each other. At least such was the tenor of the thoughts of each as they went to rest that night.

"Ah well," thought John, "I wonder when she will go—how soon or how late in the year; won't the house be quiet without her! However, I'll be kind to her, and bear with her for the short time she has to live, so that my conscience can not reproach me when she's gone."

And Dora's thoughts were much the same.

And so week after week passed, and month after month, each giving a little and taking a little—bearing and forbearing with each other; and so the time passed, and the year drew near to its close, and another St. Mark's Eve approached.

One wild, gusty, rainy March night as both were seated over the fire, Dora working and John smoking, his thoughts went wandering over the past year and wondering on into the future. And as he sat and smoked and thought he felt half-sad she would so soon have to leave him; for, after all, thought he, she has been a good wife to me the last ten months. No doubt death has cast his softening shadow over her, and she feels changed by it. Still it puzzled him: there she sat, so healthy-looking, so contented, and so happy—it must be sudden, thought he; ought I not to tell her what I know, and so warn and prepare her for it? I will, he resolved, and just then seeing her look thoughtfully at himself he got ready to speak:

"John," said Dora, suddenly, "I should miss you very much if you were to leave me."

He started and nearly jumped off his chair. His very thoughts of her.

"Dear me, Dora! how you startled me, for I was just thinking the same of you."

"Were you?" answered Dora. "Ah, well, I shall be sorry when you go."

"I go, Dora! It's your turn first, my lass, I'm after thinking."

"I do not think so," she replied, "I know you've to go soon, and I thought I ought to tell you."

"Why do you think so?"

"Because I saw your ghost walk on St. Mark's Eve," said Dora.

"And I saw thine," answered John.

"Humph! you were there, then, John?"

"I was, Dora, and it seems thou too?"

They were both silent again a short time, and Dora sat and sewed, and John smoked and thought

"Dang it all, Dora," said John, "we've been uncommon happy the past year, why shouldn't it be so to the end, eh, Dora? Thou'lt gie a little and I'll gie a little, and we'll try and haud on so for the future."

And to the end they tried to do so. Of course at times there was an occasional outbreak, but never for long—and a happier life was the result, and not the only result.

For, after seven years' married experience, two of them dissension and trouble, and the other five of mutual help and assistance, Dora, contented with her lot and feeling happier every day with her husband, he, prosperous and satisfied, both of them were yet to receive a surprise, and that a joyful one. A young John Vannote most unexpectedly made his appearance, and after him a little girl and another son, and the measure of their happiness was complete.

Does my story need any moral wherewith to point it? Can not one and all of my readers find it in this simple village tale? Need I say in words how it is that our lives so often fail of their great, grand purpose and aim through neglect of little things—little words of sympathy, little deeds of kindness, the little grains of amenity which rub down and polish the rough corners of the hard stone, and bring into full play its most beautiful colors? Oh, reader mine, scorn not my tale for its homely garb, but cut and fit it to thine own daily wear. Despire not the day of little things, for "Little things on little wings Bear up our souls to Heaven."

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

OF all the natural features of the earth none are more beautiful, more beneficent, more necessary, more important, than its navigable rivers. They are cheap, ready-made highways. They shorten the distance between nations, and between different portions of the same nation. They are convenient and commodious channels of intercommunication and carriage. They are naturally the home and conduits of commerce. Though often used to designate the boundaries between States, they are yet more serviceable in connecting and in binding them together. Difference in religion, in language, and mountain ranges, are natural barriers between nations; but where there is a similarity of origin, language, and religion, while inaccessible mountain ranges may, yet navigable rivers scarcely ever do constitute political boundaries. Rivers are therefore ligaments to bind together, rather than channels to divide a homogeneous people.

Nature has selected the New World as the theatre of her grandest displays in the creation of water-courses.

The Mississippi and the Amazon are peerless as respects utility and size. And for an object will be more obvious before we conclude, it is proper to make more than a passing allusion to the Amazon, styled by way of eminence "the King of Rivers," as our own noble stream is called "the Father of Waters." It is a coincidence worthy of notice, that during the same year—1851—when the dauntless Taylor was pushing his way up the Nile, into the far-off regions of Central Africa, Herndon and Gibbon, by the direction and at the expense of our Government, were following the course of the Amazon from its humble fountains, only 60 miles from the Pacific, in the remote eastern slopes of the Andes, to the place where it pours its deep-volumed currents into the Atlantic.

By its tributaries, the Maderia and Purus, it penetrates Bolivia, by the Ucayali and Huallaya it enters Peru, by the Napo, Ecuador, and by the Rio Negro, Venezuela—thus connecting nearly all the South American Republics with the ocean. The main river carries a volume of water, as it runs through Brazil, which makes even the majestic Mississippi seem small in comparison. It is navigable for 3360 miles by the Ucayali—by the Huallaya for 2815 miles. At the distance of 2000 miles from its mouth, repeated and careful soundings show it to have a depth of from 42 to 85 feet, at 1300 miles from its mouth a depth of 138 feet. The average flow of the current will not exceed three miles per hour. Lying in the regions of the Equator, its navigation is never impeded by ice. It is the concurrent opinion of residents, explorers, and travelers that the countries through which it flows are not only not sickly, but remarkably healthy. It was discovered almost half a century before the Mississippi. It was known to the Pizarros and the exploration attempted by them as early as 1560—a period shortly after the downfall of the Inca dynasty, and the plunder of the Inca temples by those renowned robbers. It was descended in 1539—two years before the discovery of the Mississippi—by Orellana from near Quito to its mouth. And yet to-day, after the lapse of 300 years, it holds its course through the solitudes and wilderness of primeval nature. "If," says Baron Humboldt, "the name of a primeval forest can be given to any forest on the face of the earth, none perhaps can so strictly claim it as those that fill the connected basin of the Orinoco and the Amazon." Its banks are still tenanted by monkeys, tigers, lazy, craven, and worthless Indians. The enterprising spirit of the age has scarcely penetrated its deep and tangled forests. How sparsely populated the Amazonian region is, will appear by reference to the size of the main towns upon the river; thus, Egas, 1450 miles from the mouth, and the most important town above Barra, contains only 800 people. Barra itself contains only 3614 free inhabitants. Santarem, 600 miles from its mouth, and the largest town above Para, contains, slaves and all, less than 7000, and Para, though healthy and founded in 1616, and situated at its mouth, precisely as New Orleans is at the mouth of the Mississippi, contains a population of only 10,000 free inhabitants. Excluding savages, the population of the Amazonian region is only one for every ten square miles. These are indeed dry details; and yet details, though dry, are often essential to accuracy of ideas.

We now turn our thoughts to our country and to its great river. The connection between the Amazon and the Mississippi, though not obvious, has yet been demonstrated by scientific investigations to be remarkably intimate. A boat launched on the Amazon, and left to the course of the winds and currents of the ocean, would float close by Cape Hatteras; thus demonstrating that the commerce of the vast countries drained by the Amazon naturally belongs to the United States.

It is befitting our theme that a brief allusion be made to the history of the discovery of our great river. We will not dwell at great length upon those facts which are generally understood, or which may be found in our standard histories. It was first discovered in A.D. 1541, by the gallant and romantic De Soto. He had been a follower of Pizarro in his famous conquest of Peru. He had assisted in the capture of the last Inca, and shared in rich treasures with which that barbaric monarch vainly sought to effect his ransom. De Soto's ambition was fired. Like the conquerors of the Montezumas and the Incas, he wished for himself to carve out provinces with his own good sword, and to share in the treasures of overturned Indian dynasties. Attracted by his renown, large numbers flocked to the standard of De Soto, anxious to share the perils and the rewards of his enterprise. We will not follow the history of the ill-starred and ill-fated expedition. They wandered for several years in the vast regions, wholly unknown, extending between the everglades of Florida and the Red River. Of course they found no Mexico and no Peru. Harassed with disappointment, with hostile Indian tribes, with the mutiny and discontent of his followers, the brave old leader died on the banks, and was most fittingly buried beneath the waters of the noble river he was the first to discover. No attempt was made to explore the stream. It was used by Moscoso, the successor of De Soto, simply as an avenue to escape with the miserable remnant of De Soto's men. The discovery of De Soto was not immediately followed up. It yielded no fruit to Spain, of which he was a native, and under whose auspices his enterprise was undertaken.

The next discovery of the river was made from a different quarter, and was prompted by different motives. It derived no aid from, and was wholly independent of, De Soto's discovery; for it was not known until afterward that the rivers were one and the same. We allude to the explorations and discoveries of Marquette and Joliet. Marquette is entitled to the glory of discovering the Upper Mississippi. He was the first to explore the river from the mouth of the Wisconsin to the mouth of the Arkansas. As upon the results of this exploration the destiny of nations and states has been influenced, if not controlled, it is worthy of special notice. The present generation were not the pioneers of this beautiful region. On the contrary the oldest settlers now there simply came to live in the country, first unveiled to the gaze of the world by the dauntless heroism and disinterested religious zeal of James Marquette. He and his companion, Joliet, were undeniably the first white men who trod the soil of Iowa. Of Joliet, the associate of Marquette, we only know that he was a Canadian fur-trader. He is remembered only in connection with the great discovery which he assisted to make. He, and not Marquette, was the representative of the French Government of Canada, under whose auspices the voyage was undertaken. He is represented as a man of "prudence, tact, and courage." Marquette, though the originator and soul of the enterprise, accompanied Joliet in the humble and unpretending character of a missionary.

Marquette was born in France in 1637, and justice, no less than Christian charity, compels the acknowledgment that the history of the world has rarely, if ever, shown a zeal more disinterested, a heroism more lofty, a faith more lowly, yet more self-sacrificing and sublime suffering, and hardships more multiplied and great, than those which characterized the lives and labors of the early French Catholic Missionaries on this continent. Marquette's patron and exemplar was the renowned St. Francis Xavier. Like the great Apostle to the Indies, he therefore sought a foreign mission not to the court of some earthly king or monarch, but to savage, distant, and benighted tribes, in an almost unknown country, and amidst unexplored regions. He is ordered to the remote Lake Superior Missions. In the midst of his humble labors he hears, from parties of the Illinois Indians, of a "large river, almost a league wide, running north and south, so far that the Illinois have never heard of its mouth, with great nations upon its banks.

His heart is fired with the magnificent accounts which he receives of the river, and he yearns to be the first to carry the Gospel to the wild people who live upon its shores. He repeatedly urged the discovery of the river upon the French Government of Canada. He fairly glowed with the belief that under God it was his mission to discover it.

It is now conceded that to Marquette belongs the honor of originating the purpose of discovering the great river. He spent nearly four years in collecting all possible information concerning its location and the character of the tribes who resided upon it. Imagine his joy and exultation, when for the first time he learned that he had been selected as the associate of Joliet to undertake its discovery! That joy was increased to rapture when he observed the very day Joliet arrived was the feast of the Virgin Mary, "whom," says the pious Marquette, "I had always invoked to obtain of God the grace to be able to visit the nations on the River Mississippi." "I put the voyage," continues he, in his narrative, "under her protection, promising her, that if she did us the grace to discover the great river, I would give it the name of 'Conception.'" A promise which a fac-simile of his map, newly discovered (the original having been preserved at St. Mary's College at Montreal), shows that he faithfully kept.

Space forbids, interesting as the excursion would be, to follow step by step the progress of the voyage. The mere outline and meagre details which we give are taken wholly from Marquette's original narration—a most interesting book. He says: "We were not long in preparing our outfit, although we were embarking on a voyage the duration of which we could not foresee. Indian corn, with some dried meat, was our whole stock of provisions. With this we set out in two bark canoes. M. Joliet, myself, and five men firmly resolved to do all and suffer all for so glorious an enterprise." They started from Mackinaw on the 17th of May, 1673. "Our joy at being chosen for the expedition sweetened the labor of rowing from morning till night." They pass over part of Lake Huron and Lake Michigan to Green Bay. The friendly Indians then did their best to dissuade the undertaking, but in vain. "They told me," says Marquette, "that we would meet nations that never spare strangers, but tomahawk them without provocation; that they were at war with each other, which would increase our danger; that the great river itself was full of perils, of frightful monsters which swallowed up men and canoes; that it contained a demon that engulfed all who dare approach; and lastly, that the excessive heat would infallibly cause our death." Disheartened? No, not he! "I thanked them for their kind advice, but assured them that I could not follow it, as the salvation of souls was concerned, and that for them I should be but too happy to lay down my life."

Here again he imitated his great patron, St. Xavier, who upon one occasion was besought by his friends not to assume the peril of visiting a country where his life would almost surely be the forfeit of his temerity. "If those lands," indignantly exclaimed Xavier, in reply to their protestations and warnings, "had scented wood and mines of gold Christians would find courage to go there. Shall love for the souls of men be less hardy and less generous than avarice? They will destroy me, you say, by poison. It is an honor to which such a sinner as I may not aspire; but this I dare say, that whatever death or torture await me, I am ready to suffer it ten thousand times for the salvation of a single soul." From Green Bay our voyageurs sail down the Fox River of Wisconsin. They reach, on the 10th day of June, the narrow strip of land which divides it from the Wisconsin. On their backs the two light canoes are carried across the portage of twenty-seven hundred paces. After which the guides returned, "leaving us," says Marquette, "alone in an unknown country, in the hands of Providence. Invoking the Blessed Virgin Immaculate, and putting ourselves under her protection, we now leave," adds Marquette, "the waters which flow to Quebec to follow those which lead into strange lands." How natural the reflection! They enter the broad, sandy-bottomed, and shallow Wisconsin. They pass along its timbered banks and vine-clad islets. After a seven days' journey they reached its mouth, and lo! there spreads out before them the long-sought river!

With joy inexpressible the voyageurs entered the Mississippi, near the present city of Prairie Du Chien and opposite that of McGregor, in Iowa, on the 7th of June, 1673. They commenced at once to descend the Mississippi. Though they had journeyed on the great river for eight days and for more than two hundred miles they saw no human being or the signs of any. Yet they advanced cautiously. On each night they landed and made a low fire on the shore to prepare their meal; then for safety anchored their canoes in the middle of the stream, one of the party invariably standing as sentinel; and in the frail barks slept, till the coming of the morning light enabled them to resume the voyage. Thus they pursued their course until the 25th of June, when footprints of men were discovered by the water-side, and a path leading through a beautiful prairie. It was concluded to stop. The path was rightly conjectured to lead to an Indian village. Though fearless of life they did not necessarily ignore the precautions of worldly prudence. The five Frenchmen were left with orders to guard the boat and thereby keep open the means of retreat, if a retreat should be necessary. Besides, it was rightly reasoned that two men would not be so likely to excite the apprehensions and incur the hostility of Indians as a more numerous party.

Single and alone Marquette and Joliet resolved to pursue the path and to assume the peril of meeting a barbarous and unknown people.

Following the path some five or six miles they discovered three Indian villages, somewhat separated, on the banks of a river the name of which Marquette does not give. On his map he indicates the course of this river, and gives the names of two of these villages, viz., Pewarea and Moinguena. The site of these towns can not with certainty be ascertained. The name favors the conjecture that the river was the River Des Moines, and it probably was. Implying the help of God, and relying upon it, Marquette and Joliet advanced undiscovered so far that they even heard the Indians talking. In order to show them that they intended no surprise or harm they halted, and by a loud cry announced their presence. Strange meeting that first meeting on Iowa soil between the amazed Indian and his unknown visitors! Wild and strange the ceremonies which characterize it, and illuminate it with a wild and strange splendor!

They are received in warm welcomes and in peace. Their course becomes a splendid ovation. The savages depute four of their old men—for age receives, even among them, its appropriate respect—to meet and receive them.

Two of the deputies bear aloft the gayly adorned calumet of peace; all four advanced silently and slowly, with stately, barbaric dignity—Indian like.

As an earnest of peace they present their visitors with the mysterious pipe. They invite them to their city, and tender with sincerity and warmth its rude hospitality. Arriving at the village, all the people turned out to gaze at them with the same wondering curiosity with which the pale faces a few years since thronged around a princely visitor from distant Britain. Marquette briefly spoke of the object of his mission (for they used a dialect of the Algonquin tongue, with which he was familiar), of the one God, of the great French captain who had subdued the Iroquois, their ancient enemies. Speech-making on such occasions would not seem to be a civilized ceremony. The sachem of the tribe rising to reply, spoke as follows—a speech, which though never noticed as such, is one of the finest specimens of Indian eloquence: “I thank the Black-gown,” for so, alluding to his garb, he styled Marquette, “and the Frenchman,” addressing Joliet, “for taking so much pains to come and visit us; never has the earth been so beautiful, nor the sun so bright as now; never has the river been so calm, nor so free from rocks which your canoes have removed as they passed; never has our tobacco had so fine a flavor, nor our corn appeared so beautiful as we behold it to-day. Ask the Great Spirit, whom thou knowest to give us life and health, and come thou and dwell with us.”

Following this a great feast was set before the strangers. In his glowing style, disdaining particulars, Bancroft describes it as a “magnificent festival prepared of hominy, and fish, and the choicest viands from the prairies.” Let us consult the faithful and unexaggerated account of Marquette, and see the style and “bill of fare” of this magnificent festival, the first meal ever sat down to by white men upon the western side of the Upper Mississippi.

“This feast,” says Marquette, “consisted of four courses, which we had to take with all their ways. The first course was a great wooden dish full of sagamity, that is to say, of Indian meal boiled in water and seasoned with grease. The master of ceremonies, with a spoonful of sagamity, presented it three or four times to my mouth, as we would do with a little child; he did the same to M. Joliet. For the second course he brought in another dish containing three fish; removed the bones and having blown upon it to cool it, put it into my mouth as we would food to a bird. For a third course they produced a large dog (an Indian can give no higher mark of his friendship than thus to sacrifice his faithful companion), which they had just killed, but learning that we did not eat it, it was withdrawn. Finally, the fourth course was a piece of wild buffalo, the fattest portions of which were put into our mouths.” After remaining here several days the explorers announced their departure. Their new-found friends endeavored to persuade them not to continue the dangerous journey, and would not consent to allow them to leave until they had extracted a promise from Marquette to come to them personally the next year to stay with them and instruct them. An escort of 600 Indians accompanied the explorers to their boats; they embarked, and, following the current, soon passed the boundaries of what is now the State of Iowa.

We can not follow them in their course till they pass the mouth of the Missouri; that of the Ohio, and that of the Arkansas. Nor can we stop to notice at length their laborious return by the same river up to the mouth of the Illinois, ascending which, as far as practicable, and then, by a short portage, reaching Chicago, where the unambitious Marquette remained to preach the Gospel to the natives, while Joliet hastened to Quebec with the news of their discoveries and success. Nor can we notice in detail the subsequent labors of Marquette, nor the circumstances of his death, and trace the parallel between it and the death of St. Xavier.

It occurred within two years after, and was caused by the exposures which he underwent in his great voyage. On his way to the Mission at Mackinaw he expired on the bleak shores of Lake Michigan, within the limits of that State (of which he may be said to be one of the founders), and died, as St. Xavier had died, on the Saucian shore, in the presence of two canoe-men; and with the names of Jesus and Mary upon his lips he commenced his voyage to the Land of Souls.

Do the departed look down upon us? We love to imagine that, as the voyageurs passed along the shores of the Great River, in the majestic solitude of nature, they listened, and listening, heard the busy tramp of the coming millions, and had visions of the commonwealths that have so marvelously arisen along the banks of the great river they were the first to explore! They founded no cities; they left no permanent physical monuments behind them! Yet a generous posterity will not willingly let their names perish. So long as the river flows it will water their memories and preserve them fresh and green!

It was by virtue of the discovery of Marquette that France acquired the ownership of the Mississippi Valley, and the territory was subsequently called after the King of France by the name of Louisiana. Soon after Marquette's voyage, and in consequence of it, Hennepin, an unvarnished but enterprising man, explored the river from the mouth of the Illinois to the falls of the St. Anthony, first by white men and named by him; and in connection with the fearless, gifted, and noble La Salle, was the first (with the exception of De Soto's successor) to explore the river from the limits reached by Marquette to its entrance into the Gulf of Mexico. Louisiana remained a French province till 1762, when it was ceded to Spain. It remained a Spanish province till the year 1800, when it was secretly retroceded to France.

Before the purchase of Louisiana by the United States the river, from its mouth northward several hundred miles, ran through the dominions of a foreign power; above this the river constituted the western boundary of the United States, as defined by the treaty of Independence with Great Britain. Although the West was at that time comparatively a wilderness, the navigation of the river came near involving us in two wars with Spain. The West was in a blaze at being denied their natural outlet. Steps were taken to raise an armed force, and war was imminent. Spain, as owner of the land on both sides of the river at its mouth, claimed under the law of nations the sole right to regulate or to forbid its navigation.

By the treaty made with Spain in 1795, to compose and settle our disputes, she conceded to us the right of the free navigation of the river; she also agreed "to permit citizens of the United States, for the space of three years, to deposit their merchandise and effects at the port of New Orleans, paying only fair storage," which permission the King of Spain agreed to continue longer if he saw fit; if he did not, then he was to "assign to the United States, another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment."

Soon after the lapse of the three years, viz., about the year 1800, Spain violated the provisions of the treaty by refusing the right of deposit at New Orleans, without at the same time assigning, as by terms and a fair construction of the treaty she was bound to do, another place of deposit. She went further and prohibited our boats and vessels even to land, and interdicted all intercourse between our citizens and the inhabitants of the province. As our boats could not land, and as boats which were suitable for the transportation of produce down the river were unsuitable for navigation at sea, the mere right to pass up and down the river with boats was found to be an almost worthless and barren one. The right of deposit, preparatory to transshipment on sea-going vessels, proved to be as indispensable and necessary as the right of passage. The whole country was again in a blaze of excitement. The Senate authorized President Jefferson to call out and arm 80,000 militia. In the course of the debates which followed truths were uttered which are as pertinent now as they were then. Thus, Senator Wright, of Delaware, said:

"We can never have permanent peace on our Western waters till we possess ourselves of New Orleans, and such other positions as may be necessary to give us the complete and absolute command of the navigation of the Mississippi."

It will be seen that our situation at that time was precisely the same as it would be at this time if the South had succeeded in establishing a separate Confederacy. He further declared that "you had as well pretend to dam up the mouth of the Mississippi and say to its restless waves, ye shall cease here and never mingle with the ocean, as to expect that the people of the West will be prevented from descending it. Without the free use of this river and the necessary advantages of a deposit below our boundary their fertile country is not worth possessing, their produce must be wasted in their fields or rot in their granaries." It is true that when these words were spoken the Mississippi was the only outlet for the products of the country; and that since then the New York and Canadian canals, and five parallel lines of railway, connect the East and the West, thereby affording to the West an artificial eastern outlet. But both outlets are needed; needed to do the business of the great West, needed to prevent the crushing exactions of railroad and canal monopolies. Water communication with the Atlantic is the great want of the West.

It was then (1802) believed, but not certainly known, though such was the fact, that the Louisiana Territory had been ceded to France. Napoleon was at this time on the rising tide of his high fortunes, and exercised almost despotic power under the modest title of the French Consul. The Senator last named urged the absolute national necessity which existed that the United States should own and control the mouth of the river, the key to the vast valley of the Mississippi; a region larger in extent than all Europe. In the course of his argument he alluded to the situation of this country, with the mouth of the river in the possession of a foreign power. We quote them, because if the Southern Confederacy be substituted in the place of Bonaparte, his remarks are much more weighty and applicable now than they were sixty years ago. He says: "What is more than all to be dreaded, in such hands, is that it may be made the means of access and corruption to your national councils, and a key to your treasury."

"The Western people will see in Bonaparte, at their very doors, a powerful friend or a dangerous enemy, and should he, after completely controlling the river, approach them, not in the attitude of an enemy, but under the specious garb of a protector and a friend; should he, instead of embarrassing their commerce by any fiscal arrangement, invite them to the navigation of the river, and give them privileges in trade not heretofore enjoyed; should he, instead of coercing them to his measures, court and intrigue with them, who can tell the consequences?"

"Foreign influence will gain admittance into our national councils; a foreign faction will exist which will increase with the rapidly increasing population of the Western world. Whenever this period shall arrive it will be the crisis of American glory, and must result either in the political subjugation of the Atlantic States or their separation from the Western country."

What weighty suggestions are these! Nothing can be added to their force. In the events of the past few years their truth and significance have been remarkably exemplified. At that early day the statesmen of our country saw, and the people of our country felt, the indispensable importance of the entire national ownership and control of the river to the people of all the States bordering on it and its tributaries.

Senator Jackson, of Georgia, declared that "God and nature have destined New Orleans and the Floridas to belong to this great and rising empire."

Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, in his letter of November 27, 1802, to Mr. Charles Pinckney, our Minister at Madrid, instructing him to demand redress from Spain for the infraction of the treaty of 1795, says: "You are aware of the sensibility of our Western people on this subject. This sensibility is justified by the interest they have at stake. The Mississippi is to them every thing. It is the Hudson, the Delaware, the Potomac, and all the navigable rivers of the Atlantic States formed into one stream."

In view of its importance negotiations were authorized by our Government for the purchase of New Orleans, so as to make the river the boundary between the United States and Louisiana. The idea of the purchase of the entire Territory of Louisiana was at that time not even thought of. Our ideas did not rise so high. We were poor then and prudent. We wanted the river and a place of deposit that we could call our own; this was the primary idea, and not the augmentation of territory. The comprehensive mind of the First Consul knew the value of this trans-Atlantic possession. Mr. Livingston, at that time our Minister at Paris, writing May 12, 1803, to Mr. Madison, giving an account of the purchase, says: "Among the most favorite projects of the First Consul was the colonization of Louisiana. He saw in it a new Egypt; he saw in it a colony that was to counterbalance the Eastern establishment of Great Britain; he saw in it a provision for his Generals; and what was more important in the then state of things, he saw in it a pretense for the ostracism of suspected enemies. When I arrived here I found Louisiana a very favorite object. Some books were published representing it a paradise."

France, at that time, was at peace. Mr. Livingston urged the payment of the American debts, and hinted to one of the French Ministers, probably the celebrated Talleyrand, of a sale of the Territory as a means. His reply was: "None but spendthrifts satisfy their debts by selling their lands."

The First Consul organized a fleet and an army to send to New Orleans. They were blockaded in the Dutch forts at first by ice, and the flames of war having again been lighted, then by the English. Mr. Livingston opportunely pressed the purchase of New Orleans, calling, with much shrewdness, the attention of France to a proposition in the London papers for raising 50,000 men to take New Orleans. Napoleon saw the crisis; took in the situation at a glance. He knew that England, by virtue of its navy, would attempt the capture of the province. He much preferred that we should own it to England. To our proposition to purchase part Talleyrand, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, replied: "That if they gave us New Orleans the rest would be of little value, and wished to know what we would give for the whole?"

It was wise in France to sell, but it was wiser in us to buy. On the 30th of April, 1803, the treaty of cession was made. All the vast and undefined territory known as Louisiana, stretching from New Orleans to Oregon, was, in consideration of $15,000,000, sold to the United States. The necessities of France obliged her to sell. Napoleon knew that $15,000,000 was no compensation, and it is a remarkable fact that the treaty alludes to no pecuniary consideration for the sale. The language of the treaty, in this respect, is as follows:

"The First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give the United States a strong proof of friendship, does hereby cede to it, forever, and in full sovereignty, the colony or province of Louisiana."

Thus did the United States become invested with the title to the whole valley of the Mississippi.

The great river, and its countless tributaries, were ours. Every bubbling fountain on the remote slopes of the Alleghanies; every spring and waterfall on the distant sides of the Rocky Mountains; all the intermediate rivulets, brooks, streamlets, streams, and rivers, were, by an undisputed title, ours. It is fortunate, not only for the United States, but for the race, that this magnificent domain passed into our hands. Only two generations have passed away, and see the results! Great and flourishing commonwealths line its banks from its source to its mouth. Civil and religious liberty, science, literature, religion, art, education and educational institutions, all that can adorn and bless a nation, have here found a home. Every 16th square mile has been set apart for common school purposes. The genius of our free institutions has been extended over it. What is there in all the diversified history of the Rhine—what is there in all the entombed mysteries of the Nile—what is there any where, in all the records of the race, so remarkable as to be compared to the marvelous growth and development of the Mississippi Valley? And yet the phenomenon is not a mystery. Its cause is not hid in occult hieroglyphics. The aid of no Layard is needed to reveal or decipher it. It is known to the world. The down-trodden Irishman knows it. The countrymen of Kossuth and Kosciuszko knew it. The liberty-loving German knows it. The oppressed of all nations and of every clime know it. That cause is the vivifying influence of our Free Institutions; and it is nothing else.

Does the reader doubt it? Appeal for a moment to history. Look at Mexico! Cortéz, the Spanish robber, overthrew the Montezumas one hundred years before the Mayflower landed at Plymouth, and the despotism, political and intellectual, of the Spanish rule was established. Why has Mexico in the race of nations thus lagged behind? Pizarro overturned the Inca power, and established permanent Spanish settlements in Peru, three-quarters of a century before Virginia was colonized.

Why are Mexico and the nations of South America blanks on the map of the political world? Why does the Amazon to-day roll its vast course in sullen silence through an almost uninhabited wilderness? It is scarcely twelve years since the apathetic inhabitants and amazed Indians were startled by the shrill whistle of the first steamboat that ever plied its waters. It was found that steam navigation would not pay. Brazil, as the owner of the mouth, claiming the right to do so under the law of nations (how justly is not in our way to discuss), in A.D. 1852, made with one De Souza a contract, giving him the exclusive navigation of the river for thirty years, through all the Brazilian territories; and in consideration that he would run six steamboats, agreed to pay him a bonus of $100,000 per year.

Think of it for a moment! One man having the exclusive right to navigate the Amazon! If this contract be carried out not a steam vessel from the outside world can enter the river. Nay more, Peru, Ecuador, Venezuela, and Bolivia are cut off from all direct river connection with the Atlantic. They must stop at the boundaries of Brazil, deposit their merchandise, and allow De Souza's steamboats, and no other, to carry it. They must import in the same way. Contrast this state of things with the vast, free, and profitable commerce and navigation of the Mississippi, and then again inquire into the cause of this difference. The question admits of but one answer: the Amazon has been cursed with despotism, while the Mississippi has been vivified by free institutions, and its free and unobstructed navigation, under the ownership of one nation, has lined its banks with great and growing free commonwealths.

The sublime duty, the sublimest ever confided by Heaven to mortal man, that of preserving these free institutions from menaced destruction, was confided to the loyal people of the nation. Nobly, grandly, faithfully did they discharge this high trust. If the Confederates had been permitted to destroy the unity of this nation, what would have become of us of the Northwest, situate as we are, remote from the sea-board and markets of the world, in the centre and heart of a vast continent? If the Southern States may secede, so may the Pacific States, the Upper Mississippi States, and New York and New England. If the South could levy tribute on our southern outlet, why may not New York secede and levy tribute on our eastern outlet? Successful secession would have been national death.

JONES'S METEMPSYCHOSES.

"Quam bene Saturno vivebant rege."—TIBULLUS, EL. III.

I.

JONES, after an eventful life of fifty years, having acquired a competency in the whole-sale grocery business, retired from active participation in the affairs of the concern and purchased a country house—commonly called a villa—in the neighborhood of his native city of Gotham. It contains all the modern improvements: hot water, cold water, gas, etc., with a well-selected library and a well-filled wine cellar. There Jones, surrounded by his family—Mrs. Jones, and six young Joneses of both sexes—is passing the afternoon of his days in tranquil enjoyment.

I would say in perfect happiness, were it not for the fact that he is sometimes inclined to be dyspeptic—the doctor says from want of exercise; and when the symptoms are on him he is apt to be a little peevish, and complains (particularly after his meals) of a loss of appetite, accompanied by a sensation of fullness in the region of the stomach. On such occasions nothing seems to please him unless it be to find fault. "Those muffins are cold, Mrs. Jones," he will say; and it is in vain that Miss Emily lisps, "Papa dear, I'll make one hot for you," or that his excellent wife insinuates that muffins are not good for him. If headed off on the muffin question he discovers that the eggs have been boiled half a minute too long, or that there is a fly in the butter, or a speck in the sugar, or that something is the matter with the mutton-chops.

A ride of a few miles on horseback (although he is not much of a cavalier) usually drives off the unpleasant feelings, and then he may be called a happy and an amiable man. He goes regularly to church (and as regularly to sleep), is benevolent to the poor, kind to his dependents, and, in short, is an estimable citizen and highly respected by his neighbors.

I spent a day with Jones. Of course I had to go through the rather wearisome duty of accompanying him over his "place," and listening to a detailed account of all the various improvements: the ponds stocked with fish—"No trouble to catch trout here, Sir, catch 'em with a net;" the fruit trees trained against the walls; the shady walks; the gardens; the well-built stables; the hot-houses; the vineries—"Make our own Port in a few years, Sir."

We had an excellent though rather early dinner, with a bottle or two of fine old wine, after which we withdrew into what Jones called his "study" for a smoke and a chat. Through the half-opened blinds I spied Miss Emily sitting in the arbor in the garden, with a rather nice-looking young man by her side. They were reading a book together—Longfellow's "Evangeline."

"Young Smith, Sir," said Jones. "Son of my neighbor on the hill yonder; a very estimable young man. Old Smith used to be somewhat inclined to be litigious—had a long suit with him about some property—but it was settled by the courts to the satisfaction of all parties, and we're the best of friends now."

A sable attendant came in with coffee and cigars, and as we reclined on the soft lounges, sipping the delicious Mocha and puffing our fragrant Havanas, I doubted if Solomon in all his glory ever experienced such comfort.

"Jones," I exclaimed, "how lucky we are in coming into the world in this Nineteenth Century, this age of civilization! The whole earth contributes its products to our enjoyment, and even many of the powers of nature, steam, electricity, etc., are at our command."

"Sir," answered Jones, "I doubt your conclusion. When man existed in a more simple state his wants were fewer, and happiness of course more easily attainable; but we are getting super-civilized, the luxuries of the last age are the necessities of this. How much more contented—and better too, for that matter—must have been our unsophisticated ancestors!"

The heat of the weather and the long walk over Jones's grounds, aided perhaps by the wine at dinner, made me somewhat drowsy, and in spite of my efforts to keep awake I began to doze, and dozing I had a dream.

II.

I dreamed that Asmodeus tapped me on the shoulder, and bade me follow him. On the wings of the wind we traveled with the rapidity of lightning through years and centuries of the past until we reached the banks of the Rhine, some time during the Middle Ages. It was night. Before us was a castle perched on an almost inaccessible crag. "Who lives here?" I inquired of my companion.

"The owner, or rather the possessor," answered Asmodeus, "calls himself the Count Johannes. His father was a robber, who, at the head of a gang of cut-throats, was accustomed to waylay passing travelers, rob, and not unfrequently murder them. He was killed in a brawl; but his son continued the business, until having amassed quite a store of his ill-gotten gains, he built this castle, whence he levies tribute on his weaker neighbors, and on all, in fact, who fall in his way. He has long been engaged in a bitter feud with a former companion in villainy, the Baron Von Schmidt, who lives in the tower we see yonder, near the smoking embers of the ruined hamlets. The village was destroyed this morning, in a raid by Count Johannes, and nearly all the wretched serfs slain or carried into captivity. He is now celebrating his success with a drunken orgie; we can hear the sounds of revelry; let us enter."

So saying, Asmodeus carried me through a loop-hole in the highest turret, and passing down the spiral staircase, though we did not actually touch the steps, we entered the banquet-hall—invisible to mortal eyes. Some twenty or thirty mail-clad men were sitting around a rough table quaffing huge tankards of ale or goblets of golden wine. In the centre of the board were the remains of a wild boar that had been roasted whole. The mirth was boisterous. At the head of the table sat a grim-visaged knight, with a bloody bandage around his head.

"A good day's work we've done, my trusty men," he said. "Much booty have we taken, and four score of the common herd have fallen beneath our good swords; but the escape of the caitiff Von Schmidt concerns me much. Had we caught him, by my troth his ears should have decked our festive board this night. Let us drink to better luck to-morrow."

The voice of the knight seemed to me familiar though rather harsh. I scanned his features more closely, and started back with amazement. It was the face of Jones. He had a grizzly beard and mustache, it is true, and the gold-rimmed spectacles were wanting, but I could not mistake the rest.

"That," said Asmodeus, "is the robber Count Johannes."

The revel waxed high, with deep potations and many a ribald song and jest. At last all of the carousers had fallen under the table in a state of intoxication, excepting the old knight, and he was becoming unsteady in his seat, and his head was beginning to nod, when beckoning to an attendant, he said:

"Varlet, bid the Ladie Emilie come hither. I would a word with her."

The page went out. In a few minutes a young woman entered, bearing in her hand a lute, and seated herself on a stool at the feet of the knight.

"Fair daughter," said the latter, right well didst thou dress the boar this day. What guerdon dost thou ask?"

"Dear father," answered the maiden, "I crave that, when thou stormest the tower to-morrow, thou wouldst spare the life of that comely youth, the son of the Baron Von Schmidt."

"Dunder and blitzen," cried the Count, "the heir to my arch foe! Knowest thou not, child, I have vowed that ere another day be past the heads of those caitiffs, father and son, shall grace my portcullis?"

The maiden wept. "It is but a trifling boon," she sobbed.

Her stern old father seemed moved, and smoothing her golden locks, he said:

"Child, sing me that old song once more, and perchance I may grant thy request, but as to the Baron's son"—and he struck the table with his clenched fist.

The maiden now passed her fingers lightly over the lute, and commenced the following rondeau:

*"Ah! s'il passait un chevalier
Dont le cœur fût tendre et fidèle,
Et qu'il triomphât du goliard
Qui me retient dans la tournelle, Je hénerais ce chevalier," etc.*

Soothed by the melody and overcome by the fumes of the wine he had imbibed, the knight soon dropped asleep. Suddenly a crash was heard, as of doors broken down, followed by the tramping of many feet, the clash of arms, the shrieking of women, and the shouts of men. The wary and unconquered old Baron Von Schmidt, at the head of a band of retainers, had managed, unperceived, to climb the precipice in rear of the castle, and, scaling the battlements, had forced his way into the strong-hold. The Count Johannes started up and grasped his sword, and those of his companions who were not obviously drunk staggered to their feet. A terrible struggle ensued, but the half-tipsy revelers of the castle could not cope with the vigorous and vengeful followers of the Baron, and they were nearly all slain.....Day was breaking when Asmodeus led me away from the place. The castle was in flames, and the victors were riding away laden with booty. At their head rode the Baron, leading an ass on which the unfortunate Count Johannes was strapped, Mazeppa-like, and grinding his teeth with rage and despair.

The Baron's son, the young and comely Count Von Schmidt, followed on a palfrey, bearing in his arms the Ladie Emilie, who had fainted away.

III.

Once more, led by Asmodeus, I sped through space and through time, on, on, on until we found ourselves on the banks of the Tiber, in Imperial Rome, nearly half a century before the coming of our Lord. There was a terrible commotion in the city; citizens were hurrying to and fro, or whispering mysteriously together, and soldiers were rushing about brandishing their swords with looks of rage and hatred. In a corner of the forum a war-worn veteran was addressing a crowd from the steps of the temple of Jupiter.

"Casar is slain!" said he; "the noblest Roman of them all, the foremost man of all this world;" and his moistened eyes flashed fire, as with uplifted sword he called upon his hearers to "strike for their altars and their fires, and inflict vengeance on the assassins."

"Who is that old soldier?" I inquired of Asmodeus.

"That is Furius Jonus," he replied, "the famous centurion of the 10th legion."

The name struck me. "Can it be?" I thought; for in that scarred and weather-beaten visage, deeply marked with the lines of hardship, I saw a certain resemblance to the placid Jones. I looked inquiringly at Asmodeus. He read my thoughts, and nodded affirmatively.

"That cut across his face," said he, "was received in a hand-to-hand combat with Vercingetorix; and that scar above the eye, whence a piece of the skull has been extracted, shows where he was struck by a club in the hands of a painted savage, when, jumping from the trireme, he led the legion ashore on the barbarous coast of Britain."

At this moment a citizen stepped forward, and endeavored to calm the passion of the veteran.

"Thou hast done the state good service, Furius," said he; "leave it now to younger arms to strike. Thy seven jugera at Laburnum, a virgin soil, wait the willing plow. There, with thy wife and children, thou mayest live in ease."

A smile of inexpressible scorn passed over the features of Furius.

"What care I for filthy lucre!" said he, "and what is ease to me? His sword should be the Roman soldier's only bride; and as for children, since my Emilia was forcibly abducted by Licencius Sergius, I acknowledge no other offspring than my deeds. They shall hand my name down to posterity."

Just then a party of conspirators, headed by Brutus, Cassius, and Licencius Sergius, rushed into the forum shouting "Liberty!"

"Ye shall have it," cried Furius, "to roam in Hades!"

And with that he made at them, striking right and left. At a single blow he cut off the head of Licencius Sergius, and then made a lunge at Cassius; but that individual being exceedingly lean, the blade passed through the toga only, merely grazing the body. Brutus instantly seized him by the throat, while Cassius tripped him up from behind, and the other confederates pressing forward were on the point of dispatching him with their daggers, when Marcus Antonius appeared at the opposite side of the forum, at the head of a body of soldiery. The conspirators hereupon made a precipitate exit, leaving Furius Jonus struggling on the pavement sorely bruised, but vowing that he had life enough left for revenge.

IV.

Again Asmodeus bore me away. We traveled a long distance into time, but not so far in space, for we landed in Arcadia sometime during the Age of Stone.

I saw before me a rude hut, made of branches of trees interlaced together and plastered with mud. A hideous old crone, with a great ring in her nose, and but scantily clad in a garment made from the inner bark of a tree, was grinding some roots between two stones. Five or six naked children were lolling about, the elder ones occasionally occupying themselves in making flint arrow-heads. A girl about sixteen years of age, whose whole costume consisted of a fringe of undressed leather about the loins, and whose tangled hair was matted with grease and dirt, was admiring herself in a neighboring pool of water, while engaged in staining her teeth black. A man dressed in skins soon came out of the surrounding woods. His hair was long and unkempt, and his grizzly beard came down to his waist. Some porcupine quills were stuck through his ears, and his arms and legs were tattooed. In one hand he carried a bow and arrows, and in the other a dead musk-rat.

"Woman," he said, in a harsh guttural voice, "I want to eat."

"Eat!" cried the harridan; "you are always eating! and a fine hunter you are, for the last moon we've had nothing but frogs and lizards!"

Just then her eye lighted on the musk-rat, and with an exclamation of delight she seized the carcass, and with a flint knife skinned and dressed it in a few minutes. She then took two sticks, and rubbing them quickly together succeeded, in about a quarter of an hour, in igniting them, and thus made a fire in which she commenced roasting the musk-rat. When it was about half done the man took it and proceeded voraciously to devour it. Some of the children, attracted by the smell of meat, drew toward him, whereupon he kicked them away. The woman told him to let them alone. By way of answer he picked up a club and gave her a beating. When he had finished the musk-rat, gnawing the bones quite clean, he gave a grunt of satisfaction, threw himself down on some leaves on the ground in the hut, and went to sleep.

Soon afterward a stalwart young savage, painted blue and with a club in his hand, crept out of the woods, and stealing behind the girl at the pool dealt her a blow on the head with his club that laid her senseless at his feet. He then tossed her over his shoulder and bore her away unperceived.

I felt incensed at his brutality and wished to interfere, but Asmodeus checked me, saying:

"That is the ceremony of courtship and marriage among these people."

"And who is the sleeping barbarian in the hut?" I asked.

"That is Dgongues," answered Asmodeus; "a great hunter in his youth, but now he is getting old. The end of his nose is gone, you see, nipped off in a tussle with a bear."

"Dgongues? Dgongues?" said I, "you don't mean to tell me that that is the original Jones."

"The aboriginal only," replied Asmodeus; "there are many long, long ages yet before we come to the Gorilla."

V.

The mention of this horrible beast so startled me that I awoke. Jones, wrapped in a cashmere dressing-gown, and with his feet in a pair of embroidered slippers worked by his wife, and Harper's Monthly on the table beside him, was stretched in his easy-chair, taking a comfortable siesta.

Miss Emily was in the drawing-room, playing an accompaniment on the piano to Smith, Jun., who was singing the popular song, "I will love thee ever, dearest!"

JACK AND HIS MOTHER.

"LITTLE children should be seen, and not heard!" says the venerable proverb. Should they, indeed? Then why were they not made like little mice, instead of having an instinctive desire to jump, scrape, stamp, caper, laugh, sing, halloo, and make a noise generally? But if children are to be heard as well as seen, are they to be heard to the exclusion of every thing else? If not, where shall the hearing begin? and do you believe in discipline or moral suasion, or both; and if so, how many parts of moral suasion?

I have, of course, an individual theory. I think somebody must govern in a house, or the ship will be without a hand at the helm; and if the largest experience gives the best light, perhaps the parents had better govern the children. If you mean to govern at all, I suppose, also, that it is better to commence early. When the little thing creeping about on the floor is told not to pull down the basket, or not to creep out at the door, and pulls down the basket, or slips out at the door, the instant the older head is turned, it may fairly be said to know how to disobey. It can then be taught to obey, or left to disobey for the next two or three years, and then taken in hand; the difference being that between building your house properly from the foundation, or laying the stones at hap-hazard, to take them down and lay them over again.

Also I have always believed that the fundamental principle of discipline was, "As few rules as possible, and those never broken with impunity."

But any theory rigidly applied is nothing more nor less than a strait jacket, and there is no grand educational theory applicable to all cases, though there is a happy medium, and few there be who find it. One of the first and most astounding discoveries made by the young mother, who has spent her girl-life over German and the piano, but not even a year in learning to play on human nature, is that you can not cut your child to fit your theory, but must cut your theory to fit your child. Here is a coil! here is trouble! here is piecing and patching off—the unlucky child, too often. John, the piper's son, walks barefoot in the gutters, makes mud-pies, and eats cucumbers, mince-pies, sausages, fruit-cake, gravies, and candies, indifferently. What on earth does your pale, thin-legged little Jack mean by getting ill under the same régime?

Mrs. Dikers punishes her children, who are models of infant virtue, whenever they disobey. Inference, when Jack comes roaring to you, about noon, and refuses to stop when he is bid, you commence to undo his buttons; but, my dear Madam, just one moment. Jack has been broiling over a brick fort since breakfast-time. His legs ache, and the gnats have had a nip at him. His hair is in his eyes. He has a hole in his trousers and a stone in his shoe. His face is begrimed and his fingers are sticky. If your legs ached, your hair was in your eyes, and your fingers were sticky, how do you think you would feel under the circumstances? Would it not be advisable, by washing, brushing, and combing, first to ascertain how many parts are depravity and how much is dirt; and then, if need still continue, to spank him, à la Mrs. Dikers? Worse yet: you can do nothing with Jack. You have warned him a dozen times and whipped him two dozen, and you make no impression, except on his skin. It is plain you can not draw out naughtiness from him by a counter irritant. But, Madam, every human being is an organ, and you can play on him, if you know the stops. You have not yet found out your boy; but he is get-at-able, and it is your business never to rest till you do get at him. There is something he loves and something he fears, and you can discover it if you have the patience. He may be open to reason, or touched by an appeal to his honor. He may dread rigidly enforced quiet, or the loss of a pleasure, or worse than all, the sad coldness of those he loves. But to declare that he is unmanageable, is simply to declare that you are too busy, or too lazy to experiment till you hit on a motive power; and, in that case, to be plain with you, you had better retire with your boy to a hermitage; for Jack howling, and Jack breaking up all conversation, and Jack in your neighbor's trees, and breaking his windows, and in full chase after his chickens, and disobeying you right and left, is insupportable and not to be endured by society.

Jack has another inconvenient aspect. He is something else besides a sweet little piece of mechanism that must be made to obey, if he is to be tolerable. Be determined fully within yourself to be obeyed on those few grand points on which obedience is necessary for home comfort and the child's safety, and lay no gins and snares for his poor little stumbling feet, in the shape of numerous rules, regulations, and restrictions; and, unless in exceptional cases, you will find discipline an easy matter. But Jack is an individual with rights that you are bound to respect. It is so excessively disagreeable and troublesome to respect the rights of those much weaker than ourselves that we are apt to dispense with that little ceremony altogether. If Mrs. Glycers willfully breaks her word, you have ways of being unpleasant to Mrs. Glycers, and vice versa. But if you disappoint Jack he has no means of holding you to your word. He was a thousand times more eager for his cart or book than you were for Mrs. Glycer's company at your party, and his disappointment goes fathoms below yours; for you are calmly sure that there are more Mrs. Glycers, while he is passionately certain that there will never be another cart, book, or happy moment for him. He has exactly the same right to expect fidelity from you that you have from Mrs. Glycers, and when you brush him away with "Some other time," and "How foolish to cry!" you are trampling on his rights because he is not old enough or strong enough to exact it; and when you do that you are a tyrant.

Jack has his troubles and his delights. We call them childish. We mean by that they are of slight value and of short duration. They interest us slightly; as a consequence we argue they take light hold on him, and we laugh often at his eager interest in them, and make him ashamed of them. But I appeal to the Man in the Moon, or the gentleman from Saturn, which is the most childish, a game of hop and skip or a Polka Redowa? a house of cards or the life of a Wall Street speculator? a game at ball, battle-door, or croquet and billiards? If you like to have your interests and pleasures treated with respect, has not Jack the same desire and the same right? And as for the short duration—which does the man in middle life, or the old man, remember best and most fondly, the years next him or those in which he was a boy?

Jack has a right to be heard. When he bursts in on your conversation, eager and palpitating, if he is a tolerably well-behaved Jack he will wait for the end of your paragraph, and then it is your turn for politeness and a hearing. Especially should he be heard when under suspicion, and believed, if his truthfulness is up to the average; if it is not, I am afraid you are to blame. If the matter is complicated by relations with Bob, or "some other fellow," he has the moral right to the patient investigation and dispassionate judgment that we accord to our felons, under the name of trial by jury.

It is useless to say, "These are stilted notions and beyond the appreciation of children," unless you think that your Jack is a little beast, and not a little man. If he is the last he has the germs of honor, truth, and self-respect. If you mean to develop honor, truth, and self-respect you must begin by believing in them. Respect him and he will respect himself. Trust him and he will feel the full responsibility. Outrage his childish dignity and delicacy, and though he has no words in which to express the sting, it will rankle deep in his little heart. Call on the good that is in him and it will answer you. Rouse the evil and it will grow. Be as wide awake for his good points as for his shortcomings, and you will find such praise the best guano for the small boy virtue-crop. If you wish him to say "Thank you," thank him yourself when he waits on you. If you desire him to be well-bred, treat him with scrupulous politeness. If you lose your temper, don't flatter yourself that you can wipe it out with ten pages of the Bible; or that it will escape him, even if he does not look up in your face with round, wondering eyes, and ask softly, "Mamma, aren't you quarreling?" as once happened to a friend of mine. If you have a truth for his digestion spread it abroad in the atmosphere. Don't make it into a potion or a pill. Live it, speak it, find it in a story, and tell or read it to him; but count it as just so much lost time when you sit down and say, sepulchrally, "My child, we are made of the dust of the earth to teach us humility. We ought to be good in order to be happy; and we shall be happy if we are good." A child is sure to shirk lumpy instruction like that, dodge precepts, and look straight at example.

I am aware that this view of Jack's rights and perceptions is a troublesome one. It will break in often on calls and concerts, on pie-making and frock-braiding, on reading and writing. It will take a piece here out of the best hour, and nip off a bit there from an agreeable plan. It requires a care and caution with which we are pleasantly apt to dispense in dealing with our children. If we are irritated when Jack bursts in upon our reading or shakes the table in the middle of a long-tailed letter, do we not irritate him in turn when we call him off from his play to bring us a pin? Have we any business to demand of him a self-control which we are unable to practice ourselves when we knock down the house that he was an hour in building with one sweep of our skirts?

A troublesome view, I admit again. Here have you a little stranger in this world, whose incessant drafts on your sympathy you must honor, because you are the only firm on whom this young gentleman has as yet any credit of the sort. You can't wind him up and set him running, in a safe place, out of harm's way. You can't tie him in a theory, like a baby-jumper, and leave him there. You can't snub him and turn him off, though he walks straight through all your plans, as he is sure to do. At least you will not, if you are wise.

Settle down at your crochet or your gossip and leave your little son to spend four-fifths of his day with his nurse or in the street at your peril. Push him off, with "Don't bother!" and "I am busy," to take his little interests outside for sympathy, and see if he will bring you his larger anxieties. Fold your hands and let the wind be sown in his heart, and see what you will find there when you come to look for fruit.

I know there are women to whom all this is the very superfluity of needless painstaking. Women who believe that there is some magic virtue inherent in the two words "Wife" and "Mother"—with all the qualities belonging thereto left out. It is enough for them that one day long ago they married and since have brought children into the world. On the strength of these two facts alone, husband and children are henceforth expected to love them straight through to the end of their lives, no matter how unlovable they may be. Their creed apparently runs like this:

"I believe that I am a Wife and Mother. That I can present myself constantly to husband and children with mouth down at the corners, temper out of joint, hair down my back, and the worst wrapper in town; and though they dislike untidiness, whining, and ill-temper in other people it will not affect them in the least; but they will enthusiastically prefer me to the rest of the world, because I am a Wife and Mother.

"I can habitually sour their sport and take the sparkle out of their pleasure, and still they will come to me for sympathy and find nothing pleasant without me, because I am a Wife and Mother.

"I believe that every thing in my house may run with a creak or a jar, and still they will prefer home, because I am in it, a Wife and a Mother. I believe that I have nothing to learn, because I am a Wife and a Mother. I believe that I can snap my fingers in the face of human nature, because I am a Wife and Mother. I am not selfish, for that is impossible for a Wife and Mother. I am nervous, but that is only natural in a Wife and Mother.

"I believe that I do wrong in a general way, but never on any particular count, being a Wife and Mother. If my house is out of order, our expenses beyond our income, and the children sickly, fretful, and quarrelsome, it is not that there is any thing amiss in my management, but simply that my house and children are entirely unlike all others, and there is no possible method of keeping them clean and under discipline. To think otherwise would be to cast a slur on me, a Wife and Mother; and no matter how repulsive and provoking I should appear were I somebody else, as a Wife and Mother I have a right to expect the entire devotion of both husband and children, unless they are miracles of infidelity and ingratitude."

Ladies may protest and indignantly disclaim such a creed, but is not that a very common practice reduced to words? Oh! the pity! the pity of it! that the mortal folly of all this can not be driven home to the comprehension of women. Think of a woman settling down in the midst of her household and spreading out into a great, fat vegetable. Her husband is modified by years and experience, but she learns nothing. Her children grow and she only develops—cabbageward. She instinctively looks after shirts and puddings; and to give her whole mind to these matters she sends her troublesome, meddling, busy, inquisitive little Jack any where out of her way.

The poor little fellow goes about with the "Why?" that God set on the end of his tongue, to be answered sometimes by a wise man, often by a fool, oftenest by a liar, picking up his mental and moral training like cold victuals. He grows to companionable age, and finds that he regards his mother with traditional respect and a certain interest due to the source from whence his shirt-buttons and lunch-baskets are derived. But he has a habit of finding all the enthusiasm, romance, and delight of his young life outside of his home; a habit acquired years before, when he was a very little boy, and much in his mother's way. In those days she was the oldest, the loveliest, the wittiest, and the dearest woman in the world; and he rather pined for her society. In these days she is unmistakably frouzy. She wears preternatural night-caps and huge flannel petticoats; she prosed intolerably; she has all the exploded notions of fifty years ago. She is weak, vain, irritable, rash, and undignified; endowed with all the attributes, in fact, proper to a woman who has vegetated without once asking whether those about her might not prefer a Woman to a Cabbage. Jack has an instinctive tenderness and respect for her as his mother; but she insists on an active personal preference and admiration. How can Jack prefer a woman stupid and selfish enough to have learned nothing in the last half century? and if he would walk half a mile out of his way to avoid such a woman, if she were not his mother, by what stretching and pulling of possibilities can he admire and venerate her?

I meet enough of such women, uneasy, dissatisfied, and pained. I often hear Her Cabbageship bewailing herself over the undutiful tendencies of this generation. I see also the gentle, gracious, keen-eyed, intelligent mother; the woman who, having her children, recognized the full value of what she had at stake, and the full weight of her responsibility. Very determined and unwearied was this little woman in her quiet way. When the plan that worked so well with Clara failed with Bob, with gentle, sagacious patience she set herself to find another. When she caught herself undoing her precept by her practice she took herself to task and rebuked herself with severity. As her children grew she grew with them, dreading only to be left behind. She called them her roses, and when she was selfish or lazy, said to herself, "But my roses will not clamber and shade my door-stone through the heat unless I weed, and water, and prune, and cut, and tie, and watch them now." Her Cabbageship looked on sneering, or stupidly indifferent. She had tried all that; or why be the slave of your children? But to-day I see our little Mother hanging on her son's arm, and very proud of Jack, who is quite as proud of her, while over the way Her Cabbageship sits alone, groaning over her thisle-crop.

OUR VEGETABLES.

IN these days, when nearly all the good things in the vegetable world are fast becoming cosmopolitan, it is interesting to trace the nationality of some of the most familiar things in our daily fare. Seldom, while munching our matutinal radish, do we pause to conjure an imaginary bed of buried crimson and white in the far lands of Fang-Chou and Ptsy-Wampi; yet from China and Japan were the first Radishes introduced to the outside barbarians of Europe. Neither, at supper, in meeting with a peculiarly flavorful morsel in our cake, do we inwardly thank the home of Demosthenes for the luxury; yet the earliest Citron-groves breathed their perfume on the sunny Grecian ether. Our Quinces, hanging from crooked, crowded limbs, the most neglected of all our luxuries, may be forced to stand in drunken rows along broken-down fences, or act as outposts to barns and outhouses; but the great-great-grandmother of all the Quinces was a plucky little tree of high station, looked up to by sweet-scented shrubs in the Island of Crete.

Fennel grew long along the banks of European rivers long before the first entertainment of the "Arabian Nights" was dreamed of; and Celery, once known as "Smallage," was munches by many an ancient Druid, let us believe, plucking it during his solitary walks along the old British coast. Even then, it may be, the ducks of an unknown continent were munching it too, for it grows wild upon our Chesapeake and Delaware bays, and our canvas-backs and their friends love to dine upon it. But the British, as usual, have all the credit, as it is down in their books.

Garlic came from Sicily, where, for my part, I wish it had staid. The Cuculo-rapa, an afflicted cross between the turnip and cabbage, claims the Vaterland for its own. Beans blossomed first within sight of embryo mummies, in the land of the Sphinx; and the Egg-plant first laid its glossy treasures under an African sun.

Peru and Chili were the first countries enlivened by the dazzling hues of the Nasturtian vine; and Southern Europe gave us the Artichoke and the Beet.

To Persia we stand indebted for Peaches, Walnuts, Mulberries, and a score of everyday luxuries and necessities; to Arabia we owe the cultivation of Spinage; and to Southern Europe we must bow in tearful gratitude for the Horseradish.

At Siberia the victims of modern intemperance may shake their gory locks forever—for from that cold, unsocial land came Rye, the father of the great fire-water river which has floated so many jolly souls on its treacherous tides, and engulfed so much of humanity's treasure.

The Chestnut, dear to squirrels and young America, first dropped its burrs on Italian soil, while its giant cousin, yeleft the "Horse," is a native of Thibet.

Who ever dreams, while enjoying his "Bergamotte," his "Flemish Beauty," or his "Jargonelle," that the first Pear-blossoms opened within sight of the Pyramids? and what fair school-girl of all the pickle-eating tribe, dreams of thanking the East Indies for her Cucumbers? Apropos of this, I once was told by a worthy old lady of Long Island, a singular item in regard to the last-named edible. She said that in its wild state it grew on very luxuriant vines that trailed in every direction over the ground, tangling themselves among the bushes at such a rate that the progress of grazing animals was thereby much impeded; hence, she assured me, the name, cow-cumber. The old lady's learning, I admit, was generally not of the most reliable order, but I give her suggestion for what it may be worth. Probably she was in some way akin to that other worthy old lady in New Jersey who, when asked by her city nephew, why in the world she called a certain vegetable "Sparrow-grass," replied, innocently:

"Well, child, I can't say where these names comes from gen'rally, but certain it's as plain as the nose on your face that sparrow-grass must get its name from the sparrows feedin' on it so plentiful when it's in seed."

The nephew chuckled inwardly, of course. But he, poor fellow, was ignorant in his turn; for he didn't know that Asparagus was first found in Russia and Poland; and that in its wild state, as gathered along the shores of Long Island Sound and elsewhere, it is a most delicious edible.

Parsley, that prettiest of all pretty greens, taking so naturally to our American soil that it seems quite to the manner born, is only a sojourner among us. Its native home is Sardinia, or, rather, there it first secured an acquaintanceship with civilized man. Onions, too, are only naturalized foreigners in America. I had hoped that in poetic justice research would prove this pathetic bulb to have sprung from the land of Niobe: but no; Egypt stretches forth her withered hand and claims the Onion as her own!

Maize and Potatoes, thank Heaven! can mock us with no foreign pedigree. They are ours—ours to command, to have, and to hold, from time's beginning to its ending, though England and Ireland bluster over "Corn" and "Praties" till they are hoarse. John Bull's corn-laws take in wide fields of waving grain of many names; but our Corn and Potatoes he can claim only as emigrants—American cousins, whose coming and vanishing can make the British lion caper or crouch at will.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT is always inspiring to see a man of great ability and spotless character a leader in public affairs. And it is not a common spectacle. Most men reach great political distinction only after terrible wear and tear of conscience, and most, indeed, as they ascend, lose faith in principle and in the generosity of human nature. Seeing men under the perpetual strain of selfish views, the leader makes his appeal to selfishness, and half despises those whom he persuades; while the necessity of managing human affairs by human instruments, and of doing what is actually practicable instead of what is ideally desirable, accustoms him to a pity for "poor human nature" which is the prolific parent of contempt and cynicism.

Very few of the more conspicuous political leaders of the last generation in this country were such as we have called inspiring. The character did not balance the ability. Daniel Webster and Henry Clay were the great names of the Whigs; Calhoun and Douglas of the Democrats. Of these we suppose Calhoun to have been the man of the simplest life and purest habits; but he was not a true political leader. He was a political philosopher, a visionary, a fanatic. He entangled himself and his admiring followers in an inextricable web of sophistry; and his theories of human society were as medieval as if he had been a Spanish monk of the thirteenth century. The contrast between this austere figure and Webster was that between St. Just and Charles Fox. We do not recall in Webster's correspondence or in the reports of his conversation any especially fond allusion to Fox, yet it is clear that of all statesmen he was Webster's most congenial model. The richness and geniality of nature, the variety of knowledge, the generous delight in sport and all sensual stimulants, the liberal political sympathy, the power of debate, even the personal attributes of impressive presence and voice, all furnish a resemblance of which it is not easy to suppose Webster unconscious, or with which he was not pleased.

Among our own conspicuous statesmen at this time, although many are learned, accomplished, and of the utmost honesty of life, no single man is so marked and superior a political leader as Mr. Gladstone is in England. Mr. Mill lately said of him that he was the greatest Parliamentary leader since the Stuarts. The praise is prodigious when the glittering list of Parliamentary names is remembered; and yet a little reflection will assure us that Gladstone's qualities are those of the men of 1690, of Hampden and his friends, a freshness of faith, an earnestness of purpose, enforced by the noblest character. Perhaps a certain leftiness of manner may seem almost haughty and imperious, but such a manner belongs to a very fine and sensitive nature, and indicates modesty and extreme shyness quite as much as pride.

But without recurring to the time of the Stuarts, no one who is familiar with the political history of England can fail to remark a curious similarity in the careers of Mr. Gladstone and the greatest British statesman of the last generation, George Canning, who has an especial interest for us as being the real author of the Monroe doctrine, a policy which has been grossly misinterpreted. The Monroe doctrine, in essence, declared not that this continent is to remain the game-preserve or fish-park of the United States, a vast territory upon which we are to do what we choose; but merely that America shall be the arena on which the experiment of free popular Government shall be tried. "The Monroe doctrine," says Goldwin Smith, in his late thoughtful and profound discourse upon the civil war in America, "properly understood, and as Canning, who was really its first propounder, understood it, means not the aggrandizement of the United States, but the independence of America. It means that the Powers of the Past may work their own will in Europe for a season, but that they shall not be allowed to mar the hopes of man in the New World." George Canning was a monarchist, but he was the brave champion of Constitutional liberty against the Holy Alliance. Gladstone is not a Republican, but he is the intrepid advocate of political progress against the sluggishness of a fat Conservatism.

Both Canning and Gladstone came from a class below the nobility. Both are known as scholars and variously accomplished. Both began as Tories, and were liberalized by time and native generosity. Like Canning, Gladstone is the greatest Parliamentary orator of his time. Like Canning, he has the most comprehensive grasp of principles. Like Canning, his personal and political character is spotless. Gladstone has also Canning's delicate sensitiveness of nature, which suffers acutely in political contest, and which invites the coarsest attacks from vulgar minds. Like the great Foreign Secretary, Gladstone is ceaselessly hated and hunted by the Tory hounds, who can never forgive fidelity to ennobling ideas. Like his father's friend, Gladstone grows pale and haggard and gray in the battle from which his voice rings out in a loftier strain with every fiercer shock. Graceful and brilliant and witty and wise, a shining figure of what is best in the politics of his country, Gladstone, like Canning, redeems to all generous hearts in the world the traditional England of constitutional liberty.

In one salient point they differ. Canning was opposed to Parliamentary reform, and Gladstone's fame is identified with it. It was, however, less the question of Canning's time than of Gladstone's. During Canning's active career his aim was to maintain the principle of Constitutional liberty against the Holy Alliance, which was the form taken by the violent reaction following the Napoleonic wars. His policy was masterly. The power and effect with which it was urged were imperial. The bitter disgrace with which Castlereagh's part in the Congress of Vienna had covered England was entirely removed by the splendid attitude which Canning gave her; just as the mousing, shop-keeping, cockney hedging and dodging of Palmerston, which made British policy a synonym for unprincipled meanness, has been, though but for a few months, pitifully contrasted with the earnest programme of Gladstone.

Both have shown that genius of a high order is as valuable in politics as in any other sphere. The policy of Canning saved the position of England in his time, and only the policy of Gladstone can save it now. But John Bull distrusts genius. Like George Third, who thought Edmund Burke a rhetorical declaimer and Addington a statesman, so there is a disposition in England, of which Palmerston was the typical representative, to sneer at profound convictions and radical principles. Instead of sailing freely in deep waters with every inch of canvas swelled with the wind of heaven, John Bull prefers to tide his boat over sand bars and pole it along shallow and tortuous channels. Robert Lowe is the legitimate successor of Palmerston, as Gladstone is of Canning; and if Englishmen prefer the Palmerstonian England to Canning's, Robert Lowe will rise to power while Gladstone withdraws.

There is something pathetic in the picture of George Canning, derided and maligned at every step, yet, with all his sparkling superiority, unable to laugh his tormentors down, but sinking careworn, enfeebled, and lonely beneath their petty stings. With similar sorrow we read of Gladstone wining under miserable taunts, asking proudly when the Tory tally-ho greets him as he rises: "Am I to be permitted to speak?" and grimly, with effort and anxiety that have left their plain traces upon his face and figure, announcing that the Government "has communicated with the Queen." It is impossible not to associate the two men, who, indeed, have an earlier and actual association. It was to Seaforth House, the residence of his friend, the father of Mr. Gladstone, that Canning went in 1822 to make his final preparations for his departure to India as Governor-General. It is "situated on a flat," says Canning's biographer, "stretching north of the town and overlooking the sea. The room which he occupied looked out upon the ocean, and here he would sit for hours gazing on the open expanse, while young Gladstone... used to be playing on the strand below." It was here that Canning heard of the death of Castlereagh, and received the summons to the King which made him Foreign Secretary.

It is curious, as Canning was opposed to Parliamentary Reform, and as Gladstone is its Achilles, that the motion which occasioned the late defeat of Gladstone was made by Lord Dunkellin, Canning's grandson.

WHEN Harvard University conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws upon Andrew Jackson, the venerable college traditions were broken by the chief college in the country, and a degree became merely a certificate of general distinction and personal popularity. It has not, however, altogether lost its peculiar meaning, even at Cambridge, where at the late Commencement it was awarded to Ralph Waldo Emerson and Richard H. Dana, Jun. Dartmouth, again, this year not unhandsomely followed the Jacksonian precedent of Harvard, and to the illustrious company of Dr. Emerson, Dr. Dana, and Dr. Andrew Jackson introduced Dr. W. T. Sherman, late of Savannah and Bentonville via Chattanooga and Atlanta.

Dr. Sherman was happily present, and happily spoke. Indeed it must have been a memorable day in that pleasant old New Hampshire town of Hanover when the grave civic procession proceeded from the humpbacked old brick barracks which constitute our classic halls at every college town, and descending to the level of the street skirted the inclosed green common in the centre of the town, which corresponds to the ancient market-place in English villages, and irregularly pacing to martial music straggled toward the church. If the blushing candidate for the Doctorate of Laws beheld that march he perhaps was the only spectator who was not thinking of another—daring, secret, swift, triumphant, and forever historic, Sherman's March to the Sea. Of all the bright throng packed close in the plain old church which has seen so many repetitions of the same inspiring and touching spectacle of Commencement, Sherman, of course, was the one object of eager interest and scrutiny. Each young orator, as he ascended the platform in academic robes and turned to speak to that throng, addressed himself not to the scholars, the vague public, or the solemn collegiate authorities, but to the soldier. Even the youth who knew that she was there, listening and looking with flushed cheek and palpitating bosom, knew that she was timidly wondering what impression he was making upon the great guest of the day, and the young orator shared her soft curiosity.

What mind was not busy with the contrast which Sherman's presence compelled! There he sat placid in the midst of tranquil, scholarly rites, who, two summers before, through smoke and fire and splintering shell, and all the loud, mad horror of war, was forcing his tremendous way from the mountains to the sea. What heart in the old church was not grateful as it remembered that the fiery work was done not for himself but for them all who sat peaceful and contented and looked at him! No wonder that the wise men of Dartmouth resolved that their most shining wreath should be laid upon his head, and that he should go laureled from their hands. No wonder that a mind so sensitive, a temperament so ardent and impetuous as his, were touched with emotion and kindled into the truest eloquence.

When the President of the College announced that the degree of Doctor of Laws had been conferred upon Major-General William T. Sherman, and Dr. Sherman rose, at the President's request, to reply, we are told that he was received with "the wildest expressions of delight." The Doctor spoke very simply, but with a sincerity and individuality and point that distinguish his oration among all the collegiate discourses of the year.

"When I graduated," he said, "I was told in plain English, not in Latin, that I had finished, and was qualified in natural philosophy, chemistry, mathematics, and so forth. To prove that I was so quailed I was sent down to Florida to catch Indians. I did not see the logic of it then, nor do I now, but I had to go. I went from place to place in that country, and finally I brought up in Charleston; and whether I had a foresight of what was coming, if that could be, or whether it was by the directing hand of Providence, who rules all things, I certainly was a wanderer in those days, and hunted through the marshes of the Santos, the Edisto, and the Savannah rivers, obtaining knowledge which has since been of value to the nation. Again, by what seemed a Providential accident, I was sent to take testimony about some lost saddles and bridles, value nothing: but nevertheless those lost saddles and bridles took me into a region of country the knowledge of which afterward proved to be of the greatest importance to the people of New Hampshire and the whole civilized world. I went to Marietta and Chattanooga and staid six weeks, and in that short time gained knowledge which has since, I think, repaid the mileage paid me at ten cents per mile....

"After some years I again went South, and all at once I paused to see and feel in the very air that we were upon the very verge of a sectional war. I had heard its spoken of in Charleston. We had laughed and joked over it at the mess table. I had heard it discussed by politicians. I had heard General Scott say that we were upon the eve of war, but my mind never realized it until the spring or summer of 1860, when I was in New Orleans and Baton Rouge. Then, for the first time, I saw that it was not all talk. That cry of wolf, wolf, meant something, and that civil war was upon us sure enough: and what has been the issue? You all know it has been a short war to the world at large, but long enough to us during those dark days which formed the early part of it. I will not review it. Let history take charge of it. All I will say is, that in that war arose men, one by one, equal to the emergency, until the war closed and the nation was saved."

Dr. Sherman proceeded to say a few words of hearty praise of Grant and Thomas, and Sheridan and Meade. Simple men they are, he said, and their eminence teaches that, with honesty of purpose you can master every problem, if you go at it with a good purpose and a determination to do so. There is no doubt of that, in my judgment. It requires, of course, a great intellect to become a powerful judge, or lawyer, or man of science; but for a man of business, for the thousand and one employments that give tone and temper to the country, any young man with a good, honest heart can master them. For the art of war, in which renown seems thrust upon us, all that is required is nerve, honor, courage, and faith in the flag that wins, and wins always." He asked the blessing of the audience upon the young men who stood before them and were just starting out into the world, "which is not so dark and full of bad people as has been represented;" and then the maiden Doctor took his seat.

There have been many memorable days at Dartmouth, and noble words of exhortation and encouragement have there been spoken to young men "starting out into the world." These of Sherman are not likely to be forgotten. They come to enforce those lyrical sentences of most earnest persuasion uttered in the same church twenty-eight years ago by Ralph Waldo Emerson, which have chastened and inspired the lives of many more young men than those of the generation that heard them. "When you shall say, 'As others do, so must I: I renounce. I am sorry for it, the dreams of my youth, I must let learning and romantic expectation go until a more convenient season.' Then dies the man in you. Then perish the buds of art and poetry and science as they have died already in a thousand, thousand men. The hour of that choice is the crisis of your history; see that you hold yourselves fast by the intellect."

NEITHER the fear of cholera nor the angry aspect of our politics have been able to lessen the interest of this country in the European war. It came, after all, so suddenly, and its opening campaign was so swift and amazing in its results, that nobody could be indifferent. Napoleon Bonaparte, in the beginning of the century and the Congress of 1815, gave Venetia to Austria. This campaign of ten days in Bohemia gave it back to Bonaparte's nephew and to Italy. Old Metternich, hated by every Italian heart, used to sneer back again for all his long dreary years, "Italy is a geographical expression." This campaign of ten days in Bohemia reversed the wisdom and policy of his lifetime. Louis Napoleon said at Auxerre, "France hates the treaties of 1815." This ten days' campaign in Bohemia tore those treaties to tatters. Bismarck said that there ought to be a united Germany with Prussia at the head. This campaign of ten days in Bohemia obliterated little kingdoms and duchies, sent little kings and dukes flying like dry leaves in October; dissolved the Germanic Confederation: paralyzed the Federal army, and revealed one supreme power in Germany. Prussia, alert, compact, homogeneous, has long chafed under the sluggish disdain of Austria, has long resolved that her hereditary and traditional headship should be destroyed, even to the crumbling of the empire. The campaign of ten days in Bohemia is fought, and "the empire of Austria," as a distinguished diplomatist remarks in the traditional epigrammatic style of diplomatists, "no longer exists but at the headquarters of Field-Marshal Dornik."

Such radical results have never before been achieved in so brief a campaign, and they seem to be due simply to the better wit of Prussia. She meant to fight; she made every preparation; and she struck hard and incessantly. Austria took the field with her usual vast prestige, which is a vast pretense, for she has never been really formidable in war. She has prevailed by Deportment. She has been the residuary legatee of the Holy Roman Empire. There has been a general consent to say that she was a terrible fellow. Her very weaknesses have been quoted as the real secrets of her strength. It is true, said the believers, that she is composed of many nationalities, but you see that these are skillfully played off against each other. One part has no unwillingness to keep another part in order. Austria has been what Carlyle calls a mere "sunderum." "Austria never wins," says the London Times, "but is always going to win.... There is always some coming man, some crafty Wurmsner among her veterans, or some dashing Alvinzi among her untried youngsters, some Melas, some Mack, some Gialay or Benedek sure to astonish the world by unexpected achievements. The young Corsican breaking through the passes of the Alps at the head of 30,000 sans-culottes in 1796, the Prussian army invading Hanover and Saxony in 1806, are to have no chance against the men and officers that Austria brings into the field.... Wurmsser and Alvinzi and Rovera and five or six successive Austrian armies break to pieces against that mere handful of 30,000 sans-culottes under the young Corsican. Mack, outgeneraled, bewildered, 'crumpled up,' lays down his arms at the head of 30,000 or 40,000 combatants, yielding up an impregnable fortress. Giulay loses Lombardy in two battles, fought on ground of his own choosing; and Benedek allows the inexperienced Prussians to steal a march over him in Saxony, to break through his lines in Bohemia, to make good their way toward Vienna."

Poor Benedek! A month ago we all pronounced his name as if it had been Hannibal, and now how easily the London Times, that parasite of success, now proves him to be nobody! The fault is ours, not his. What did we know of Benedek? And so with Austria. Why did we forget history? A century ago the Prussian Frederick marched into Saxony in the same sudden and overwhelming manner, and stole the great jewel of Silesia from the Austrian crown. Napoleon Bonaparte defeated her in the beginning of this century. The treaties of 1815 put her upon her feet again, and now at the first serious effort to disturb the treaties down she topples.

It is not enough to ascribe such vast defeats as those of the Austrians in this Bohemian campaign to the needle-gun. It is not circumstances but the power that uses and controls them which gives victory. Boys enough had watched steam puffing from a kettle. But James Watt was the only boy who made that steam move machinery. It is the intellectual activity and skill in a nation which invents needle-guns that shows the probability of the power in the same nation to use them effectively, and to direct great armies and their movements. A quick-witted people is a dangerous enemy. A people of fat wits, however strongly stationed, may be safely attacked. The Prussian conduct of the Bohemian campaign was an intellectual triumph. It calculated all the risks, and was sagacious enough to take them. It counted upon the slowness of the enemy as much as upon its own decision and agility, and it counted truly.

The position of Italy at the close of the campaign is not what its friends wish. After long years of resolved preparation it bravely strikes a heavy blow at the very mailed heart of the enemy, but is repulsed and baffled, and the foe wincing under a heavier assault from another hand, disdainfully surrenders the contested prize not to Italy but to France. Italy, therefore, can not feel that she owes Venetia to her own will and force, and, whatever the terms upon which France cedes the territory, Italy loses much of the moral value of the possession.

But what shall we say of the moral value of the whole struggle? Here is a fearful war—and what war is we know—what good cause is to gain by it? Ruskin, in his last little book, says that art springs from war. But will the art of better living, of more diffused happiness, spring from this war? To this the answer must be that it is useless to limit our view to the mere occasion of the war. The question is not whether Prussia or Austria were more or less right upon the point of the breaking of the Convention of Gastein, but whether, Prussia and Austria being two huge thunder-clouds so charged as to make the storm inevitable, the sympathies of civilization went with the one or the other. This question suffers very little debate. There is in Prussia a strong Constitutional party, a more general intelligence, and a vigorous German nationality. In Austria there are none of these. The victory of Austria would be an indefinite duration of a semi-despotic condition. The triumph of Prussia opens the way for a united German nationality and Constitutional government. It is by no means impossible that Bismarck himself, who is the chief of European statesmen, seizing the opportunities of the hour and of his position, may trust the event of the war to the enthusiasm and inspiration of the German people, sure that this cloudy complication would then issue in a truly imperial Germany.

WHEN the chief end of novelists for so long a time seems to have been the delineation of criminals and the description of crime, it is a true pleasure to read a story so lofty and earnest as "Felix Holt, the Radical," by George Eliot, which is the name chosen by Miss Evans, the author of "Adam Bede" and "Romola." Felix Holt neither steals nor stabs nor poisons. He does not woo other men's wives nor murder his own. He is a young Englishman of the middle class, who, impatient of the hollowness and falsity of the society around him, resolves to devote himself to watch-making and poverty, hoping to teach at least a few of his companions contentment with their own position and class, and to lead them to understand that happiness does not consist in reaching a higher rank, but in doing cheerfully the duties of their own. The cultivation which he has acquired as a medical student invests him with an air of refinement, despite his low collar in the day of high stocks and stiff cravats, and the general rough independence of conventionalities which distinguishes him.

Felix Holt is as impatient of the cant and hypocrisy of Liberalism as he is of the dull injustice of Toryism. Yet he is neither a dreamer nor a sentimentalist, neither Hamlet nor a ridiculous Manfred. He does not curse the spite that makes it necessary for him to set the world right, for he does not propose to create an era. In a small way he will try to expose the defects of all parties, showing that not upon the ballot, nor upon land, nor upon titles, but upon intelligence and self-denial, is a man's happiness to be built. If he is a little sober it is because his heart is sensitive, and he sees many kinds of suffering, many more than "Reform" can medicinate.

For the tale is laid in the Reform year in England, in 1832. Where else shall we find such exquisite, broad, breezy, finished pictures of English rural life and landscape thirty years ago as in this book? There is almost a sense of novelty, after the melodramatic descriptions and flashy sketches of the popular novels, in the tranquil, deep, luminous, and careful elaboration of "Felix Holt." But it is a book of great power as well as great art. Esther Lyon—a figure so exquisitely womanly, so bright, wayward, tender, and true—is a portrait of which every woman must be proud. The gradual deepening and purifying of her character by good fortune and not ill; the delicate poise and balance of a clear, healthy human will; the deliberate choice of the higher with all its doubts rather than the lower with all its certainties, are all unfolded with a skill and firmness and felicity which no living author surpasses.

It is long since we have met in a novel a heroine who is truly fascinating on other grounds than her bonnet or the constant assertion of her fascination by the author, or a hero who is properly heroic. His portrait in this case, indeed, is less excellent than hers, simply because it is more of a sketch and less finished. Others of the personages are more fully made out, and are very individual. But we stop. We hint at nothing in the story lest we should suggest its plot, and we would not willingly be guilty of so mortal an offense to every true novel-reader.

It is hard to believe that it is now eleven or twelve years since the excitement of the summer was the expectation of Rachel. She was to come early in September, and in the absence of wars or rumors of war, the gay loiterers at Newport and Saratoga and Sharon and Lebanon and the White Sulphur Springs and the White Mountains, and wherever else their glittering was seen, had that new zest to the old pleasure, and forgave the early coming to town since it might be made only a delightful excursion from which they could return with sparkling memories and eager mouths.

Punctual to the time Rachel came, as three or four years before Jenny Lind had come. But there was nothing in the fame or story of the actress which could arouse the enthusiasm that greeted the singer. That vast moral welcome of which we have formerly spoken as awaiting Jenny Lind could not possibly salute Rachel. However supreme the actress might be the popular conscience looked askance at the woman. Besides, she spoke French only. Her audience must necessarily be limited and half foreign. There might be great admiration of a select circle, but there could not be universal popular delight.

The pleasant September evening of her first appearance came. The pretty metropolitan theatre was full of a choice and curious audience, the mass of which was undoubtedly American, only partly familiar with the French language. They sat with the book of the play—it was Corneille's "Les Horaces"—and patiently awaited the rising of the curtain. Presently the prompter touched his bell and the stage was revealed. Its formality and severity, even to bareness, was the first impression. There were the two regulation arm-chairs, a general, faint, feeble hint of "classical" rigor, and a premonition of a drama in which the "unities" and the conventions were painfully prominent. But before the impression was very clearly defined a figure, exquisitely draped, of the severest symmetry, a form of tragic grace, not full to ripe queenliness but of a royal maiden, glided upon the scene with a face so pitiful and wan that its overpowering woe put every mind in key for the tragedy.

But Rachel herself was more tragical than any part she played. Her genius seemed to be as exceptional to her whole character as a fine voice. She was already stricken with mortal disease when she came: but the poor girl of the Boulevards, the slight singer at the cafés of a few years before, burned to be the sovereign of two worlds, as she proudly declared. She could not know what she had undertaken. How could she, whose chief weapon was speech, hope to subdue those who could not understand her? Her tones, her movement, her superb taste might be acknowledged, but even actual passion in a foreign tongue is strange, feigned passion may be even ludicrous. Rachel could not but feel acutely that her American career was not a triumph, was not exactly a success. And she was mortally ill when she became conscious of it! And she had crossed the sea to confound and conquer the barbarous Yankees, and they were not subdued! They were not averse, they were not unkind, ungenerous, or unintelligent. On the contrary, they were ardently eager to be enthusiastic, and she who had illuminated Europe with the blaze of her genius turned it upon them, and they smiled and hoped but were not warmed. How truly that wan, piteous face, that wasting figure, that low voice which vibrated through the hearer, that hollow cough which destroyed the sad illusion by a sadder truth, told the melancholy tale of disappointment and despair. No one can recall those last and unhappiest days of Rachel without a willingness to draw a cloud of forgiveness over her wild and wayward life.

The expectation of this summer fortunately has none of these mournful aspects. Adelaide Ristori, who will be the September guest of this year, comes invested only with the most womanly and attractive associations. No longer young she is still in the gentle prime of her power, and brings to us the unworn and persuasive genius which did not shrink from the contest with Rachel when she sat crowned in her own capital. The gossip that Dumas or Jules Janin or Véron or some other proud Parisian resolved to show Rachel that fames could be made as readily as omelets, and therefore brought Ristori to Paris and puffed and applauded her into a great reputation, is worthy of Paris for its extravagance and folly. Paris is the worst place in the world to try such an experiment, for the Parisians are remorseless and spoiled. A hungry man may be duped with a painted dish but not the victim of satiety.

It seems that Ristori was born near Venice in 1822. Her parents were strolling players, so that she began life in the theatre. When she was fourteen she played in Francesca da Rimini, and in a very few years became the most noted of Italian actresses. Her beauty and her grace, with her winning genius, made her every where a favorite, and in 1846 Julio del Grillo, son and heir of the Marquis of Capranica, saw her, and loved her, and offered to marry her. The chronicler from whom we cull these facts of high romance informs us that the pride of the fine old Italian nobleman and of all his fine old family was aroused by the threatened degradation. Remonstrance was in vain. The affair took the course that it always does in the fine old English comedy. The lovers eloped and were married; then returned upon their knees, and were reconciled to the fine old people, who insisted that the Marchesa del Grillo—for such, says the proud chronicler, is the true title of Ristori—should remain at their villa, where she remained in seclusion for nearly two years. But the retirement was haunted and disturbed by the ghosts of former triumphs and excitements. She longed to return to the stage, for which her genius so peculiarly fitted her; and she again appeared at Rome, in 1848, in Alfieri's tragedy of Myrrha. But the French were soon battering at the city, and Ristori left the theatre for the hospital; nor was it till 1850 that she returned to the stage, of which since the death of Rachel she has been the undisputed queen.

In this country, of course, Ristori will play in the Italian language. As with Rachel, this must, of course, limit both her audience and their enjoyment. Yet her magnificent action, her womanly tenderness and passion, the pathos of the heart, will not fail of their effect. These are of no country, and appeal to the universal sympathy of humanity. Her coming assures us of a refined and profound artistic enjoyment. The "whole audience" may not "rise in a body, so deeply moved that the play for some moments can not proceed;" their "overwrought feelings" may not find "an outlet in loud shouts, clapping of hands, wavings of handkerchiefs, and such tumults of applause as are very, very rarely witnessed in any theatre;" but they will certainly feel to their hearts that exquisite charm of true womanhood which is described as the crowning grace of Ristori.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 2d of August. It embraces the conclusion of the session of Congress; several changes in the Cabinet; the successful laying of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable; the change in the British Ministry; and the progress and probable termination of the war in Europe. So many important events have seldom occurred in the course of a single month.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

On the 15th of June the "National Union Club" of Washington issued a call for a "Union National Convention," to be convened at Philadelphia on the 14th of August. Among the Executive Committee of the Club are Senators Browning, now Secretary of the Interior, Doolittle, and Cowan. This call is sanctioned by prominent men throughout the country who favor the general policy of the President, and oppose that of the majority in both Houses of Congress. It prescribes that the Convention shall consist of at least two delegates from each Congressional district of all the States, four from each State at large, two from each Territory, two from the District of Columbia, to be chosen by electors of the several States "who sustain the Administration in maintaining unbroken the union of the States under the Constitution, and who agree in the following propositions," which we present in a greatly abridged form:

1. The Union is insoluble, and the Constitution, and the laws passed in accordance with it, are supreme.
2. The rights and equality of the States, including the right of representation in Congress, are guaranteed by the Constitution.
3. There is nowhere any right to dissolve the Union, either by withdrawal of States, by force of arms, by Congressional action, by secession, by exclusion of Representatives, or by the National Government in any form.
4. Slavery is abolished, and can not be restored in any State or Territory.
5. Each State has the right to prescribe the qualifications of its own electors.
6. Each State has the right to order its own domestic concerns, subject only to the Constitution. "The overthrow of that system, by usurpation and centralization of power in Congress, would be a revolution dangerous to a Republican Government and destructive of liberty;" and while each House is judge of the qualifications of its own members, yet "the exclusion of loyal Senators and Representatives, properly chosen and qualified under the Constitution and laws, is unjust and revolutionary."
7. The purpose of the war was to preserve the Union and the Constitution; this having been achieved, the rebellion having been suppressed, and all resistance to the authority of the Government having ceased, war measures should also cease; and as indispensably necessary to the National credit there should be "an early restoration of all the States to the exercise of all their Constitutional powers in the National Government."
8. All electors who agree in the foregoing propositions are invited to vote for delegates to this Convention; "but no delegate will take a seat in such Convention who does not loyally accept the National situation, and cordially indorse the principles above set forth, and who is not attached in true allegiance to the Constitution, the Union, and the Government of the United States."

The call for this Convention, taking as it did the form of a measure of the Administration, led to a partial re-construction of the Cabinet. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, wrote (July 11), warmly approving of this Convention. "I regard," he said, "a restoration of the unity of the country its immediate, as well as its most vital interest. That restoration will be complete when loyal men are admitted as Representatives of the loyal men of the eleven States so long unrepresented in Congress.... Congress possesses that power exclusively; Congress, after a session of seven months, still omits to exercise that power. What can be done to induce Congress to act?" A Convention of the people he thinks every way proper, which should urge this action upon Congress. "No one party," continues Mr. Seward, "could do this effectually, or even seems willing to do it alone. No local or popular organization could do it effectually. It is the interest of all parties alike, of all the States, and of all sections—a national interest, the interest of the whole people. The Convention indeed may not succeed in inducing Congress to act; but if they fail the attempt can make matters no worse. It will be a lawful and patriotic attempt in the right direction."

The Secretaries of War and of the Navy do not appear to have expressed themselves publicly on this question, but their silence is considered to be an approval of the calling of this Convention.

The Attorney-General, Mr. Speed, wrote disapproving of the Convention, and refusing to recognize in those who had called it the representatives of the Union party. He resigned his position, and has been succeeded by Mr. Stansberry. Mr. Denison, Postmaster-General, also resigned, upon the same general grounds, and Mr. Randall was appointed in his place. Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, resigned, and Senator Browning was appointed to succeed him.

RESTORATION OF TENNESSEE.

On the 23d of July a joint resolution, originating in the House of Representatives, was adopted by the Senate, restoring Tennessee to her place in the Union. The preamble to the resolution recites, that in 1861 the Government of that State was seized upon by persons hostile to the United States; that the State could be restored to the Union only by the consent of the law-making power of the United States, the people of the State having been declared to be in insurrection against the United States; that the people did in February, 1865, ratify a Constitution abolishing slavery, and nullifying all laws passed during secession; and a State Government has been organized under this Constitution, which has "ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, and also the amendment proposed by the 39th Congress, and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty." It is therefore resolved by Congress, "That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress."

The President, while signing this joint resolution, takes occasion to object to many of the points embraced in the preamble, which, he says, "consists of statements some of which are assumed, while the resolution is merely a matter of opinion, and comprises no legislation, and confers no power which is binding upon the respective Houses, the Executive, or the States." After criticising the details of the resolution, the President says: "Earnestly desiring to relieve every cause of further delay, whether real or imaginary, on the part of Congress, to the admission to seats of loyal Senators and Representatives from the State of Tennessee, I have, notwithstanding the anomalous character of this proceeding, affixed my signature to this resolution. My approval is not, however, to be construed as an acknowledgment of the right of Congress to pass laws preliminary to the admission of duly qualified representatives from any of the States. Neither is it to be considered as committing me to all the statements made in the preamble, some of which are, in my opinion, without foundation in fact." The President concludes by "earnestly repeating his recommendation for the admission of Tennessee and all other States to a fair and equal participation in the National Legislature, when they present themselves in the persons of loyal Senators and Representatives, who can comply with all the requirements of the Constitution and the laws."—The members elect from Tennessee were admitted to their seats without question, except in the case of Mr. Patterson, chosen Senator, who it was urged could not take the oath because he had held a judicial office under the Confederate Government. His case was referred to a Committee, which reported in his favor. He accordingly took the oath as prescribed by law, and was admitted to his seat at the very close of the session.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU AGAIN.

A Bill to continue in force, and to amend the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, was passed by Congress. The President, on the 5th of July, returned the bill to the House, with his veto. The reasons assigned for withholding his signature are essentially the same as those before given for vetoing the new Freedmen's Bill, as noted in a former Record. In the House the bill was repassed by a vote of 103 to 33, notwithstanding the veto of the President. We do not find that the bill was again taken up in the Senate; so that this Bureau stands as before, its powers to exist for a year after the announced close of the war; that is until February, 1867.

NEBRASKA.

At the very close of the session a bill admitting Nebraska as a State of the Union was passed. But the President did not either sign or veto it; so that the question lies over until the next session of Congress.

CLOSING SCENES OF CONGRESS.

Congress adjourned, nominally, on the 28th of July, though the session was really prolonged until after daylight on the 29th. The most notable feature of the last day was the action on the questions of increasing the pay of Members of Congress, and of granting bounties to soldiers. The House had rejected the former, the Senate the latter. Finally, a Committee of Conference agreed to introduce both measures into the Appropriation Bill. In this shape, having gone through the Senate, it was passed in the House by a meagre majority, several members declaring that they voted in favor of increasing their own salaries solely in order to secure the bounty to soldiers. By this Bill the salaries of Members of Congress are raised from $3000 to $5000, the Speaker of the House to have $8000; and soldiers who enlisted for three years, and either served the whole time or were discharged on account of disability, are to receive a bounty of $100; two-years soldiers to have $50. After passing unanimous votes of thanks to the presiding officers of both Houses, Congress finally adjourned to meet at the time appointed by law in December.

We have given, in the successive numbers of this Record, a somewhat detailed view of the action taken by Congress upon the leading questions which have come before it. Omitting notice of Acts of private or local interest, the following is a brief abstract of the actual action of Congress during the late session:

The Civil Rights Bill: Passed by both Houses, vetoed by the President, and enacted by the requisite majority of more than two-thirds.

Pension Bill: Grants pensions of $25 per month to soldiers or sailors who have been wholly disabled while in the performance of duty; and $15 a month to those who have, in a manner specified, been partially disabled. The bill guards against abuses and extortion on the part of lawyers and others engaged in prosecuting such claims.

Homestead Law: Provides that the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, shall be disposed of according to laws previously existing, without regard to race or color of persons applying for them. The Act confines the benefits derived from it to those who are heads of families, or have served in the army or navy, and excludes mineral lands from occupation.

Pacific Railway: This amends previous Acts, grants aid to a Company to construct a railroad and telegraph across the continent, forming, in conjunction with others, a continuous line.

Internal Revenue: This Act is too long to be reproduced, even in abstract. It defines the whole subject of Internal Taxation.

Freedmen's Bureau: The principal features of this bill have been given in this Record. Vetoed by the President. Another Act extending the operation of the present Bureau passed, and also vetoed.

Bounties to Soldiers and pay to Congressmen: Raises the salary of members of Congress from $3000 to $5000, and grants bounties to three-years soldiers, of $100; to two-years soldiers, of $50.

Army Bill: Fixes the regular army at 3 regiments of artillery, 10 of cavalry, and 45 of infantry; 2 regiments of cavalry and 4 of infantry to be of colored men. The officers to be 1 general, 1 lieutenant-general, 5 major-generals, 10 brigadier-generals, besides those of lower grades. No one who has served in the Confederate army to be eligible as an officer.—Grant is appointed General; Sherman, Lieutenant-General.

U. S. Senators: Each Legislative House in each State is, on the second Tuesday after its meeting, to name a person to be Senator. The Houses are to meet in joint assembly on the next day: if the same person is named by both Houses, he is to be declared elected: if not, the joint assembly shall proceed to choose. If no choice is made on that day, the joint assembly shall be convened and take at least one vote a day during the session, or until a choice is made.

Mineral Lands: Under the title of "Ditches and Canals," it is declared that all mineral lands are open to exploration by citizens of the United States, and that patents may be issued in favor of any claimant or association of claimants who have actually expended not less than $1000. A special section, whence the title of the bill, protects the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals. When homesteads have been located upon mineral lands where no valuable mines have been discovered, and which are purely agricultural, the occupants shall have a right of pre-emption.

The most important Public Resolutions passed provide as follows: No. 1 Authorizes the President to expend the balance of fund for the suppression of the slave-trade for the relief of destitute Indians.—No. 6 Directs the distribution of the writings of James Madison.—No. 8 Thanks Admiral Farragut and his officers and men for their conduct at Mobile Bay, August 5, 1864.—No. 11 Reimburses Miss Clara Barton for expenses incurred in discovering graves of soldiers.—No. 12 Gives the assent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia.—No. 21 Provides that the Secretary of War shall preserve from desecration the graves of soldiers.—No. 22 Protests against pardons by foreign governments of persons convicted of infamous offenses on condition of emigration to the United States.

The Amendment to the Constitution, proposed by the requisite majority in Congress, to be submitted to the action of the State Legislatures, has been noted, in its essential features, in the preceding numbers of this Record.

Other Resolutions, which by the signature of the President have become laws, revive the grade of "General" in the army—that dignity being conferred upon Grant, while Sherman is raised to the rank of "Lieutenant-General;" and create the grades of "Admiral" and "Vice-Admiral" in the navy, the former grade being allotted to Farragut, the latter to D. D. Porter.

On the 4th of July a fire in Portland, Maine, destroyed fully a third part of the city, including almost the entire business portion and a great part of the churches and public buildings. Fully a quarter of the population were rendered homeless. The entire loss is roughly estimated at $10,000,000, endured by a population of about 40,000.

The cholera has been gradually but surely advancing in various quarters, especially in New York and the adjacent city of Brooklyn. It has not as yet assumed the form of a decided epidemic, being confined mainly to ill-drained, ill-ventilated, and filthy quarters of the cities, and to some of the public institutions. In New York, for the week ending on the 28th of July, the total number of deaths was 771, about the usual average at this season. Of these 48 were reported as from cholera, but there were 176 from cholera infantum, and 139 more from cholera morbus and other diarrheal diseases; many of these should probably be set down to cholera.

On the 30th of July a riot broke out in the city of New Orleans. It grew out of the proposed re-assemblage there of a Convention which was in 1864 convened to draft a new Constitution for the State. It was claimed on one side that this Convention having adjourned, the official functions of its members had ceased. The colored population appear to have sympathized with the Convention, while the whites were adverse to it. As appears the acting-Governor favored the meeting, and undertook to protect the members. When it assembled a mingled crowd of both colors gathered in and around the building, and by the middle of the afternoon the whole neighborhood was in an uproar. Collisions took place, the police endeavored to make arrests; the Mayor warned all peaceable citizens to retire to their homes. Finally General Baird, commanding the troops, proclaimed the city under martial law. The President telegraphed to Mr. Herron, Attorney-General of the State, to call upon the military commander for sufficient force to sustain the civil authorities in suppressing "all illegal or unlawful assemblies who usurp or assume to exercise any power or authority without having first obtained the consent of the people of the State. If there is to be a Convention," says the President, "let it be composed of delegates chosen from the people of the whole State. The people must be first consulted in changing the organized laws of the State. Usurpation will not be tolerated." From this it would appear that, in the view of the President, the Convention was an unauthorized and illegal body. The number of lives lost in this riot is set down at about thirty of the colored people and three or four whites; but other statements, apparently not reliable, fully treble these numbers. The whole affray lasted only a few hours. Mayor Monroe, the same person who held that office at the time of the arrival of Farragut and Butler in 1862, wrote to General Baird objecting to the declaration of martial law. The aid of the military, he says, "would have been gladly received to suppress violence when such intervention was asked. But I am at a loss to understand by what authority it is made to assume the virtual suppression of the civil authority. We have always been taught to believe that it was the principal duty of military officers in this country to sustain and enforce the civil law." He suggests that if the General wished to prevent the recurrence of riots, he had committed a mistake in having, as "the first act of his administration of military law, released all the rioters and their accessories, who had been arrested by the police." He refused to act as Mayor until civil authority was restored. A Military Commission, General Mower, President, has been appointed to investigate this riot.

LAYING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPHIC.

The Atlantic telegraphic cable has been safely laid, and the line has been for a week in successful operation. The work was fairly begun on the 6th of July, when the shore-end was landed at Valentia, in Ireland. On the 13th the deep-sea line was spliced to the shore-end, and the Great Eastern with the cable on board, accompanied by three consorts, set out on the voyage. Nothing further was heard of the expedition until Sunday morning, July 29, when a dispatch from Cyrus W. Field reached New York, announcing that on the preceding day the vessels had reached Heart's Content, the American terminus, having laid the cable across the ocean; that it was in perfect order, and that they were in telegraphic communication with Ireland. Not a single misadventure had occurred. The whole distance sailed by the fleet was 1686 nautical miles, the length of cable payed out was 1866 miles, showing a "slack" of only about 12 per cent. The rate of sailing was singularly uniform, the least distance made in a single day being 105 miles, the greatest 128; the average being 120. The first message sent through the line was this, "A treaty of peace has been signed between Austria and Prussia." This message was received at Heart's Content on the 28th, and brought news eleven days later than had been received by steamer. On the 27th Queen Victoria, then at Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, sent the following dispatch to the President of the United States: "The Queen congratulates the President on the successful completion of an undertaking which she hopes may serve as an additional bond of Union between the United States and England." This dispatch appears to have left Valentia on the 28th; at 6 o'clock on the morning of the 30th it had been conveyed by steamer to Aspy Bay in Newfoundland, at present the nearest point of telegraphic communication with the United States; and by half past 11 the President returned the following reply: "The President of the United States acknowledges with profound gratification the receipt of Her Majesty's dispatch, and cordially reciprocates the hope that the cable which now unites the Eastern and Western hemispheres may serve to strengthen and perpetuate peace and amity between the Government of Great Britain and the Republic of the United States." It is announced that the Great Eastern will immediately proceed to the spot where the cable was lost last year, and endeavor to recover and relay it. If this attempt is successful there will soon be a double line across the Atlantic. The submarine line to connect Heart's Content with the main land has yet to be laid; and there is a space of eighty miles over which dispatches are carried by steamer. Until this telegraphic link is supplied New York is still twenty-four hours distant from Europe. When this line is laid the communication will be almost instantaneous; or, indeed, taking into account the difference of time between the two hemispheres, a message may perhaps be received here some minutes earlier than—measured by the sun and chronometers—it was sent. The telegraph is now opened for business, the rates fixed for the present being about one dollar a letter, payable in gold.

FOREIGN.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

The Empress Carlotta of Mexico has left that country for Europe, it is said, upon a diplomatic mission. Report says that she will represent to the Emperor Napoleon that, in case the French troops are withdrawn, it will be impossible for Maximilian to maintain his authority. It is reported, however, that two French vessels have actually received orders to sail for Mexico, in order to bring back the first detachment of the French troops.

On the River Plata there has been severe fighting, especially on May 24, at a place named Yagui. According to the Argentine official accounts, the allied forces of that Republic and Brazil gained a decided victory. President Mitre says that the Paraguayans lost 4200 dead, abandoned on the field of battle, the loss of the Allies being 502 killed and 2345 wounded. Newspaper accounts represent the action as in effect a drawn battle, both parties, after suffering severely and about equally, retiring to their intrenchments. In Paraguay it was regarded as a great victory, and a grand celebration was held in honor of it at Asuncion, the capital.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Ministry having been beaten in Parliament upon an important provision of the Reform Bill, resigned on the 19th of June. The majority was indeed small, 315 to 304. The Queen was unwilling to accept the resignation, wishing the Ministry to accept the defeat, and for a time to abandon the project of carrying the Bill; but as they persisted, Lord Derby was charged with the formation of a new Ministry. It took two weeks to accomplish this. The principal members of the new Ministry are: Lord Derby, Prime Minister; Mr. Disraeli, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Stanley, Foreign Secretary; Mr. Walpole, Home Secretary; Lord Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary; Lord Cranborne, Secretary for India; General Peel, Secretary of War; Sir John Pakington, First Lord of the Admiralty; the Duke of Buckingham, President of the Council; Lord Malmesbury, Privy Seal; Lord Chelmsford, Lord Chancellor; the Marquis of Abercorn, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Sir Stafford Northcote, President of the Board of Trade; Mr. Hardy, President of the Poor Law Board. Lord Derby in announcing the general policy of the Government said, that in respect to the war it would "studiously maintain strict and impartial neutrality between all the contending parties, only ready at any time to offer its good offices if there appeared the slightest gleam of hope that, combined with those of other neutral Powers, such as France and Russia, they might lead to a termination of this bloody struggle, and to the restoration of peace." In reference to the United States, he said that he "earnestly hoped that the restoration of peace and the wise course which the President of the United States appears to be taking, in seeking to reconcile and bring back to the Union the vanquished members who seceded from it, may terminate any feeling of irritation which yet prevails among the citizens of the United States against this country, and that nothing will interrupt the friendly and harmonious relations between the two countries."—In regard to the action of the Government of the United States in the late Fenian invasion of Canada, he said that, notwithstanding the "latitude which is given in the United States to all expressions of public feeling, and to any thing short of actual violation of the law, yet, as soon as the law was plainly about to be violated, vigorous and decided measures, as I acknowledge with the utmost gratitude, were taken by the Government of the United States to prevent a violation of their own laws, and the rights of friendly states, by a lawless band of marauders." Lord Derby expressed himself in terms of the most decided approbation of the scheme for a Confederation of the British Provinces in America as essential to the well-being, unity, and strength of Canada, "under a system of the freest possible government, at the same time maintaining unbroken their allegiance to the Crown."

The Commission for investigating the late riot and massacre in Jamaica, have reported that the severe measures taken by the Governor and military authorities were uncalled-for and unjustifiable, and that Mr. Gordon, the clergyman who was hung, was wholly innocent, and judicially murdered. Government has been strongly urged to institute a prosecution for murder against Governor Eyre, but declined, on the ground that he acted not maliciously, but under a mistaken opinion of the circumstances. The widow of the murdered man has also been urged to bring in a prosecution, but the Roclined to do so, choosing rather to leave the murderers to the decision of a higher power.

The American double-turreted monitor, the Minutonomoh, has crossed the Atlantic, and reached British waters. This, together with the passage of the Monadnock around Cape Horn to California, demonstrates the sea-worthy capacity of this class of vessels. The Minutonomoh has excited great interest in Great Britain, and the most competent authorities declare that the British navy does not possess a single iron-clad which could destroy her by gunnery, while there is not one which she could not destroy.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The war in Europe, if we may rely upon the indications furnished by telegraphic dispatches, has been concluded, occupying a period of just forty days. Never before were military operations of such magnitude conducted in so short a period. On the 18th of June war was formally declared by Italy and Prussia against Austria, and virtually against the German States which sided with Austria. The Prussians advancing rapidly southward occupied Dresden, the capital of Saxony, the Saxon army retreating to Bohemia, to unite with the Austrians. Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, and several other minor states were speedily, and with scarce a show of opposition, overrun by the Prussians.

Meanwhile the Italian army moved against the Austrians. On the 23d of June this army, numbering nearly 100,000, crossed the Mincio, in separate divisions, separated by considerable intervals. The Austrian Archduke Albert, taking advantage of this, amused one corps of the Italians by demonstrations, while he threw a force of 60,000 upon another division of the Italians, of hardly half this number. After a severe conflict, which lasted nearly the whole day of the 24th, this Italian corps was defeated, the Austrians concluding their victory by storming the decisive position at Custoza. The remaining corps of the Italians which had not been seriously engaged, were, however, placed in a position so perilous as to induce the King to withdraw across the Mincio; this movement was made without much molestation from the Austrians. No reliable accounts of the losses have been given; but they were severe on both sides. This battle, though not altogether decisive, appeared to give the preponderance in this quarter to the Austrians.

The Prussians meanwhile were advancing steadily into Bohemia. Benedek, the Austrian General-in-Chief, issued an arrogant address to his army. They were, he said, face to face with an enemy composed partly of youths who had never made a campaign, and partly those who would rather overturn their own Government than fight the Austrians. The enemy had been so long at peace that he had not a single General who had had the opportunity of developing his faculties on the field of battle. They, he adds, "have long boasted of the rapidity and sureness of their fire, but I think this will not profit them. It is not likely that we shall give them time to fire at us. We shall attack him with our bayonets and the butt-ends of our muskets." The strategy of Benedek is incomprehensible. The Prussians advanced toward Bohemia in two main bodies. The first, under the Crown Prince and General Steinmetz, encountered the Austrians on the 27th, at Nachod, when a sharp but undecisive action took place. Next day Steinmetz, having been reinforced, renewed the attack. The superiority of the Prussian needle-gun was evinced. The Austrians, unable to endure the close and rapid fire, gave way into full retreat. On the same day, July 28, a battle took place at Trautenau between the Prussian Guards and the Austrians, under General Gablenz: here also the Prussians were victorious. Still another battle took place on that day at Mönchengrätz, fifty miles from Trautenau, between the Prussians, under Prince Frederick Charles, and a force of Austrians and Saxons, estimated at 80,000, strongly posted. The needle-gun again manifested its superiority, and the Austrians were beaten. Next day, July 29, another sanguinary battle occurred at Gitschin, in which the Austrians were again defeated, and forced to fall back toward Josephstadt.

These brilliant successes enabled the two Prussian armies of the Crown Prince and Prince Frederick Charles, which had been advancing from different directions toward a common centre, to put themselves in communication. The Austrians, having neglected to strike with their full force against the divided army, were now compelled to retreat in order to concentrate. This concentration was effected between the strong fortresses of Josephstadt and Königsgrätz. On the 3d of July the two Prussian armies advanced upon the Austrians from different points, the actual junction being made upon the battle-field, which lay mainly near the little village of Sadowa about midway between the two fortresses, which stand about a dozen miles apart. The forces are said to have numbered about 250,000 on each side, each having more than 700 pieces of artillery. If this estimate is correct, they were the largest armies ever brought in modern times upon a single field. The action commenced at seven o'clock in the morning. The Austrians held their ground firmly for several hours: but about noon the Prussians, as stated by General Benedek, "succeeded in establishing themselves unobserved in Klum. The rain prevented the smoke of the powder from dispersing, and a distinct view of the position was therefore impossible. The enemy were thereby enabled to advance into our position near Klum, whence they suddenly and unexpectedly poured a heavy fire into our flank and rear. The latter wavered and fell back upon the troops adjoining them, and notwithstanding every exertion I could not succeed in arresting the retreat, which at first commenced slowly, but increased in haste as the enemy pressed forward, until at length the whole army had withdrawn across the Elbe to Pardubitz." The Austrians were badly defeated, but not routed, although their retreat was, upon the whole, a disorderly one. The losses on both sides were severe, much the greatest on that of the Austrians. The estimates vary greatly; but those which appear most probable place those of the Austrians at 40,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, and more than 100 guns. W. H. Russell, the correspondent of the London Times, was with the Austrian army, and saw the whole fight from a favorable position. From his long and minute account we extract a single passage, describing one of the most important moments of the battle:

"It was now near two o'clock. On the left and centre there could be no hesitation in declaring that the Prussians were all but beaten. It seemed as if a charge en masse of the horse deployed for miles on the plateau could roll up their centre on their left, or crumble the left into pieces. The Prussians in the centre made another grand effort. The movements of the Austrians from the right centre to oppose the last effort of the Prussians increased the open interval between the centre and the extreme right retiring on the lower ground near the river, but the Austrians did not perceive it, or, if they did, could not prevent the advance of the enemy along the plateau by the big tree toward Klum. The Austrian right and reserves become more unsteady, but their artillery contests every foot of ground. Suddenly a spattering of musketry breaks out of the trees and houses of Klum right down on the Austrian gunners and on the columns of infantry drawn up on the slopes below. The gunners fall on all sides—their horses are disabled—the fire increases in intensity—the Prussians on the ridge press on over the plateau: this is an awful catastrophe—two columns of Austrians are led against the village, but they can not stand the fire, and after three attempts to carry it retreat, leaving the hill-side covered with the fallen. It is a terrible moment! The Prussians see their advantage; they here get into the very centre of the position. In vain the staff-officers fly to the reserves and hasten to get back some of the artillery from the front. The dark-blue regiments multiply on all sides, and from their edges roll perpetually sparkling musketry. Their guns hurry up, and from the slope take both the Austrians on the extreme right and the reserves in flank. They spread away to the woods near the Prague road and fire into the rear of the Austrian gunners. Thus a wedge, growing broader and driven in more deeply every instant, was forced into the very body of the Austrian army, separating it at the heart, and dividing its left and centre from the right. The troops in the centre and left are dismayed at hearing the enemy's guns in their rear, and are soon exposed to the fire which most of all destroys the morale of soldiers already shaken by surprise. The right, previously broken up and discomfited, hurry toward the Prague road in something like confusion, and spread alarm among the reserves of the centre and left. The regular lines of the columns below are gradually bulging out, and are at last swallowed up in disordered multitude. Officers gallop about trying to restore order. Some regiments hold together, though they are losing men in heaps every instant. The left wing is arrested in its onward progress. The Prussian generals in front of them and on the centre, seeing their enemy waver, throw their battalions against them and encourage their artillery to fresh efforts, but the formidable Austrian cavalry prevents any hasty or enthusiastic demonstrations on the part of the Prussian right, whom long-continued fighting and heavy losses must have somewhat enervated."

The success of the Prussians in this action seems to have been won by hard fighting and superior generalship rather than by any superiority in numbers or quality of arms.

The Emperor of Austria, apparently with the view of stopping hostilities in Italy, and so enabling him to bring his whole force against Prussia, ceded Venetia to the Emperor of France, having, as he said, "maintained the honor of his arms in Italy," and concurring in the principles advanced by the French Emperor in relation to the territorial distribution of Europe. He at the same time requested Napoleon to mediate an armistice with Italy. The French Emperor accepted the cession, upon what terms does not appear; and endeavored to bring about an armistice with Italy. These efforts were at first unavailing, the King of Italy declaring that he could treat with Austria only in conjunction with his Prussian ally, and resumed offensive movements, of which we have as yet only partial details.

The Emperor of Austria, on the 10th of July, addressed a manifesto to his people, admitting the heavy reverses which his troops had sustained, and saying that in view of them "I have addressed myself to the good offices of the Emperor of the French, requesting his good offices for bringing about an armistice with Italy. Not merely did the Emperor readily respond to my demand, but with the noble intention of preventing any further bloodshed, he even of his own accord offered to mediate with Prussia for a suspension of hostilities, and for opening negotiations for peace. This offer I have accepted. I am prepared to make peace upon honorable conditions in order to put an end to the ravages and bloodshed of war. But I will never sanction a treaty of peace by which the fundamental conditions of Austria's position as a great Power would be shaken. Sooner than that this should be the case, I am resolved to carry on the war to the utmost extremity, and in this I am sure of my people's approval. Austria has been severely visited by misfortune, but she is not humiliated or bowed down. Have confidence in your Emperor. The Peoples of Austria have never shown themselves greater than in misfortune. I will follow the examples of my forefathers, and will lead you on with determination, perseverance, and unshakable confidence in God."

The Prussians at first seem to have declined not only proffers for an armistice directly made by Austria but those proposed by the Emperor of France. The reported details of the negotiations are wholly contradictory. But at all events the Prussians kept on in their victorious progress. On the 11th of July they defeated the Bavarians near Kissingen. On the 14th the Prussians encountered the Federal army at Aschaffenburg, near Frankfort on the Main, defeating it, after a severe contest, and entering Frankfort, the seat of the Diet, which had in the mean while been transferred to Augsburg. The Austrian army fell back toward Vienna, where, according to report, 400,000 troops were concentrated for the defense of the capital, the Archduke Charles taking the place of Benedek as commander of the entire army.

The Italians meanwhile resumed military operations which had been suspended after their defeat at Custoza. On the 14th their troops were in undisturbed occupation of Padua. On the 16th the Austrians in Venetia retired within the fortresses. On the 17th the Italians attacked successfully Borgoforte, a town on the left bank of the Po, seven miles from Mantua. Several unimportant engagements have taken place in the Tyrol to the general advantage of the Italians. On the 18th the Italian fleet assailed Fort George on the island of Lissa, off the coast of Dalmatia, and after a cannonade of several hours silenced it, a powder magazine within the fort having exploded. The Italians were on the point of disembarking when the Austrian fleet was perceived to be approaching in order to prevent the landing. We are briefly informed by telegraph that an action ensued in which the Italian iron-clad Re d'Italia was sunk and another blown up. According to one account the Austrian squadron retired after one man-of-war and two steamers had been sunk; while another says the Italian fleet was driven off and was pursued by the Austrians.

The negotiations for a truce took the following form: On the 12th of July the Secretary of the French legation at Berlin delivered to the Austrian Government the proposals of the King of Prussia. He would abstain from hostilities for three days in order to allow time for ascertaining the intentions of the Italian Government, upon condition that the Austrians should evacuate the country lying between the Prussian position and the River Thaya; the Austrian armies, with all their trains, to remain stationary; the Prussians to remain at a distance of three miles from Olmutz; and the Prague and Dresden Railway to be open for transmission of supplies to the Prussian army. The Austrians declined to accept these conditions on various grounds, and proposed others, the principal points being that a line of demarcation should be fixed which neither army should cross, but within which each should have freedom of movement; and the Emperor would endeavor to induce the King of Bavaria to consent to the condition respecting the Prague and Dresden Railway. The King of Prussia rejected this proposition. The Emperor Napoleon still endeavored to bring about an armistice; but Prussia declined to accede unless the preliminaries of peace should be settled. Prussia demanded that the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein should be united with her, and that she should also have the slip of territory lying between her eastern and western provinces; that the unity of Germany should be established under the leadership of Prussia, Austria being excluded from the Confederation. Napoleon recognized the justice of these demands, and announced that, should Austria refuse to accede, he should remain neutral in the contest. According to the latest reports by steamer, which come down to the London date of July 21, the Austrian Government rejected the terms of Prussia, and their whole army fell back to the neighborhood of Vienna, where it was proposed to make a desperate defense; and the Prussians followed after, and were then within three days' easy march of the Austrian capital. But the telegraphic dispatches of a week later announce that a truce for five days was agreed upon, which was extended into an armistice for four weeks, signed by Prussia, Austria, Bavaria, and the other German States, and that negotiations were in progress which embrace a lasting peace over the whole of Europe. This dispatch is dated on the 28th of July, so that the first telegraphic message, announcing the signing of a treaty of peace between Austria and Prussia, was premature. As we close this Record, on the morning of August 2, the London telegraphic dispatch of July 28, which reached New York on the 30th, is the latest received, an interruption of communication having taken place in consequence of the failure to work of the Nova Scotia line, on the evening of August 1.

Editor's Drawer.

FROM the Pine-tree State come the two following:

While traveling one day just after dark, in the midst of a heavy shower, I was overtaken while nearing a railroad-crossing by a man in a light-wagon. Having a horse somewhat afraid of the cars, I requested the man to inform me should he perceive them approaching. He passed over the track and drove on. It was evident that the track was clear, and I drove briskly forward. The mud was quite deep on the opposite side, and the man moved slowly. Suddenly he stopped, looking back as if he had forgotten something. I concluded he had perceived the train, and intended to fulfill his promise. I stopped my horse, fully expecting the cars would dash past, when the man, in a long, peculiar whine, drawled out, "They—ain't—a—comin'—Mister!"

As the steeple of a church in this place was being painted recently, the attention of a little girl was attracted by the staging put up about it. She appeared unable to comprehend it; but finally, after a moment's reflection, said, "She guessed it was the crinoline!"

THERE is an amusing story told of a practical joke played by a physician upon a farmer in Staffordshire, England. Parliament has, in view of the fearful ravages of the cattle-plague, passed a law that all cattle attacked with it shall be killed at once. This farmer had lost several cows of the plague, and got an idea that he was suffering from the disease himself. He applied to his physician for advice. The doctor, who was a great wit, agreed with him, and sent him to the apothecary with a sealed prescription. Both patient and druggist were rather astonished at reading: "This man has got the cattle-plague; take him into the back-yard and shoot him according to act of Parliament!"

The prescription did its work, and the farmer was no longer troubled with the rinderpest.

A DWELLER in the Land of Egypt, who is enlightened enough to read and appreciate the Drawer, writes:

There resides in this favored region a solid, well-to-do farmer, Joseph by name, who, having built him a new house and furnished it in accordance, all but the curtains for the parlor, was daily importuned by his better-half to supply the wherewithal to purchase the aforesaid lacking and much-desired ornamentation. Now, to appreciate Joseph's reply to his wife's importunities, it must be borne in mind that Joseph deals largely in horses, mules, and Jerusalem ponies. When the probable cost of the curtains was named: "Why, Mary, Mary!" said he, "I can't afford to hang up a mule at each window!" Mary has got her new curtains nevertheless.

THE citizens of Leavenworth have had an opportunity not often afforded an entire town at once of "sowing their wild oats." It is thus described by one of the victims:

The most successful and extensive hoax ever perpetrated hereabout was that originated by L—M—, and participated in by almost our entire population. It rivals the celebrated moon hoax of Mr. Locke, and the victims include every degree of society. Physicians, merchants, clerks, bankers, officials, policemen, editors, livery men, restaurateurs, book-keepers, and, in fact, to the number of perhaps five hundred, all classes were victimized so simply and absurdly that precedent victims stood around to laugh at the experiences of each newcomer. Ask a man to-day "if he has had his oats," and he can not forbear a smile at the recollection. Of course each would endeavor to sell his neighbor, and all day long there was a constant succession of applicants at Jer Clark's office for a note which some one had left there for them. The jolly, rubicund visage of V—, like Bacchus amidst his grapevines, or a ripe pumpkin inclosing a candle, was suffused with deeper blushes as he emerged with his missive from the office. The venerable S—, of Main Street, thought it scandalous to take a man from his business on such frivolous pretenses; but almost all were inclined to humor the joke, and take in good part the confusion of subsequent callers. At the lowest estimate there were five hundred applicants for a note yesterday at the principal and branch offices, and each received "an oat." Somebody's granary suffered to the extent of half a peck.

In vehicles and on foot the stream of humanity was incessant until, in self-protection, the doors of the new post-office were closed. D— was sometimes inclined to hesitate when a big-fisted six-footer called to inquire "if a note had been left for him;" but the presentation of the cereal invariably incited a hearty laugh at the proneness of the genus homo to humbug.

A QUAKER friend, who writes from North Carolina, is welcome to the Drawer. We give his letter:

FRIEND HARPER.—There is welcome to the inclosed. I take and read thy Magazine as one of my regular Monthlies. I like the contents of thy Drawer. I do not know whether thee is willing to insert the piece among thy yarns, but it would give me much pleasure to have it there. It is to the point:

We often meet with Irish jokes and American wit, but seldom are we called upon to record a Quaker joke, which caused the sides of the assembled company to shake with laughter. The affair happened in the goodly city of W—, and, though the names are fictitious, the facts are true.

It seems that John Jones and Mary Smith contemplated matrimony upon St. Valentine's eve, and Mrs. Jovial, a Friend, invited them, with their friends, to take a cup of tea upon the eve of that happy day. While all was going on as merry as a "marriage bell" Mrs. J. called the company to order with this opening remark:

"Mary, thee knows the old proverb says that upon 'the 14th of February every gander chooses its mate,' but I see that John is not willing to wait until the 14th for his goose!"

The effect can better be imagined than described.

A KENTUCKIAN writes:

Our city (Louisville, Kentucky) is famous for its many places of refreshment, and to the query, "Have we a Bourbon among us?" I would say a great many of them, for imbibers of Bourbon whiskey are numerous hereabout. At the "Pearl," a bar-room conveniently located to the theatre, is a bar-keeper well known to the community as Dick Gardner. Richard has an impediment in his speech, and, being an original, is considered very funny, and his jokes are widely told. In this country after a man "kills his third" he becomes quite a lion, and is usually permitted to do pretty much as he pleases. Now one of these characters, whom we shall call Bob S—, while considerably under the influence of spirituous drinks, visited the "Pearl" with some friends and took a drink, and walked away without paying, and, in bar-room parlance, "was a dead-beat." Bob made three visits, which was rather more than Dick's good-nature and liberality could stand. Upon the third round Dick stutteringly remarked: "Th-i-s i-s a-l-l-r-i-g-h-t, but, Bob, I wo-uld ra-ther you wo-uld di-vid-e your cus-tom!"

DEAR DRAWER.—The readers of Harper's Weekly will remember that in one number of that excellent paper, during (I think) the summer of '65, an illustration appeared representing Columbia, with a maimed colored soldier at her right, and a number of rebels in front of her cringing for pardon. Columbia is represented as saying, "Which shall I trust?"—referring to the negro and the rebels.

This picture was shown to our coppery friend, Joe B—, a retired hotel-keeper, who surveyed it a few moments, the indignation rising in his face; and at last threw the paper down, angrily exclaiming, "I don't believe such a thing ever happened!"

DEAR DRAWER.—Thinking a word or two now and then from the "Golden City" might not be unwelcome, I send you the following:

Mr. W— has been a member of the press of this city for several years, and many a time has the public been alternately surprised or amused by some comical item or outrageous hoax from his pen. He has an amusing way of using long words, though he is seldom in earnest. He has, moreover, a considerable smattering of French phrases and words, and improves every occasion to get one into his conversation edgewise. One "Fourth," after having tramped all over this city of hills to see the sights, and tired ourselves completely out, four of us, among whom was W—, entered a restaurant to recruit. There happened to be no bill of fare, but a little waiter, with a lot of towels thrown over his shoulder, supplied its place by singing out, with a strong Gallic accent:

"Muttong ha-ash! shicken gumbo! roas' beef! roas' pork! roas' lamb!" etc.

Some preliminary consultation was held, and all of us gave in our orders except W—, who, smoothing out a paper in his hand, said, gravely:

"Have you got any green owls?"

"Monsieur?"

"Any green owls?"

The waiter grinned incredulously.

"Why, W—, what do you mean?" said one of the company.

"You know," said W—, not in the least disconcerted. "green owls—frogs!"

You may imagine there was considerable laughter at this; however, some one who understood the French language explained the matter, though not much to the satisfaction of W—, who could not see what on earth g-r-e-n-o-u-i-l-le spelled if it were not green owl, and why on earth the French did not spell it "gronwee" at once, so that one could understand them.

WE are often told to "make the best of a bad business," but we have rarely heard a better example of doing so than this, which is sent by a friend to the Drawer:

The late Captain G—, of Vermont, was always satisfied. He was one of the early and most successful breeders of merino sheep in this part of the State. He had a large native cosset that he valued highly. His son came in one morning and told him that the old cosset had twins. Captain G— said "he was glad; she would bring up two as well as one." Soon after his son reported one of the twins dead. Upon this he said "the one left would be worth more in the fall than both." In the afternoon the boy told his father that the other lamb was dead. "I am glad," said he; "I can now fat the old sheep." The next morning the son reported the old cosset dead. "That is just what I wanted; now I have got rid of the breed!"

A VALUED correspondent sends another good story to the Drawer:

President Lincoln related many a story, but never a one nearer the point, or more applicable, than the following:

It was in the summer of 1861, a short time after the Bull Run defeat, that complaint was made to Governor R—— concerning the conduct of Colonel ——, of the — Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

The Colonel was a prominent man, a Democrat, and the Governor was disposed, in military affairs, to act impartially; but how to have the Colonel transferred, or "let down easy," so that no disturbance, political or otherwise, should arise at home to vex him, was the question. Finally, it was resolved that the matter should be left with President Lincoln. So Judge O—— was requested by the Governor to go to Washington and have "matters fixed." Accordingly the Judge and Senator D—— called at the White House and stated the case to Mr. Lincoln, and recommended that the Colonel be put upon some General's staff, where he could be more useful than in the position he then occupied, and so "let him down easy." Mr. Lincoln inquired if the Colonel knew any thing of the plan, and upon being answered in the negative, said:

"This reminds me of a little story. It was in the Mexican war—at the battle of Monterey, I believe—that a little Irish captain from Sangamon County was ordered by his Colonel to a position, so and so, with his Company. After hearing the order, the little Captain straightened up full height, and said: 'Colonel, will yez be so kind as to tell that to my min yourself'; for, by jabbers, Colonel, I'm not on spakin' terms wid my Company!"

It is, perhaps, needless to add that the gallant Colonel was, shortly after this interview with the good-natured President, placed in a more exalted sphere of usefulness.

From Ohio comes a capital temperance story:

"All of those who in youth acquire a habit of drinking whisky, at forty years of age will be total abstainers or drunkards. No one can use whisky for years in moderation. If there is a person in the audience before me whose own experience disputes this let him make it known; I will account for it, or acknowledge that I am mistaken."

A tall, large man arose, and, folding his arms in a dignified manner across his breast, said:

"I offer myself as one whose own experience contradicts your statement."

"Are you a moderate drinker?" said the Judge.

"I am."

"How long have you drank in moderation?"

"Forty years."

"And were never intoxicated?"

"Never."

"Well," remarked the Judge, scanning his subject closely from head to foot, "yours is a singular case; yet I think it is easily accounted for. I am reminded by it of a little story: A colored man, with a loaf of bread and flask of whisky, sat down to dine by the bank of a clear stream. In breaking bread some of the crumbs dropped into the water. These were eagerly seized and eaten by the fish. That circumstance suggested to the darkey the idea of dipping the bread in the whisky and feeding it to them. He tried it. It worked well. Some of the fish ate of it, became drunk, and floated helpless on the water. In this way he easily caught a great number. But in the stream was a large fish very unlike the rest. It partook freely of the bread and whisky, but with no perceptible effect. It was shy of every effort of the darkey to take it. He resolved to have it at all hazards, that he might learn its name and nature. He procured a net, and, after much effort, caught it, carried it to a colored neighbor, and asked his opinion in the matter. The other surveyed the wonder a moment, and then said: 'Sambo, I un'erstans dis case. Dat fish is a mullet-head; it hain't got any brains!' In other words," added the Judge, "alcohol affects only the brain; and, of course, those having none may drink without injury!"

The storm of laughter that followed drove the moderate drinker suddenly from the house.

A COUNTRY Squire sometimes used big words in their wrong places. My father was building a mill-dam not long since, and the boards projected over so far as to make an elevation of 10 to 11 feet (8½ only being allowed). The Squire rode up one day while the mill was making, straightened himself out, threw his head back, arms akimbo, and began with: "I say, Mr. W——, are you going to let those boards digest out that far?" Imagine the laughter of the ignorant workmen.

Good old Deacon S—— lived and farmed it away down in Eastern Connecticut. It was his custom to go with several of his neighbors, nearly every year, down to the "Shore" for a clam-bake. The old Deacon was very fond of these bivalves, and on one occasion he ate and overloaded his "capacity" to such an extent that he was sore distressed; his faith in prayer, however, was strong. Leaving his party, and being followed by some of the younger members a little way off, he was heard to supplicate thus: "Forgive me, O Lord, for this great sin of gluttony, and I will never eat any more clams!" Then, pausing an instant, he added: "Very fer, if you—Amen!"

A FEW years since, while traveling in the insurance business in the West, I called on a wealthy Dutchman, by the name of Baumgarder. (By-the-way, the old fellow bears the reputation of being one of the stingiest old skin-flints in the county, and is very deaf withal.) Not knowing the latter peculiarity, I "went in," and while in the midst of an elaborate argument showing the necessity of insurance, etc., the old man broke in on it by yelling at his son, who sat near, and wanted to know "what that feller was talking about?" Like the bursting of a cannon the dutiful son bawled in his ear that I wanted to insure his property. "Oh!" says the old chap, "der vash a man here already who vants to put a telegraph on my barn." The young man suggested it was lightning-rods. "Oh, vell, it ish de same ting; I want noting of him. It is all one tam Yankee invention!" It is needless, perhaps, to say I didn't insure him.

A TRAVELER in Oregon reports the following:

One day last fall, while on the way by stage to the Santiam mines, we had occasion to stop for dinner at the little town of Sublimity, which boasts of two little "one-horse" hotels, and a 40 × 50 feet church. Our driver had along some flaming show-bills for a circus which was to exhibit at Salem during the week. Our host, who had never seen any thing of the kind, and who had quite an "eye to business," was very anxious that we should exert our influence to have the circus exhibit in Sublimity, remarking, at the same time (and he was really in earnest), "that he didn't exactly know where the best place would be for it to be held, but he reckoned the church would do, as the seats were all movable, and could be ranged around the sides of the room, and then it would hold lots of folks."

DEAR DRAWER,—During my prison life in the sunny but rebellious South, the Drawer was more than welcome to those who were fortunate enough to get hold of it, although its contents were to most of us "twice told tales," from the fact that a recent number seldom reached us. The dog-eared spelling-book of a lazy school-boy could bear no comparison, in point of dirt and dilapidation, to the utterly used-up and forlorn appearance of such unfortunate numbers of Harper as found their way into "Libby," and underwent with us the various journeyings and sojournings incident to prison life in Dixie. I am constrained to offer to the Drawer an anecdote or two, as a sort of part-payment of the debt I feel I owe it for beguiling many otherwise weary hours of captivity:

A Confederate official, high in authority (whose name I will not mention, he having received a "special pardon" for his innumerable political sins), not unfrequently went through the farce of an inspection of prison-rations, quarters, etc. Upon such occasions he was usually accompanied by a number of staff-officers—gay young sprigs, the very flower of the capital—whose principal duty seemed to be to "stir up the animals," and show them off to such foreign diplomats and distinguished citizens as saw fit to accept an invitation to visit the "Yanks."

One fine May morning, just after the prison had received a large accession of captive Yanks (owing to a recent "onward movement"), this high official, whom I will call "the Judge," made his appearance, accompanied by the usual retinue of staff-officers and distinguished civilians. Among the late arrivals at Libby was a waggish Down-Easter, who didn't take at all kindly to prison-fare or discipline. Upon the morning referred to this officer was seated upon a box near one of the windows, apparently in a very melancholy mood. The Judge, observing his disconsolate appearance, approached him, when the following conversation ensued, which was listened to by all who could crowd around:

JUDGE. "Good-morning, Sir!"

YANK (dolefully). "Go-o-d-morning, Sir!"

JUDGE. "Your impressions of the Confederacy do not seem to raise your spirits."

YANK. "Confederacy? what Confederacy?"

JUDGE. "Why, Sir, this Confederacy—the Southern Confederacy."

YANK. "Do you mean to say that I am in the Southern Confederacy?"

JUDGE. "What do you mean, Sir? Of course you are."

YANK (rising and button-holing the Judge). "Stranger, you've taken a great load from my mind. I'll explain. You see, the last thing I remember before coming here was being in a fight, and since then I've been under the impression that I was killed in that fight, and that I went to hell; but I'm glad to know it's the Southern Confederacy, although if hell is any worse a place than this I pity traitors! Don't you?"

You may imagine the scene which followed, but it can not be described. Such a roar of laughter! I am sure it did us more good than all the rations we received in the next month.

ANOTHER one, of which this same Yank is the hero, and I have done for the present.

When the late lamented(?) Winder inspected the prison at Macon, Georgia, he was unfortunate enough to interrogate this same Down-Easter in regard to rations received by prisoners.

"What do you draw?" inquired Winder.

"Well," leisurely replied the Yank, "not much of any thing, except our breath, and that comes pretty hard sometimes; and if you were commissary of that sort of thing we couldn't do that in this horrid hole!"

A CORRESPONDENT sends some amusing instances of absence of mind to the Drawer, which call to mind the case of a celebrated Professor of Hebrew in Edinburgh, who once stood upon the door-step of a friend's house, where he was invited to dine, for an hour, lost in thought, and might have stood there till night, had not a passing acquaintance who knew his eccentricities pulled the bell, and thus roused him from his reveries.

An acquaintance in Wisconsin told us the story long ago of a very benevolent, kind-hearted old gentleman in Maine, who, riding along in his carriage one hot day in July, saw a toad lying in the road gasping with the heat. In the kindness of his heart the old gentleman (who was very fleshy) climbed down, moved the poor melting toad into the shade of his carriage, then complacently climbed up again and drove on.

Another instance of his absence of mind. He bought a pig. Arriving home he took it out of the wagon, and on his shoulder carried it, and very deliberately threw it over the well-curb into the well, instead of into the nice, comfortable sty he had prepared.

THE Drawer is not only indebted to the printers for the fine style in which it is presented to the public, but now and then for some of its amusing stories. A correspondent in Iowa writes:

I am a printer, and a short time since was employed in one of the daily offices in this city. One day a noted sign-painter of this city, who is very good at forming his letters, but notorious for bad spelling, brought in his copy for an "ad," which was "set up," and the paper "put to press," and the edition partly "worked off," and the carrier out with his "first round," when in rushed the painter aforesaid, who stepped up to the pressman, breathlessly exclaiming, "Stop! hold on! here's a mistake in my advertisement." The press was stopped and the painter went on: "This head-line ought to be, 'Who is G. M. White?' instead of 'Here is G. M. White.'" The compositor who set the "ad" was called and required to produce the copy, which he did. White took the copy and looked at it, then exclaimed, triumphantly: "There! What did I tell you? There it is: h-u-e—who." The typo acknowledged and corrected his error, and the painter left amidst peals of laughter from the boys.

AT R—there is a debating society, at which are decided all matters of pith and moment. At one time an educational subject was on the floor. Concerning the causes of irregular attendance at school, one member held the following views:

"Many parents have no children, and don't care whether they are at school or not!"

A CLERICAL friend sends this unique answer to a "call:"

The following answer substantially, with names omitted, was recently returned to a "call" extended through a Home Missionary Agent to a young minister "to settle" in the interior of one of the Western States:

"DEAR BRO.,—Allow me to group a few objections against going to ——. I speak by the card.

"1. You know that State is considered the worst one in the Union, that county the worst in the State, that town the worst in the county, and that neighborhood has the worst set of men in town. One man there is 'such a son of Belial that a man can not speak to him.' (1 Sam. xxv. 17.) He is considered, however, the best man in town. The prophet Samuel had also the advantage in his day in that Nabal had a good wife, but this man's wife is worse than himself. 'The Lord also smote Nabal that he died,' but this man and his wife are still alive. You are right when you call it 'rather a rough country, but the grandest kind of a mission field.'

"2. The mud is from three to five feet deep, an alluvial deposit of that depth lying upon a substratum of clay impervious to water. This under-stratum of clay, however, is the only salvation of the county, preventing every thing from sinking below it. All traveling done on horse-back; but my horse is not long-legged enough to touch the under-stratum. The tradition is that when the Creator finished cementing the world he threw an extra hodful of mortar down in this county.

"3. Mosquitoes are of the mammoth kind, generally termed Gallinippers. Many of them will weigh a pound, and they climb up on the trees and bark.

"4. Fevers and ague indigenous. Country flat, and the streams run both ways. Ague shakes even the bark off from all except gum-trees. Few have ever crawled out of that sixteen miles' swamp alive, and they were shaken out by the chills.

"5. The inhabitants are not as loving as cooing doves. The last commandment, 'That ye love one another,' probably has not reached them yet, as they live so far inland. Indeed it is the Kilkenny cats over again. You know the cats fought all night, when nothing could be found but a cloud of fur and the tip of Norval's tail. So Norval beat. Well, a cloud of fur has rested over this district a score of years. Bob-tails of no account.

"6. That salary of $300 (maximum) must be a mistake, as that is a larger sum of money than was ever heard of in the county.

"There is one advantage, however, to be mentioned in this connection. Pastors in this district have generally been 'settled' for life. Their longevity, however, has not been remarkable.

"All things considered, I think I'd better decline the call, hoping that the successful candidate may make his 'will' before he 'settles.' He might get his life insured had not all the life-insurance companies abandoned that part of the country.

"It is fortunate that 'the church has no man in view'—I mean for the man!

"Your Bro., ————."

A FARMER in Venango County gave a lease to an Oil Company to sink a well on his farm for one-tenth the oil. Oil was struck, and at the end of the month the farmer came to the well for his share of the oil for the month. The oil was divided, one barrel going to the farmer's side for every nine to the Company. At the end of the division the farmer observed that his share was very small in comparison with the Company's, and expressed himself dissatisfied with the division and the terms of the lease, and declared that he would not be contented unless the Company gave him the twelfth part of the oil. The Company declined making any alteration in the lease; the farmer insisted; the Company finally yielded the point, and had the proper papers drawn up, giving the farmer one-twelfth instead of the one-tenth of the produce of the well. The papers were executed, and at the end of the month the farmer called for his share of the oil as before. The division was made, one barrel going to the farmer's side for every eleven to the Company's. This division surprised the farmer, and he contended that it was wrong. Neighbors were called in to settle the difficulty, who decided that the division was correct, according to the new terms of the lease. "Then," said the farmer, "this is the first time in my life I find out that ten is more than twelve!"

ONE of the honorable members from Indiana, though a "member in good standing" of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is not very much of a "praying man," and not a very frequent attendant at class-meetings. Being present once at such a meeting, rather by accident than otherwise, he was called on by the class-leader to close the exercises by prayer. Before he had time to decline the invitation the people—rather anxious, probably, for a conclusion of the services—were on their knees, all expectant of the closing prayer. The Hon. gentleman thus cornered, delivered himself of a very brief supplication, as follows: "O Lord, bless this church, its pastor, and its membership. Bless especially the class-meeting, and, above all, give them a leader competent to select a man suitable to close the meeting with prayer!"

A YOUNG gentleman of the city, describing affairs in the country, writes that "the cows often act very badly about being milked, sometimes, when you are almost through, they will kick the milk all over, and you have to go to work and milk them right over again."

A CORRESPONDENT relates this story of himself; perhaps it has taken place more than once, but it is a good one:

The experienced are aware that there is no severer trial of temper than the milking of a refractory cow. Such a cow, by refusing to stand still, and by kicking over the milk two or three times, had vexed me so beyond all endurance that, procuring a good cudgel, and having got the cow well cornered, I proceeded to administer a most wrathful flogging. My father that moment made his unexpected appearance, and suspended the operation of castigation by saying, "Harmon, my son, don't strike that cow again; never strike a cow; it never does them any good—never!"

About a week after this my father was doing the milking himself, and the cow proved unusually troublesome, as I inferred from loud sounds in the direction of the barn-yard. Going to the spot, I arrived just in time to see the cow in a very close corner of the fence, and the boot of my paternal relative administering kicks of the heaviest kind thick and fast. "Father," said I, very quietly, "I thought you told me never to strike a cow." "Yes, that is true," was the reply, while the punishment continued with unabated vigor, "that is true; but did I say any thing about kicking them? did I say any thing about kicking them? Striking does no good, but kicking seems to curl 'em right up!"

DEACON A—was one of the best of men, but by nature very irascible. A cow was so exceedingly disorderly, as the Deacon was attempting to milk her one morning, that the old Adam got the better of him, and he vented his excited feelings in a volley of execrations very undeaconish in their character. At this moment the good Deacon's pastor appeared unexpectedly on the scene, and announced his presence by saying, "Why, Deacon! can it be? Are you swearing?—are you swearing?" "Well, Parson," replied the Deacon, "I didn't think of any one being near by; but the truth is, I never shall enjoy religion as long as I keep this cow!"

MR. M——, of N——, a little village in Vermont, was so profane that oaths were the staple of his conversation. With his oxen he always swore, so that they knew no other language whatever. He became convinced, however, of the error of his ways, and joined the church. A few days after he had occasion to draw some logs, and yoked up his four oxen for the purpose. By great exertion he succeeded in getting them to the forest with the empty sled, but when a heavy log had been duly loaded he found it impossible to make the oxen pull together, or in the same direction, and finally, to pull at all. Loud and repeated vociferation was in vain; the oxen could not understand his Christianized terminology. At this juncture a neighbor, who had secretly followed him to the woods to see how well converted he would prove to be, and who had no scruples against swearing, came to his rescue, swore the refractory "boves" into obedience, and out of the forest to the house, where he concluded a bargain for them on very low terms.

MESSRS. J—— and C——, two lawyers of Wisconsin, went to Mormon Cooley, in the county of La Crosse, one fine morning, for the purpose of trying a case before Mr. N——, a Justice of the Peace. The case was replevin; the property in dispute a pig. C——, the attorney for the defendant, put a little daughter of his client on the stand, as a witness to prove the ownership of the pig. She was very bashful, and would answer no questions asked her by the attorney. The Justice was her next neighbor, with whom she was well acquainted, and C—— suggested that the Justice had better examine her himself, which he proceeded to do. He asked her if she knew who owned the pig in dispute? She answered, her father, and that she knew the pig very well. The next question was how she knew the pig? which she hesitated to answer, and which question was asked three or four times by the Justice. Finally, she turned very indignantly to the Justice, and said: "Why, I know that pig as well as I do you or any other pig!" which caused quite a laugh at the expense of the Justice.

A QUIET family in the country were electrified the other day by the receipt of a telegraphic dispatch from a daughter who was teaching in a distant city. The telegram was passed around and duly admired. The dashing boldness of the chirography came in for its share of praise. The old lady shook her head with an air of gratified pride as she ejaculated, slowly: "Ann Maria allers did write like a man; guess she's ben takin' writin' lessons; this here beats her last letter all holler!"

GEORGE KENYON (known locally as squealing George), an eccentric genius who formerly traveled the country, extending his pilgrimages through the sea-board towns of New England for quite a distance along the coast, was notorious for his gift of telling large stories. During many years he regularly made his annual tour, doing a day's work here and there for the farmers, but subsisting mainly on charity. In process of time he might be said to have become an institution. Appearing regularly, several times a year, with his short, stout figure, horse laugh, and stories growing bigger with each recital, there were few farm-houses where he did not find, if not exactly a welcome, what perhaps he prized more—a good meal and a night's shelter. A passage at arms is related as having occurred between him and a wide-awake Irish girl employed at a place where he had spent the night. Endeavoring to impress her with his importance, as one who had traveled far and wide, he was stung by the apathy with which she received his communications. Pausing a moment, he glowered at her with his little black eyes; then, with his hoarse voice quivering with impotent rage, he ejaculated: "Traveled, marm! Think I hain't traveled? I've ben tew Liverpool, an' Lunnun, and [his voice rising into a harsh scream] I've seen the Church of England, an' it's bigger 'n Pawcatuck Bridge!" It may be added that the Pawcatuck Bridge alluded to was a name often applied to Tresterly, a village of several thousand inhabitants.

LITTLE Eddy B——n, of Washington, set the table in a roar, a few mornings ago, by his aptness of answer to the paternal questioning. Said his father:

"Well, Eddy, your summer vacation has commenced; but you must not lay aside your studies altogether. You ought to write a short essay every few days."

"I don't know what an essay is," replied Master Ed, as if fearful that a confession of acquaintance with the art would involve an obligation for its exercise.

"Didn't you ever read Josh Billings's Essay on the Mule?" inquired the father, with a view to elucidation.

"No," replied Ed, his eyes bright with the reflex of the mind's illumination, "I never read that; but last summer I read C. S. A. that the rebels had branded on one!"

The "fond parent" is resolved that the boy's education be carefully looked to.

Among the members was one from an eastern county, who was continually going around behind the President's chair and striking off a peculiar kind of match, which could be heard through all the house. One of the members who was speaking, becoming very much annoyed, stopped, and then said: "Mr. President, I move that the honorable gentleman from B—— County be compelled to defer his Fourth of July celebration till next Christmas!"

DURING the past winter a little girl of our acquaintance attended the wedding of her brother, and, judging by the sequel, was very much struck by one line of the marriage-service, which she understood literally. A few days after, passing through the room where the bride was sitting in the lap of her liege lord, she exclaimed, with all the simplicity imaginable: "To have and to hold!"

A STORY about smoking has lately been "smoked out" by a friend of the Drawer, and though hitherto only promulgated among the friends of the family, is worthy of more extensive hearing:

A widow, young and handsome, had a lover; but although she had sworn not to marry again, every day she seemed on the point of perjuring herself.

She had a particular aversion to tobacco. One day her lover screwed his courage up so far as to ask permission to smoke. The lady was bewildered with astonishment, but being told by the gentleman that there was some affinity between love and a cigar, she assured him that if he could prove the fact he might convert her salon into a tap-room. The lover proceeded to argue that the flame of love could be lighted in various ways, just as there were several modes of lighting a cigar—by a pipe-light, by the cigar of another person, and by a lucifer. In youth the head was inflamed too quickly by love, just as some cigars burned out too speedily. There was, perhaps, some danger if love were extinguished, but if the fire of a cigar went out it could easily be relighted. The pure flame of love, however, like a good cigar, never was burned out. The lady was convinced by the arguments. The lover was so earnest that his cigar was extinguished, while he talked and discontinued to smoke it. The widow looked at the fire, suddenly recollected that an offer of marriage had been made to her, and, in a mild voice, said, "Henry, light your cigar."

HAVING occasion last spring, about town-meeting time, to spend a few days in one of the central towns of this State, a little matter of business induced me to call upon a very original specimen of the "American gentleman of African descent," an importation from Secessia, who, being an excellent shoemaker, had "set up business," and by his industry had begun to reap quite a harvest of postal currency—which fact added not a little to his native dignity of character. He attended to the wants of his customers with all the politeness and affability of a two-thousand dollar clerk at Stewart's. Being assured that I would have to wait but a moment, and seeing that Phil was very talkative, I concluded it would be a favorable opportunity to get my "understanding" improved in more ways than one. Matters connected with the war very naturally became the subject of conversation, and I asked Phil what he thought of the relative merits of Northern and Southern soldiers as fighting men? "Well," says Phil, "in a fair, open field fight, I think the Yankee boys could whip 'em easy; but the pesky gorillas never fit fair; they'd skulk into the woods, and climb up into the ambushes, and shoot every Union man they could see, and we couldn't get at 'em! Besides, they'd steal every thing they could lay hands on; why, they'd steal the molasses off from a sick nigger's pancake!" Phil had my sympathy.

Speaking of town-meeting, I asked Phil how he should vote. Drawing himself up to the importance of the question, and not wishing to inform me that he hadn't been sufficiently reconstructed to exercise that high privilege, he replied, "Well, I don't know; I've thought on that subject mightily. The fact is, when I came here and set up business the Democrats they patronized me, and the Abolitionists they patronized me. So I think, on the whole, I'll remain mutual, and not vote at all!" When town-meeting came Phil was mutual.

DURING the heat of summer B— purchased a hat of exaggerated dimensions, and a friend remarked, on seeing it for the first time, that B— was evidently studying economy, inasmuch as he had provided himself with a head-covering for the summer, and his cow with substantial food for the winter.

"Yes," replied B—, "it is necessary to be economical in these days. I have concluded to sell my dog, because I can not afford to supply him with dry goods."

"Dry goods for a dog?" queries the friend.

"Of course," rejoined B—. "During the hot weather dogs require muzzlin', and my dictionary tells me that muslin is a species of dry goods!"

"Good-morning!" said the friend, and passed on.

A NEW HAMPSHIRE friend writes:

DEAR DRAWER,—The weather has been excessively warm for the past few days, even here, among the Granite Hills; and during one of those sweltering days, when it seemed an exertion even to eat one's regular meals, it is not strange that the cook who prepares them should complain bitterly. We have in that capacity a good, honest Irish girl, not long in this country, who thought the thermometer ranged higher than the law allowed, and to assure herself on that point, asked one of the men "how much is the thermometer above Cesar?"

THE following comes from Nebraska City:

A few days ago an honest miner from Colorado had his pocket-book stolen containing sundry greenbacks and several nuggets, one of which was of a peculiar wedge shape.

Our worthy Marshal soon scented out and arrested a suspicious character, upon whose person the nuggets were found. Upon the examination the prisoner brought forward a Dutchman to prove that the nuggets found with him were his, and that the witness had seen them in his possession previous to the theft. The Dutchman was sworn and told his story, and was cross-examined by C—, plaintiff's attorney, who asked him if one of these nuggets he described was thinner at one end than the other. "V-o-s?" says Dutchie. "I ask you," says C—, "if one of these nuggets you describe was thinner at one end than at the other?" "Oh! No, it vos dicker mit one end as it vos mit de odder!"

A shout was raised, and the Dutchman retired from the witness-stand with a bewildered look, muttering to himself, "It vos dicker!"

OLD Father C— had long been a traveling preacher, but finally settled down on a good fat farm, on which he raised grain to sell. Some of those who have not the fear of the law before their eyes reported that Father C— had two half-bushels—one full-grown, one not so big. C— was very fond of administering reproof to all, both saints and sinners (and, by-the-by, he had very little regard for time, place, or politeness). There was a little Italian, nicknamed Johnny Cado, living near Father C—'s, on whom C—'s wit was lavished without stint. One day Johnny came to C— for some corn, and there being several of the neighbors present, C— thought to exercise his wit on poor Johnny by way of pretended reproof for his wickedness. Johnny bore it for a time meekly, but, finally, he said: "Mr. C—, do you suppose there are seats enough in heaven for all who will go there?" "Yes," said C—; "why do you ask such a question?" "Why," said Johnny, "I thought that if you had any fears on the subject you might take along your little half-bushel!"

OUR little girl of three has lately had the privilege of attending church a few times. Last Sunday her mother and grandmother, with other members of the church, after services were through and congregation dismissed, remained, on invitation of the clergyman, to transact some business of the church proper. When about half-way home Joey first missed her mother, and inquired where she was. Being informed that the minister wished her to stop a short time where we had the meeting, she made the same inquiry as to her grandmother and received a similar answer. She then proposed to go back herself, but was told that she was not wanted there. Reflecting a moment, and pouting a little, she replied: "I guess I could stop if I had my silk hat on!"

WE are glad to see that there is such a "good state of feeling," as the papers say, in some parts of the South. The following indication is from Mobile:

On my way home last evening I was compelled to stop at my grocer's, to procure some articles for home consumption, and while there one or two friends dropped in. The grocer had recently received an invoice of English ale which he was strongly recommending, and to prove it was good, opened a bottle and asked us to try it. The weather being quite warm the ale was remarkably frisky, when one of the party remarked to the grocer: "I say, S—, do you want to know how you can sell more ale?" S— was very anxious to know how he could do it. "Well, I will tell you—sell less froth!" Of course another bottle had to be opened. Among the articles I had to purchase was some soap for the kitchen and laundry, and the grocer advised me to buy "Babbitt's." Speaking of "Babbitt," says he, "I saw his picture in one of the illustrated weeklies as one of the self-made men." This brought our joker out again. Says he, "S—, don't you know what caused 'Babbitt' to rise so fast?" "I do not," was the reply; "can you tell me?" "Why, yes, of course I can—it was done by yeast powders!" "Sold again! Cato, bring another bottle of ale!" One would have supposed that both parties were now satisfied. Not so. Our joker says: "Speaking of good things, the editor of the Times got off a good thing last night." "What was it?" says S—. "A dirty shirt!" was the reply. And S— said he was going home; and so did I.

A FRIEND in Nevada has a smart child, of whom he says:

We think "our Mondie," two and a half years old, is the smartest and cutest child in these parts. Upon rising a little earlier than common a few mornings ago, and going out into the yard, he noticed, what to him was an unusual thing, a dense fog, which hid from view every thing a little distance off. Running to the door he called to us, at the top of his voice, "Do come and see the big air!"

ABOUT the time of the advent of copper toes, Professor L—, of Evanston, Illinois, was catechising a class of Sunday scholars in Iowa. Among other questions he asked Willie if he had a new heart. "No, thir," frankly answered the little fellow, poking his fat legs over the seat-back, "but I've got thum new boots!" The grave Professor smiled a quaint smile, and the subject dropped with the dropping of the boots.

THE Drawer is acquainted with editors, and sympathizes with them in their trials. Not the least difficult part of the duties of the editorial chair is to decline gracefully. The following is an example of what excellence in this branch of editorial duty can be attained by long experience. The story is true. "Hannah" sent what she considered a wonderful poem, to be published in the —, with this note:

"I send you a poem on Spring, which, out of respect to yourself and paper, you are at liberty to publish."

The ode, the merest hash of bombastic ignorance, was disposed of as follows:

"Hannah says she sends us a poem out of respect to ourselves. Out of respect to our readers we decline."

THE children have been noted for their innocent mistakes, which cover parents with confusion, ever since the Drawer published the smart story of the little girl who exclaimed to her mortified papa, respecting a bald-headed visitor, "Oh! papa, Mr. Jones has got another face on top of his head!" This month we have the story of a little girl who was reading in her turn at family-prayers, an aunt of strong secession proclivities being a visitor in the family. The little one, as her turn came around, demurely read: "Alexander the copperhead did me much evil." We think Paul the Apostle would not have liked Copperheads any better than he did "Alexander the coppersmith."

Some weeks since the case of a sister of a man deceased against the administrators came up in one of our circuit courts. The plaintiff brought suit for twenty-six hundred dollars, amount claimed for thirteen years' services, during which time she had attended to and taken care of her brother, who had died without rewarding her pecuniarily for her really invaluable devotion.

There being a great number of cases in court, by consent of counsel the matter was submitted to three referees, who, after hearing the arguments pro and con, were to decide whether the bill should be allowed or not. At the appointed time the room was crowded with spectators, and no little interest was manifested in the result. The counsel for the plaintiff, a sedate and solemn man, concluded that the best way to secure his ends was by adopting the pathetic. Accordingly he began:

"Gentlemen, for thirteen long years did my client devote herself to her unfortunate brother. With an affection such as only a sister can feel did she minister to his every want. Patiently, faithfully she toiled, never complaining, never unwilling, never murmuring. And never was she rewarded, except in that inward consciousness of having done a noble and self-sacrificing deed. Yes, gentlemen, for thirteen long years she toiled and labored, and during that time she never received enough to buy her a pair of pantaloons!"

The perfect simplicity of this forgetfulness of his client's sex was so apparent, and the mistake so natural, the flight from the pathetic to the broad ridiculous was so sudden and complete that the effect can scarcely be imagined.

WE have had a specimen in the Drawer before of the poetic wit of the "prominent member of the bar" (a distinguished Judge, by-the-way) referred to in the following extract:

Two cousins claimed an account, each against the other, and litigated very spiritedly. The case was reported as "Owen Kerr vs. Owen Kerr." While this trial was in progress a prominent member of the bar, possessing a decided poetical turn of mind, composed the following lines on the true merits of the case, which are too good to be lost, though not legitimately belonging to the regular "law report:"

OWEN KERR vs. OWEN KERR.

If the strife in this case is extremely perverse,
'Tis because 'tis between a couple of "Kerrs."
Each Owen is Owen—but here lies the bother—
To determine which Owen is owin' the other.
Each Owen swears Owen to Owen is owin',
And each alike certain, dog-matic, and knowin'—
But 'tis hoped that the Jury will not be deterred
From finding which "Kerr" the true debt has incurred;
Thus settling which Owen by owin' has failed,
And that justice 'twixt Kerrs has not been cur-tailed.

THE somewhat eccentric and good-hearted General T—, who lived in Newport, opposite Cincinnati, and died a few years since a millionaire, though very wealthy was rather close, and not always ready to pay his debts. On one occasion a Mr. W—, who had considerable dealings with him, called on him for a settlement. The General was overbearing and profane, W— was earnest and decided. One word brought on another, until there seemed no hope of a settlement. The General cursed and swore, W— retorted. In the midst of the dispute a servant announced dinner. The General invited W— to dine with him. "No!" says W—, "I will never eat with such a grand old rascal as you are!" The General blandly replied, "My friend, business is business, but hospitality is hospitality." W— did dine with the General, and after dinner they had but very little trouble in settling their differences.

ON another occasion the General was taken suddenly ill with the cramp colic, and it was feared he would die. He had quite a number of slaves, and among them was old Harry, a very pious old darkey. The General requested that Harry and the other slaves be called in immediately to pray for him. They came in, and knelt and prayed with all their might, the General rubbing his body and groaning in agony. After a while he said he felt some easier, and again looking round on his blacks he exclaimed, "You black rascals, stop praying and go to your work! I think I shall get well now!"

FOR some time during the early part of the war the Eighteenth Regulars were quartered at Camp Thomas, a few miles north of Columbus. One night one of the guards contrived to take with him a bottle of whisky, on which he got rather boozey. While in this condition Lieutenant K—, who was officer of the day, came along on his rounds. The guard had remaining sense enough to call out, "Who comes there?" The usual reply was given. Judge of the officer's surprise when the drunken guard answered: "Well, ze officer of ze day better be getting in, for if ze officer of ze night catches him out he'll give him fits!"

AMONG the numerous hands employed a few years since in the repair-shops of the Columbus and Indianapolis Railroad there was an old German by the name of Sites, and a young fellow, Jim W—. It was Jim's delight to tease Sites on every occasion that offered. One of his most common ways of doing so was to stick his hands in his pockets, open his mouth and eyes to their utmost extent, and gape at Sites whenever he came near. This was uncomplainingly borne for a long time, until one day, when Jim was gaping as usual, Sites marched up to him, shaking his fist, and broke out with: "Young man, I dells you one dings—dere is one place up dat is goot; dere is one place down dat is bad, and he open his mouth for you just so wide as do you for me!" Jim never gaped at the old man again.

THERE must have been a vast amount of fun in the army in spite of the sober work which it had to do, for many correspondents from all parts of the Union, now that the war is over, are sending to the Drawer their reminiscences, and camp stories, and practical jokes. Among them we find this from Michigan concerning General Richardson:

The General was sauntering along toward a fort which was in course of erection not far from headquarters, dressed in his usual uniform for fatigue—namely, citizen's pants, undress coat, and an old straw-hat which had once been white, but was now two or three shades nearer the General's own complexion. Along came a dashing city staff-officer, in white gloves, and trimmed off with gold lace to the very extreme of military regulations. He was in search of General Richardson, but did not know him personally. Reining up his horse some little distance from the General, he shouted:

"Hello, old fellow! can you tell me where General Richardson's head-quarters are?"

The General pointed out the tent to him, and the young officer went dashing along without saying "Thank you." The General then turned on his heel and went back to his tent, where he found the officer making a fuss because there was no orderly to hold his horse. Turning to General R., as he came up, he said:

"Won't you hold my horse while I find General Richardson?"

"Oh yes, certainly," said he.

After hitching the horse to a post near by, the General walked into the tent, and, confronting young pomposity, he said, in his peculiar twang:

"Well, Sir, what will you have?"

ANOTHER: While in command of the "Sunner Division" one of the "Irish brigade" mistook him for a fellow-private, and called out to him, "Hello, pardner, give us a chaw!" The General pulled forth one of those long, dry plugs of tobacco called "Home Manufacture." The Irishman cut off what he thought would be two or three days' rations for him, and returned the remainder, with the inquisitive remark, "Bully boy, what regiment do yez belong to?"

The General, with all the meekness of a chicken thief, told him he was General Richardson, and the Irishman moved off to camp "on the double-quick," to make his report to the boys.

IF our Illinois friend has any more stories as good as this the Drawer will keep a corner for them; meanwhile, thanks for a good beginning:

A rich congregation in F— worshiped in a very poor and very smoky meeting-house. The Society had been called together to provide the means to repair the building. Old Deacon B— was appointed chairman, and opened with a long prayer, after which he called upon Brother T— to state the object of the meeting. Brother T— arose, and, with great gravity, said: "My brethren, this meeting has been called for the purpose of providing the means to repair the Lord's smoke-house!" Something like a smile lit up the countenance of the assembly, and the necessary funds were forthwith contributed.

ONE of the "juvenile bibers," who probably does like lager, and doesn't like to "save" at the loss of his pleasures, thinks the Drawer has been "sold" in the story of the German porter. The "juvenile" is mistaken. The Drawer can introduce him to a man who owns now a large share in one of the largest hotels in New York city. Less than twenty years ago this man was a porter, and the secret of his success was just that of the German porter, that when he wanted a glass of lager "so bad that he couldn't do without it," he just didn't get it. There is an old proverb, "A penny saved is two-pence earned." Try it, and see if it's true.

AN old subscriber in Wisconsin, who has appeared in the Drawer before, sends the following item, of special interest, we imagine, to the internal revenue collector of "Thad's" district:

We have here a fixture, "an old resident," called Thad S—, who is something of a philosopher. The other night he awoke from a troubled sleep and began saying, "Death and Taxes!" intimating there could be no escape from either. His moaning and groaning awoke his wife, who said, "Mr. S—, what is the matter?" All the reply she could get was, "Death and Taxes!" She says, "Mr. S—, you are prepared to die, I trust." The reply was, "Yes, I'm prepared for death, but not for the taxes!"

ONE who tells many good stories has sent a couple to the Drawer from Indiana. They have not lost their flavor by transmission through the mails, as some of the local jests seem to do:

Old S—, who died a few years since, was one of the earliest settlers in Southeastern Indiana. He lived in a little hovel, on the Great Miami "Bottoms," with only one room, hogs and chickens inhabiting the same room with himself and wife. Though very ignorant, he was very kind-hearted and hospitable. A Yankee "tin peddler" once stopped at his house near dinner-time and inquired if he could get his dinner? "Certainly," replied S—. He ate dinner on a flour-barrel head, and then asked what was to pay? "Nothing." The peddler insisted, saying, "You are too poor to give me a dinner for nothing." S— positively refused, and the peddler left, thanking them kindly for their hospitality, and expressing his sympathy for their "poverty-stricken lot." He traveled through the Bottoms, disposing of his ware, and at evening got his supper a little farther on. He asked who those poor people were with whom he took dinner; and wanted to know "if his host and the neighbors could not help them a little?" The answer came from the "guidwife": "Horn, man, Bire S— could buy you, and a hundred more like you, if you was black! He's worth hundreds of thousands!" The peddler was astonished, never having seen wealth in that shape before.

S— was the owner of nearly two thousand acres of the rich alluvial at the junction of the Ohio and Great Miami rivers, and the old lady did not at all exaggerate his wealth.

A SIMILAR anecdote used to be told, when I was a boy and lived on Long Island, of old Smith, one of the early settlers. Old Smith went up to New York some eighty or ninety years ago. Strolling along the then fashionable thoroughfare of Broad Street, he was attracted by a new jewelry store, and stopped to look in the window. The jeweler seeing such a shabby fellow staring in at his goods walked to the door and kept a sharp eye on the stranger. Smith, having finished his survey, walked into the store and accosted the proprietor: "I say, Mister, what are them there buckles worth?" pointing to a pair of handsome gold knee-buckles displayed in the window. The jeweler took a survey of him, and now concluded that he was some farm laborer, who had a desire to shine on Sundays, but was ignorant of the quality and value of the coveted article. He replied, "They are solid gold." "I didn't ax what they were; I axed the price," replied Smith. "Do you think you have money enough to pay for them?" said the jeweler, in a bantering tone. "If I haven't, I guess I could soon borrow it," replied Smith, somewhat "riled." The jeweler laughed. "If you will stand outside and find some one who will lend you the money on your own security, I will give you the buckles," said he. Smith assented, and went out. In a few minutes he looked in and said, "Here comes a man'll lend me the money!" The jeweler stepped to the door and looked out. One of the city bankers was approaching, who was well known to the jeweler. Curiosity to see the result kept him quiet. As soon as the banker came up Smith coolly addressed him: "I say, friend, can you lend me $40 or $50 if I want 'em?" In an instant the banker's wallet was out: "Yes, Mr. Smith, $500 if you want them." The jeweler was astonished, and still more so when the banker introduced "Mr. Smith, his particular friend, one of the richest men on Long Island!" Like the above tin peddler, he had never seen wealth in that shape before.

THE Drawer has received a pome entitled "The Soul's Last Sight." Whether it is original or selected the Drawer, in spite of its extensive reading and classical attainments, is unable to decide. It contains the history of a young lady who became enamored of a certain John Smith, who was faithful until he heard of a former Down-East flame living in "York State," when, it appears, he took the steam-boat line to pay a visit before yielding himself up to his engagements. Lucy, cast down by this apparent desertion, thus gives vent to her grief:

He's gone! across the sudzy see;

He's crost the lakey watter!

To sea Jerushey Anjyline,

Ben Smither's oldest dawter.

My heart is broak! I soon shall di,

Oh cruel, cruel John!

And when I'm dead and berrayed

I hope you'll look upon

The gras that grose upon my tume,

Down in the woods so dark,

Where all is sad and silent glume

And strecked skwirrels bark.

And when your out at nite as late

As eleven o'clock or later,

And heer the wind whine thro' the tall popped pine,

Oh!!! think uv Lucy Baker.

And ef ye marry that Jerushey

Yuve crost the laix to get,

Remember that your deerist Lucy

Died in konsekwnce uv it.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

[Fourth Paper.]

EXPECTANCY.

“HOPE deferred maketh the heart sick.” After the excitement incident to the operations about Ball’s Bluff had died away, the truth of this proverb was painfully realized. The “ninety-day” theory was completely exploded. Those who had flattered themselves that the conflict would be “sharp and short,” that a single victorious and glorious campaign would crush the rebellion, were now disenchanted. My own hopes had controlled my judgment on that subject, and made me visionary. I had hoped for myself to be able speedily to return to congenial pursuits and my domestic circle. I had hoped for the Southern people that a speedy collapse of their frenzy would save them from the inevitable ruin which must result from a protracted war. I had hoped for my country that the spectacle she now presented to the world—exciting the derision of her enemies, the melancholy pity of her friends—would presently be changed by the “returning good sense of the people:” a phrase often used by disappointed parties, but rarely realized by those of certain opinions.

The results of the late campaign had dissipated all these hopes. The war which had burst upon many like a thunder-clap from a cloudless sky, without any apparent adequate cause, a surprise, a concatenation of accidents, was now developing into a reality whose proportions and consequences it was bewildering to estimate. The peace-loving people who had no interest in the war, who voted against it, who abhorred it, were nevertheless fighting as fiercely and determinately as those who initiated the quarrel and blew the trumpets. The certaminis gaudia had got possession of the sections. The hurrah for our side had now completely drowned the voice of reason, interest, or policy. An interminable and gloomy vista began to open before us. That the American people would prevail in the end who could doubt?—but at what a cost! Their best blood must flow in rivers; their accumulated wealth wasted like water, their mild and paternal government embittered, and hardened perhaps into an iron despotism. All that, perhaps, and worse. Well, let it come! “The Federal Union—it must and shall be preserved!” Let this fair land, from the Potomac to the Gulf, become a howling wilderness, so that the Right prevail and the Nationality is established. War to the last man and the last dollar!

The mind easily resigns itself to the inevitable. War, with its fatigues, privations, and fearful hazards, has its compensating glories and rewards.

“Still, still, forever

Better though each man's life-blood were a river
That it should flow, and overflow, than creep
Through thousand lazy channels in our veins
Dammed like the dull canal, with locks and chains.

SIGNAL-STATION, MONTGOMERY COUNTY.

Better be
Where the extinguished Spartans still are free,
In their proud charnel of Thermopylae,
Than stagnate in dishonorable peace;
Better one current to the ocean add,
One spirit to the souls our Fathers had,
One freeman more, America, to thee!"

Henceforth I begin to pay more attention to the details of a soldier's profession; to calculate distances, take bearings, study fortifications and tactics, read treatises on grand strategy, and dream of feats of arms and future campaigns. I was but a globule of the blood of the Great Nation which was warming up to the subject in hand.

Oct. 27.—Having surveyed the roads and topography in the vicinity of Edwards's Ferry we broke camp to-day, and followed our division back to its position near Darnestown. We found the locality of head-quarters changed from the old place in the pines to Magruder's Farm, about two miles below the village. The General and staff occupied the farm-house; the topographers established themselves among the ruined chimneys of an old mansion which had been burned some time ago. The tents were pitched under the trees in the grass-grown inclosure; while the kitchen and mess-room were established in the cellar walls. We had news of the occupation of Romney by General Kellogg.

November 1.—Bright and cool. Captain A—— commenced a course of lessons in field fortification. An earth-work redoubt was planned in a neighboring field, and working parties from the different regiments were detailed to execute it, thus familiarizing the officers and men with this essential branch of a soldier's duty. War is the practical application of all human science—creative, conservative, and destructive.

November 2.—During the night a northeast storm arose, shaking my tent so violently that I could not sleep. About two o'clock A.M. I went out to look after my tent-pots, and saw that Captain A——'s tent had blown down, exposing his bed, books, and papers to the rain. He was absent, so I aroused Benjamin and the Swizerts, and righted matters; after which I returned to bed, but not to sleep. During the whole day the storm raged with unabated fury. With Benjamin's assistance we reinforced our tent-cords and pins, ditched about them to prevent overflow, and finally regulated the Captain's tent. General Banks called to see us about mid-day, and the violence of the storm suggested fears in regard to the Grand Armada, under Burnside, recently sailed for parts unknown. Several officers called to report for fortification duty, but were dismissed until the following morning on account of the weather.

November 3.—Clear and cloudless, with high wind. Ate an enormous breakfast, and afterward discussed the merits of Hawthorne and Longfellow with Luce. Wrote to my wife, and studied fortification. In the afternoon visited the signal-station on the old Chestnut—from whence, through the glass, we could see the signal-tower on Maryland Heights, opposite Harper's Ferry (thirty-two miles distant), and read the signals from the flag. Returning met some Martinsburg men, who were enlisted in the First Maryland Regiment. These gave me some news of individual acquaintances there of a private and unimportant character. An officer of the Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers told me the following anecdote of Edward's Ferry.

During our occupation of the Virginia shore picket posts were established along Goose Creek, and when the retreat was ordered a sergeant was dispatched to call in the pickets. The sergeant, thinking it might be dangerous, shirked the duty and slipped over the river with the retreating troops without executing his mission. The men on duty remained at their posts all night (ten hours), and finding that the expected relief did not come returned to the mill, where the post head-quarters had been established. This they found vacant. They then returned to the regimental bivouac, and found that also deserted. Making their way to the ferry landing, they called a boat, and were thus enabled to rejoin their regiment in Maryland. I remember seeing these men come down to the landing and wondered at their tardiness. Ten minutes after a party of Confederate cavalry appeared on the ground—the reconnoitring party referred to before.

This evening at head-quarters the idea of spending the winter in Winchester was discussed. I pressed it with all the argumentation I could, but I was overruled, but the military opinion of the staff seemed rather against it. They insisted that we would in all likelihood have a hot winter there, and one which might be unhealthy. Inaction sits most heavily on men newly entered into military life. The veteran's power is in patience. The lesson of life, civil or military, is in knowing how to bide one's time.

November 4.—Clear and pleasant. The evening a sergeant with his guard, who had been on picket duty at Seneca Mills, lost his way in attempting to return to the regiment, and called at our quarters for directions. This is one of the disadvantages that men born and educated in cities and work-shops have to contend with in military life. Their topographical faculties having never been cultivated, they have no capacity to find their way in the fields and forests. The sergeant reports that six or eight dead bodies of National soldiers drowned at Ball's Bluff have been picked up at the mouth of the Seneca.

Among the most pleasant features of our military life are the delightful serenades, vocal and instrumental, that are got up almost every evening for the entertainment of head-quarters. The bands of the Massachusetts regiments, which are the best in our division, give us the instrumental music, while the Zouaves of the body-guard are charming vocalists, and not sparing of their music, especially since the advent of a company of cavalry detailed for duty at head-quarters. The musical rivalry between this company and the Zouaves inures to the enjoyment of all the circumjacent camps.

This company of Zouaves was brought from Philadelphia by Captain Collis, a young lawyer of that place, and not being connected with any regimental organization was assigned to duty as the General's body-guard. They wear a sort of Turkish costume with breeches of extraordinary redness, enlivening by its brilliancy the prevailing dinginess of our regulation blue. A number of these fellows are Europeans, and some having served in the Crimea, show themselves adepts at divers of the minor military accomplishments, foraging included. I exercised my pencil to-day in portraying one of the strongest characters among them, an old Frenchman of various Crimean reminiscences, at present chief wagon-master of the body-guard.

I passed an evening with some West Point officers, discussing the character and capacities of their old class-mates and comrades who had gone South. As these opinions expressed in November, 1861, around a camp-fire, may be interesting at some distant day I will record them :

Joe Johnston is considered the foremost man among the Southern leaders in point of general ability and military genius. A man eminently brave, energetic, and ambitious ; capable of enlarged views in war or politics, and one who will take the highest position in case the rebellion succeeds. Cold and concentrated in manner, of immovable self-possession, he will exhibit great vigor in the field, but will probably lack confidence and steadfastness under reverses.

Robert Lee, who was the favorite officer of General Scott, is supposed to be much over-rated, and not to have inherited the military genius that so greatly distinguished his father, Light-Horse Harry Lee of Revolutionary memory. In manners and deportment Lee is the complete gentleman—handsome, dignified, and courteous—an accomplished engineer, thorough in his observations, and almost infallible in his decisions on points examined ; but so slow in arriving at conclusions, and so cautious in action, that he will probably be beaten by a more active and less calculating opponent in the field. Lee was always considered a good staff-officer, but failed as a colonel of cavalry. He is supposed to have won the regard of General Scott as much by the uniform urbanity of his manners as by his engineering talents.

Beauregard is also a capital engineer, but for general command in the field is an inferior man. He will, however, sustain himself against reverses better than either of those mentioned, rising against adversity he will be found fighting to the last.

Braxton Bragg, lately appointed Secretary of War in the Confederate Government, is a bright, clever man in his profession, but limited in capacity and not likely to achieve high distinction in the present struggle. In social life he is sour and cynical ; in command, an overbearing martinet.

Albert Sydney Johnston is by birth a Kentuckian, and is the General Johnston of the Mormon Expedition. He is a man decided in council, energetic and resolute in action, possessing a large amount of practical wisdom and vigorous common sense, and full of very strong prejudices withal.

Magruder is a light man, dissipated, dressy, and full of knight-errant valor. In developing the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war, his genius is Napoleonic. He may execute a brilliant demonstration, or succeed in a harebrained adventure, but lacks solid and reliable military qualities as well as comprehensive judgment.

Jackson was a hard and earnest worker at West Point, but dull in some important branches. He was secluded and peculiar in his social habits, and so much of a hypochondriac that it seemed to indicate occasional aberration of mind. He had been brevetted for gallantry in Mexico, but owing to his peculiarities of character will probably not be trusted in any important command by the Confederate chiefs.

Evans—"Shanks Evans" as he was familiarly called by his old comrades—is considered an inferior soldier, and without much ability otherwise. His luck at Ball's Bluff may give him position, but he will in all probability not sustain it.

Jeff Davis is himself an educated soldier, and was the best Secretary of War we have ever had at Washington ; the only one who entirely ignored politics in the administration of his Department. He is for the rest a narrow-minded martinet, full of prejudice, obstinacy, and vindictiveness, which latter characteristics may be serviceable to our Government before the war is over.

November 12.—Clear and frosty. I was talking last night with some of the officers about the Rocky Mountains. Their descriptions of the strange and sublime scenery, the breezy healthfulness of the atmosphere, the picturesqueness of the Indian encampments, manners, and costumes, the wild beasts, birds, and fishes with which those regions abound, quite fired my imagination. Captain A—— relates that on one occasion in traveling up a gorge in these mountains he saw three strange figures approaching by the narrow way. They appeared to be very old men, so extremely old that they seemed almost to have taken leave of humanity. Their strange and savage countenances were half hidden in growth of grizzled hair and whiskers. They moved with an awkward, shambling gait, so weird and uncouth altogether that their approach was watched with mingled emotions of curiosity and terror. When quite near they were discovered to be Grizzly Bears—a mother and two cubs nearly grown. Both parties halted, reconnoitred each other, and then tacitly entered into an amicable arrangement, which permitted each to go on its way rejoicing.

November 13.—Clear and cold. Information was received at head-quarters that Jackson was at Winchester with twenty-five thousand men, and Joe Johnston in the same vicinity with forty thousand. This disturbs our plan for occupying Winchester. If true, it means more than defense against any premeditated move of ours. But the whole statement is without foundation, or the force is greatly exaggerated. I volunteered to ride up the river as far as Hancock, reconnoitre the positions, and obtain reliable information.

Starting after dinner, I arrived at Poolesville just as General Stone and staff were sitting down to supper. The General was about starting for Washington and left me in occupancy of his tent for the night. It was believed here that a portion of the troops about Leesburg had moved in the direction of Winchester.

November 14.—I continued my ride to the mouth of the Monocacy, crossed on the aqueduct, and followed the tow-path to Point of Rocks. The line was guarded by a regiment of Philadelphia Zouaves, stationed at Monocacy, and Colonel Geary's Pennsylvania regiment, stationed at Point of Rocks. The picket-posts were all alert. I was amused and pleased with the varied ingenuity exhibited in the huts and shelters erected to protect them from the rains and frost. At the Point of Rocks I met Colonel Geary, who seems to be a capital officer, and has a fine regiment. His accurate knowledge of the topography of Loudon County, opposite, gives him great advantages, and shows that the Government has one man, at least, in the right place. Pushed on to Sandy Hook by way of the tow-path, and stopped with Major Tyndale, of Geary's regiment.

November 15.—A cold, driving rain made my ride gloomy and uncomfortable. This, I remember, is the day appointed by Jeff Davis for humiliation, fasting, and prayer. May his humiliation be eternal!

Above Harper's Ferry I left the tow-path and took the road to Williamsport via Antietam Iron Works, Sharpsburg, and Jones's Tavern. Just as I passed a road-wagon my horse took fright, and came near throwing me by his extraordinary capers. The object which scared him out of his propriety was an astonishing piece of ordnance which was attached to the tail of the wagon. This was one of the guns of the Sowders Battery, already known to fame.

Those who live remote from the military frontier doubtless have imagined that all the fighting in this war is done by the great organized antagonists—the Government and the Rebellion. This is a mistake. Individuals are continually taking advantage of the times to fight out their private quarrels, villages and communities to avenge the jealousies and rivalries of past years. Sharpsburg and Shepherdstown are but three miles apart, separated by the Potomac River, the boundary line between Maryland and Virginia—"Lands separated by a narrow frith abhor each other." Sharpsburg and Shepherdstown are jealous in proportion to their mutual insignificance. Since last spring they have been fighting each other across the river with all the virulence of rival tom-cats: raiding and counter-raiding; plundering and defending canal-boats; arresting and counter-arresting citizens and strangers. As the war-spirit waxed and warmed the amusement of pelting each other with musket-balls at long taw was found scarcely stimulating enough; they couldn't kill any body. The Shepherdstowners, having nothing else to do, pursued the war with more pertinacity, and were rather gaining on their rivals. At this juncture a brilliant idea suggested itself to Captain Sowders. There were two old 6-pounders of Revolutionary or 1812 memory planted as street-posts in Sharpsburg. The Captain had them dug up and mounted upon a couple of water-cars. The ammunition consisted of bags of nails and scraps of iron of all shapes and sizes. These formidable engines were hauled down to the bluffs, and placed in battery against the devoted village of Shepherdstown. The guns were charged and sighted, but the patent friction and percussion fuse were both ignored. The artillerymen preferring a slow match lighted with a cigar—which done, they ran and hid themselves in adjacent gullies and behind rocks. The explosion was terrific, tremendous, entirely satisfactory to the Marylanders, and equally so to the Virginians, who, before the nails and bits of old iron had ceased raining upon their houses, succumbed and dispatched a flag of truce to protest, in the name of humanity and civilized usages, against the wholesale massacre of unarmed and non-combatant widows and orphans who were thus menaced with destruction. A truce was concluded, highly honorable and advantageous to the Sharpsburg party.

It may be as well to anticipate, and here give the conclusion of the history of these memorable guns. Some time after this date I was riding through Sharpsburg, and there saw a dozen or more fugitives from one of our defeated columns. They told me that in their attempt to gain the northern bank of the Potomac they had been set upon and arrested by certain citizens of Shepherdstown, disarmed, and held as prisoners. One of their number escaping reported the facts to Sharpsburg. The sensible Sowers Battery was again put in the field. A flag was sent over the river demanding the release of the prisoners, threatening an immediate bombardment if the demand was not complied with. The prisoners were innocently released; but their arms and equipments still remained behind. The herald returned and haughtily demanded their surrender, even to the last haversack. They were surrendered meekly; but the current of war (no more than that of honey) does not run always smooth, nor in the same direction. Grown arrogant, perhaps, and careless from their repeated triumphs, or fatigued with their martial labors, or, like Charles the Twelfth (who sent his jack-boots to paddle over the Swedish Senate), believing that the mere presence of their terrible guns on the opposite bluff would quell the spirits of their adversaries, and keep them in subjection—for some reason, unknown to history, they left the pieces on the bluff and retired to Sharpsburg to celebrate their victory. What was their mortification on returning, a short time after, to find their victorious engines disappeared—gone. Their enemies, taking advantage of their error, had come with stealth in the night and captured—not, not captured, thank Fortune—but had meanly stole them away. Thus ended the Sowers Battery. The gallant Captain still lived, however, and, obtaining a commission in the National army, turned his energy and courage to account with more scientific weapons, and rendered good service during the war.

It was night when I arrived at Williamsport. Here I obtained accurate information in regard to the enemy's force and position on the Virginia border. There had been no troops in Winchester for some time, except three or four hundred militia, ill fed, ill paid, and ill disposed, deserting whenever they had an opportunity. Alarmed at Kelley's position at Romney, which was a continual menace to Winchester, the leading citizens of the place went to Richmond and besought protection from the Confederate Government. The commander at Manassas emphatically declared that he had not the troops to spare, and refused to send assistance. The importance of the delegation at length prevailed with the President, and General Jackson, with his brigade, was sent to their defense. This brigade was twenty-five hundred strong instead of twenty-five thousand, as had been reported to General Banks. The force at the Junction (meaning Manassas) was forty thousand. The officer, unacquainted with the geographical points of the country, had supposed this junction located somewhere near Winchester. This explained the whole matter. Jackson, on his arrival at Winchester, had drawn in some other troops to his command, and had ordered out the militia en masse, including all males between 16 and 40. This call had been slowly and feebly responded to, a large number fleeing into Maryland to escape the conscription.

November 16.—Blossering and bitter cold. Leaving my horse in Williamsport, I accepted a seat in Bill Harper's Rockaway, and we drove to Hancock, with a stiff norwester blowing in our faces the whole way. My wife and daughter from Berkeley joined me the same evening.

November 17, Sunday.—Captain K—, commanding the post here, came in to inform me that my father was waiting on the Virginia side of the river. We hurried down to the ferry landing, but found none of the boatmen at hand. I could see my father on the opposite shore, wrapped in his cloak, and apparently shivering from the bitter breeze. The rough and sturdy Captain had enough of true manhood in him to divine my burning impatience. He seized a stone and broke the chain which confined the boat. We both leaped in, and with bending oars swept across the swollen current and brought our passenger triumphantly back to town. I have never forgotten the noble but heavy sympathy manifested in that act of the Captain. I also found in Hancock on this occasion some old and faithful friends from Virginia. Once more surrounded by family and friends I passed a day most pleasantly, reveling in anticipation of victory and peace soon after the opening of the coming spring.

November 18.—Clear and moderate. A company of Pittsburg cavalry are stationed here, and this morning went through their drill opposite the hotel. As a grand finale the whole body charged at full speed down the street. Casualties: two pigs killed dead, a cow overthrown and crippled; one cavalier and horse tumbled over the cow, and were both seriously but not fatally hurt.

In the afternoon Colonel Leonard, commanding at Williamsport, arrived in town on a reconnaissance toward Romney and Cumberland. He was escorted by Captain Russell, of the Maryland cavalry, with twenty-four men, and accompanied by Lieutenant Devins, Assistant-Quartermaster. I was invited to accompany the party, and borrowing a horse from Lieutenant Stewart of the Pittsburg cavalry, started with them up the National Turnpike at five o'clock P.M. As we crossed the Siding Hill the air was frosty and bracing, and the full moon rose upon our caravans, interesting it and its wild surroundings with picturesque interest. At eight we arrived at Mrs. Bell's "homestead," fourteen miles from Hancock, one of the best specimens of an old-fashioned House of Entertainment, roomy, neat, and homelike. The presence of a fine piazza, and the walls hung with engravings and school-girl paintings, showed that the Muses were no strangers here; while a jolly supper and soft beds proved there was no lack of what, in our cases, were the more needful comforts.

November 19.—We started after an early breakfast, and made Flintstone, twelve miles westward, in good time. Here we left the broad National Turnpike and took an obscure country road to Oldtown, fifteen miles distant. Took lunch by the way with an old couple whose cottage was wriggling with dogs, kittens, and grandchildren. The old man's sons were in the Southern army, as he confessed, to his great grief, and contrary to his orders. Oldtown is the most miserable collection of human habitations that I ever beheld; fortunately for humanity the village is very small. We crossed the Potomac here by a deep and difficult ford, and halted at Green Spring, a station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and at present the head-quarters of a regiment of the Maryland Home Guard, commanded by Colonel Johns, of Cumberland. Here Colonel Leonard procured an engine, and leaving our fatigued horses to needful refreshment and repose, we mounted the untiring iron beast and started for Cumberland, sixteen miles distant. A good bed at the Saint Nicholas served to repair the fatigue of this long and wearisome journey.

November 20.—We returned to Green Spring this morning by railroad. Finding our horses still stiff from the travel of the last two days, we were freshly mounted, through the politeness of Colonel Johns, and started for Romney at high speed. At Springfield I saw Captain Louis Dyche, with his company enlisted in my own county of Morgan, and composed almost entirely of personal acquaintances. We had a shaking of hands, and an interchange of inquiries about friends and families, and then we drove on our course.

At the Chain Bridge over the South Branch there had been a skirmish between Colonel Johns's Maryland regiment and some Virginia militia, at the time of Kelley's advance on Romney on the 25th ult. The Virginians, about three hundred strong, were intrenched on a wooded hill facing the bridge, a strong position. The Marylanders, ordered to co-operate with Kelley's movement from another direction, advanced upon the bridge until they got two-thirds of the distance across, when they found the flooring torn up and their further progress stopped; at this point they received a volley from the log breast-work in front, which killed one man and wounded seven. Finding themselves exposed, without the ability to advance, they broke, and retiring behind the pillars and abutments of the bridge, commenced returning the fire, at which the Virginians fled in their turn.

In Romney the question was more advantageously settled. General Kelley with twenty-five hundred men advanced upon the place through Miller's Gap by the covered bridge above the town. The enemy commanded this bridge with three or four guns, and disputed it until Kelley's advance dashed across the ford and bridge and rushed rapidly into the town. The commandant, Colonel McDonald, with about four hundred militia who had attempted to defend the place, now fled in panic, leaving artillery, stores, horses, and prisoners in the hands of the National forces.

Arriving at Romney, we drew rein in front of General Kelley's quarters, having made the distance, sixteen miles, in two hours. We dismounted and were courteously received by the commander of the forces. General Kelley has the air and manner of a West Virginian: a tall commanding figure, bronzed face with shaggy overhanging brows, a countenance which shows both determination and sagacity, a manner which indicates great mildness and goodness of heart. He is still suffering from a wound received at Philippi, supposed at the time to have been mortal. I am pleased with his manner of managing the revolted counties which have been brought under his control: a combination of liberality with severity. The people are offered grace if they come in and lay down their arms. They are encouraged to trade; paid liberally for what they have to sell; and where they have nothing, their necessities are gratuitously supplied. On the other hand, bushwhackers are ruthlessly shot where found; while incorrigible and defiant rebels, violators of oaths and plunderers, are (to use an expressive phrase of the times) "cleaned out." This policy seems thus far to work well. But to obtain solid results it is essential that the Government shall remain in occupation of the country at all hazards.

After a hearty dinner with the General we remounted and turned our horses' heads to Green Spring. My Secession steed, although long-legged and fiery at the start, began very soon to show symptoms of fagging. Lieutenant Devins's horse was in the same plight, and we soon found ourselves distanced by our driving Colonel. Night overtook us between Springfield and Green Spring, and we pursued our journey at the risk of being shot either by rebel malignants, who ambuscaded our pickets, or our own suspicious sentinels, who were posted all along the highway at short intervals. At every half mile a picket-fire blazed in the road, and as we advanced into the circle of light the guard had an ugly way of retiring into the shade, out of sight, and with a startling halt, and still more startling click of his musket-lock, demanding our business and condition. As several of our sentinels had been treacherously shot their suspicion was extremely hazardous to the traveler. We were lucky enough to arrive at Green Spring without accident.

Here we learned that Colonel Leonard and suite had gone on at least an hour ahead of us. We were anxious to follow, but hospitably pressed to stay all night. It was raining, pitchy dark; the river ford was deep and dangerous; a good supper, beds, a social fire blazing in the chimney. Our extreme fatigue all argued in favor of stopping for the night. We yielded gracefully, and had a pleasant evening and good night's rest.

November 21.—This morning we rose refreshed, crossed the ford, consulted the authorities at Oldtown, and took the short road to Hancock. The party consisted of Lieutenant Devins and his negro servant, and myself. The short cut turned out like all other schemes to avoid study, labor, or trouble. It was a failure. The country through which we passed was rugged and desolate in the extreme. We lost our way, and recovered ourselves several times, and at length finding an easy road that descended continuously for several miles, we followed it until we found ourselves upon a narrow spur, impassably steep on either side and terminating abruptly in a precipice thirty feet high, which overhung the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. Our servant descended by a shelving rock, aided by roots and branches, and crossing the canal by a lock gate, endeavored to obtain from a woman at the lock-house some idea of our whereabouts. By reason of bashfulness or charlishness we did not get any information at all. The feminine occupant of another house in the neighborhood was more communicative, and gave us to understand that we could not cross but must return to the road from which we had wandered, and by pursuing that would presently reach Little Orleans, another station on the canal, four miles below.

We followed these directions, and at length reached Little Orleans, a straggling settlement on the river and canal. From hence we struck inland, determined to reach Mrs. Bell's, on the National Turnpike, seven miles distant. After riding half a mile we stopped at a house to inquire the way, when three cavalymen came out and a red-faced sergeant began to cross-question us. These fellows had been placed on guard at the Little Orleans crossing, but had evidently been taking their ease. To their inquiries as to our State and business Devins replied that we were United States officers, just from Virginia, and on our way to Hancock. This avowal aroused the crafty sergeant's suspicions, and he plied his questions so fast and so bunglingly that Devins became impatient, and cursing him, rode off. At the end of five or six miles we were again puzzled about the road, and seeing a house near, my companion dismounted to make inquiries. At this moment we heard the sound of horses' hoofs approaching by the road we had come, and apparently moving in hot haste. Presently our red-faced sergeant, followed by two men with carbines cocked, burst upon us, their faces all flushed and their horses all sweating and blown. The placidity with which we regarded their demonstrations rather dashed the sergeant, and he began to look confused; but plucking up confidence, he gave me to understand that his mind was not entirely at ease in regard to our characters, and he had come to get a little more satisfaction. I asked him what reason he had to doubt our statement that we were United States officers. He replied that the language the Lieutenant had used toward him was not that of an officer. This was a fair hit; and in return we reiterated our statements, and opening our over-coats, exhibited the United States button.

The sergeant still had doubts, and fearing he might annoy us further, I opened upon him rather fiercely about neglecting the duty to which he had been assigned. Instead of watching the river we had found him loafing at a country house half a mile back: he was now five miles from his post on a foolish errand; I had a great mind to report him. This quelled the sergeant, who began to apologize and take the defensive. So the scene ended, and we went on our way. It was dark when we arrived at Mrs. Bell's, jaded and hungry. An hour's repose and a fat dinner nerved us for the completion of our journey. We reached Hancock the same night by eleven o'clock.

November 22.—Lieutenant Devins rode on to Williamsport. I determined to enjoy the society of my friends for a day longer. During our absence Captain K—— had made a raid to Berkeley Springs, hoping to surprise a rebel conscript party signorning there. His expedition was unsuccessful in the main feature. The party escaped, and the raiders got two horses, an old hat, an empty cigar box, and a map of Virginia for their trouble. I claimed the map as my share of the plunder.

November 23.—We heard the rebels had returned and occupied Berkeley Springs in force. As I was about to start for Darnestown, I endeavored to dissuade my father from returning home while the enemy were in possession. He had violated their orders and crossed the lines, and he might be rearrested and maltreated in revenge for the late action of the Federal troops. The old man's eye blazed with excitement. "I must go back," he said; "I can not go to war; but I feel that it is my mission to face these people—to show them on all occasions that there is one Virginian, at least, who abhors their treason and despises their usurped authority." So we parted; but the look and the words will remain impressed upon my memory forever, for it was the last time I ever saw my father's face.

November 25.—Making my way back to the division I arrived at Poolesville this afternoon, and called on General Stone at his headquarters. He showed me a letter from an aid-de-camp of Beauregard, inclosing copies of the orders and communications sent by Stone to Colonel Baker during the battle at Ball's Bluff—the original papers having fallen into the hands of the Confederates on that occasion. Having seen the newspaper strictures on the management of that battle, the orders were inclosed to enable General Stone to place his own action in a proper light, and fix the responsibility where it properly belonged. This is the first act of chivalric courtesy that I have heard of from the other side.

November 26.—About mid-day arrived at Camp Magruder, near Darnestown, and reported the results of my reconnoissance to the general commanding. The news received of the enemy's numbers and position while I was at Williamsport had been confirmed at Hancock and Romney, with circumstantial details corroborating the general statement, so that there was no room for a reasonable doubt of their approximate correctness. At this time the enemy certainly had not over fifty thousand men under arms in Northern Virginia.

I found the topographical establishment in a melancholy condition. The Captain and his valet had gone to Washington. Adam, our cook, had been sent to Frederick with a fellow-servant, who had been taken violently ill with typhoid fever. I found Luce alone, trying to cook dinner. Luce was a delightful companion—artist, poet, musician, wit, inventor, a soul filled with all generous sympathies, and a mind accomplished in all elegant attainments; but in the kitchen he was a botch. The dinner was already ruined past remedy. I sharply censured his action, and forthwith relieved him of command in the culinary department, contemptuously throwing his abortive mess to the fat pup (who, by-the-way, despised it). I commenced a new dinner, which was presently served and pronounced a success. Even Luce, who was half starved, had the magnanimity to compliment it highly. In the evening Captain A— with Captain C—, of the New York Ninth, arrived. I was appointed cook pro tem., and for my pains politely complimented at each meal by the company. Visited head-quarters and discussed public affairs with the officers—the proposition to remove the Confederate Capital to Nashville, the great decline in their bonds, the local and personal jealousies which are embroiling both army and leaders, give token of the speedy dissolution of this infernal league. How can a movement founded wholly on the local prejudices of the masses, and the factious ambition of individuals, end otherwise than in anarchy and mutual destruction?

"I talked with Major C— about old John Brown and his raid. No new ideas were broached on the subject, but he convinced me beyond a doubt that Brown had good reason, on that occasion, to expect reinforcement from a certain set in the North. Many were on their way from adjacent points in Maryland and Southern Pennsylvania, but in the hour of imminent action their hearts failed them and they turned back.

November 28.—After dinner Benjamin got home with the light wagon, and, detaching the horses, left it standing in its usual place. He came into the kitchen, and I turned over the cookery to him after a conversation of ten or fifteen minutes perhaps. Upon going out I was astonished to see the wagon lying overturned at the foot of the slope some two hundred yards distant, while my horse and one of the cavalry horses were running about, snorting and gazing at the vehicle with every expression of amazement. Upon examination we found the tongue of the wagon broken short off, and tracking it back to the spot whence it started, perceived that it had been violently dragged around a tree, breaking some of the lower branches. It was at first suggested that this must have been the work of some drunken or malicious person about the camp; but we had heard no noise, and such an act within the respected precincts of head-quarters would have been unprecedented. Moreover, the earth was soft, and while the traces of wheels and horses were plainly visible there were no human tracks to be found. We were completely mystified. Meanwhile my pony had ceased to graze, and continued to trot around the overturned carriage at a respectful distance, snorting violently, and rolling his eyes like Toodles at his cravat tie. Presently light began to dawn, and by putting facts together we solved the mystery. The pony had been grazing in the meadow with his halter looped up carelessly. The halter had got loose. The pony, on the arrival of the carriage, went nosing about it to seek for oats, which it frequently carried. The halter became entangled in the running gear of the vehicle. The horse started, the vehicle followed. He became frightened and ran, dragging it after him. In the race he got loose, and the carriage continued to roll down the declivity until it upset in the swamp at the bottom. The pony's subsequent behavior verified our surmises. For a week after he never came in sight of the light wagon without renewing his ludicrous manifestations of astonishment; and when, under the soothing influences of time and oats, he seemed to have forgotten his terror, yet if, while he stood near, any one would slyly give the wagon a push, he would start and take to his heels as if the devil were after him.

On recounting this story to some friends in the evening it led to the narration of other wonderful stories, and finally to the discussion of mesmerism, spiritualism, and the other "isms," credences, and superstitions that have prevailed among the enlightened as well as the ignorant of all nations and all ages. We came to the conclusion that "there may be more things between heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy." The human mind seems most unreliable when most confidently relied on.

November 29.—It is definitely concluded that we are to take up our winter-quarters in Frederick City. I received orders to-day to reconnoitre the roads in that direction preparatory to a move.

November 30.—I started this morning with an orderly, via Monocacy Chapel and Urbana, to view the roads. My orderly was a sociable fellow, and talked so incessantly that, at Momosquey Chapel. I pencilled a report of my reconnaissance and sent him back with it. "I stopped to dine at old Howard's farm-house at the foot of Sugar Loaf Mountain. While dinner was preparing a negro girl came in and reported that Mass Sammy was lying in the road, and the "creetur" was running loose across the field. The old woman instantly exclaimed, "Hit's that fool spur. He's spurred the creetur and she's flung him." Mass Sammy presently entered, limping, covered with mud, his eye bleeding, and (speaking metaphorically) his comb decidedly cut. He was a man of twenty-five or six years, city bred, and possessed with the martial ambition of riding with a spur.

December 1.—Having staid all night at Thomas Dixon's, near Urbana, I rose early and rode back to Darnestown through a damp and chilly wind which pierced to the bones. As I passed the site of the encampment occupied before our movement to Edwards's Ferry six weeks ago, I was constrained to visit it to verify or rid myself of a trifling presentiment which had been haunting me for a month. I had lost a cake of very fine ultramarine, used in coloring my maps. I could not fix the date of the loss within ten days, nor the locality within a circuit of twenty miles. Yet I was strongly impressed with the idea that by seeking on the spot where Luce's tent stood I should find it. This impression haunted me so persistently that it amounted to annoyance. Yet I refused to gratify my urgent curiosity. I was ashamed of it. The old ground had been picked over and plundered by all the soldiers, negroes, and children of the vicinity for weeks. It had been washed by all the autumn storms, and it was absurd to expect at this date to recover my treasure. I had passed the place several times and resisted the violent feeling I had to look over it. To-day I was alone and free to gratify my weakness. My horse, seeing his old feeding-ground, turned unchecked from the main road and trotted up to the spot, stopping upon the former site of Luce's tent. The first object that met my eyes was a little square package of mouldy paper lying among the snow and leaves. I dismounted and took it up. It was my lost ultramarine. I was as much delighted for the moment as if the realization of my presentiment had involved the fate of nations.

December 2.—The army is in motion for Frederick. I started in charge of the topographical baggage-wagons and party. It was bitter cold, and the roads so thoroughly frozen as to be equal to stoned highways. Arrived at Clarksburg about the middle of the afternoon, and found entertainment at a house at the eastern end of the village, kept by a motherly old lady with two pretty daughters.

By the time that my party and horses were comfortably provided for the premises were invaded by the Provost Marshal with all the murderers of the Division in his charge. The officers, however, were sociable and agreeable fellows, so that we had a jovial evening and a comfortable night.

December 4.—To-day we arrived and took up our winter-quarters in Frederick City.

For the next month our time was passed agreeably in organizing the duties of our office, attending reviews, and in enjoying the elegant hospitality of the loyal city of Frederick. We heard of Jackson's rampaging along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and sputtering at Dam No. 5 and Williamsport, intending, perhaps, to interrupt the navigation of the canal. His exertions in these matters will serve to keep his half-naked troops from freezing in this cold weather.

A letter from my wife informs me that the Virginia militia are occupying Berkeley, and that General Carson is occupying our cottage. He treats the family with marked courtesy, and does every thing in his power to prevent destruction.

I afterward saw a negro refugee from Virginia, who informed me that the National troops were at Berkeley and my house was occupied by their officers. Thus they live, changing governments from day to day, not knowing when they go to bed whether the political horizon on the next morning will be gray or blue.

My wife incloses me a letter from A—, who is about to be married, and desires me to procure her a permit to visit Baltimore for the purpose of getting her wedding finery. I wrote in reply that so spirited a rebel as Miss A— should by all means be content to get married in homespun.

December 30.—I received orders to-day to report to the Topographical Bureau at Washington in view of assignment to another department. I supped on terrapins and oysters with Lieutenant-Colonel Bryan, Captain Bingham, and others, and was felicitated on my expected change to "an enlarged sphere of usefulness" as the preachers say when called to a place with a larger salary. But my change brought with it no increase either of rank or pay; and I was ordered from a field where my local knowledge might have been eminently useful to one, where, in my present position, I would be a mere draughtsman—still farther from those who needed my care and protection to sink my individuality in the masses and mud lying in front of Washington.

On the following morning I packed my baggage by express and started on horseback for Washington. The whole weary and freezing day I jogged along chewing the cud of bitter fancies. About sunset I entered Damascus, and while hesitating as to where I should look for shelter I remembered Luce's telling me that he was once comfortably entertained here at a house, where a pretty girl lived who spent most of her time before the glass arranging her hair. As I rode slowly through the village I saw the fire-light glowing hospitably through a cottage window. On approaching I saw a girl before the glass dressing her hair. I immediately dismounted, and knocking at the door claimed food and shelter. The answer was, "Well, we do sometimes take in strangers." I supped and rested pleasantly before the fire, making friends of the old folks, children, and dogs. The girl continued to fix her hair (of which she had a charming suit) until several of the village beaux came in to pay their "devoirs." I retired to bed early and slept profoundly until the cheering beams of the first sun of 1862 awakened me. Another fatiguing day's journey brought me to Washington, where I arrived in time to partake of a late New-Year's dinner with some friends.

January 2, 1862.—I repaired to the Topographical Bureau this morning, and received orders to report to Colonel Simpson, of the Fourth New Jersey, Kearney's Brigade, at the Theological Seminary near Alexandria. Thus ends my connection with the Army of the Shenandoah. Thus ends the first volume of my journal with the eventful year of eighteen hundred and sixty-one. Eighteen hundred and sixty-two! May the bright and balmy sunshine that welcomed your birth betoken a brighter future for my home and country. But whether your skies may be clear or clouded, whether your winds blow soft or biting—speed on—

"Here's a heart for any foe."

As my orders were not pressing, I remained in Washington for several days discussing political and military affairs with such acquaintances as I chanced to meet. I have observed that while in the field I am never troubled with a doubt of the entire ability of the Government to crush out the rebellion in good time; and I feel at the same time satisfied that our political system will weather this storm and even be strengthened by the trial, yet whenever I come to Washington I fall into discouragement in regard to both our military management and our political salubrity. I hear that Jackson is bombarding Hancock. We have more than double his force in position to be thrown upon his communications, cutting him off entirely, and forcing him to surrender or destruction. What deep-laid strategic plan there may be that prevents us from assailing and destroying a detachment of the enemy which has walked like a hungry wolf into our trap I can not imagine. Have the mud, cold, and dangers of a winter campaign more terrors for those who have volunteered to defend their homes and country, their freedom and civilization, than they have for the stupid and aimless destructives who are laboring to scatter all these things to the winds? Is the National soldier, with his complete equipments and ample supplies, really incapable of taking the field against one-third his numbers of these half-starved ragamuffins? I can not believe it. I know that it can not be so. What, then, am I to think of the military policy which permits so many thousand square miles of our most fertile territory to be occupied and stripped by an enemy so contemptible both in moral and physical power? of the Government which refuses its protection to so many thousand loyal citizens, who are stretching forth their arms to it and imploring assistance? While our armies are rotting in their camps, losing more men and moral power by disease and inaction than would be spent in twenty battles, the enemy is keeping every thing astir with his zealous activity. With less than fifty thousand men afoot he has blockaded the Potomac, cut off the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, is threatening to drive our troops out of Western Maryland, and actually besieges Washington, scarcely defended by an army of two hundred and fifty thousand men. These, however, are but trifling evils and easily remedied. But there are others more deadly and irremediable resulting from this fatal delay. The active and virulent poison of treason is withering and blighting the hitherto steadfast loyalty that existed in many portions of the Southern States. How many are daily drifting away from their allegiance to a Government which seems to have neither the power nor the will to crush its enemies and protect its friends! How this lack of respect and confidence seem to be creeping north of the feebly-defended military lines—poisoning the body of the nation itself! Where do we see and hear more dangerous defection and more venomous treason than in the Federal city, under the very shadow of the Capitol? Can it be that this vast aggregation of power and civilization is to perish thus early and ignominiously of its own inherent insufficiency, helplessly groping like a blind giant stung to death with poisonous flies? Has our Democratic theory of equality been so successfully established that we have now no man or class of men sufficiently above their fellows as to be fitted to direct them in this terrible emergency? Has the habit of timorous subservency to public opinion and popular will so emasculated our strong minds that none are to be found capable of decisive action? Now when the clearest dictates of reason, policy, the public safety, the cries of the nation, demand action we are permitted to be kicked, cuffed, and flouted, and make no reply.

I was introduced to General Rosecrans at Willard's by Major Doubleday. The General expressed a desire to have me attached to his command, and asked me certain questions in regard to the topography of the Valley of Virginia and the Upper James, which induced me to think he meditated a campaign in that direction. Our conversation was interrupted by a man who had a machine for putting percussion-caps on the musket-tubes when, during frosty weather, the men's fingers were so benumbed that they could not handle them. The General went off with him, while I am sure, from his explanation, that a machine for blowing the men's noses on similar occasions would be equally useful. The city seems to be filled with patented machines and plans for carrying on the war. With the booming of the rebel cannon in their ears our Congressional patentees are busily occupied in disposing of the lives and property of their insolent besiegers, liberating slaves, confiscating and hanging in prospect, with their trunks packed all the while ready for a move into Canada in case of emergency. Those who have faith in material engines are confused with the infinite variety offered. Earth, air, fire, and water are all scientifically tortured into subserviency to the great end—all warranted to crush the rebellion in an incredibly short time, and at an astonishing small expense of human life, not to mention money.

MACHINES FOR FIELD RECONNOISSANCE.

I regret that I have so little confidence in these well-meant efforts either of our law-givers or mechanical inventors. Inter arma silent leges. With his short, clumsy sword the Roman conquered the world. The Duke of Wellington said that a reliance on long-range rifles and patent engines would enfeeble the morale of the soldier. His words were verified in the Crimean contest, where the traditional valor of the English troops was neutralized by too much reliance on English superiority in military cutlery. This nation can not be saved by denunciatory debates or extreme party legislation, nor yet by oceans of money nor whole galleries of "cute" inventions, nor by armies that blacken the land and navies that whiten the seas. The security and greatness of a nation in a crisis like the present can only be assured by the valor and blood of its citizens. The one must show itself proof against all trials, the other must be poured out unreservedly upon the high altars of the country. It has seemed to me that the American people feel this necessity, and have rushed to the sacrifice with a devotion that rises to sublimity. They have as yet found no leaders.

January 7.—I went to Willard's this morning, hoping to meet General Rosecrans again. I here understood that he had come to the city for the purpose of proposing a campaign in Western Virginia and East Tennessee, but had failed in his mission. I then mounted my horse, and, crossing the river by the Georgetown Aqueduct, rode to the Seminary Camp, near Alexandria, and reported to my former friend and chief, now Colonel Simpson of the Fourth New Jersey. My pony was comfortably stabled, and I passed an agreeable afternoon making the acquaintance of the regimental officers. In the evening I was domiciled in the Seminary building, and introduced to the surgeons who occupied the place as a hospital. I shared a room with Dr. Osborne, surgeon of the regiment, and immediately set to work studying and mapping the topography of the adjacent country. * * *

The Theological Seminary, around which the regimental camps of Phil Kearney's brigade were grouped, is beautifully situated on a wooded eminence, three miles from Alexandria, commanding a view of the Federal City, the Potomac River, and the surrounding country, with a horizon of fifteen or twenty miles radius. It included the whole circle of forts, redoubts, and earth-works defending the capital, and the winter encampments of the vast army there assembled. I have seldom looked upon a grander panorama than that seen from the cupola of the central building of the Seminary. Every thing here is on a rigid military footing. The troops drill frequently. The officers study and discuss tactics and points of discipline. I saw General Kearney on parade—a keen, soldierly-looking man with the air of a game-cock. He rides a white horse, and wears an empty sleeve pinned across his breast, having lost an arm in the war with Mexico. The tone of the brigade officers is high, and among them are many educated and polished gentlemen. They relieve the prevailing dreariness of wintry snows and mud by frequent social suppers, where all the culinary delicacies of this favored region are washed down with the choicest brands of foreign wines. I attended a "possum" supper given by Dr. S—— on the occasion of his taking leave of the brigade for service elsewhere.

CAMP SEMINARY.

The table groaned with the choicest products of the famous Chesapeake shell-fish, flesh, and fowl—wine and confectioneries flashed between, like jewels on the “cheek of night.” But why a possum supper? Where’s the chef de cuisine that gives its name to the feast? The Doctor uncovers a dish in the centre of the table, and there, in all its farcical grimness, lies the “possum,” reminding one of a roasted rat sodden in castor-oil. The Doctor is a jolly wag, as well as a charming companion and accomplished gentleman.

January 10.—A day of rain and fog. The mud apparently bottomless and tenacious as wax. I passed the evening with the Colonel, hoping to enjoy a quiet conversation concerning past campaigns and future prospects. The attempt was a failure, as it was near pay-day, and a stream of applications for furloughs poured in upon the unlucky Colonel. It reminded me of my school-days, when the boys wanted holiday to go to a fair or a camp-meeting. One fellow’s grandmother was at the point of death. Another’s wife was very ill. A third had a child that was very bad. A beardless recruit pokes his finger in his eye, and desires five days “to see the end of his ‘old man,’” who has been suddenly taken down with a “parallax.” Evidence of the truth of these statements, in the form of letters, telegrams, and personal witnesses, is volunteered with a readiness that would suggest a doubt in the mind of a wicked lawyer; but our amiable and truthful Colonel is credulous of these tales of sorrow. It is remarkable, indeed, that such a Pandora's box of diseases and misfortunes should open upon unhappy New Jersey always about pay-day. Yet the regulation is inexorable—but ten furloughs at a time are allowed to a regiment. The ten lucky ones are gone already, and there is no chance for a week to come. So the hackneyed lies are filed away to await their turn, and the weepers, readily resigning themselves to the inevitable, dry their tears, and laughingly plan some other scheme for dissipating their pay.

January 11.—On going the rounds to-day the Colonel found a huckster selling beer within the precincts of the camp—a high offense and breach of regulation. He forthwith ordered the vendor to the guard-house, and pulled the spigot out of the barrel. As the foaming liquor spouted out upon the ground the huckster poured out in unison a stream of prayers and supplications. He was a poor man, striving to support a starving family; this small keg of smaller beer was his little all, his only hope for bread for his innocent babes. The Colonel relented, and with his own hand replaced the spigot, contenting himself with ordering the sinner to get out of his camp with his nuisance. A Jew who was caught peddling copper watches through the tents was treated with less consideration. He was incontinently packed off to the guard-house for forty-eight hours. As a considerable portion of the brigade got there for one reason or another during the peddler's term of confinement he opened shop for the benefit of his fellow-prisoners, and sold off his whole stock to great advantage.

January 15.—I see in the Philadelphia Enquirer a confused report of a fight at Berkeley Springs. I suppose this refers to the affair that took place there ten days ago; but as I have had no letter since Jackson's operations in that vicinity I feel some uneasiness in regard to my friends.

Major — and Surgeon — visited me, and we passed the evening playing euchre, discussing public affairs at intervals. The Doctor's views were very discouraging. The corruption of contractors, the virulence of faction, the blunders, indecisions, futilities, and cowardice patent in our military operations—all seemed to indicate that there must be a breakdown. I could not but feel the force of his views, and acknowledge the truth of his statements. Yet I could not acquiesce in his conclusions, as I had been ten days out of Washington, and I felt the vigor of the military surroundings. What government or what people has escaped similar or worse difficulties? In all countries and all history the word "army contractor" is a synonym for fraud. What nation has ever attempted to make war (even with a foreign enemy) whose efforts were not hampered and thwarted by domestic faction? Look at our own history during the Revolutionary struggle of 1776—half of our people were adverse to the war, a third of the military force of the Colonies supported the British crown. Then what else than blunders, weakness, and waste of means can be expected of a people that has grown up in entire ignorance of the art of war; whose habits and instincts have combined to unfit them for military service; who believed in Peace Congresses and approaching millenniums, and the universal empire of love and dimes, among whom the military profession was hardly held reputable?

It can scarcely be expected that such a people will, in the commencement of a war, exhibit the promptitude, energy, and efficiency that characterizes the action of those governments which possess large and well-trained standing armies. Yet even among these, when called to the field after a long interval of peace, what failures and mismanagement! Read Napier's History of the War in the Peninsula, look at the more recent exhibit of the English in the Crimea; recall the earlier efforts of the French on the opening of their great Revolution. Our most unwarlike nation has, within the space of six months, marshaled for war, equipped, provisioned, and organized an army of six hundred thousand men. What this army will accomplish we will see. Those who have general command have general information, and have doubtless general plans which time will develop. It can not be otherwise. Let us, therefore, bide our time patiently and hopefully. I, for one, have an abiding faith in the power and destiny of the American people. I am at times troubled with a momentary faintness. I fret and vituperate, but if I hear another speak discouragingly forthwith my faith becomes belligerent. This nation will not perish thus ignominiously.

January 17.—The weather was so mild to-day that I sketched in the open air a view of the winter camp of the Fourth New Jersey. The men were engaged in erecting a new flag-staff in the centre of the parade-ground. In the afternoon I received a visit from my uncle, the chaplain of the Third Pennsylvania cavalry regiment, commanded by Colonel Averill. This regiment was encamped five or six miles above us, and we had exchanged several visits since I came over the river. Indeed, Colonel Averill had proposed to me to apply for a vacant Majority in the regiment, and my uncle had called over to urge me accept the proposition. I must get my commission from the Governor of Pennsylvania, and he naturally is unwilling to commission natives and residents of other States. I still had a lingering hope of being recalled to the Army of the Shenandoah when the great movement begun. My personal services would be more important in that field, and my feelings induced me to prefer it. To accept a commission in a cavalry regiment here would cut me off entirely from friends and home. Yet all our former ideas of personal merit, social distinction, and character were fast becoming emerged in the military hieroglyphic wrought upon the shoulder-knots. I had, like many others, entered the service with the praiseworthy but rather romantic notion that it was even more honorable to serve one's country without rank or pay. However elevating such sentiments may appear at first, the man who attempts by their means to sustain long flights will find himself in the condition of a flying fish; his wings will dry up, and he must, per force, fall to the practical level whence he started. I determined to seek a commission in the Line or Staff service in time for the spring campaign. Having talked over these matters, I proposed to my uncle to visit Colonel Simpson's tent. As we walked together he began making minute inquiries about my father's health and appearance, as he had not seen him for some years. I described him as I had last seen him at Hancock, erect, animated, filled with fire and faith as he talked of national affairs, yet when the excitement was past he would relapse into age and feebleness that it pained me to recall. The Colonel was absent when we entered his tent, but I observed upon his table a telegraphic dispatch addressed to me. "Here," said I, cheerily, "is my reply to Buck's column. There will be some movement soon."

"Open it," said my uncle, "and let us hear the tidings."

I opened the message and read as follows:

* Excerpt, January 17, 1862.

"Your father died of pneumonia yesterday. I forward herewith — by to-day's mail.

* W. W. Whitaker, A. A. G."

I spent this afternoon alone, strolling about a country once beautiful and pleasantly improved, now withered by the double desolation of war and winter. The light of a lurid sunset was just fading into a more dismal gray when the funeral train of an officer moved out from one of the redoubts and wound slowly through the felled forest that covered the slope of the hill. A military band accompanied the procession, thrilling the dreary twilight with strains of solemn music. The blasted landscape, the ruined dwellings, the wailing anthem, all combined to fill the soul with images of death—death, not fearful, but sublime.

Looking upon a nation's agony, how trivial appear our private griefs! Absorbed as we are in the petty details of our daily routine, how often do we fail to realize the importance of the era in which we are living, the grandeur of the drama which we are acting! On the events of these days hang the culminating hopes of mankind for a thousand years. Hundreds of millions of human hearts are now watching the issue of this contest with trembling solicitude. How small a matter seems a man's life given to so great and glorious a cause! Now the music, as it ascends from the misty valley, arouses the echoes with its notes of martial triumph. The brief hour of mourning is already past.

January 18.—Damp and foggy. Last night the Hutchinson Family gave a concert at the Seminary. During the performance a song was introduced containing abolition sentiments. It was violently hissed by one party, and defended by another, until a grave disturbance ensued. This morning the excitement is unabated, and the subject is discussed by the officers with a degree of feeling that both surprises and distresses me. Such exhibitions of partisan spirit menace the social unity of the brigade, if not the military efficiency of the army. Colonel S—— takes the conservative view, and believes that a recurrence of the disorder may be avoided by prohibiting the exciting cause. I have just heard that the Commander-in-Chief has revoked the permit given to the Hutchinsons, and ordered them out of the lines.

January 18, Sunday.—Thick fog and rain. At breakfast we discussed the Slavery question and the objects of the war. New Jersey officers will not admit the question of Slavery as entering into their views. They see no object in the war of sufficient importance to dignify and justify it, except the single idea of national unity. That must be maintained at all cost and at all hazards. It is the great essential, upon which the whole people will unite; and they object to the introduction of all non-essential, ideologicistic factions or local issues, as tending to degrade and enfeeble this great idea. Some, however, maintained that the Institution of Slavery lies at the bottom of the whole matter, and that its abolition was essential to the secure establishment of that national unity upon which all were equally determined. I protested against all exciting discussion of the subject as needless. It was virtually a dead issue. The opinion of the nineteenth century had heretofore spared the Institution out of respect for the power of the United States Government. Its special maintainers, in their madness, had forestalled destiny, and were striving now to destroy the only barrier that stood between it and an abhorrent world. Whether they won or lost in the coming struggle, slavery was equally doomed to destruction—exposed as it must be, naked and enfeebled, to the pressure of that vast, all-controlling, and mysterious power, the Opinion of the Age, of which it may be truly said, that, "Whoso falleth upon it shall be broken; but upon whomsoever it shall fall, it shall grind him to powder."

For the rest, let this and all other disputed questions slip until we have decided the great question. At the siege of Jerusalem the Jews, when not engaged in resisting the assaults of the Romans, spent their time in cutting each other's throats—their mode of discussing differences of opinion respecting ceremonial forms and religious dogmas. The Moors of Grenada fought around the doors of their mosques until the pavements were slippery with blood, and then, with swords dripping with fraternal gore, ran to man the walls against the Spaniards. Both cities fell. Most fortunately for this country the armed rebellion has claimed territorial limits, and assumed a distinct and organized form. We know in what direction to march our armies, and upon whom to point our cannon. But the prevalence of factious opinion poisons the healthy blood of a nation, confuses its counsels, and undermines its strength unseen. The nation true to itself may laugh to scorn the dangers of a localized rebellion, backed by all the powers of the earth. Poisoned by internal faction we may perish ignominiously of our own corruption, the most despicable failure that ever stained the pages of history, the most pitiable monument of human incapacity for free government that ever merited the derision of a despot.

January 21.—The drums are rolling and the bands playing paeans for a victory in Kentucky. General Thomas has defeated Zollicoffer at Mill Spring with great slaughter, thus opening the road to East Tennessee. This news is indeed important, and has suspended the discussion of the Hutchinson concert.

January 21, Sunday.—Cool wind with pleasant sunshine. Rode over to Camp Marcy to see my kinsman, but found him absent at church. Dined with Colonel A—— and Lieutenant-Colonel Gregg of the Eighth Regular Cavalry. After dinner we had the following graphic sketches of Arlington House before and after the battle of Bull's Run:

On the day the troops marched out the sun shone bright, the banners flaunted, the bands filled the air with inspiring strains of martial music. Columns of trigly dressed, neatly equipped infantry moved with cadenced tread and burnished arms glittering in the sun. Gay cavaliers pranced on bedizened chargers, exchanging courtly salutes with carriage-loads of smiling ladies and immensely respectable civil officials, who crowded the grounds to witness the victorious march of the grand army.

There were regiments of invincible Fire Zouaves,

"Whose breeches were red and whose jackets were blue," and portentous reporters, their patrons and admirers, already writing out the deeds of valor and renown that were to be accomplished by these heroic imitations. So the gay and martial pageant left the stage, and with it went the narrator.

SCENE 2, Monday morning, July 22.—Arlington revisited. The sky is overcast, and a continuous soaking rain has dampened and bedraggled all nature. A death-like silence reigns over the old house and the gloomy groves that surround it. The camps are desolate, the tents dripping and lazily flapping in the fitful gusts, as if impatient at their loneliness. Here and there a pavilion lay overthrown, exposing beds and furniture to unheeded soaking. A crippled and discarded horse straying among the trees raises his head for a moment to salute the passer with a dreary stare, and then quietly returns to his grazing. The occasional twitter of a lonely sparrow or subdued scolding of an irritated wren were thrown in to point the effect of utter silence, as the idea of utter desolation was pointed by the appearance of a single human figure on the wide and lofty portico. Seated in a high-backed chair, leaning against the door-jamb, his military costume wet and mud-stained, his hair disheveled, skin blistered to a lurid red, hat slouched over his eyes, breathing thick and heavily, asleep. This was M'Dowell, the Federal commander.

In the afternoon I started on my return to Camp Seminary. My way led through Blenker's Division, located about Hunter's Chapel. The Dutch were hived around the lager beer tents like bees around a sugar hog'shead in a dry summer. Numerous drunk were straying between this and the other encampments, all outrageously polite to any passer supposed to be an officer, heightening the grade of the salute in proportion to the quantity of beer they had belted.

January 28.—The papers are still cackling over the defeat of Zollicoffer. I am anxious to hear of some further results.

January 30.—Raining. I visited Major Birney to-day, and had some conversation with him respecting my chances for a commission in the Pennsylvania cavalry. He proposed another position for me. His brother, David B. Birney, who commanded a regiment in the Patterson campaign, is now Colonel of the Twenty-third Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. He is about to receive a commission as Brigadier-General, and will want an Adjutant. He offers me the position, and I will take it into consideration. The rank and pay are less than the other, but for many reasons a staff appointment will suit me better than a commission in the line. These gentlemen are sons of the Mr. Birney who was formerly supported by the Anti-Slavery party for the Presidency. The Colonel at the breaking out of the war was a lawyer in Philadelphia. The Major, with whom I have been conversing, has led a life of varied experiences. He was born in Alabama, was educated partly in Kentucky, and afterward at the North. He became early imbued with anti-slavery principles, and has led a characteristic American life: having figured as a farmer, manufacturer, editor, lecturer, writer, teacher, soldier, and lawyer. He was in France during the Revolution of 1848, and commanded at one of the barricades. He was afterward a professor in a school there, but becoming an object of suspicion to the police under the present Emperor he returned to America, and has lately been practicing law in New York. He is, of course, a zealous partisan of the war, and our philosophy on the subject runs very generally in the same direction.

February 1.—I went over to the city to-day, and met General Birney at Willard's. He formally tendered me the position of Assistant Adjutant-General on his staff. I asked a week to consider the proposition, which was politely accorded. The General's manners and appearance are extremely prepossessing, and I remember having met him in the Patterson campaign. The rank of Captain of infantry, at one hundred and twenty dollars per month and forage for two horses, will do to commence with.

February 3.—I have been only two days in the city and feel my faith in men and governments beginning to sicken again. I must hasten back to seek invigoration in the atmosphere of the camp.

I left Washington in a furious snow-storm, and rode to Camp Marcy, where I dined with my friends, and disclosed my intention of accepting Birney's offer. It was combated with a zeal most friendly and flattering; but I believed I had reason on my side. The aspect of the country as I rode to Camp Seminary was most gloomy and Russian-like, yet the soldiers seemed as lively as snow-birds in the storm. Owing to the stupidity of the orderly at Camp Marcy my pony had been left standing out during my visit, and on coming out I found the snow heaped upon his back a hand-breadth in depth. As we jogged homeward over the rugged roads he whined and grunted like a sick child, and I feared the unwonted exposure had injured him. He went gayly to his stall, however, and evidenced by his appetite that he had received no serious damage.

I found the regimental mess at supper, where I was warmly welcomed and felicitated on my prospective promotion. We spent the evening in Dr. Oakley's room, where we met the members of the surgical staff and a number of other officers—Doctors Dougherty and Osborne; Colonel Torbert, of the Second New Jersey; Captains Sturgis, Jackson, Ryerson; and Lieutenant Hamick. Our discourse turned upon the climate and monstrous vegetable growth of California, when one of the party produced a set of prints showing the great trees of that region, four hundred feet in height, and thirty feet in diameter at the base. One of the pictures represented an officer on horseback riding into the hollow of a fallen and decayed trunk. Another gives a view of a waterfall which, in three consecutive leaps, falls two thousand three hundred feet. What a magnificent country!

Returning to my quarters I parted with Colonel Simpson, who took the path toward his tent. A moment after entering my room I heard the report of a musket, followed by cries of agony and voices shouting for the corporal of the guard. I was thrilled with the horrible suspicion that the Colonel had been shot by a stupid sentinel. Voices in wild alarm calling for a doctor seemed to confirm my appalling surmise. I called to Osborne, who was writing letters at the other end of the room, and then rushed out to face the tragic scene. I met a group of men and officers hurrying toward the Seminary, the medical head-quarters of the brigade. The Quarter-Master led the way with a lantern. To my great relief the next person I recognized was the Colonel, active and sympathetic, giving orders to those who were supporting a soldier apparently suffering from a mortal wound. Surgeons, hospital stewards, and servants swelled the crowd. The sentinel's musket had gone off accidentally and blown his hand off. Back at the post I saw the corporal, with one or two comrades, with a light, searching in the snow for the missing member. The wounded man was carried into the surgical room, surrounded by a sympathizing and agitated group. Lint and bandages were spread upon the table, and cases of instruments unrolled, exhibiting rows of hooks, pinchers, and gleaming blades, suggestive of all manner of insufferable tortures. The barber had brought his basin and towels, ready to catch the blood, while two young surgeons, who had been heating water to make some punch, magnanimously devoted it to the dressing of the gory wound. The man's hand had not been blown off, after all; for, on raising his arm to the light, it appeared encased in a dirty glove still dangling to the wrist. At every touch and movement the soldier groaned and shrieked most piteously, so affecting some of the spectators (not accustomed to such bloody work) that they were obliged to retire to reinforce their stomachs with some narcotic stimulant. Two surgeons with hook and scissors undertook to remove the glove. The patient's outcries were so violent during the operation that it was proposed to administer chloroform. Before it was brought in, however, the glove came off, and developed a manipulator red and dirty enough, but with four fingers and a thumb complete. The hand was turned over and over to the light, and wrist and arm were carefully examined. "Damn it!" quoth the Doctor, "I can't see the wound!" Neither could any one else. Not a scratch, nor a bruise, nor a powder-burn! The sentinel was the most astonished individual of the company. His hands and feet were half frozen, and he had been dancing to warm them, holding his musket near the muzzle, meanwhile. The piece went off accidentally, jarring his benumbed fingers painfully; imagination did the rest. The meeting dissolved in shouts of derisive laughter. Several whose sympathies had been most painfully excited vented themselves by giving the ex-patient a kick or two as he retired. The Colonel, who had been most deeply grieved of any, condemned the man to stand on a barrel for three hours in the cold next morning.

SEMINARY PUMP.

February 4.—Bright and mild. I wrote to General David Birney, accepting the position he has offered me. Below I saw the regiments of a neighboring division engaged in a snow-balling drill—attacking, retreating, and manœuvring in handsome style—by the bugle-calls and under the direction of their officers. It struck me as a very cheerful and appropriate exercise to break the monotony of camp life in snowy seasons. At night I attended a supper at the mess-room of the Second New Jersey—a rich and elegant affair. Champagne, speeches, songs, and stories were the order of the evening. Several of the officers expressed their fears lest the war would be over before they had an opportunity of fleshing their burnished arms or griming their gilded trappings in battle. I have often recalled that night when, in after-times, I have seen and heard of Phil Kearney's brigade, foremost in the blaze and storm of battle, and wondered how many of that gallant company have survived to remember that festal evening, with its hopes and fears.

February 7.—Clear and mild. I rode over to the city to-day and paid a visit to General Birney at the camp of the Twenty-third Pennsylvania. He was at dinner, and I joined him with a will. I afterward wrote to the President applying for the requisite commission, and after some agreeable general conversation returned to Camp Seminary.

February 8.—Mild and misty. At breakfast we all pitched into the authorities for continuing inactive so long. The genial spring breezes have begun to thaw men's blood and render the mud and despondency of inaction doubly irksome. Our strictures were suspended by hearing cheers at a distance. What does that mean? Fort Henry in Kentucky has been captured by our gun-boat fleet. The reoccupation of Romney by Lander is also news of less national interest, but being nearer home adds to my personal enjoyment.

February 12.—This morning smells deliciously of spring. More drums and cheering for the victory at Roanoke Island. The Fourth New Jersey is paraded and formed in hollow square, facing inward receives the news and responds with three times three.

February 14.—Raining. Having settled my affairs and taken leave of my kind friends of the brigade, I started with horse and baggage for Washington. Having seen General Birney I ascertained that my application had been duly forwarded, but would not be acted upon for two weeks perhaps. I determined to improve the leisure thus afforded by visiting my family at Berkeley—engaging the General to telegraph me at Hancock, Maryland, in case of any movement.

February 18.—I arrived at Hancock last night. This morning is bright and balmy as spring. Soon after breakfast I called to see General Williams (of Banks's Division), who holds this place with his brigade. The General, ascertaining that I wished to visit Berkeley, kindly offered me a company of cavalry as an escort. Colonel Knipe, of the Pennsylvania Rifles, also offered me his horse and arms. I crossed the river at the head of my troop, and took the road to Berkeley after an absence of nearly seven months. The grander features of the familiar landscape were unchanged, still defying the power of human might and malignity; but all the minor landmarks were obliterated. Fences, houses, and barns had disappeared; heaps of ashes and the carcasses of dead horses marked the route over which Jackson's army had advanced and retired. The streets of the village as I entered were silent and deserted, with no signs of life except an occasional face of a woman or child peering from a half-closed door or window.

In the public square I met some negroes who recognized me. Captain Homer halted the escort here, and sent out pickets to guard the roads, having been informed that a large body of rebel cavalry were a short distance above the town. Meanwhile my friends, informed of my advent, had appeared at doors and balconies and were waving joyful welcome. As I rode past the Pendleton cottage I saw my venerable kinsman waving his handkerchief from the balcony. I responded with the triumphant tidings which I had brought over the river: "Grant has captured Fort Donelson, with fifteen thousand prisoners—Union forever."

As I approached my own door there were handkerchiefs waving too, and my daughter, all bright and blooming, ran out to meet me. It is strange that my eye should have searched so persistently for a face that I knew could not be there. My sight grew dim for a moment, but I quickly rallied, determined to drain to the bottom my cup of social joy and triumph. We talked, laughed, dined, drank wine, and congratulated each other. I was at home again; Victory had perched upon the National eagles in all quarters. A few days more and the power of the nation would move, sweeping all before it like an Alpine avalanche. Who could for a moment doubt the result?

"Twas as though God himself had set Against Satan—"

Courage, dear friends! One brief and glorious campaign, and all will be over. We will see our beloved Virginia again free from her bloody oppressors—"sitting clothed and in her right mind. The evil spirits cast out," and peace established in all her borders. The flag that enfolds all that is great and noble in her past history shall wave forever in power and honor over the homes of her living and the graves of her dead children.

In the afternoon I returned to Hancock accompanied by my wife and daughter, and by sunset we were comfortably established in our quarters at Barton's. While here I gathered the following account of Jackson's recent operations in this vicinity:

Having been sent to Winchester in the early part of the winter to protect that place against an anticipated occupation by the National forces, and encouraged by their apathy, he determined, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season, to make an active campaign. He consequently gathered all the available force in the Northwestern Department of Virginia, amounting to about ten thousand volunteers and several thousand militia, with thirty pieces of cannon. With this force he moved into Berkeley and Jefferson counties, completely destroying the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Harper's Ferry and Hedgesville, and making several abortive attempts to render the Chesapeake and Cumberland Canal useless by destroying the dams from which it was fed. These attempts brought on some skirmishing along the river, in which the National troops, from the superiority of their ordnance, generally had the advantage. In the beginning of January Jackson moved with his whole force toward Berkeley Springs. The place was occupied by a battalion of National troops, with two guns of Muhlenburg's Battery. As the rebels advanced by the Winchester road a company of the Thirty-ninth Illinois Infantry was sent out to feel and reconnoitre their column; as the reports from the country had been so uniformly false or exaggerated, they were not credited in the present instance. The scouting party encountered the enemy's advance several miles out and made a dashing attack upon it, killing and wounding several and checking the whole column. Perceiving they had fallen upon a greatly superior force, the gallant Illinoisians retired in good order and unmolested to their post at Berkeley. Jackson was so much deceived by this audacious and unexpected attack that he halted for the night, and next morning advanced as cautiously on the village, occupied by five companies, as if he were in the presence of a large army. The Federals, still incredulous in regard to the enemy's force, held their ground; and Muhlenburg's two guns, posted on the ridge over the hotel, opened sharply on the columns advancing by the Winchester and Martinsburg roads. The presence of artillery again confused the rebel commander, who had expected to find nothing but infantry opposed to him, and again his march was checked and his opportunity lost. The eyes of the National officers were at length opened by seeing heavy flanking columns moving both to the right and left of their position. They quietly retired with their guns by the Sir John's road, and, crossing the river, joined the brigade under Lander, stationed at Hancock, in Maryland. About four hours after the Illinoisians had withdrawn the enemy's advanced cavalry under Colonel Ashby entered the village. Jackson, with his artillery and a brigade of infantry, passed through without stopping, and took position on the bluffs opposite Hancock. Young's brigade occupied the Berkeley Springs Hotel, while the militia bivouacked here and there where they could find a convenient resting-place. The rebel General's plan, it seems, was to capture the force at Berkeley, then cross the Potomac at Hancock, move up the National Turnpike, capture Cumberland, and cut off Kelley, who held possession of Romney. Hancock was defended by Lander with about two thousand men and two guns. He was summoned to surrender by Jackson, and his answer may be better imagined by those who know him than by those who do not. Persons who were present say the oaths were appalling. Immediately after Jackson's messenger returned the cannon opened. The rebel bombardment was urged to the utmost, and several houses in the centre of the town were perforated by shells, while the women and children were running wildly through the streets seeking an escape from the fire. Muhlenburg's two guns, already in position, returned the fire with such fatal accuracy as to drive the rebel batteries from the bluff.

During the heat of the bombardment the gallant lieutenant commanding the artillery, wishing to quiet the alarm of the fleeing women and children, rode up the street and addressed them in the following soothing words: "Ladies, don't be frightened, there is no danger, I assure you—their powder ain't worth a damn!" Jackson got his pontoons upon the river bank, but so sternly were the opposing shores held by Lander's infantry that neither commands nor persuasion could induce the rebel troops to attempt a crossing.

While matters stood in this position at Hancock, Kelley made a dash from Romney in the direction of Winchester, and at Blue's Gap attacked and dispersed a body of militia, storming their redoubt and capturing four cannon with all their stores and baggage. This spirited blow caused the rebel commander hastily to abandon his position before Hancock, and to move on Romney by the Blooming road. The weather, which had been mild at the commencement of the movement, had now become intensely cold, and the march was accomplished with the most severe suffering to the troops. Kelley meanwhile quietly withdrew from Romney, leaving Jackson to occupy, unopposed, a useless and devastated village which he could not afford to hold, and from which he could not advance.

This campaign was as stupidly conceived, and as feebly executed, as any that will be recorded on either side in this war of failures and blunders. It cost the rebel commander about two thousand men hors du combat (chiefly from cold and exposure), and nearly cost him his commission. I was told he was so offended at the strictures that were heaped upon him by his superior officers, and the public generally, that he tendered his resignation, which, however, was not accepted.

During the rebel occupancy of Berkeley my father's property was wasted and plundered with many circumstances of obscene and wanton outrage. Besides large quantities of blankets and bedding which the men took to supply their necessities, a great amount was destroyed from mere spite and malignity. Doors, balusters, and furniture were used for fire-wood, although the place was surrounded with abundance of good timber. Private papers, collections of rare books, choice paintings, port-folios of sketches and engravings, cabinets of curiosities and articles of vertu, were torn, trampled under foot, defaced, or carried away. A chivalric amateur of the arts introduced his horse into my studio and served his feed in the desk. Both animals left indelible traces of their appreciative tastes behind them. The handsome residence of Mr. Garrison, a gentleman from New Jersey, was needlessly burned, as were several barns and other buildings.

Ill-natured folks might be tickled to hear that our visitors were not altogether partial in their attentions, and that sympathizing friends of the Southern cause fared little better than their avowed and open enemies. Some boxes of clothes and valuables, belonging to Southern neighbors, had been deposited in our house to insure protection against the Federal Hessians and Vandals. Although special pains were taken to protect them by proclaiming the political proclivities of their owners, they went with the rest. Some neighboring cottages, belonging to well-known friends of the Southern cause, were gutted as ruthlessly as ours had been. For the rest the family received no personal rudeness from either officers or men. Indeed they spoke with feeling of many acts of sympathetic and kindly attention received from individuals during these trying times.

Directly after the departure of the invading army my father took to his bed, complaining of a severe cold, owing, perhaps, to the unusual exposure and discomfort to which he had been subjected during the occupation of his house by the troops. During his illness he seemed to suffer but little, except from general prostration of vital energy. In his broken and fevered sleep his mind seemed continually occupied with the unhappy condition of his beloved country, and when he died, on the sixteenth of the month, in his seventieth year, his last audible words were, "Forward! Forward! M'Clellan!"

February 21.—To-day I received a telegram from General Birney, informing me of my appointment as Assistant Adjutant-General, and requesting me to report at once. This promises a speedy answer to the patriot's dying cry.

The days of impatient and wearing expectancy are at length past, and those of tremendous realization are at hand.

WOODEN LEGS.

TWO children sat in the twilight,
Murmuring soft and low,
Said one, "I'll be a sailor-lad,
With my boat ahoy! yo ho!
For sailors are most loved of all,
In every happy home,
And tears of grief or gladness fall
Just as they go or come."

But the other child said sadly,
"Ah, do not go to sea,
Or in the dreary winter nights
What will become of me?
For if the wind began to blow,
Or thunder shook the sky,
While you were in your boat, yo ho!
What could I do but cry?"

Then he said, "I'll be a soldier,
With a delightful gun,
And I'll come home with a wooden leg,
As heroes have often done."
She screams at that—and prays and begs,
While tears—half anger—start,
"Don't talk about your wooden legs, Unless you'd break my heart!"

He answered her rather proudly,
"If so, what can I be?
If I must not have a wooden leg
And must not go to sea?
How could the Queen sleep sound at night,
Safe from the scum and dregs,
If English boys refused to fight
For fear of wooden legs?"

She bang her head repeating,
And trying to be good,
But her little hand smacked suddenly
The leg of flesh and blood;
And with her very mouth she flung
The unremembered word,
And cried, "Perhaps—if you know—
You'd better go to bed!"

Then to find his trust about her,
And laughingly he said,
"But I've seen many honest men
With legs of blood and lead;
Oh Darling, when I am a man,
With heart of diamond hard,
I'll be a hero if I can,
And you must not hold me back."

She stood like as she answered,
"I'll try what I can do—
And Wellington had both his legs,
And Caesar & Linn too!
And heroically," here she sighed,
"I know it's lame—but then—
He's not a hero—your brother
Like him would do and dare!"

So the children talked in the twilight
Of many a setting sun,
And she'd stroke his chin and clasp her hands
That the heart had not begun,
For should she pretend to be brave and good
When he played a hero's part,
For often the thought of the leg of wood
Lay heavy on her heart!

THE ROB ROY IN THE BOLLIES.

CRUISE OF THE ROB ROY.

THE ROB ROY is a canoe, built of oak, with cedar deck; fifteen feet long, twenty-eight inches broad (she should, her Captain thinks, have been two feet shorter and two inches narrower); nine inches deep, weighs eighty pounds, and draws, when manned, three inches of water with an inch keel. For her a stream with a clear channel four inches deep, a yard wide, without bends of less than fifteen feet, is a navigable river. Her means of propulsion are a man with a stout pair of arms, a double-bladed paddle seven feet long; and, when occasion serves, a lug-sail, or preferably a "sprit," rigged to a five-foot mast, with bamboo yard. When not in use the sail, mast, and yard are rolled up together, making a bundle much like an artist's sketching umbrella. In the deck is an elliptic hole fifty-four inches by twenty, in which sits Captain, who is also crew, and all hands. A cover of India-rubber cloth fits tightly around the combing, and is fastened by a button to the Captain's breast, keeping all dry below deck. The Rob Roy is, in form, dimensions, build, and equipment, a civilized brother of the Esquimaux kyack. But we doubt whether any civilized canoeist would for any money undertake the gymnastic feats performed by the Greenland kyackers, as described by Mr. Charles F. Hall:*

Owner, Captain, and crew of the Rob Roy is J. Macgregor, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, of the "Temple," London, and so we

* "I enjoyed a rare sight. One of the Esquimaux turned summersets in the water seated in his kyack. Over and over he and his kyack went till we cried, 'Enough!' and yet he was only his hands and feet. This is a feat performed only by a few. It requires great skill and strength to do it. One miss in the stroke of an oar as they pass from the centre (when their head and body are under the water to the surface might terminate fatally. No one will attempt this feat, however, unless a companion in his kyack is near. The next feat I witnessed was for an Esquimaux to run his kyack, while seated in it, over another. Getting some distance off he strikes briskly and pushes forward. In an instant he is over, having struck the upturned peak of his own kyack nearly amidships, and at right angles, of the other. These feats were rewarded by a few plugs of tobacco."

suppose a Barrister at Law: at all events a gentleman and "muscular Christian" in the best sense of that rather abused phrase; for he paddled his own canoe a thousand miles; took kindly to almost every body and every thing; laid by duly on Sundays, carried religious tracts for gratuitous distribution, and gives to the "Royal National Life-Boat Institution," and to the "Shipwrecked Mariners' Society," the profits of the clever little book in which he narrates the incidents of his summer vacation.

The thousand miles of canoeing were performed upon the British Thames; the German Sambre, Meuse, Rhine, Main, and Danube; the Swiss Reuss, Aar, and Ill; the French Moselle, Meurthe, Marne, and Seine; the German Lake Titisee; the Swiss lakes Constance, Untersee, Zurich, Zug, and Lucerne; half a dozen canals in Belgium and France, and two expeditions in the open sea of the British Channel. Mr. Macgregor is an experienced traveler. He has climbed glaciers and volcanoes; has dived into caves and catacombs; has trotted in a Norway carriole, and galloped in a Russian tarantasse; has sailed on the Ægean, and boated on the Nile; has "muled" in Spain, "donkeyed" in Egypt, "cameled" in Syria, "sleighed" in Canada, and "rantooned" in Ireland. He has, he says, "most thoroughly enjoyed these and other methods of locomotion in the four quarters of the world; but the pleasure in the canoe was far greater than them all."

A CHOKED CHANNEL.

For a three months' cruise the following is given as a list of "Useful Stores:" Basket to sit on, 12×6×1 inches, holding an India-rubber coat; nails, screws, putty, gimlet, cord, thread, string; buttons, needles, pins; luggage-bag 12×12×5 inches; flannel jacket with short flaps, two pairs of flannel trowsers, two flannel shirts, one on the person, the other for shore; thin alpaca Sunday coat, thick waistcoat; pair of light-soled shoes, straw-hat, two collars, three pocket-handkerchiefs; brush, comb, tooth-brush; Testament, tracts for distribution; purse, circular notes, and small change; blue spectacles, book for journal and sketches, pen and pencils; maps, cutting of a six-inch square at a time for pocket-references; pipe, tobacco-case, and light-box; guide-books, and pleasant book for evening reading, tearing off covers, advertisements, and pages as read; for no needless weight should be carried hundreds of miles—even a fly settling on the boat must be refused a free passage; box of "Gregory's Mixture," sticking-plaster, small knife, and pencil. Canoe, paddle, mast, sail, and luggage, will all weigh about 120 pounds.

Several parties of oarsmen have made pleasant voyages on the great European rivers, accounts of which have been given to the world. Mr. Macgregor thus pleasantly sets forth the superiority of the canoe and paddle over the boat and oars:

"In the wildest parts of the best rivers the channel is too narrow for oars, or, if wide, it is too shallow for a row-boat; and the tortuous passages, the rocks and banks, the weeds and snags, the milldams, barriers, fallen trees, rapids, whirlpools, and waterfalls which constantly occur on a river winding among hills, make those very parts where the scenery is wildest and best to be quite unapproachable in an open boat, for it would be swamped by the sharp waves, or upset over the sunken rocks which are utterly impossible for a steersman to see.

"But these very things, which are obstacles or dangers to the 'pair oar,' become interesting features to the voyager in a covered canoe. For now he looks forward, and not backward, as he sits in his little bark. He sees all his course, and the scenery besides. With one powerful sweep of his paddle he can instantly turn the canoe, when only a foot distant from fatal destruction. He can steer within an inch in a narrow place, or press through reeds and weeds, branches and grass; can hoist and lower his sail without changing his seat; can shove with his paddle when aground, or jump out in good time to prevent a decided smash. He can wade and haul the light craft over shallows, or on dry ground, through fields and hedges, over dykes, barriers, and walls; can carry it by hand up ladders and stairs, and can transport his boat over high mountains and broad plains in a cart drawn by a horse, a bullock, or a cow.

"Nay, more than this, the covered canoe is far stronger than an open boat, and may be fearlessly dropped headforemost into a deep pool, or a lock, or a millrace, and yet, when the breakers are high, in the open sea or fresh water rapids, they can only wash over the covered deck, while it is always dry within.

"Again, the canoe is safer than a rowing-boat, because you sit so low in it, and never require to shift your place or lose hold of the paddle; while for comfort during long hours, for days and weeks of hard work, it is evidently the best, because you lean all the time against a backboard, and the moment you rest the paddle on your lap you are as much at ease as in an arm-chair; so that, while drifting along with the current or the wind, you can gaze around, and eat or read or chat with the starers on the bank, and yet, in a moment of sudden danger, the hands are at once on the faithful paddle ready for action.

"Finally, you can lie at full length in the canoe, with the sail as an awning for the sun, or a shelter for rain, and you can sleep in it thus at night, under cover, with an opening for air to leeward, and at least as much room for turning in your bed as sufficed for the great Duke of Wellington; or, if you are tired of the water for a time, you can leave your boat at an inn—it will not be 'eating its head off,' like a horse; or you can send it home or sell it, and take to the road yourself, or sink into the dull old cushions of the 'Première Classe,' and dream you are seeing the world.

"With such advantages, then, and with good weather and good health, the canoe voyage about to be described was truly delightful, and I never enjoyed so much continuous pleasure in any other tour."

The ease and cheapness with which the light canoe can be packed upon a railway or steamer, carried overland upon a cart, or borne through the streets of a village when the day's rowing is done, are no small items of advantage. Indeed, on most railways the boat was taken as luggage, as though it were a trunk, without extra charge. Mr. Macgregor's usual mode of procedure was to have his canoe carried as nearly as possible to the head-waters of a river which he wished to explore, and then to row down the current, setting sails upon broad streams and lakes. Thus he struck the Danube at its very source, in a clear spring in the princely gardens at Donaueschingen, and launching his canoe a little below where, two or three brooks having joined, the stream is a few feet broad, he followed it to Ulm, where it has become a great river.

Mr. Macgregor's tour was commenced by rowing from London down the Thames to Sheerness, where he had a chance to try his canoe in rough water. Her buoyancy and stability more than equaled his expectations. In the very midst of the waves he managed to rig up mast and sail. Then he sent the canoe by rail to Dover, thence by steamer to Ostend, where he gave her another trial in the rough rollers of the British Channel, where she behaved admirably, to the great delectation of the bathers on the beach and the spectators on the pier. Thence canoe and crew went by rail and cart to Namur, where trial was made on the Sambre and Meuse.

These quiet streams were for a while sufficient to please the voyager. "The banks would be called tame if seen from the shore, but are altogether new when you open up the vista from the middle of the stream. The picture that is rolled up sideways to the common traveler now pours out before you, ever enlarging from a centre, and in the gentle sway of the stream the landscape seems to swell on this side and that with new things ever advancing to meet you in succession. How careful was I," continues Mr. Macgregor, "at the first shallow, getting out and wading as I lowered the boat. A month afterward, I would dash over them, with a shove here and a stroke there, in answer to a hoarse creak of the stones at the bottom grinding against my keel."

The voyage down the Meuse gives occasion for some pleasant Dutch pictures in pen and ink. Sometimes when a steamer passed, the voyager would draw alongside, get a penny roll and glass of beer, to the astonishment of the wondering passengers, who set the visitor down as a mad Englishman.

"The pleasure of meandering with a new river is very peculiar and fascinating. Each few yards brings a novelty or starts an excitement. A crane jumps up here, a duck flutters there, splash leaps a gleaming trout by your side, the rushing sound of rocks warns you round that corner, or anon you come suddenly upon a millrace. All these, in addition to the scenery and the people and the weather, and the determination that you must get on, over, through, or under every difficulty, and can not leave your boat in a desolate wold, and ought to arrive at a house before dark, and that your luncheon bag is long since empty; all these, I say, keep the mind awake, which would perchance dose away for 100 miles in a first-class carriage.

"The river soon got fast and lively, and hour after hour of vigorous work prepared one well for breakfast. Trees seemed to spring up in front and grow tall, but it was only because I came rapidly toward them. Pleasant villages floated, as it were, to meet me, gently moving. All life got to be a smooth and gliding thing, without fuss and without dust, or any thing sudden or loud, till at length the bustle and hammers of Liege neared the Rob Roy—for it was always the objects and not myself that seemed to move. Here I saw a fast steamer, the Seraing, propelled by water forced from its sides, and as my boat hopped and bobbed in the steamer's waves we entered a dock together, and I hoisted the canoe into a garden for the night."

At Liege—famous for its gun-barrels, where even the women stalk about with twenty stocked rifles, each weighing ten pounds, on their backs—Mr. Macgregor met the young Earl of Aberdeen, with a canoe very much like his own, only a foot longer and two inches narrower. The two canoemen joined company. Sometimes they sailed, sometimes paddled a mile or two, joined to help the boats over a weir, or, by way of change, walked a while on the bank, towing the canoes after them. At intervals were floating-baths, filled with merry bathers, and squads of soldiers marched down for their daily dip or target-shooting on shore. Once, on rounding a point, they came right into a great herd of cattle swimming in close column across the stream.

The two voyagers kept company for a while, passing Maestricht, once thought one of the most strongly-fortified places in Europe, whose straight walls would go down in a few hours before the heavy shot of modern artillery. Thence they struck eastward by railway toward the Rhine. The railway officials demurred at first to taking the two boats, but suddenly, at a word from a by-stander, hurried the canoes aboard. "Do you know," said this stranger, after they were fairly on the way, "why they yielded so suddenly?" "Not at all," replied the Englishmen. "It was because I told them that one of you was the son of the Prime Minister, and the other Lord Russell's son."

The canoes were launched upon the Rhine at Bingen, and after a day's pleasuring were put on the cars for the River Main. The Englishmen fell into converse with a German fellow-passenger, to whom they endeavored to give some idea of their pleasure trip. But the honest German, mistaking the word "canoes" for "cannons," was for a while under the impression that the foreigners were traveling for pleasure with a couple of pieces of artillery fifteen feet long, weighing only eighty pounds.

At Frankfort-on-the-Main the voyagers parted company, the Earl paddling down the Rhine, the Barrister taking his canoe up the river by steamer as far as steamers run; thence by wagon through the passes of the Black Forest, stopping for a day's sail upon Titisee—a lonely little lake, or, as we should call it, pond, 3000 feet above the sea—one of the score or two in which, according to popular belief, the troubled ghost of Pontius Pilate has its habitation until the Day of Judgment, then onward again through forests and defiles, by lonely mountain brooks, over the ridge to Donauschwingen, the source of the Danube. Mr. Macgregor notes the kindness and intelligence of the dwellers of the lonely mountain villages. At the hotels each guest utters his

IN THE HAY-FIELDS.

"Gut Tag," "Gut Morgen," or "Bon appetit," upon coming to or leaving the table. All the peasantry, too, can read, and do read. "There is more reading in one day in a common house in Germany than in a month in the same sort of place in France."

It happened to be a high-day at Donau-schwingen, for there was a great "singing meeting" for that part of Germany. The Rob Roy, a lion none the less welcome for being unexpected, was borne in procession through the streets, and safely deposited in the coach-house of the hotel.

Satisfying himself that among the rivulets which claim to be the source of the Danube that starting from a spring in the garden of the Prince of Furstemburg was the true one, our voyager, paying thirteen francs as his hotel bill for three days, launched his canoe upon the brook, and began the descent of the Danube, amidst the "hochs!" and farewells of the crowd.

The upper Danube is exceedingly picturesque. Having in a few miles swollen from a tiny brook to a considerable river, it winds slowly through level meads, with waving sedge on the banks, and silken, sleepy weeds in the river. There are long-necked, long-winged, long-legged herons, which seem to have forgotten to get a body, and flocks of wild ducks in the water, while the air is alive with gay butterflies and fierce-looking dragon-flies. The hay-makers are busy in the fields, half their work seemingly consisting in sharpening their miserable scythes. At length hills begin to skirt the stream; these are soon crowned with old castles; then come woods and rocks, and the current grows more rapid, the river descending fifteen hundred feet in the course of a five-days' sail. Every few hours is a mill-dam. If one is not more than four feet high our canoe-man was wont to shoot it; if higher, the canoe was dragged around and launched below. When he came to one of these places he used to walk straight into the hay-fields, dragging the boat over the wet, newly-mown grass, in literal imitation of the mythical American craft which would run wherever there was a heavy dew, greatly to the amusement of hay-makers.

Once Mr. Macgregor got belated, and night fell in with no signs of a habitation in sight, and he had made up his mind to sleep supperless in the canoe, though a storm was coming up. Just then he caught sight of a light high up on the bank ; scrambling through the thicket, oar in hand to keep off the large dogs which throng around these lonely habitations, he knocked loudly at the door. All was still, though just before he had heard the sound of several voices. At length a window far above was opened, and a fat night-capped head was thrust out, and after a parley the window was closed—soon to be opened and other heads thrust out. At length, convinced that the stranger was alone, he was admitted and hospitably entertained with the best that the house contained—kirschwasser, bread, and eggs, of which latter the hungry traveler made way with half a score. The priest was sent for to talk with him, but as the Englishman had well-nigh forgotten his Latin, and they had no other language, their talk was not very edifying.

At Teutlingen, a quaint old town “with a good inn and bad pavement,” where every house seems to be dyer’s shop or a tannery, the Rob Roy and her master was quite a lion.
The whole floating population followed in procession as the boat, mounted on a wheel-barrow, was borne to the inn, where it was hoisted into the hay-loft ; and until far into the night visitors came with lanterns to get a sight of the curious craft. In the morning all the populace flocked to the bridge to see the departure, one man politely requesting that it might be delayed a few minutes till his bedridden father could come up to get a sight.

Leaving the Danube at Ulm, famous in history, the Rob Roy was sent by rail to Friedrichshafen, on the Swiss Lake of Constance, upon which the canoe was soon launched, and a sail was taken around that romantic sheet of water, then down its outlet, the "arrowy Rhine," to Schaffhausen, the finest of European waterfalls; then by rail again to Lake Zurich, the centre of the region where gather the Swiss tourists, for whom arise the huge hotels which seem to be managed with the special view of demonstrating the problem of giving the least accommodation for the most money.

"If you wish to live well in Switzerland," says Mr. Macgregor, "go to German hotels, and avoid the grand barracks reared on every view-point for the English tourist. See how the omnibus from the train or steamer pours down its victims into the landlord's arms. The whole party, men, women, and children, are so demure, so afraid of themselves, that the hotel-keeper does just what he likes with them, every one. As a helpless bachelor, and without a courier or heavy baggage, I enter too, and venture to order a cutlet and potatoes. After half an hour two chops come and spinach, each just one bite, and cold. I ask for fruit, and some pears are presented that grate on the knife, with a minute bunch of grapes—good ones, I will acknowledge. For this I pay two shillings. Next day I row down the lake and order, just as before, a cutlet, potatoes, and fruit. Presently appear two luscious veal-cutlets, with splendid potatoes, and famous hot plates; and a fruit-basket teeming gracefully with large clusters of magnificent grapes, peaches, pears, all gushing with juice, mellow apples and rosy plums. For this I pay one shilling and sixpence. The secret is, that the Germans won't pay the prices which the English fear to grumble at, and won't put up with the articles the English fear to refuse."

At a village on the lake our canoeist seems to have had his only serious occasion for fault-finding during his whole voyage. His pet, the Rob Roy, was badly treated. He had confided her to the care of a man who seemed to be a stolid, honest fellow; but she had "been sadly tumbled about, filled with water, the seat cast off and floating outside, the covering deranged, the sails untied, and the sacred paddle defiled by clumsy hands. The man who suffered this to be perpetrated," says Mr. Macgregor, "will not, I hope, forget the Anglo-German-French set-down he received (with a half-franc); and I shall not in future forget the time-honored practice of carrying the canoe, invariably, into the hotel."

This practice of carrying the canoe to the hotel every evening gave rise to a multitude of pleasant scenes; the children, whether of larger or smaller growth, taking immense delight in following the vessel in its land passage, and, in case of need, aiding in its transport. Let the following serve as an example of many:

"Frequent intercourse with natives of strange countries, where there is no common language between them and the tourist, will gradually teach him a "sign language," which suits all people alike. Thus, in any place, no matter what was their dialect, it was always easy to induce one or two men to aid in carrying the canoe. The formula for this was something in the following style:

"I first got the boat on shore, and a crowd of course soon collected, while I arranged its interior, and spunged out the splashed water, and fastened the cover down. Then, tightening my belt for a walk, I looked round with a kind smile, and selecting a likely man, I would address him in English deliberately as follows—suited each action to the word, for I have always found that sign language is made more natural when you speak your own tongue all the time you are acting: 'Well, now, I think as you have looked on enough and have seen all you want, it's about time to go to a hotel, a

THE ROB ROY IN A CROWD.

Gasthaus. Here! you—yes, you!—just take that end of the boat up, so—gently, langsam! langsam!—all right, yes, under your arm, like this—now march off to the best hotel, Gasthaus.

“Then the procession naturally formed itself. The most humorous boys of course took precedence, because of services willing to be performed; and, meanwhile, they gratuitously danced about and under the canoe like the Fauns around Silenus. Women only came near and waited modestly till the throng had passed. The seniors of the place kept on the safer confines of the movement, where dignity of gait might comport with close observation.”

From Lake Zurich to

Lake Zug is some ten miles, over a high neck of forest land, over which the canoe was taken by cart, the driver whereof was vastly proud of his novel freight. After sailing around this pretty lake, studded with islands, the Rob Roy rumbled by cart over to the Lake of Lucerne, the Sea of the Four Cantons, famous in Swiss story, which Mr. Macgregor thinks “the prettiest lake in the world.” “Like other people,” he says, “and at other times, I had traversed this beautiful water of the Four Cantons; but those only who have seen it well by steamer and by walking, so as to know how it juts in and winds around an intricate geography, can imagine how much better you may follow and grasp its beauties by searching them out alone and in a canoe. For thus I could penetrate all the wooded nooks, and dwell upon each view-point, and visit the rocky islets, and wait long, longer—as long as I pleased—before some lofty berg, while the ground-swell gently undulated, and the passing cloud shaded the hill with gray, and the red flag of a steamer fluttered in a distant sunbeam, and the plash of a barge's oar broke on the boatman's song; every thing around changing just a little, and the stream of inward thought and admiration changing too as it flowed; but all the time, and when the eye came back to it again, there was the same grand mountain, still the same.”

The outlet of the Sea of the Four Cantons is the Reuss, which falls into the Aar, and this again into the Rhine. The Reuss is a rapid stream, and nobody could tell whether it was boatable, though there was a story of a man who had gone into it with a boat, was arrested by the police, and punished for thus periling his life. However, Mr. Macgregor resolved to try it. The voyage turned out rather perilous, and he had more than one occasion to shirk a waterfall. At length he came to a place where the river ran swiftly through a gorge with steep, rocky banks, the channel filled with rocks and rapids. He had been warned of this bad place, but had forgotten the admonition. The river here makes a series of sharp turns, almost like the figure 8, gliding over a sloping ledge of flat rocks lying athwart the stream only a few inches below the surface. Over this the Rob Roy swept, the keel and sides grinding and bumping on the stones, or slipping over the soft moss which clothed their sides. Right in front was the peculiar wave, always raised when a main stream converges as it rushes down a narrow neck. The trough of this wave was two feet below the level of the surface, the crest of the wave four feet above, so that there was six feet of wave through which the Rob Roy must plunge bodily; behind this main wave was another but smaller. What was behind that? If it was a rock, then the last hour of the Rob Roy, and most likely of her Captain, had come. The canoe plunged headlong into the shining mound of water. The canoeman shut his eyes, clenched his teeth, and clutched his paddle as he saw her sharp prow deeply buried, and before she could rise the mass of solid water struck him with a heavy blow full in the breast, closing round his neck, as if cold hands had gripped him, quite taking away his breath. An instant after there was another slap and clutch, but feebler, from the lesser wave, a whirl in the eddy below, and the gallant little Rob Roy slowly rose from under a load of water. The peril was seen, encountered, and overpast in a moment. Hardly a drop of water had got inside under the water-proof covering, and though the breast of the voyager and all his front was drenched, his back was hardly wet in driving through the waves.

From the Reuss the Rob Roy passed into the Aar, not without some adventures, such as being fixed on a waterfall, and from the Aar into the Rhine, once more, at Waldschut "Forest End." It was now late in September, and the Rob Roy had wet her keel in the waters of England, Holland, Belgium, France, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, Baden, Rhenish Prussia, the Palatinate, Switzerland, and the Grand Duchy of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, with a population of 52,000, and a sovereign bearing the sounding title of "His Royal Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen," of sufficiently pure blood, we believe, to entitle his family to furnish husbands or wives to the reigning families of Europe.

Down the Rhine once more, but still far above the point where the Rob Roy had sailed two months before; but whither the fame of the little canoe had preceded her, and where the good burgers made unavailing efforts to pronounce her name; some hailing her as the "Roab Ro," others as the Rub-ree: while a spectacled personage, most likely a University Professor, or a Doctor of Philosophy at least, called out, "Ah, ah! Valtarescott!" manifesting thereby his own acquaintance with the novels of the great Wizard of the North.

Down the rapid Rhine again, paddling vigorously, and shooting the rapids in all sorts of ways until Bale was reached. Here at the turning point, where the Rhine bends from west to north, and seeks the sea, there were routes innumerable which might be taken homeward.

The one finally chosen led across the range of the Vosges, over which the Rob Roy was borne by rail and cart to the head-waters of the Moselle, down which she was paddled for a while; thence again carted to the upper course of the Meurthe, which seemed lined with washing barges and fishermen, patiently waiting for a nibble, which they rarely got; then again by canal and railway to the Marne, down which the little canoe floated for 200 miles, with little of adventure, saving the annoying passages of a few barrages or "barriers." One of these consisted of three low steps reaching quite across the stream, each having a line of iron posts, with connecting chains, reaching from the top of one to the bottom of that below. The space between these posts was only an inch or two greater than the breadth of the Rob Roy, and to steer through was a delicate task. But a group of navvies had gathered to see what the Englishman would do. So he resolved to try the passage; but the boat got entangled in the chains, and the Captain got out quietly into the water, whistling as though all was just as it should be, lifted the canoe through, and got in dripping wet, and paddled off amidst the cheers of the crowd.

Again, hoping to cut off a long bend, he turned into a narrow canal. But soon the channel became so thoroughly filled with grass and weeds that it was just like a hay-field, with grass four feet high ready for mowing. Through this the canoe was pushed for miles under a hot sun. But at length the canal struck the river again, and the Rob Roy glided down Paris-ward until it entered the Seine.

"The gradual approach to Paris by gliding down the Seine," writes Mr. Macgregor, "was altogether a new sensation. By diligence, railway, or steamer, you have nothing like it—not certainly by walking into Paris along a dusty road. For now I was smoothly carried on a wide and winding river, with nothing to do but to look and listen, while the splendid panorama majestically unfolds. Villas thickened, gardens get smaller as houses are closer; trees get fewer as walls increase; barges line the banks; commerce and its movements, luxury and its adornments; spires and cupolas grow out of the dim horizon, and the hum of life gets deeper and busier, while the pretty little tinkling sound of the river waters yields to the roar of traffic, and to that indescribable thrill which throbs in the air around this capital of the Continent, the centre of the politics, the focus of the pleasure and splendor of the world."

Here ended the voyage of the Rob Roy. Homeward she went by rail to Calais, by steamer thence to Dover, and then by rail again to London.

Our country furnishes a field for canoe voyages which would exceed in pleasure and interest that of the Rob Roy. Forty-eight hours from New York, by steamer or rail, would land the canoe at the very head-waters of either the Connecticut, the Hudson, the Delaware, or the Susquehanna. For a bolder journey, why not go down the Saint Lawrence, from Lake Ontario, sailing or paddling among the Thousand Isles, shooting the Rapids, passing Montreal and Quebec, and going up the lake-like Saguenay?

THACKERAY, upon his return to England from this country, was honored by a breakfast, given him by Dickens and others of the literati of London. The conversation turned upon America and the mother-wit of the common people. Thackeray was asked what was the wittiest thing he had heard during his tour. He replied :

“I was once steaming up one of the majestic Western rivers, fifteen hundred miles from the Atlantic coast, when I met a Western man who had just returned from the tour of Europe. I asked him how he liked England. He replied, hesitatingly, ‘Why, I liked England very well —very well indeed, in the daytime.' 'In the daytime,' I rejoined, 'why what was the difficulty in the night?' He answered very solemnly, 'I was always afraid to go out after dark lest I should stop off!'"

The magnitude of this country exceeds all ordinary comprehension. Arkansas, which derives its name from an extinct tribe of Indians, and which is one of the new and but little-known States of the Mississippi Valley, embraces an area of 52,376 square miles. It is considerably larger than Ireland, and about equal to the whole of England. The Arkansas River, which sweeps through its centre, takes its rise among the Rocky Mountains, and flows unobstructed two thousand miles before it empties its flood into the Mississippi, of which it is a tributary. The Mississippi, in its tumuous course, washes the eastern border of the State for a distance of nearly four hundred miles. The Arkansas River rolls its majestic flood through the heart of the State in a winding course of nearly fifteen hundred miles. In the year 1800 France was in possession of the whole of the vast region north and west of the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, and as far north as the British territory, excepting only the portions then occupied by Spain.

Jefferson and other far-seeing statesmen of that day were keenly alive to the importance that the mouth of the Mississippi, and the immense valleys watered by its western tributaries, should be under the exclusive control of the United States. After much diplomacy the country was purchased by the United States Government for fifteen millions of dollars. The whole country, which was then almost an unexplored wilderness, roamed over by painted savages, was called Louisiana. It has been cut up into the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, the greater part of Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, the Indian Territories, etc. Such a transfer of real estate was probably never before made since the creation of the world. Its possession by the United States was deemed a matter of vital importance to our national peace and prosperity. Napoleon said, when he had signed the articles of cession: "This accession of territory strengthens forever the power of the United States. I have now given to England a rival who will sooner or later humble her pride." Arkansas was received as a State into the Union in 1836.

At the commencement of the rebellion the population of Arkansas consisted of about 374,323 whites and 111,104 slaves. At the Presidential election of 1860, which called out nearly every available voter, the State cast 96,969 votes. This handful of men assumed that the State belonged exclusively to them, and that they had a right to withdraw the territory from the National Government, and transfer it to England, France, Spain, Mexico, or the Confederate rebels, as they pleased.

There was a strong Union party in Arkansas, composed of the peaceable and respectable classes of the people; but they were soon overborne by the madness of those reckless men who were determined at every hazard to break up the Government. On the 16th of January, 1862, the Legislature voted to submit the question to the people, whether they would call a Convention to act upon the subject of secession. The election was held on the 18th of February. The vote stood 27,412 for the Convention, 15,816 against it. At the election of delegates for this Convention the Union vote was 23,626, the secession vote 17,927, being a majority of 5699 against secession.

As one of the measures adopted to "fire the Southern heart," on the 8th of February a mob of rebels under military organization, but acting without either State or National authority, ascending the river in two steamboats from Helena, demanded of Colonel Totten, the United States officer in command, the surrender of the National arsenal at Little Rock. These desperate men, four hundred in number, seem to have overawed the Governor. Without the shadow of an excuse for the treasonable act—for the State had not then, even pretended to secede—he demanded, backed by the bludgeons and the bowie-knives of this mob, the surrender of the arsenal. Colonel Totten had no force to resist the demand. Thus the arsenal, with 2000 stand of arms, 40 cannon, and a large amount of ammunition, passed into the hands of the rebels. Colonel Totten did every thing which his country could have asked of him under the trying circumstances in which he was placed.

After long debate the Convention, not being able to agree, adjourned on the 20th of March, referring the question of secession back again to the people. On the 12th of April South Carolina rebels opened fire upon Sumter. This brought matters to a crisis. Every man was compelled to take sides, for the nation or against it. The rebels in Arkansas were elated with joy. In reply to the demand from the National Government for a quota of troops to aid in putting down the rebellion Governor Reclar replied:

"In answer to your requisition for troops from Arkansas to subjugate the Southern States, I have to say that none will be furnished. The demand is only adding insult to injury. The people of this Commonwealth are freemen, not slaves, and will defend, to the last extremity, their homes, lives, and property against Northern hostility and usurpation."

Twelve days after the fall of Sumter, on the 23d of April, the Arkansas rebels seized a fine machine hospital which the United States Government had built at Napoleon, near the mouth of Arkansas River. The Government had in store there one hundred and thirty boxes, containing one hundred and forty thousand ball cartridges, one hundred Mynard rifles, two hundred cavalry saddles, and five hundred sabres. These were destined for the National troops, two thousand in number, who were stationed along a line a thousand miles in extent to guard the frontiers of Arkansas and Texas from incursions of the Indians. These military stores were seized by General Jones under instructions from Governor Rector.

Two days after this, on the 24th of April, Governor Rector sent Colonel Borland to capture Fort Smith, at the city of the same name, upon the Arkansas River, on the extreme western border of the State. The insurrectionists reached the fort in a steamer at 12 o'clock on the night of the 24th. Captain Sturgess, who was in command, apprised of their approach, left with his little garrison of two cavalry companies an hour before their arrival, taking with him the horses and all the stores he could remove, falling back upon Fort Wachita, in the Indian Territory. Fort Smith was one of the finest on the frontier. The rebels having seized it, with National property estimated at the value of three hundred thousand dollars, raised the Confederate flag with cheers for Jeff Davis.

The Convention was now hurriedly reassembled, and without waiting for the action of the people, on the 6th of May an ordinance of secession was passed, with but one dissenting vote. Commissioners were immediately dispatched to the rebel Congress in Montgomery, and on the 18th the State of Arkansas was declared no longer to belong to the United States, but to the Confederacy of Southern rebels. The passage of the ordinance of secession in the Convention was a solemn scene; and yet but few of those infatuated men were aware of the woes they were bringing down upon their land. It was three o'clock in the afternoon. The hall was crowded almost to suffocation. Profound silence prevailed as vote after vote was given, broken only by cheers when some well-known Union man gave in his adhesion to the cause of treason. When the result was announced a cheer arose which shook the building to its foundations. Thus the great crime was perpetrated which plunged thousands of the families of Arkansas into life-long woe.

West of Arkansas extends the Indian Territory, spreading over almost countless leagues and occupied by remnants of many Indian tribes. Their country embraces 82,073 square miles, being about equal to the whole island of Great Britain. The region had been divided out to the Cherokees, Osages, Quapaws, Senecas, Shawnees, Creeks, Seminoles, Reserve Indians, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. Their aggregate population amounted to 71,500. Some of these, through the labors of missionaries, were partially civilized; others were in a very savage state.

The Secession Convention had authorized the calling out of sixty thousand men to prosecute the war against the United States, and efforts were immediately adopted to bring the tomahawk and the scalping-knife of these fierce warriors to their aid. As early as the 29th of January, 1861, more than three months before the act of secession was passed, Governor Rector wrote to John Ross, the veteran, well-educated Chief of the Cherokees, urging him, by every consideration he could present, to marshal his warriors under the rebel flag. The Indian Chief wrote a very dignified reply, declining to enter the war path against his brethren of the United States, from whom he declared that he had received only kind treatment. But the rebels were determined to drag the poor savages into the conflict.

On the 15th of May Colonel Kannady, the rebel commissioner at Fort Smith, which was just on the borders of the Indian country, and which, as we have shown, the rebels had wrested from its feeble garrison, wrote again to John Ross, wishing to know explicitly "whether it is your intention to adhere to the United States Government during the pending conflict, or if you mean to support the Government of the Southern Confederacy." The reply of John Ross was noble. After stating that their relations were perfectly amicable with the United States, and that they had no grievances of which to complain, he adds:

"The Cherokees have properly taken no part in the present deplorable state of affairs. They have done nothing to disturb the cordial friendship between them and their white brothers. Weak, defenseless, and scattered over a large section of country, in the peaceful pursuits of agricultural life, without hostility to any, and with friendly feelings toward all, they hope to be allowed to remain so, under the solemn conviction that they should not be called upon to participate in the threatened fratricidal war between the United States and the Confederate States, and that persons gallantly tenacious of their own rights will respect those of others. Under existing circumstances my wish, advice, and hope are, that we shall be allowed to remain strictly neutral. Our interests all centre in peace."

But the rebels were inexorable. As by the rigors of a conscription more merciless than the world had ever before known, they drove every man within their borders, capable of bearing arms, into their ranks, so they compelled the poor Indians to take sides. When these half-civilized men found that they must fight, many of them rallied beneath the banners of the United States.

On the 29th of January, 1862, General Earl Van Dorn took command of the rebel forces in the trans-Mississippi district, having his headquarters at Little Rock, the capital of Arkansas. He was preparing to invade Missouri, to co-operate with rebels there in compelling the State to secede from the Union and to unite with the Confederacy. To frustrate this purpose, General Halleck, in command of this Department, sent a considerable force, under General Curtis, down into the southwest corner of Missouri, where the rebels had already commenced their march of invasion. The two hostile bodies met near Springfield. The rebels were repulsed, and the patriots unfurled their triumphant banners over the court-house in the city.

The Confederate General Price retreated toward Arkansas. General Curtis hotly pursued him. There were sundry skirmishes between the rear-guard of the fugitives and the advance of the pursuers, until, after a chase of seventy miles, it was telegraphed to Washington, by General Halleck, on the 18th of February:

"The flag of the Union is floating in Arkansas. General Curtis has driven Price from Missouri, and is several miles across the Arkansas line, cutting up Price's rear, and hourly capturing prisoners and stores."

The rebels made a brief stand at Sugar Creek, but were speedily routed and driven headlong toward Fayetteville. Again they offered resistance at Cross Hollows and at Fayetteville, and again from each place they were driven wildly, with loss of prisoners and of stores. At Mudtown, one of the encampments of the foe, the rebels, as they retreated, poisoned the wells and the provisions which they left behind. It was reported to General Halleck that forty-two officers and men were thus poisoned. Notwithstanding the exasperation of our soldiers in view of such barbarity, they did not wreak any vengeance upon the rebel prisoners in our hands.

General Curtis was now in quite a wilderness country, many a weary league from the base of his supplies at St. Louis on the Missouri. He had with him an army of about 10,500 cavalry and infantry, with 49 pieces of cannon. Anticipating that the rebels would concentrate all their possible force to attack him, he selected a strong position about fourteen miles east of Bentonville to make a stand against whatever odds might march against him. The four divisions of his army were stationed at points to guard all approaches, but from which they could be easily rallied and united in case of an attack.

The 5th of March was bitterly cold and blustering, and the ground was white with snow. As General Curtis was engaged in writing, scouts came hurrying in with the information that the rebels were approaching in force, evidently prepared to give battle. Van Dorn had concentrated an army of between 25,000 and 30,000 men, composed of troops from Missouri, led by Price, bands from Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, under McCulloch, and a mass of Indians, whom they had compelled to join their ranks, from the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Choctaw tribes, goaded on by Albert Pike. These troops were gathered in the Boston Mountains, a high range in the extreme north-western part of the State.

Generals Sigel and Asboth were southwest of Bentonville. The first dash of the foe was toward their little band. Sigel immediately retreated upon Bentonville, and then, while pressed by an overpowering force—often surrounding him, in one of the most brilliant exploits of this or any other war, slowly retired, beating back the assaults of the foe on both flanks and his rear for five-and-a-half hours, until safely, and with all his baggage train preserved, he reached the reinforcements which Curtis sent to his aid. Truly does Sigel say, in his address to his soldiers:

"On the retreat from Bentonville to Sugar Creek, a distance of ten miles, you cut your way through an enemy at least five times stronger than yourselves. The activity, self-possession, and courage of the little band of 600 will ever be memorable in the history of this war."

Curtis rapidly concentrated the patriot army upon a commanding swell of land called Pea Ridge, on the banks of Sugar Creek. Van Dorn, exulting in his immense superiority in numbers, marched from Fayetteville to Bentonville, leaving Pea Ridge some miles distant upon his right. Near Bentonville he took a detour to the westward with the main body of his army, and while he made the feint of an attack upon Curtis upon the south, he pressed rapidly northward and gained, about eight miles from Curtis, and in his rear, the only road by which he could retreat to Springfield. He now felt sure of his victims. Less than ten thousand patriots, in a strange country, with their lines of communication and their retreat cut off, were completely surrounded by thirty thousand as desperate men as ever plunged into the horrors of battle.

Curtis, fully aware of the arduous conflict which was before him, prepared to meet the foe, now rushing upon him from all sides, by adopting all the precautions which military skill and bravery could suggest. Parties were detailed to fell timber to obstruct the approaches; earth-works were thrown up and positions selected for the batteries. All the men worked with a will, and as by magic the spacious encampment became strongly fortified. By the middle of the afternoon of the 6th the four divisions were assembled on the selected field to await the crisis of a battle whose result was very uncertain, and the issues of which would inevitably prove most momentous. The line of the army extended three or four miles fronting Sugar Creek on the south, with the broken plateau, called Pea Ridge, extending northward in the rear. It had been supposed that the enemy would attack from the south, as it was not then known that the great mass of the rebel army had swept around to cut off our retreat and to attack us from the north.

As soon as this movement of the enemy was ascertained on the 6th a change of front became necessary. While effecting this change intelligence was brought that the rebels were advancing in force, having already commenced their attack directly in our rear. It was then about half past ten o'clock in the morning. It was clear and cold, and not a breath of air swept the ground, which was slightly whitened with snow. The battle commenced on the right of our column, and raged all day most furiously through ravines and over ridges and into forests, with charges and counter-charges, repulses, and victories in a blending of terror, confusion, uproar, wounds, and death which it is in vain for any pen to describe. The Third and Fourth Divisions, severally under the command of Colonels Carr and Davis, bore the brunt of this battle.

The loss on both sides was severe. Van

Dorn had massed an immense superiority of numbers at this point, and threading deep gullies and penetrating thick underbrush, succeeded in driving back our right wing nearly a mile. Night closed the conflict. General Curtis thus sums up the result :

"The enemy ceased firing, and I hurried men after the caissons and more ammunition. Meantime I arranged the infantry in the edge of the timber, with fields in front, where they lay on their arms and held the position for the night. I directed a detail from each company to bring water and provisions. Thus, without a murmur these weary soldiers lay, and many of them slept within a few yards of the foe, with their dead and wounded comrades scattered around them. Darkness, silence, and fatigue soon secured for the weary broken slumbers and gloomy repose. The day had closed on some reverses on the right, but the left had been unassailed, and the centre had driven the foe from the field."

General Asboth with his artillery rendered signal service, as did Colonel Osterhaus in a very gallant charge. Before the battle commenced the purity of the atmosphere was such that every object on the hills and slopes was visible. But the smoke of the conflict soon settled so thick and heavy that the whole scene was enveloped in sulphurous gloom, and the position of the batteries could only be discerned by the lurid flash at the moment of discharge. The dense masses of infantry were entirely obscured by the ever-thickening cloud. During the night the lines of the hostile parties were not more than six hundred feet apart. It was bitter cold, but no fires could be safely lighted lest the batteries of the enemy should open upon them ; and the air was so still that it was necessary to carry on conversation in whispers. The braying of the mules through the long hours of the night was painful to hear. Many of them had been without water for forty-eight hours, and without food for twenty-four.

The patriot commanders passed a sleepless night. Though Curtis kept up good courage and was sanguine of ultimate success, the superiority of the foe in numbers was so great that most of the officers, though prepared for a desperate fight, silently and anxiously awaited the dawn. The long-looked-for light at length appeared in the east; and the sun, like a fiery ball, shone portentously through the murky clouds. The enemy held the only road by which we could retreat. The woods and hills swarmed with their troops. They outnumbered the patriots three to one, and a thousand of our men had already fallen dead or wounded.

Soon after the dawn there was some skirmish firing, and at eight o'clock, as the cannoniers stood to their guns along the entire line, the fire was opened. Sigel arranged his batteries in a way which elicited the highest admiration from the most scientific observers. He soon had thirty pieces of artillery opening upon the enemy a fire which no human courage could endure. Canister and grape tore through the crowded ranks of the foe with awful destruction. An officer in the regular army, who was a witness of this scene, writes:

"For two hours and ten minutes did Sigel's iron hail fall thick as autumn leaves, furious as the avalanche, deadly as the simoom. One by one the rebel pieces ceased to play. Onward crept our infantry. Onward crept Sigel and his terrible guns. Shorter and shorter became the range. No charge of theirs could face that iron hail, or dare to venture on that compact line of bayonets. Again Sigel advanced his line, making another partial change of front. Then came the order to charge the enemy in the woods; and those brave boys, who had lain for hours with the hail and shot of the enemy falling upon them and the cannon of Sigel playing over them, rose up and dressed their ranks as if it were but an evening parade. And as the 'Forward' was given the Twenty-fifth Illinois moved in compact line, supported on the left with the Twelfth Missouri acting as skirmishers, and on the right by the Twenty-second Indiana. As they passed into the dense brush they were met by a terrible volley. This was answered by one as terrible and far more deadly. Volley followed volley; yet on and on went that line of determined men. Steadily they pushed the rebel force until they gained more open ground. Here the Confederate forces broke in confusion and fled. The day was ours. And the battle of Pea Ridge was added to the already long list of triumphs clustering around the old starry flag."

The rebels retreated precipitately through the gullies and ravines, pelted by round shot and shell from such batteries as could be brought to bear upon their rapidly-vanishing lines. Sigel pursued them some miles toward Keitsville, firing on them as they ran away. McCulloch, a rebel of reckless daring and much military skill, fell in this engagement. His loss was greatly deplored by his comrades.

The Indians, goaded on by Albert Pike, were roused, like wolves having once lapped blood, to demoniac ferocity. They gratified their savage propensities by scalping the wounded; and it is said that it made no difference to them whether the scalp was peeled from the brow of friend or foe. All would alike count as trophies of their prowess around their camp-fires. The rebels complained that they rendered but little efficient service; that they were bewildered by the deafening roar of battle. They had been accustomed to the rifle. They had heard the war-whoop. But when they saw 12-pounders running around on wheels, causing the forest to tremble with their thunderings, while shells shrieked through the air, prostrated large trees, and exploded with carnage which swept away whole platoons, their amazement passed all bounds. No power could hold them to the discipline essential in modern warfare.

The Texan Rangers were more fierce and savage even than the Indians. Probably a more desperate set of men never existed. The Richmond Whig speaks, with much complacency, of the Texans, "with their large, heavy knives, driving skulls in twain, mingling blood and brains and hair." This spectacle, the Whig amiably declares, "was not devoid of satisfaction."

The patriot loss in killed, wounded, and missing, as given by General Curtis, was 1351. The rebel loss has not been ascertained; but it must have been far more severe, from their crowded masses and the terrible accuracy and destructiveness of our fire. The rebels retired south of the Boston Mountains, to repair damages and to recruit their forces. General Curtis established himself at Keitsville, and received reinforcements from Kansas and Missouri. Then ensued for many weeks a series of marchings and countermarchings to baffle the designs of the rebels. The story of these arduous campaignings through darkness and storms, traversing with weary footsteps wide and miry prairies, and fording swollen streams, can probably never be told.*

These movements, though all-important, though accomplishing great results, though accompanied with the heroic endurance of fatigue, exhaustion, and death, were uneventful in those incidents which give so dreadful an interest to the carnage of the field of battle. By the middle of April General Curtis was marching through the State with the strides of a conqueror. In that sunny clime the chilling winds of winter had passed away, and every where verdure and summer's bloom cheered the eye. Foraging and scouting parties were moving in all directions, sweeping vehemently before them every form of opposition. Curtis now set out for Little Rock, the capital of the State, on the Arkansas River. Leaving the Boston Mountains on his right he marched by the way of Salem and Batesville. At Bates-

* For this narrative of the great victory at Pea Ridge I am indebted to the official reports of Generals Curtis and Sigel, and of the subordinate officers, Colonels Jeff. C. Davis, Pattison, Washburn, White, and others; also to an admirable description given by an officer in the regular army, and a very minute detail from the correspondent of the New York Herald. I have also examined the rebel narrative given in the Richmond Whig.

ville he expected to meet a gun-boat expedition, which was fitted out at Memphis under Colonel Fitch, to descend the Missouri, and steam up the White River with supplies and reinforcements. But this expedition, consisting of three gun-boats and a transport, having on board the Forty-sixth Indiana Regiment, met with disaster, and failed to accomplish its object.

The boats successfully entered the White River, and had ascended the stream some fifteen miles, to a point near Saint Charles, when they encountered a concealed battery. Though the troops landed and captured the battery, it was not until a shot had pierced the steam-drum of the Mound City, filling the boat with scalding vapor, which drove the men into the river. Nearly every one was scalded. Out of a crew numbering 175 but 23 escaped uninjured. After the explosion took place the rebels fired upon the scalded men who were struggling helplessly and drowning in the stream.

The loss of the Mound City, and the necessity of sending two other steamers back to Memphis to convey the wounded there arrested the immediate progress of the expedition, though it subsequently reached its place of destination. The scene of suffering witnessed as these scalded men were collected is too painful to record. Awful has been the price of misery and of death through which our country has been redeemed from the assaults of rebellion. Thirty-seven of these unhappy men died on their passage to Memphis. This disaster and victory—for the batteries were taken, and White River thrown open—occurred on Tuesday, June 17, 1862. Among the many incidents of the disaster may be mentioned that a sailor by the name of Jones leaped, badly scalded, through one of the port-holes into the river. As he was swimming around to get to some one of the boats he received three gun-shot wounds—one in the leg, one in the shoulder, and one in the back. Still he kept afloat, and not being able to reach any of the small boats was swept down the rapid stream nearly half a mile, where he was taken on board the Lexington, and is probably still living.

The situation of Curtis was now very alarming. He was nearly destitute of provisions, far distant from his sources of supply, and surrounded by envenomed foes. To add to the embarrassments of this heroic leader it became necessary just at this time to concentrate all our forces for the siege of Corinth. Curtis received dispatches calling for ten regiments to be sent immediately, by forced marches, to Cape Girardeau. Without a murmur, though it must have been with deep pangs of regret, he yielded to a necessity which frustrated all his plans. But for this in a few days the flag of the Union would have floated over Little Rock, and Arkansas would have stood forth redeemed.

Curtis thus found himself with a very feeble band, altogether too weak to prosecute a vigorous war against twenty thousand rebels dispersed through the State, and in great danger of being surrounded, cut off from his base of supplies at Springfield, and starved into surrender. He therefore decided to move his army across the State to Helena, on the Mississippi. That river, then traversed above Vicksburg by our gun-boats, could be his line of communication with the North.

But such a march as this, through an almost pathless wilderness, where there were scarcely any opportunities for forage, and all necessary supplies were to be transported with the army; where forests were to be penetrated, vast plains traversed in the blaze of a July sun, and rivers forded or bridged; while guerrillas were hovering on his flanks, and a vigilant and daring foe, familiar with the country, was throwing every possible impediment in his way, and often gathering in strength to give him fierce battle, involved difficulties which required the highest qualities of genius and heroism to surmount. Even before the army commenced its march it was exposed at times to severe deprivation for want of food.

The distance to be traversed was nearly two hundred miles, and the march occupied about eighteen days. On the 24th of June Curtis abandoned his communications with Springfield, Missouri, which had been for some time his base of supplies, called in his guards, and commenced his adventurous march. At Jacksonport, twenty-five miles from Batesville, where the Big Black River enters into the White, a delay of five days occurred to make still more efficient preparations. He then again put his columns in motion, to push forward with the utmost possible rapidity.

There was a band of about twelve hundred rebels in front of him, to destroy the bridges, barricade the roads with trees felled by the forced labor of the negroes, to fire upon his trains from the cane-brakes as they could get opportunity, and to place every possible obstacle in the way of his advance. There were frequent skirmishes as our troops fought their way along, until, on the 7th of July, they encountered a force of six Texan regiments upon the banks of the Cache River, who were prepared to dispute our advance behind a blockade of fallen timber. But few have heard of the battle of Bayou Cache; and yet there was exhibited there military discipline and bravery which could not have been surpassed on the world-renowned arenas of Austerlitz and Waterloo.

Colonel Hovey, of the Thirty-third Illinois regiment, was ordered to open the road. Parts of four companies of the Eleventh Wisconsin, under Colonel Harris, were in the advance. Cautiously they moved forward with one small rifle piece, belonging to the First Indiana cavalry, under Captain Potter. As this little band reached a turn in the road they came suddenly upon two Texan regiments of cavalry, with a regiment of infantry. Their first greeting was a volley of bullets, which killed five of our men and wounded both Colonel Harris and Captain Potter. The fire was promptly returned from both musketry and the rifle-gun. But now, with loud yells, the rebels came rushing on in an impejuous charge. Our men fell back, but still pouring volley after volley into the ranks of the foe.

Hovey, who was at some distance in the rear, hearing the firing, and seeing the clouds of dust which rose above the trees and filled the air, pressed forward with the Thirty-third Illinois, and very sagaciously placed his men in ambush by the side of the road. Our overpowered troops, still firing as they retreated, were pursued by the rebels, who uttered loud yells as they rushed furiously forward. Suddenly there was poured in upon them a crash of musketry from the patriots in ambush which tumbled twenty-five of the foe from their saddles, and caused the whole column to reel and stagger; and as volley followed volley from their concealed assailants the rebels broke and fled, utterly panic-stricken.

It was now about half past ten o'clock in the morning. Just then Colonel Wood, who had been sent fifteen miles from the camp to save a bridge from being destroyed at Bayou de Vieu, and which enterprise he gloriously accomplished, came up at full speed with the First Indiana. They were greeted with cheers, which added to the dismay of the disordered foe. Colonel Hovey rode up to Wood, exclaiming, "You will find the rebels down there, Colonel, thick enough. Pitch into them!" No second word was needed. With cheers the cavalry plunged forward, the horses leaping a ditch four feet wide, from which the rebels had broken up the bridge. In the perilous leap some of the men were pitched headlong, and one horse had his leg broken. Rails were thrown into the ditch, and some steel rifled guns passed over. The cavalry was then brought into line of battle, the artillery in front drawn by hand. The enemy was soon discovered advancing again with extended wings. At the distance of but two hundred yards we opened upon them with a terrible fire of canister. As round after round tore their ranks again the rebels fled. Onward rushed the pursuers. In the enthusiasm of the moment the officers seized the drag ropes, and thus aided in the impetuous chase. Several times the resolute rebels endeavored to make a stand, but such volleys as were poured upon them no courage could endure. Thus they were driven, strewing the ground with their dead for a distance of three miles. The enemy lost in killed over a hundred in this running fight, while our loss was but five killed and forty-seven wounded.

Continuing his march through Augusta and Clarendon, the advance, under General Washburn, reached Helena, on the Mississippi, at nine o'clock in the morning of the 12th of July. The last day and night the troops accomplished a forced march of sixty-five miles. During the whole war there were but few adventures more heroic than this movement of the army of Curtis through the wilds of Arkansas.

The battle of Pea Ridge really decided the fate both of Arkansas and Missouri. The rebels made a few attempts to recover their lost ground, some of them quite desperate, but in all they were utterly baffled. We had a small army of observation on the northwestern frontier of Arkansas, chiefly composed of Kansas troops under General James G. Blunt, and Mississippi and Iowa troops under General F. J. Herron. The rebel forces were stationed at several posts throughout Arkansas, under Generals Hindman, Roan, Rains, and Marmaduke.

On the 14th of July, just after Curtis had safely arrived at Helena, the rebels were concentrating their forces at Fayetteville for a raid into Missouri. Major Miller pounced upon them with a patriot force of about six hundred men, and after a severe conflict utterly routed and dispersed the Confederate band, which numbered about sixteen hundred.

Again, after some weeks of recruiting, the rebels concentrated their forces at Old Fort Wayne, near Maysville. Seven thousand had been gathered there. At a short distance, at a place called Cross Hollows, there were four thousand more, chiefly Texans, under Marmaduke. Blunt, with a small but well-tried Union force, was at Pea Ridge. Maysville is about twenty-three miles west from Bentonville, and directly on the boundary line between Arkansas and the Indian Territory. Fort Wayne, which is the site of an old United States military garrison, long since abandoned, is about four miles south of Maysville, on the southern edge of a very beautiful prairie.

At seven o'clock in the evening of the 20th of October Blunt, with the Second and Third brigades of his command, consisting mostly of Kansas and Indiana troops, with two Cherokee regiments, left camp at Pea Ridge. Through all the dark hours of the night his troops pushed forward until they reached Bentonville, just before daylight in the morning. Here they halted until five o'clock in the evening for his train to come up. He was anxious to reach, if possible, the rebel encampment, so as to attack them by surprise, before the dawn of the morning. But there was yet before the troops a march of thirty miles, by night, through a strange land, rough, hilly, and densely wooded. The column started from Bentonville at five o'clock in the evening. When they had reached a point about three miles beyond Bentonville the supply train was directed to go into camp, and to follow on early in the morning, while the rest of the column pressed on as rapidly as possible.

About two o'clock in the morning the advance halted, that the long line, broken by darkness and the fatigues of the march, might close up. But the men were by this time so exhausted that, as soon as halted, they dropped by the roadside and were soon soundly asleep. After the delay of half an hour the column was again pushed forward. But by some mistake, in the darkness and the inevitable confusion of such a march, only the head of the column, consisting of about six hundred Kansas troops, was put in motion, while the rear still enjoyed their bivouac. These Kansas troops were under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bassett. General Blunt, with his body-guard, was ahead. They reached Maysville just before daylight. But by some means the tidings that the Yankees were coming had penetrated the streets, and all the male inhabitants had fled to the rebel camp.

It was now five o'clock. As Blunt was making his arrangements to sweep rapidly across the prairie and attack the entrenched foe he learned, to his surprise, and greatly to his chagrin, that the main body of his little army was seven miles in the rear, and that he had only six hundred men to march upon a force estimated at seven thousand. A courier was dispatched to order the column up as rapidly as possible; while Blunt, with true heroism, resolved to move directly upon the enemy with the small force then at his command, and commence the attack with the utmost fierceness. He hoped thus to hold the foe there until the main body should come up, and help him to a victory, and cut off the rebel retreat.

One of our ever firm friends, a negro, gave Blunt a minute description of all the rebel defenses, and having his freedom promised him served as a faithful guide. Dashing rapidly forward, these mounted troops swept over the prairie of which we have spoken, and drove the pickets into the edge of the forest, or timber, as it is there called. Cautiously entering the timber they advanced about a quarter of a mile, when they encountered the enemy, drawn up in line of battle at the edge of a pasture. Two howitzers were brought forward to within two hundred yards of the foe, and with great rapidity and precision a fire of shells was opened, which the rebels promptly returned, and instantly the entire line was engaged.

The rebels could not but observe our small force. They probably deemed it impossible that a little band of but six hundred men would have the audacity to attack them. They must have supposed that a larger force was somewhere concealed, or, with their accustomed daring, they would have rushed upon and overwhelmed the bold band which had thus bid them defiance. The Kansas troops were all ordered to dismount and advance on foot to within short range, where they opened upon the foe a terrific fire from their Harper's Ferry rifles.

Just then the Kansas Sixth, under Colonel Judson, and the Third Cherokee regiment, under Colonel Phillips, came upon the field. A charge was now ordered by troops who were without bayonets. Gallantly it was made. Five companies of the Second Kansas, under Captains Hopkins, Moore, Gardner, and Russell, all led by Captain S. J. Crawford, making up for the paucity of their numbers by the vehemence of their cheers, plunged directly into the centre of the hostile lines, drove the cannoniers from their guns, and dragged back the captured battery, consisting of four brass pieces, in triumph to their comrades. It was gloriously done. It was a deed of which Kansas may be proud, and the record of which should be transmitted to the children and the children's children of these brave men.

And now, when the victory over seven thousand men was virtually won by six hundred, the troops which, by mistake, had been left behind began gradually to arrive. The Sixth, under Colonel Judson, with foaming steeds, came galloping over the prairie. Rabb's renowned battery, urged forward by its youthful commander, came thundering along, the horses on the full trot. The Eleventh Kansas, a splendid new regiment, forgetting exhaustion in their eagerness to reach the spot where the tempest of battle was raging, came on at the double quick. Rabb's battery was, without a moment's delay, in position, hurling its missiles upon the foe.

But the enemy had now lost all courage, all hope, nearly all organization, and was flying in dismay. They were pursued for seven miles, leaving a trail of their dead behind. So utter was their discomfiture that they did not halt in their retreat until they reached Fort Gibson, on the Arkansas River, seventy miles from the scene of their rout at Old Fort Wayne. In this brilliant little campaign we lost but four killed and five wounded. The loss of the rebels is not known. Our own troops buried fifty of their dead. But for the accident by which a part of our force had been left behind the entire rebel force would have been captured or destroyed.

We have spoken of another body of the rebels, numbering four thousand, who were encamped at Cross Hollows, a place about twelve miles south from Fayetteville, or on the main road which leads to Ozark, on the Arkansas River. In the evening of the 27th of October General Totten started from Osage Spring, about seventeen miles west from Fayetteville, to capture or disperse this rebel band. He took with him about seven thousand men. A few hours later General Herron moved from his camp with about nine hundred men, mostly cavalry, by a detour, to get into the rear of the enemy, to cut off his retreat. It was a night of Egyptian darkness, and the air sharp with frost. The obscure road led through brushwood and forests, over hills and across torrents. Unexpectedly, just as the dawn was breaking, Herron came upon the foe before Totten had accomplished his march. Herron had apparently "caught a Tartar." He found himself, as the day was dawning, with an exhausted band of nine hundred men confronted by four thousand rebels on their own chosen ground. Taking a hasty survey of the position, he rushed upon the foe with as much enthusiasm as if victory were certain. The rebels were pushed across the river, driven back to their camp, where they made a stand for an hour and a half, when the patriot boys, with loud huzzas, made a charge with such abandon of courage that the foe broke and fled in quite a panic, leaving the camp in our possession. A large number of wooden barracks were found there, which the rebels had used for winter-quarters. These were burned to the ground, and the cooking utensils and most of the camp-equipage destroyed. Pushing on with their victory they drove the routed foe four miles into the Boston Mountains, capturing a portion of their train and taking a few prisoners. Fifteen dead bodies were picked up and buried, and the path along which the rebels retreated was sprinkled with blood. This feat was accomplished mainly by the First Iowa cavalry and by the Seventeenth Missouri. It is too difficult to account for the fact that in this brilliant affair we did not lose a man, and but five were wounded. One of these, however, subsequently died.

General Blunt, who was now commanding the First Division of the Army of the Frontier, encamped at Lindsay's Prairie, fifteen miles south of Maysville. On the 26th of November he learned that the rebel General Marmaduke, with eight thousand men, was at Cane Hill, about fifteen miles west of Fayetteville. Hindman, with another large force of rebels, was on the march, expecting to effect a junction with Marmaduke on the 28th, when, with a united force, they contemplated another raid into the rich fields of Missouri.

Blunt, with characteristic promptness, decided to attack Marmaduke before Hindman could arrive. With his whole available force, consisting of three brigades, four batteries, and six mounted howitzers, he commenced his march at daylight on the morning of the 27th, with three days' rations of hard bread and salt. There was a march of thirty-five miles before them, over an extremely rugged road, before they could reach the foe. At 7 o'clock that evening the resolute band, exhausted by the rapid march, bivouacked within ten miles of the hostile encampment.

At 5 o'clock the next morning the march was resumed. Leaving the main road the army took by-paths so as to come upon the foe from an unexpected quarter on the north. No resistance was encountered until our troops were within half a mile of the rebel camp. The enemy had, however, received tidings of our approach, had called in his pickets, and was prepared for battle. Our advance consisted of about two hundred Kansas cavalry, commanded by Colonel Cloud, with two mounted howitzers under Lieutenant Stover, and Rabb's Battery, with General Blunt, his staff and body-guard. The main body of the army was still some miles in the rear, struggling against the innumerable impediments of the way.

In passing down a gorge, between two abrupt hills, the advance encountered a small force set to watch the passage, which they drove headlong before them. Emerging from this gorge they found the enemy drawn up in line of battle upon some elevated ground on their right with their guns in battery. Rabb's pieces were soon in position, and for nearly an hour, while the remainder of the patriot army was hastening forward, the hills trembled under the fierce cannonading which ensued. The rebels, not knowing how weak our advance was, did not venture from under cover of their guns. The fire from Rabb's Battery proved so destructive, and the danger was so great from other pieces of artillery coming up and taking position to rake them, that the rebels abandoned their first line of defense, and retreating to another ridge, three-fourths of a mile in their rear, where their reserves had been posted, again made a stand.

But more of our artillery soon came up, and our admirably trained gunners opened a fire so rapid, and with such accuracy of aim and destructiveness of execution, that again the foe was compelled to seek safety in flight. Retreating through the village of Cane Hill, for the third time they made a stand on a very commanding ridge, running east and west on the south side of the town. Here they concentrated their whole force. They were pursued with as much eagerness as they had fled. Blunt had just completed his arrangements for an impetuous assault, of whose successful result he cherished no doubt, when to his deep disappointment he saw the foe on the full retreat toward the mountains in their rear. Tenney's Battery succeeded in rushing forward so as to throw a few shells into their ranks just as the fugitives were disappearing under cover of the forest.

Our men and horses were exhausted by the long march. But the rebels, both men and horses, were fresh, and thus they had the decided advantage in the race which ensued. The patriots, animated by the enthusiasm of victors, strained every nerve in the chase. The rebels were retreating through the Boston Mountains, on the main road toward Van Buren, on the Arkansas River. A participant in the battle thus graphically describes the scene:

"From one hill to another, through every deep ravine, up and down mountains and through the woods they fled, occasionally making a stand in some masked place, until charged and shelled out. Thus the battle continued, the retreat and the pursuit, from ten in the morning until dark. Almost every rod of ground was fought over for a distance of ten miles. Both armies were exhausted. Cavalry regiments dismounted and fought through the brush. Artillery horses dropped in their harness, and the men would seize the ropes and drag the guns forward. The closing scene was between sunset and dark. The enemy made a stand in a deep ravine. Our howitzers had not yet come up. Our men, impatient, made a charge, cavalrymen on foot, with sabres and pistols, infantry with bayonets, and Indians with rifles in the very thickest of the woods. The cheering of the white men, the shrill war-whoops of the Indians, the clashing of sabres, and the incessant roar of small-arms, converted this remote mountain gorge into a perfect Pandemonium. The enemy gave way and darkness prevented further pursuit. This ended the battle of Cane Hill."

The pursuit would probably have been still continued had not Marmaduke sent an officer galloping forward with a white flag, requesting the privilege of taking off their dead and wounded. Blunt states, in his official report, that though he was convinced that this was but a cowardly trick to enable them to make good their retreat and save their guns, still consideration for the fate of Colonel Jewett and others, who had fallen upon the ground the rebels then held, and fears lest they might be brutally murdered, induced him to respect their flag of truce.

Our loss was small. The enemy fired wildly in their hurried retreat, and most of their shot whizzed harmlessly through the air or buried themselves in the trees over the heads of our soldiers. But four were reported as killed, and thirty-six wounded. The enemy's loss is reported at seventy-five killed, but the numbers wounded can never be known, as they were borne away by their comrades. Blunt with his victorious command encamped at Cane Hill.

On the second of December, 1862, General Blunt received information that the united rebel forces in Western Arkansas, under the command of Hindman, were preparing to march upon him from their camp in the vicinity of Van Buren, which was distant but about twenty miles from Blunt's camp at Cane Hill, and that their approach might be expected any day. Blunt resolved, at all hazards, to hold his position. He accordingly sent dispatches for the Second and Third divisions of the Army of the Frontier to march to his aid as rapidly as possible. These troops were in the neighborhood of Springfield, Missouri, and had a march before them of one hundred and twenty-five miles. Herron took command of the two divisions, and with the promptitude which ever characterized this energetic commander, made his arrangements to set out immediately to join his imperiled comrades near Cane Hill. It was mid-winter, which in that climate is often cold, wet, and stormy. Under the most favorable circumstances it would require several days to effect the junction.

On the night of the 4th Blunt received the intelligence that the enemy were but fifteen miles off, and were approaching by the mountain road. He sent out a small but resolute force to occupy some commanding position where the foe should be held in check until the reinforcements should arrive. Early the next morning, with his entire command, he took positions outside of the town, which would control the approaches from the south. Here he made every arrangement to meet the foe which prudence and courage could suggest. Detachments were sent out several miles to the east and southeast to watch the various roads leading toward Fayetteville, lest the rebels should steal by and get possession of that city, which was twenty miles in his rear. On the night of the 6th sixteen hundred of General Herron's cavalry, consisting of the Second Wisconsin, First Iowa, Tenth Illinois, and Eighth Missouri, all under Colonel Wickersham, reached Cane Hill, and also brought the joyful intelligence that Herron himself, with the remainder of his command, was at Fayetteville.

About ten o'clock on the night of the 7th Blunt, while vigilantly waiting for the approach of the foe, received the alarming intelligence that a band of twenty-five thousand of the rebels had contrived, by some of the unknown paths of that wilderness region, to slip by him and were already in his rear. This was almost frightful news, for but eight miles northwest of Cane Hill, at a place called Rhea's Mills, there was a large supply train of four hundred wagons. The enemy, by a rapid movement, might perhaps seize this train, which would be a severe, almost an irreparable loss to the army. Or he might advance rapidly along the Fayetteville road, down which Herron was undoubtedly approaching in a southwesterly direction, and by an unexpected attack might so crush his command, or so cripple it, as to prevent him from furnishing any aid to General Blunt. This it subsequently appeared was Hindman's plan.

Blunt decided first to secure the safety of his train. The little hamlet called Rhea's Mills is at the eastern extremity of a beautiful rolling prairie, about eight miles long from east to west and two miles wide, called Prairie Grove. It was a highly-cultivated region for that country, interspersed with fertile farms and picturesque clumps of trees.

On Sunday morning at four o'clock Herron reached Fayetteville, having marched all night. Allowing his wearied soldiers but one hour's rest after their fatiguing march of one hundred and ten miles, he pushed rapidly forward, hoping to join Blunt by ten o'clock that day. When about six miles from Fayetteville he emerged from a mountain road upon the charming valley of Prairie Grove, then bathed in the light of the rising sun. A more beautiful morning never dawned upon this globe. Suddenly he saw a portion of his advance, consisting of the First Arkansas and Seventh Missouri cavalry falling back in great disorder. They had been attacked by a large body of rebel cavalry under Marmaduke. In fact, the two armies of Hindman and Herron had unexpectedly, like two locomotives at full speed, come butting against each other.

The retreating cavalry were speedily checked and re-formed, though Major J. M. Hubbard, their gallant leader, had unfortunately been taken prisoner. The exultant, on-rushing rebels, pressed forward in line of battle, but as our batteries opened upon them they were put to flight, and were vigorously pursued four miles back to Illinois Creek. Here the army of Hindman was found in all its strength, very formidably posted, and all ready and eager for battle. The rebel troops occupied a long ridge, with their batteries in positions which Herron described as "magnificent." For a mile in front of this array of twenty-five thousand men the ground was clear, and, over this cleared space, and in the face of all these batteries, Herron must advance to the relief of Blunt, or be driven back in ignominious defeat. Blunt was ten miles in the rear, and all unconscious of the storm of war just ready to burst upon his friends.

The situation of this little band of patriot troops seemed almost desperate. But Herron, with that promptitude of decision so essential to military success, decided that his only refuge from disaster was instantly and fiercely to open the battle with the hope that Blunt might hear its thunders and come to his aid.

As he was looking over the ground, feeling the enemy's position and searching for places to convey his artillery across the creek, the rebels directed the fire of all their guns upon the General and his staff, whom they saw exposed to view at the side of their pieces. It was a narrow escape for them all. For ten minutes shot and shell were rattling around them almost as thick as hailstones from the clouds. Several shot fell within a foot of

They promptly withdrew their pieces, and after getting two batteries in position to engage the attention of the enemy, they cut a road through the timber, got fourteen guns across the creek almost unperceived, and opened so vigorous a fire upon the foe as, under its protection, to pass all the infantry over the creek and to form a line of battle, even while the battle was fiercely raging. Our well-trained gunners threw their shot with rapidity and accuracy which elicited the admiration of every beholder.

Herron commenced pressing his batteries slowly forward toward the enemy's lines, following up close with the infantry. The rebels fought with their accustomed determination. Soon the whole left was engaged. Hindman now endeavored to concentrate his force at that point to crush our left wing. To frustrate this endeavor the Nineteenth Iowa and the Twentieth Wisconsin were ordered to charge a battery placed near a farm-house on the brow of the hill. They stormed the hill, captured the battery of four guns, and drove the rebels back more than half a mile. But rebel reinforcements came thundering on, and our men, overpowered, were unable to hold their ground. One hundred patriots left dead upon the field attested the desperation of the charge.

And now the rebels, chafing and infuriated, attempted, in their turn, to charge en masse the batteries of Foust, Backof, and Boeries. They came rushing on with their customary yells to within two hundred yards of the muzzles of our guns. But they were met with such a merciless fire from artillery and musketry that they broke and fled, having suffered slaughter which was truly awful. Again the enemy attempted to mass his troops upon our left. Again the order to charge was given. The Twenty-sixth Indiana and the Thirty-seventh Illinois were selected for this service, and Colonel Houston in person gallantly led them. The victorious advance of our troops was followed by a repulse, as in the first charge. The battery was captured by the patriots, and recaptured by the rebels.

It was now about three o'clock in the afternoon of the short winter's day. Still there were no tidings from Blunt. Soon the gloom of night would terminate the conflict. Herron's troops were exhausted and badly cut up. Nothing remained but to hold on until dark. At this critical moment the opening fire of a battery opposite General Herron's extreme right arrested attention, and the crisis was so imminent that General Herron, accompanied by Captain Clark, rode out to examine it. With joy which can not be described they found that the advance of General Blunt's army was pressing forward but a mile distant upon their right wing. A courier was at once dispatched to inform General Blunt of the position of the foe; and with renewed fury inspiring both sides, the battle was kept up until night spread its pall over the blood-stained field.

Let us now turn back to General Blunt. About one o'clock he had reached his wagon train, which had been spread out on a large open plain at Rhea's Mills. Immediately he sent forward the First Iowa, the Tenth Ohio, and the Eighth Missouri cavalry, with three howitzers, on the road to Fayetteville to ascertain the position of Herron. These troops had advanced about two miles when, as they reached the top of a swell of ground which commanded an extensive prospect, they heard the booming of cannon and saw clouds of smoke rising over a distant valley, which told too plainly that the foe had fallen headlong upon the approaching patriots.

A courier was dispatched at the top of his speed to announce the intelligence to Blunt, while the cavalry pressed forward to the assistance of their friends. Colonel Wickersham, who was in command of the detachment, soon came upon a large body of the rebels, who were endeavoring, by a secret movement, under cover of a heavy piece of timber, to flank Herron upon the right. The Colonel, though holding a far inferior force, brought forward his howitzers, and, with his cavalry in position, opened fire upon the rebels, determined to hold them in check till Blunt, with the infantry and artillery, should arrive.

Rapidly Blunt rushed his troops forward, placed his batteries in available positions, and the engagement became general along the entire line. The boom of 70 pieces of cannon awoke such echoes over those prairies as had never before been heard since creation's dawn. But alas! the scenes of battle were not strange upon those flowery savannas. Though the thunders of artillery had never been heard there before, yet from time immemorial savage hordes had swept over those plains in murderous conflict. The war-whoop of defiance, the battle-cry of onset, the shout of the victor, and the shriek of the dying, had often blended with the gentle zephyrs of morning and of evening, while blood from human veins had enriched the soil, which for uncounted centuries has bloomed with beauty and with fragrance.

Blunt, in his eagerness to get at the foe, and with every man's nerves strained to the utmost tension by the roar of the battle, had rushed forward, often leaving the main road, over fences, ditches, through fields of chaparral and thorn brush, until his troops came upon the enemy's line upon their left, just in season to thwart the attempt they were making to flank Herron with an overwhelming force. When Herron's heroic little band heard the first guns of their allies, as they came rushing to their aid, a cheer went up from the whole division which drowned for the moment the din of the battle. As cheer after cheer ran along their lines, the booming cannon of General Blunt gloriously responded, hurtling shot and shell into the now dismayed ranks of the foe. A captured rebel said that the first three shots from Rabb's battery struck down over 100 of their men. General Blunt, in his official report, writes:

"As darkness approached, the fire, which, from both artillery and musketry, had been terrific and uninterrupted for over three hours, gradually ceased along the whole line, and my command bivouacked upon their arms, ready to renew the conflict at early dawn. I could not tell, with any certainty, the extent of damage done the enemy. But knowing that they had a force greatly superior to mine in numbers, I felt assured that they would give us battle again in the morning, and made arrangements accordingly."

The patriot troops slept upon their arms. Ammunition was brought up, refreshments distributed, and every thing was got in readiness to renew the battle at the dawn of day. But under the cover of the night the rebels fled. They wrapped blankets around the wheels of their artillery and escaped over the Boston Mountains. As the sun rose over the prairie no foe was to be seen, and the men of our victorious army grasped each other's hands, blending their voices in such a cheer of victory as is not often heard. The fight had been desperate and bloody, but the victory was signal. One thousand patriots lay dead or wounded upon the field. By their side lay 2500 of the rebels.

The victory of Prairie Grove deserves to be ranked among the most important battles of the war. The enemy encountered outnumbered us three to one. They were in their own country, and were familiar with every stream and road and mountain pass. Their passions and prejudices had been roused to the utmost intensity by their very able and sagacious leader. They fought with all that reckless daring which ever characterized them on every battle-field. The stake was all-important. The victory of the rebels would have, perhaps, annihilated this our army of the frontier. Western Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, and the Indian country would have been theirs without dispute. But this battle, so gallantly won, virtually ended the war north of the Arkansas River.*

On the 8th of December Captain Milton Birch, with a detachment of but 40 men from the Fourteenth regiment cavalry of the Missouri State militia, started on a raid from Ozark in Missouri into Marion County, Arkansas, to destroy some gigantic saltpetre works near Yellville. He was signally successful. He returned to his encampment after an absence of but seven days, having traveled 225 miles, captured 42 prisoners, destroyed 40 stand of small-arms, captured 12 horses and 4 mules, and also having utterly destroyed the saltpetre works, which had cost the rebel government thirty thousand dollars. All this was accomplished without any loss whatever.

The latter part of December General Blunt was encamped at Prairie Grove. He learned that Hindman was collecting a large force at Van Buren, on the northern banks of the Arkansas River, preparing for another attempt to force his way into Missouri. Orders were promptly given to pick out the best men from each command, each mounted man to carry one peck of corn for his horse, and all to take six rations in haversack. About seven o'clock in the morning of the 27th the three divisions, consisting of 3000 cavalry and a body of infantry, commenced their movement, in a line almost directly south, for Van Buren, which was 50 miles distant. They reached Lee's Creek that night, where they bivouacked. At daylight the next morning the army was again in motion. The crossing the creek is described as extremely ludicrous. It was midwinter, and the water icy cold. No time could be lost in constructing bridges. It was therefore ordered that each mounted man should take one of the infantry on the croup of his horse. Many of the proud steeds resented the indignity, and as their hind quarters were thrown high into the air, such mishaps were witnessed as to cause universal merriment. Others were striving to construct bridges with logs, which the swift current tore from their grasp. The whole command was, however, soon over, and the cavalry, with four mountain-howitzers, dashed forward till, about ten o'clock, they came upon two regiments of rebel cavalry, eight miles this side of Van Buren. Putting spurs to their horses they plunged upon the foe, soon routed them, and drove them in disorderly flight back to the river. The rebels attempted to save some of their camp equipment by throwing the articles loosely into their wagons and goading the horses to their utmost speed. As these wagons were driven helter-skelter along the rugged road, over hills and through ravines, while our cavalry was in hot pursuit, pelting the fugitives with bullets and shells, the ground was soon found strewn with smashed ambulances and broken wagons, while their contents of tents, carpet-bags, clothing, harnesses, saddles, etc., seemed almost to pave the road.

When they arrived within about a mile of Van Buren they found themselves, at twelve o'clock, upon the top of a hill. After a moment's pause to collect the cavalry, and after sending a few greetings from the mountain-howitzers in the direction of the foe, the whole body of horsemen dashed down the gradual descent into the town. While a part of the cavalry entered the streets of the city another part galloped down the banks of the stream to intercept, with their carbines, three stern-wheel steamers, which, freighted with corn, were making as rapid tracks as possible down the river. They were brought back and returned to the levee. The "stars and stripes" were now waving over the court-house, greeted by the cheers of the victors as infantry and cavalry crowded into the city. The inhabitants gazed upon the spectacle thus suddenly bursting upon them with terror and bewilderment.

* See official reports of Generals Blunt and Herron, and their subordinate officers; also a very spirited letter from General Herron to a friend in Iowa, in the Rebellion Record; also graphic accounts by the correspondents of the Missouri Democrat, the Chicago Journal, the Burlington Hawk-Eye, and the Chicago Tribune. Though there is, in these accounts, diversity of details, there is no diversity in respect to the great movements and issues of the battle.

About 3 o'clock in the afternoon, just as our soldiers had taken full possession of the place, and were enjoying a collation, the report of cannon was heard on the opposite side of the river, and shells began to fall and explode in the streets. The rebels had brought their artillery to the opposite bank, and, without any warning for their own women and children to escape, had opened fire, hoping to shell out our cavalry. They succeeded in killing two soldiers, wounding two, and killing two children. We soon got a battery upon a convenient eminence, and at the third shot from our guns the rebels limbered up and fled. A few shells were sent after them to hasten their flight. Our troops found many hogsheds of fine sugar on the levee, with corn, cattle, mules, and commissary and ordnance stores.

The next morning the whole infantry force, with two batteries, marched in parade through the streets of the captured city, while the splendid field-bands in front pealed forth our glorious national airs. The streets were lined with spectators. They could not restrain their expressions of astonishment as they gazed upon the well-clad, highly-disciplined, patriot troops. President Lincoln had truly said that there was scarcely a regiment in the Union army from which he could not select a sufficient number of men who were competent to fill the several places in his Cabinet.

The rebels, in their flight, burned a large part of Fort Smith, with all the buildings containing Confederate stores, also blowing up a magazine and destroying two steamboats. Our troops destroyed Confederate property to the estimated value of two hundred thousand dollars. The next day the army returned to Prairie Grove, having inflicted a blow upon the rebels from which they could not speedily recover. General Blunt reported the only casualties: five or six men slightly wounded.

A few weeks after this General John A. McClernand, who was in command of a very considerable force at Millikin's Bend, finding that nothing decisive could immediately be done toward the reduction of Vicksburg, organized an expedition to destroy a fort of the enemy at Arkansas Post, from which fort the rebels could seriously annoy our communications between Memphis and Vicksburg.

Arkansas Post, or Fort Hindman, as it was sometimes called, consisted of a small village about fifty miles above the mouth of the river, and one hundred and seventeen miles below Little Rock, the capital of the State. The fort was situated upon elevated ground, on the left bank of the stream, and formed the key to Little Rock, and to the rich valley of the Arkansas, which abounded with cattle, corn, and cotton. It was a square, full-bastioned fort, surrounded by the village. The exterior sides of the fort, between the salient angles, were three hundred feet in length, the parapet eighteen feet wide at the top, the ditch twenty feet wide on the ground level and eight feet deep.

Around the interior slope of the parapet there was a banquette or foot-bank, upon which the infantry could stand to fire upon any assailants. There were three platforms for artillery in each bastion, and one in the curtain facing north. There were two casemates, safe from shot or shell, eighteen feet by fifteen, and seven and a half feet high. The casemates were pierced by a single embrasure, and contained one a 9-inch and the other an 8-inch Columbiad. Guns of large calibre en barbette seemed perfectly to command the river below the fort. From the northwestern bastion a line of rifle-pits extended seven hundred and twenty yards toward a bayou. Six field-pieces were mounted along this line, protected by traverses. There were various other preparations for defense which it would be tedious to enumerate. All the resources of military science had been devoted to make this one of the most formidable of the frontier posts. As early as the year 1685 the French, with their characteristic sagacity, had selected the spot for one of their military settlements.

For the reduction of this fort McClernand took the Fifteenth Army Corps, under General Sherman, and the Thirteenth, commanded by General George W. Morgan. These troops were conveyed in transports, accompanied by a flotilla of gun-boats, under Rear-Admiral David D. Porter. On the 8th of January, 1863, the fleet turned from the majestic Mississippi into apparently a narrow creek or bayou, which seemed to lose itself among the hoary trees, bearded with moss, of a dense and impenetrable forest. This "lonely ribbon of water" was the mouth of the White River. Its sluggish stream was scarcely wide enough for a single steamer. There were no houses, no farms, no cultivated fields along the banks—nothing but swamp and wilderness, through whose glooms our steam puffs and dash of paddle-wheels seemed to sough with melancholy cadence.

After ascending this dismal stream a few miles the fleet passed through a bayou, or cut-off, into the more lordly Arkansas. The day was so warm and delightful that had the forest, which spread for leagues around, been covered with verdure instead of draped with hoary moss, it would have seemed like midsummer. At length the boats reached regions of semi-civilization. Here and there the wretched log-houses of the "poor white trash" began to appear. Occasionally a rambling, comfortless-looking mansion of a planter would be seen upon the banks, surrounded with negro cabins. The aspect, to one accustomed to Northern thrift, was repulsive in the extreme. Occasionally a glimpse was caught of a horseman riding at full speed, carefully keeping out of rifle's reach—probably hastening to communicate to some rebel force tidings of the approach of the flotilla.

The troops commenced landing at five o'clock in the afternoon of the 9th, and by noon the next day they were safely on shore preparing for the attack. After a careful reconnoissance Sherman was directed to diverge from the river with one division of his corps, General Steele's, so as by a detour to invest the fort on the upper side. This column was put in motion at eleven o'clock on the 10th, and after traversing with great difficulty a swamp a quarter of a mile wide, came upon an open plain called Little Prairie. Here they ascertained that it was impossible to approach the fort in that direction, except by a march of seven miles, and by crossing a narrow bridge over a bayou, where they would be fearfully exposed to rebel bullets. As this would endanger the safety of the division—even could the march be accomplished—by too great a separation from the rest of the army, the troops were ordered to return.

The second division of Sherman's corps, under Stuart, had already advanced by the river road until they halted about half a mile below the fort. Steele's division soon came up and formed on the right, and Osterhaus's division on the left, next to the river. Rear-Admiral Porter now pushed forward the gun-boats. The Baron de Kalb, Cincinnati, and Louisville, all iron-clads, steamed up within three hundred yards of the fort, and opened a terrific cannonade upon it, which was continued until nightfall, thus diverting the attention of the enemy from the movement of the land-forces. All the vessels then dropped down, and tied up to the bank for the night.

In the mean time Colonel Lindsay's brigade had landed on the right bank of the river, and, marching up the stream, had planted a battery nearly opposite the fort, but a little above it, so as to prevent any escape of the foe by water, or any reinforcements from thus reaching him. The night which ensued was cold and bleak. Our patriot troops, as patient in enduring suffering as they were heroic in meeting the perils of battle, shivered sleepless yet uncomplaining through the long hours of the winter night, but on the morning of the 11th they were cheered by the bright rays of a warm and cloudless sun.

About noon all the preparations were made for the assault. A little after one o'clock the gun-boats opened their fire, to which the rebels vigorously responded. As boat after boat came into position the bombardment increased in intensity. Our guns were admirably handled. As soon as the range was attained almost every shell struck the guns in the fort, until, one after another, each one was silenced. The Cincinnati, with shrapnel, cleared the crew away from the 9-inch Dahlgren on the parapet, when the Baron de Kalb broke off the muzzle with a 10-inch solid shot. Each of the gun-boats silenced the gun upon which it was directed to fire. By half past two o'clock every heavy gun in the fort was either dismounted or its crew dispersed. Admiral Porter, during the bombardment, was in a little steam-tug, moving rapidly about giving directions.

The first gun from the fleet was the signal for the soldiers to move. The engagement immediately extended along our whole line, mainly with a brisk fire from our field-pieces. As soon as there was evidence that the fort was seriously damaged by the fire from the gun-boats and the land batteries, our men pressed steadily forward, driving before them the enemy's advance. Nine regiments, under General A. J. Smith, drove them forward, until they took shelter behind a cluster of cabins. Here Colonel Guppy, with the Twenty-third Wisconsin, charged them impetuously, forcing them to flee to their intrenchments, and followed them up until our troops were within two hundred yards of the fort. The foe continued to pour in upon our advancing ranks a galling fire from the rifle-pits, until the pits were cleared by the storm which fell upon them from our infantry and artillery.

At this moment the One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio dashed forward to carry the east face of the fort, but were frustrated by an impassable ravine. At four o'clock the gun-boats had approached near the bank, and were pouring shot into the fort. The batteries of Lindsay's brigade, on the other side of the river, were also doing splendid execution; while Morgan's and Sherman's commands were pressing steadily forward in front. And now came the final charge. Amidst the roar and the blinding smoke of battle eight or nine regiments, with such shouts and cheers as the frenzy of the hour only could extort, reckless of the bullets which swept their ranks, rushed through ditch and over rampart till they found themselves within the enemy's intrenchments, and the white flags of surrender floating all around them. The Sixteenth Indiana, under Lieutenant-Colonel John M. Orr; the Eighty-third Ohio, Lieutenant-Colonel Baldwin; and the One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio, Colonel D. French commanding, were the first to enter the fort. Thus, after three and a half hours of hard fighting, at half past four o'clock our forces were in possession of all the enemy's defenses.

As trophies of this victory our troops could display five thousand prisoners, seventeen pieces of cannon, ten gun-carriages, three thousand stand of small-arms, one hundred and thirty swords, fifty Colt's pistols, forty cans of powder, one thousand six hundred and fifty rounds of shot, shell, and canister, three hundred and seventy-five shells, forty-six thousand rounds of ammunition for small-arms, five hundred and sixty-three animals, together with a considerable quantity of quarter-master and commissary stores.

Our loss in killed was one hundred and twenty-nine; in wounded, eight hundred and thirty-one. Though the enemy fought behind defenses, our fire was so deadly that his loss was very severe, but we are not informed of the precise number. The victory of Arkansas Post was brilliant and decisive. It was won by the combined energies of the army and the navy. M'Clernand, who conceived the plan and conducted it to its triumphant conclusion, is entitled to a nation's gratitude. M'Clernand was about to make efficient use of his victory, by steaming up the river to the capture of Little Rock, when the state of affairs at Vicksburg required the return of his army to aid in the siege of that strong-hold. They first, however, blew up the fortifications, and demolished every thing that could be made a means of offense or defense.

The Union party in Arkansas now began to develop itself. The supremacy of our arms gave hope that the rebellion would be crushed, and in places where protection could be afforded the patriots began to speak openly. On the 27th of January there was an enthusiastic Union demonstration at Fayetteville. On the 26th of February the Cherokee nation, in council, renounced all connection with the rebels, disqualified all from office who continued disloyal to the United States, and abolished slavery. Two regiments of loyal Arkansas cavalry were formed, who contributed efficient aid to the National cause. Our troops now encountered but little opposition as they moved from one point to another. General Blunt, with untiring energy, pounced upon the rebels wherever they ventured to raise their treasonable flag.

The head-quarters of the rebel army was now at Little Rock, where Marmaduke was enlarging and strengthening his forces. Guerrilla bands were dashing about here and there, perpetrating all acts of violence. On the 17th of April two thousand rebels left Ozark, on the Arkansas, to endeavor to recapture Fayetteville. The post was garrisoned by two patriot regiments, the First Arkansas infantry and the First Arkansas cavalry, under command of Colonel M. La Rue Harrison. The attack was made at sunrise on the morning of the 18th. After a desperate fight of six hours the rebels were repulsed with slaughter.

About the middle of April Marmaduke left Little Rock with ten thousand troops, and made a raid into Missouri, hoping to capture Cape Girardeau. After a battle of five hours he was repulsed by General M'Neil, and his bleeding columns were driven back into Arkansas, pelted every mile of the way by the exultant troops of Generals M'Neil and Vandever.

On the 4th of July, Marmaduke and Price made another movement with fifteen thousand men to capture Helena. General Prentiss was in command, with a patriot force of about four thousand men. The rebels commenced the assault at daylight. With their immense masses they made many and desperate charges, and it is possible that our little garrison might have been overpowered had not the gun-boat Tyler opportunely arrived and opened upon the swarming foe with its heavy guns. Utterly foiled at every point, and with the loss of a thousand in killed and wounded and a thousand prisoners, the rebels fell back again to their strong-holds in the interior of Arkansas.

Soon after the surrender of Vicksburg a combined National force, under Generals Steele and Davidson, moved upon Little Rock with the design of obtaining the entire possession of the State. The expedition crossed the White River on the 17th of August. On the 2d of September, after several skirmishes with Marmaduke's cavalry, the whole available force was concentrated at Brownsville, about seven thousand in number. They marched, nearly abreast, on each side of the Arkansas River, toward the capital. Their rapid approach excited an indescribable panic. Women and children rushed into the streets and listened with terror to the booming of the cannon, every moment drawing nearer and nearer. Rebel troops were hurrying to and fro, applying the torch to steam-boats and public stores. Steele's column had now reached the banks opposite the city, and planting his batteries there, shells were thrown shrieking and howling over the city and exploding in the woods beyond. The rapid march of infantry through the streets, the rush of flying horsemen, the clouds of dust and gleam of sabres, the terror of the citizens and the ever-deepening roar of the battle combined in a spectacle as awful as it was sublime.

Soon a squadron of United States cavalry came dashing through the streets. They urged their horses to the arsenal, and reached it just in time to save it from being blown up by the enemy. There was over a ton of powder and several thousand pounds of ammunition in the building. The mayor, who was sick, sent hastily a message to General Davidson, surrendering the city and imploring his mercy. As the bridges were destroyed Steele and his staff crossed the Arkansas in a skiff and joined Davidson. The star-spangled banner, greeted by music and the proud tramp of the conquerors, now floated over the capitol. It was the 10th of September, 1863.

General Steele, who was in command, captured one thousand prisoners and all the public property which the rebels had not found time to destroy. Marmaduke retreated to Arkadelphia, his dépôt of supplies, hotly pursued by the National cavalry. As our troops came up and took possession of Arkadelphia the dispirited, disorganized bands fled from the State, and sought refuge from the avenging hands which pursued them among the mountains, ravines, and forests of Northwestern Louisiana.

Arkansas was now redeemed—nobly redeemed, by heroism and endurance which have been rarely equaled and never surpassed. The flag of the Union now floated over the whole State undisputed, save by a few robber gangs. One of these gangs, eight hundred in number, headed by a man by the name of Quantrell, on the 20th of August entered Lawrence, in Kansas, murdered in cold blood one hundred and twenty-five of its peaceful citizens, and laid nearly the whole town in ashes, destroying property to the amount of two millions of dollars. In December there were eight regiments of Arkansas citizens rallied under the National banner, besides several thousands who had joined the companies of other regiments. Among the men who contributed most essentially to the restoration of the State, and who are deserving of especial honor, should be mentioned Brigadier-General E. W. Gantt.

On the 12th of November a very enthusiastic meeting was held at Little Rock, which was succeeded by others in all parts of the State, to take measures for the restoration of Arkansas to the Union. The Convention met in January, 1864, declared the Secession ordinance null and void, abolished slavery, the cause of all our troubles, adopted a revised Constitution, and chose Isaac Murphy Governor. In his proclamation to his constituents Governor Murphy says:

"This is nobility enough; this is honor enough to be called a citizen of the United States, whose flag commands the admiration and respect of the world, and whose government has never failed to avenge or right the wrongs done to its humblest citizen. Spurn, then, the tyranny and oppression of the leaders of this wicked rebellion, and return to the home of your ancestors, and your own by inheritance, and atone for the past by securing to your posterity freedom, security, and happiness hereafter."

SHELBY CABELL.

MY acquaintance with Shelby Cabell began in a queer sort of way. I was crossing the Pont Neuf late one night, returning from an evening spent with some friends in the Rue Tournon to my lodgings in the Champs Elysées. It was not the nearest way home. I could have made better time by going along the quai to the Pont de la Concorde. But I always liked to loaf through Old Paris—le Paris qui s'en va—when I could; and there are few spots more engaging to a man with a taste for the mouldy than those fine old relics of the times of the Fourth Henry, the Rue Dauphine, and Place Dauphine, and the quiet quarters that form at either end of the bridge a sort of tête-de-pont to resist the encroachments of demolition and change. So I used to go a little out of my way, returning from the Latin Country to the fresh drab avenues of the Elysian Fields, to pass through those fine old haunts of the fast people of two centuries gone, and have my little protest against the barbarisms of civilization. The night I speak of I was going over my customary plaint: "Ill fares the nation where the present snubs the past—the poets have no show in this age—picturesqueness and dirt have lost their charm—the municipal council will soon begin to make knife-handles of the bones of the dead;" but it was late, and I had passed the evening in good company. Near the middle of the bridge I perceived a man standing motionless in the road. As I came nearer he started, ran, and leaped upon the high stone balustrade overlooking the river. His hat fell off as he jumped, and as he balanced himself on his perch with outstretched arms his long light hair streamed out in the wind, and gave him an odd, uncanny look. I sprang toward him, caught him by the clothes, and dragged him down from his dangerous pedestal. In my excitement, forgetting I was in France, I said, "What are you about?" As he gazed at me coolly an instant without answering, I said, "Pardon, Monsieur, mais que faites vous là?"

He picked up his hat, and brushing it with his sleeve, said, "I like your first phrase best. I speak English full as well as French, and I reckon you do too."

"Yes, but what business has a Kentuckian taking a plunge-bath in the Seine at midnight?"

He looked sharply at me. "How do you know I am a Kentuckian?"

"I reckoned so," I answered. He laughed and shook hands.

"A fair shot," he said. "We fellows from the woods have always some loose joint in our armor. Where do you hail from?"

"Not far from you, I should think: Fayette County."

"Hurrah for the Blue Grass!" he shouted.

"This is a godsend. You are the first neighbor I have met in an age. Let's go and take a drink."

"Of course," I replied. "But you don't seem to me like a man who was on the point of drowning himself five minutes ago."

"Oh no! I had no idea of doing it to-night. I just got up on the wall there to see how it would look, if a man were ready to try it. And, by-the-way, talking about drowning yourself, I have an old grudge against that useless point of land down there, the Vert-Galant. It would be a very neat thing to go off the shoulders of the Béarnais with a plunge and a splash, if one could light in deep water; but those green trees and the moist turf below would let you down with a few bruises. If you could get on the neck of the bronze horse, with plenty of spring in your legs and arms, you could do it leap-frog fashion, over the head of the King. It would be quite sensational on a bright afternoon when the bridge is full of passengers!"

He walked up as he talked to the equestrian statue of Henry IV., which stands in its spacious alcove, midway of the bridge, staring, horse and rider, into the narrow opening of the Place Dauphine, waiting and watching for something that never issues from the damp and quiet court. The moonlight touching to a softer expression the wide eyes and the firm mouth of the great Bourbon, one could fancy that his image smiled at the grotesque fancy of the strange creature at my side.

"But it's no use talking about that," he said, turning away. "Until they clear away that snout of the island the jump would be only ridiculous."

"Especially," I replied, "for a countryman of Sam Patch."

We were walking through the dark little Rue de la Monnaie, toward the Rue de Rivoli. My companion lifted his hat respectfully.

"You have just pronounced," he said, "the greatest names of our times. I hope you share my admiration for Patch!"

"Hardly. I am afraid. In fact I know nothing of him, except that he began as a leader, flourished by bravado, and died from an awkward jump when tipsy."

"A base calumny. Sir, born of envy, and kept alive by the tendency of men to dislike the great deeds they have not committed and can not understand." This was said with great earnestness, though quietly enough. "I know all about him. A year ago I thought as you do, and I hope to be forgiven for my foolish errors because of the slowness of my perceptions. I have carefully studied his life and character, and I am sure that all those incidents of his career that astonished the world were simply experiments as to the best mode of doing it. Frankly disgusted with life he passed his last days in searching boldly and laboriously the best way of quitting it. There is a deep philosophy in all this. I believe that the style in which a man enters the next world depends on the manner in which he quits this. Pshaw! It is too simple for argument. But how does he do it? Does not Miss McFlimsey put on her drawing-room and come out across the threshold of the antechamber?"

"The way is obvious, isn't it? I can do myself. But the method is a little new to me."

"Fellow旅客," he continued as he turned into the Rue de Rivoli, and walked along the brilliant street toward the Louvre—"follow him from the first plunge he made from the roof of a five-story apartment in Paris into the Blackstone River, then from High Bridge, until at last the terror and the beauty of Niagara lured him, and he came to be a nine days' wonder for the tourist, to whom he was no more than a hero—O to my shame, a quainter man some have said, 'Here is the place for the end.' But Patch, with the instinct of genius, saw that Niagara was too great for him. Nature crushes all human effort there. The frame was too big for the picture. And it was this consideration that made him spread his umbrella for a parachute, in those Titanic leaps that show what a chosen leader he was in how many ways to take him. When he was ready—I know he was ready, for when they fished him out three days afterward they found only a bad quarter in his pocket—he went to Genesee Falls, and there, in the midst of that quiet and beautiful nature that harmonized so well with an act of moral grandeur like his, he plunged and went through to his own place. He is the Ideal Suicide."

"You evidently have very little respect," I said "for the 'canon' gains: self-slaughter."

"Don't mistake me. Suicide in general is not a good thing. It is only a thing to do in special and circumstances. But when done it should be well done. This is the glory of Patch—he was never resolved to die, he was always in the midst of trying, and experienced the new way of dying. The world has never caught the true meaning of his strange device. Some have considered it as what is called 'Hanging over, but can not reach in the spirit of the death the word of the sublime enigma!'"

We turned up the Rue Castiglione and saw our eyes—a door every one entering that the long colonnade to cross the Rue St. Honore—up to the colossal figure of the First Consul, gazing southward through the marble hallways, as if the bronze eyes were fixed on Corsica.

"A man ought to go out with a flash, like that, candles, wreaths, and some bright camp," continued my companion. "The Emperor is there, for instance. If he could not have had the kind of a soldier as Waterloo, why didn't he, the wit, after talking things over with Montalivet and the Hord Lamont, and everybody that all said yes—to come up here, through that column, and let his dead go out? The great opportunity for an effort that ever was missed. Imagine the effect! There is such a sense of the end of the struggle of this movement of his own glory, and stand in his own true part, and own good. And look at the great fact—look at the fact that the Emperor and the Invalides and go to heaven—no way of the movement. The emperor would have been present in the scattered crowd of the first time, and the Ideal Image would still have stood on high, defying the storm of death and defeat."

We had crossed the Tuileries and entered the Rue de la Paix. He turned and said, "I wonder if you thought of him at the Hotel Lambert that night. But I suppose he would not have been able to tell them that he did not see the Emperor." He smiled. But the colossal statue kept his bronze eyes fixed on Corsica.

Walking toward the Boulevard, he said, "In general there are questions in going off the column. It would not be such a light as for walking at the Louvre, and indeed, they might kill an Invalid of the Guard."

We walked slowly in silence a few minutes, and then he said:

"I begin with the sentimental question of names—What's your name?"

He said, "Cabel. It has passed my name."

"Married name, Cabel, married, Cabel—" "There, that will do. Sober Cabel is enough. It's my name. Washburn, Pagan, Cleo, Roman, Mar—"

"And Harding? I supplied the patronymic."

"I never," said Cabel. "I can smell the Blue Grass when I hear such names."

We talked of home. If Cabel was mad, as I had begun to suspect, the old spirit would be in the availing of old memories. We asked questions upon each other. Where did you go to school? What has become of Joe (Lamont)? Whom do you know in Lexington? What sort of fellow did Miss Perver name? And so on, as the legends of Legation. We talked of old scenes and old friends, and we kept the Boulevard and its flashing lights and passing wheels; the savage brightness of the night, the vast solitude of the granite walls built to the

I heard around me the slow pouring of water from carafes to absinthe goblets, but I only thought how, under the early starlight, the water was dancing down the white ravine, past an old plantation on Green River. I heard the clatter of tumblers and spoons, and thought of the tinkling of cow-bells in the dim woods and willow watersides of the Great West.

We sat there until the "little ladies" had spread their trailing plumes and rustled away, and the Cocodès had bored each other to the desired somnolence, and the lights were dead, the bidders fled, and all but us departed. A heavy-eyed Ganymede approaches.

"Pardon, Messieurs, mais"—and his shoulders go up to his ears.

"True, it is late: l'addition."

"Where do you live?" (Together.)

"Champs Elysées 61."

"Rue Racine 2."

"Come and see me."

"Of course. I don't find a Fayette County man lying around loose often enough not to appreciate one when I stumble over him."

From that time forward I saw a great deal of Shelby Cabell. At first I thought him a little deranged, but after I knew him better I considered his frequent references to suicide in its æsthetic phases a harmless affectation, which though sometimes tiresome was oftener amusing. If from time to time a vague suspicion came to me that there was a deeper and more painful interest in this subject to Cabell than appeared, it vanished when I met him again. For he was almost always gay, hearty, and all alive. He intensely enjoyed seeing his own theories burlesqued, and took a keen relish in running into absurdity his own ghastly fancies. He always announced his intention of "going off that way sometime," but always lightly, even jestingly. It was at first unpleasant to hear so grim a subject so frequently mentioned even in jest, but I at last grew accustomed to it, and even amused at the infinite variety of his gory reveries. The Western people are all more or less original and individual, and their characters are as hard to polish as diamonds. They carry their knobiness and their sharp angles through all the friction of time and society. They are hard to polish, but they are as hard to corrupt. Vice breaks her teeth on them. Even the frightful solvent of slavery has not been enough to melt down the rugged virtues of the Kentucky character. It has left stains, of course, but they do not go below the surface. Shelby Cabell was a fair type of these people.

He was of good height, spare build, not perfectly erect. The Kentuckian grows fast, and when young has a slight stoop in the shoulders, which disappears with the slenderness of youth. At fifty he is portly and straight as an arrow. He had very good eyes; that is, they were well set, wide apart, brows gracefully arched; the eyes themselves were like all gray eyes. The expression of his face in repose was grave. His complexion was dark, too dark to suit perfectly the hair and eyes: but that you see continually among the people in the Mississippi Valley. There is a certain richness of organization that embrowns, under a Western sun, a face that would have been blonde any where else. Men blush brown out West, never pink. He was put together rather loosely, but a man would have made an unlucky mistake in selecting him for an easy adversary. In a row he would be as sure, and as quick, and as merciless as a piece of steel machinery.

He was generally well dressed, though a little carelessly. He was not scrupulous in his cravats. His hats were too apt to suggest the Ecole de Medecine. But his crowning offense was his hair. The golden fleece which he brandished in the face of society was just cause for social ostracism. I appealed to him to sacrifice that much to the Decencies.

"Sorry I can't oblige you," he said, laughingly; "but I think long yellow hair is a fine feature in the picture of a fellow 'going off' from a given point. It gives him the effect of a comet. I got the idea from a painting of a lost lady plunging from London Bridge."

He had been abroad about four years. His father had died the year before he sailed, leaving his fortune to be divided in three portions among his sons. Shelby, the second son, took all of his patrimony in money and funds. The elder took the home plantation, and the cadet the estate coming from the mother, who died when they were children, on the Tennessee border. When the rebellion broke out, the older brother went into the National Army, the younger joined the revolt, and Shelby, stuffing his worldly gear into a carpet-bag, went to Richmond to seek service in the Regular Army of the Confederate States. There he met the Honorable Epaminondas Strutt, who was about sailing for Europe in a diplomatic capacity. The Honorable and high-toned Epaminondas wanted a Secretary of Legation, as he had heard it was the thing for diplomats to be accompanied by an appendage so styled, though his ideas of what were the duties incident to that function were of the vaguest. But young Cabell, who was burning with ardor for what was called "ouah cause," and whose young imagination was also perhaps a little touched by indiscreet reading, was delighted with this opportunity of serving his embryo nation in the gay capitals of Europe. It was a sweet thing, doubtless, to die for one's country, but not a bitter one to live for it in the town where the Chevalier de Faublas had flourished, and the Lady of the Camelias had queened it, for her hour. So he was proud and happy, when, one night in the bar-room of the Spotswood House, the unctuous and effusive statesman grasped his hand, and said: "My gifted young friend, your father was my most intimate and trusted comrade on many a well-fought field—political, I would say. We fought the hell-hounds of abolition together here. I have selected your father's son out of sixteen applicants, to continue that fight on a furrin shore. No thanks. Sir," waving a pudgy hand with a splendid magnanimity and moving to the door.

Cabell stood a moment with his head in the clouds, until the bar-tender said, "Is you or the Judge gwine to pay for them drinks?"

"Oh, I! How much?"

"Eleven juleps; two brandy strait; a lemon he put in his pocket; and a tumbler he throwed at a durg—two dollars and eighty-five cents—say three dollars for luck."

Cabell's duties as Secretary of Legation, thus begun, continued in much the same way. They came to a sudden and brilliant close after a few months' residence in Paris. One evening at his rooms in the Grand Hotel, Shelby saw his high-toned and chivalrous chief grossly, awkwardly, yet successfully, cheating at Bluff. He went to the table, seized the arm of the high-toned, etc., took an ace from his cuff and drew it across his cheek. He then took the sugar-tongs from the side-board and with them seized firmly the blooming nose of the high-toned, and led him to the door. He came back, and threw the sugar-tongs out of the window. "Gentlemen," he said, "will you drink to my retreat from the Diplomatic service of our country?"

In the morning he received a letter dismissing him from "the service." The Honorable Epaminondas wrote that he had been informed by a high-toned and reliable gentleman that Cabell had been educated at a New England College, and had there doubtless imbibed radical and disorganizing notions, which rendered him incapable of holding an office of such delicacy and trust as Secretary to a Confederate States Plenipotentiary. He said he would report his action in the case to the President, who would doubtless be grieved, as he was, at the unworthiness of one he had loved and trusted. Not one word of the scene of the night before.

Shelby's illusions died hard, but they perished one by one. Thus deprived of all opportunity of serving the cause he worshiped—for the letter of Strutt would, of course, be conclusive against him at Richmond—he grew restless and discontented. He gradually broke with most of the refugees in Paris. He soon discovered that his apparent popularity was only due to his lavish extravagance, and his presumed wealth. His first efforts at retrenchment convinced him of that. He had been young and credulous enough to dream that he was loved for himself. When he first talked one evening about a simple pastoral ménage in the country, he was answered by pretty badinage and caresses that made him forget his theme. The second time a pair of plump shoulders were shrugged petulantly, and the red lips said with some energy, "Mais, c'est une scie." He determined one day to come to an understanding. His fair enslaver lived in the Avenue Marigny. As he reached the corner of the Faubourg St. Honoré he saw her alighting from her carriage. She was with the Comte de Playoff, a young Russian who had just come down to Paris to beggar his heart and get rid of a few millions. He followed them up to her apartment. His ring was not answered for some minutes. When the saucy face of the bonne appeared he started to enter. She stood in the way, and said, "Madame n'y est pas."

"You lie!" said the furious boy; but suddenly struck with a desire to be further assured, he said, kindly, "Pardon me, Lisette, but I am sure she has entered. Ask again, and say it is I."

The girl went through the ante-chamber and into the salon. In a moment she reappeared and said, "Madame is going to the country to-morrow, and is desolate not to see Monsieur; but it is impossible: she is too busy. She will be happy to meet Monsieur next winter if Monsieur finds himself in Paris."

She shut the door in his face. The Kentuckian drew back his fist to smash the panel, but thought better of it and went home, deeply disgusted and humiliated. He was not jealous, because his time had not come to love.

These incidents, and many others he recounted to me from time to time, rubbed the butterfly-dust very rapidly from the wings of his illusions. He was getting lined almost before he was grown. His restlessness became invincible. He wandered over Europe and into Asia for two years. He squandered most of his property. He exhausted most of the amusements which young men work so conscientiously to exhaust. He did the regular things that every body must do who aspires to sit in the august congregation of the Fast.

He had now come back to Paris to "spend the evening of his days," he said, "tranquilly. The pomps and glories of the world charm me no more. I taste the joys reserved for the philosopher. I wear a bad hat. I shove no paste-board. I wear no gloves. I read some books. I see some plays, as thou dost, Antony. I have no wife, no child, no country. I have no heroes to worship. My President was caught the other day scudding through a corn-field in his wife's shawl and gysticutum, I believe they call it. All my old masters in the theory and practice of secession have taken the iron-clad oath. I don't want to be reconstructed. I have been a secessionist ever since I was born, and I can't lie about it. The cause is gone in disaster and disgrace, but I don't think it will pay to take the victor's oath for the few days I have to live."

One day I said to him, "Providence is clearly against suicide at present. An officer of the Lanciers in the Rue de la Ville-l'Évêque made up his mind to quit this world yesterday. He fell on his sword. It pierced him from point to hilt, but dodged every vital spot. Without waiting to draw it out he seized his razor and made two savage puns at his throat. His razor scorned to touch his windpipe or jugular. Disgusted, he cocked his Derringer and fired into his left temple. The flash burned his hair and scorched his eyelashes, but the ball skimmed round between skin and skull and got out on the other side. He staggered to his bed, but in a moment discovered he was not yet in heaven, and rushed to his window (he lived au cinquième) and vaulted over his balcony—”

“Sensible at last,” said Cabell; “he should have commenced with that!”

“But at that instant an upholsterer’s wagon filled with feather-beds passed, and received him fainting. The boy who drove was frightened out of a year’s growth at this addition to his load—a mad Frenchman, with a staff sword spitting him through the body, a Derringer still grasped in his fist, and a gaping bullet hole on each side of his head. They took him to a hospital, and to-day Dr. Peloton, from whom I have the story, tells me he will be ready for duty in a fortnight.”

“Poor fellow!” said Shelby, with real sympathy; “he will be so demoralized by a failure like that that he will never try it again. A man can’t be too careful and cool in such matters. I saw a superb piece of work not long ago. A young fellow in my street had gotten tired of this make-shift world, and especially of this Old-Clo’ Empire. He knew a little English also, and read Carlyle. He had become imbued with the great Scotchman’s philosophy—‘this world is for the strong and the mighty; if you are not strong and mighty shut your mouth, and don’t maunder about those who are; if that is hard, you can die—that’s always easy;’ and he concluded to die. He bought an ordinary axe, and after taking out the helve, he fastened a pair of dumb-bells to the ends of the blade. He drove a staple tightly into his ceiling. He tied a cord to his axe and passed it through the staple. With the cord in his hand he lay down on the floor, placing his head in a circle he had drawn on the planks with chalk. Raising his axe to the ceiling by means of this simple machinery, he adjusted his head so that the fine blue edge of the steel was precisely over his eyes—and let go. I went into the room two days after. His concierge had come to me, not knowing where he could be, and having seen us sometimes together; and I went to the Inspector of my quarter. We went up together. It was a dead shot. Struck fair in the eyes and clipped off the top of the head, as you split an apple.”

“Confound you, Cabell!” I protested—“this specialty of yours grows sometimes too horrible to be amusing.”

“Not amusing, perhaps,” he said, “but rather edifying. Yet it is sad to think that the great geniuses who do a good thing in this way can tell us nothing about it. All we really know is derived from the frivolous bunglers who balk at the gates. There is one thought that as often as it occurs to me strikes me with horror.”

His brow contracted as he spoke, and he clenched his hands and teeth like a strong man in bodily pain. After a moment he continued:

“You know you think very fast in rapid motion. A swift sailing boat in a gale—a fast horse flying against the wind—wake up your mind to an amazing activity. I have never thought so fast and so freely as when I used to steal my father’s blood-horses out of the stable and ride quarter-races in the moonlight with the Merriwether boys. I can’t help fearing—and shuddering at it—that when a man finds his life so snarled and twisted that he must drop it as a bad job, and so goes off from some given point”—this was Cabell’s favorite expression: amidst all his eccentricities he was always faithful to his preference of a great leap and plunge as the proper way to quit this world—“he may find in the busy second of his fall, that what seemed so impossible was the simplest thing in the world; and he may see the very means of gaining his life’s set prize, so dearly longed for and miserably despaired of, blazing before his sickening brain. The very air as it whistles by him may hiss in his ringing ears how it might have been done! I tell you, Harding, that gravels me sometimes!”

“And I tell you, Cabell, that is the first sensible word I have heard you utter on this subject. I can’t conceive a more pitiable figure than that of a suicide in the next world. It will be like that we sometimes cut in troubled dreams, when we find ourselves in a bright salon crowded with very fine company, and suddenly perceive we have omitted to put on our trowsers.”

Cabell would rarely discuss the abstract question of suicide. He pretended to consider that a settled matter for himself. But he was always ready to treat of the comparative advantages of different styles of self-destruction. He contended sturdily for the attraction of gravitation as the best and most artistic agent for the purpose. That given, he was not bigoted as to place and time. He had the heights of the principal monuments of Paris noted down in his tablets, with a careful computation of the progressive velocity of a body falling from pinnacle to pavement. He seemed to delight in the bristling array of figures which expressed the frightful momentum of a weight of 149 pounds (he weighed that in his boots) increasing as the square of the distance traversed.

“Nôtre Dame,” he said, “would be a superb point of departure. A clean, sheer fall from the front façade on the pave. But Heaven only knows when the demolitions will be over, and you don’t want to come down on a heap of rubbish and mason’s tools. And, really, one does not feel entirely comfortable in following in the wake of Claud Frolo.”

“The Tour St. Jacques la Boucherie is more finished and compact. It is especially convenient, since they have covered the saint’s back with gas-fixtures for illuminations, by which you can climb to his hat, and bid good-by to the Old Paris, with nothing between you and heaven. But if one is going to do the ecclesiastical thing at all, he might as well buy a third-class ticket to Strasbourg, and take his flight from the greatest spire in the world.”

He generally concluded by saying, “After all, the Arc de l’Etoile is good enough for the likes o’ me.”

The better I knew Cabell the more I wondered at this odd affectation, for I thought it nothing else. He was so cool and imperturbable, and so genial and cordial; his views of life were, with this exception, so just, and his health, above all, so perfect, that I never dreamed he was in earnest. At the same time this fanciful style of speech was utterly out of character. He was not a man you would expect to hear babbling for the mere sake of babble. Therefore, though never really disquieted, I was often puzzled by his talk. I had as yet seen no adequate cause for the entire indifference to life he professed. When you see a man hopelessly crushed and ruined, bankrupt of life and hope, you ask, "Who was she?" I could not see, in the greatest freedom of Cabell's confidences, any sign that a single one of the many tenants that had flitted in and out of his heart had ever, like Claude Duval, carved her name on its walls.

The Western man has a great gift of silence in these matters. Yet he never seems to expect it in others. I should not have thought of confiding a serious love-affair to Cabell. But as he never mentioned any thing of the kind to me I concluded there was nothing worth mentioning. Illogical, but natural enough.

One afternoon he and I were at my windows in the Champs Elysées. The avenue was filled with its usual chaos of carriages rolling to the Bois de Boulogne. Shelby was in his pleasantest vein. His satire was always sunny and fresh; never morbid and poisonous as a man's wit is apt to grow in Paris. He sat in the warm golden light, twisting his yellow mustache, and talking in his quaint, half-sleepy way about a project he had once cherished of constructing a Bois de la Fayette near the race-track at Lexington, describing, with a quiet verve that was inimitable, the teams and the toilets that the beauty and fashion of the Blue Grass Region would have displayed there. I heard hard swearing below my windows and looked out. A voiture de place lumbering down the hill, had struck the wheel of another laboring up, and there was a crash, and a jam, and a temporary halt of the long line of vehicles. I saw the blood bays of the exquisite Marquise de Bellechasse reined back on their haunches, and behind them a Daumont, full of the prettiest toilet and the prettiest woman in Paris. She gave me a languid nod of recognition, as the postillions saw a break in the line and dashed by.

Cabell gazed at the equipage like a man mesmerized, his hands clenched, a bright spot burning on his cheek, his lips half open, his whole life blazing in his fixed gray eyes. I looked at him with astonishment. His face was new and strange to me.

In a moment he sank back in his chair and fell to twisting his mustache again.

"Well, what did you see?" I asked.

"The door of my closet flew open and I saw my skeleton," he answered, as if at random, like a sleepy child.

"What, Madame de Bellechasse?" I cried.

"Yes," he said, in his usual tone; "though it does require some clairvoyance to see a skeleton under those beautiful lines, and Madame 'would not like to consider herself, nor yet to be so considered, in that bony light'"—quoting Dickens, as many of us do, when we want to close an embarrassing inquisition or argument. Mr. Boffin, and Captain Cuttle, and Richard Swiveller have helped me out of more tight places than all my friends together.

That evening Cabell, as he was going, said, "Lend me a hundred or two francs."

I gave him the bills.

"Shall I write you a note?"

I had never taken a promissory note before from a friend. But a new idea had come to me. I imagined a use for one. So I said "Yes, there are pens and paper. Write it in French."

He looked up inquiringly, but as I made no further explanation, he wrote the note, which I laid away.

The next day I dined with an old Washington friend, whom I had known as an attaché of the French Legation. Two titles and as many fortunes had fallen upon him through the timely kindness of a couple of uncles who had considerably died within a year of each other, leaving him sole heir. It had not spoiled him. Good fortune never spoiled any body. It is bad luck that gives the devil his opportunity over men. At De Bacheville's I met the Marquise de Bellechasse, and sat beside her at dinner.

I think I had better not attempt to describe her. I have rarely known a beauty so vehemently attacked by women, so warmly admired by men. The source of her fascination was in her "general effect." So much so that I have heard two men who were equally infatuated with her dispute as to the color of her eyes. The quarrel was adjourned from the Jockey Club to the Bois de Boulogne, and the unfortunate fellow who swore by the brown eyes of his empress was carried home with a broken rib. The victor flew to the feet of the fair cause of discord to sun himself in the light of the blue eyes he had defended, and found them hazel. She seemed very tall, but was very little over the medium height of women. Her imposing air, her Juno-like walk, deceived every one. If her face had been faithfully put in marble, it would have been too cold, too strong. There would have seemed to be too much character in the traits. But no man could resist the strange, subtle charm of that soft, bright smile veiling in sweet and feminine beauty the fine firm mouth. There is not more variety in the myriad lights smitten out from a great diamond shaken in the sun than in the shifting expressions of her dark and unfathomable eyes. Like the mocking-bird of the Western woods they talked all languages but their own. They were too faithful ever to betray their mistress. It was her superb self-command that gave her command over others. Women instinctively felt this chilly empire over passion that she possessed, and took their revenge by small criticism. Men, beguiled by the music of her voice, the languid fall of the long, dark lashes over the vigilant eyes they veiled, the sweet smile that could seem so tired and dreamy, were conquered before they thought of defending themselves. Many a man thought on Monday, at the Tuileries, that this splendid woman was in love with him. He met her again on Tuesday at a Ministerial reception on the Right Bank, and was charmed and puzzled. The next night he went to the receptions on the Left Bank, expressly to meet her, and woke up Thursday morning restless and excited and alert, planning and scheming to see her again, in love and never dreaming it.

She concealed her youth as many women do their age. Her manner was that of a splendid young matron of thirty. But her cheek was infantine in its freshness, in spite of the gravity of the eyes. Her form was superb in the perfection and grace of its curves; but its lithe, and slender, and elastic beauty had all the indiscretion of a family record. It looked, as she was, twenty-two years old.

Though a good enough Christian in her way, she firmly believed in the unscriptural doctrine of hiding your light under a bushel. She was full of talent, but did her best to keep it out of sight. It hurts the self-love of men for women to be clever, and she did not care to add insult to the injury she did. So that few men knew that Adèle de Bellechasse read in five languages nearly all that appeared of value in art, and science, and history.

She was an American, daughter of what the newspapers call a Merchant Prince. A man enriched by sagacious trade. If he had enlisted for a soldier, he would have been a General. If he had drifted into politics, a Senator. He was a square, grave, witty, shrewd, well-bred man, with a bald head and a white mustache, who could drive his own bargains and his own horses, and buy his own books and his own wine, and who wouldn't be condescended to by a prince, if a prince were ass enough to try it. A man whom no country on earth but America could send out. Every where else it requires one lifetime to make a fortune, and three to learn how to spend it.

When Adèle Brinton was eighteen years of age she was driving in the Bois with her father one pleasant day. As they drew up by the Lake, a young fellow of about sixty-five, with suspiciously black hair, approached the carriage, bowed with stiff jauntiness, and began an aimless conversation with Mr. Brinton, for the purpose of staring at the pretty girl beside him. In a moment Brinton said, "Monsieur le Marquis, do you remember the little girl I had with me in Spain in 1852? Adèle, this is the Marquis de Bellechasse." The Marquis bowed with jaunty stiffness, and addressed his conversation to the late little girl. A week later he asked Mr. Brinton for the hand of his daughter. "Ask her," said the father, ringing for Adèle. She came in, fresh, and dewy, and bright, and stopped on the threshold, seeing the jaunty veteran again. "The Marquis has something to say to you," said Brinton, passing into his library. The astonished Marquis gasped out his prayer, all his jauntiness shaken from him by this unheard-of procedure. The young lady, not in the least astonished, listened with respectful attention and accepted with composure. "Come in, papa!" she called. Mr. Brinton entered. "Embrasse ton fils," she said, laughingly, and left the two old gentlemen to talk business.

It was a perfect ménage. The Marquis made it the study of his life to please his lovely young wife. Malicious people said he was faithful in that object "even unto death." He enjoyed his treasure only two years, and left his name and great wealth to his widow. At the time of his death he was Ambassador at the Court of—well, these are critical times for kings, we will say the King of Thule. Adèle had a great success in that witty, polished, and brilliant court. The gayest and the gravest were alike at her feet. Young Hussars littered her hotel with anonymous bouquets, and old savans made homage to her of ponderous treatises on the Origin of Matter. She left them all disconsolate—the periodicals of Thule were crammed with verses of farewell—she received from twenty admirers the highly original and suggestive cadeau of a bouquet of Vergiss-mein-nicht—and there was not beer enough in the kingdom to drown the despair of the Jaunkerpartei. She came down to Paris. She induced her father to take a floor of her hotel, and she accomplished discreetly her year of widowhood. Then she appeared again in the world, and Paris—I mean the few hundreds who call themselves Paris—was in emotion, like the waves of the sea when the full moon wakes them from their sleep, and they scuffle to gain one instant of her gilding light.

"The first thing the Marquise said to me, as we took our places at the table, was, 'Who was that in your window yesterday?'"

"My friend Cabell; but you know him?"

"Yes," she said, hesitatingly. "How do you know I know him? What did he say about me?"

"Nothing. Tell me what you know of Cabell."

"Answer me?"

"Really, it is because Cabell said nothing about you that I am curious to know what your acquaintance has been."

"I don't like to give something for nothing. Tell me all you know about him, and then I will take your question into consideration."

I gave her in brief an account of my acquaintance with Shelby Cabell. It lasted, with her interruptions and questions, from fish to finger-bowls, and she had told me nothing. The ladies went to the drawing-room and the men staid behind with De Bacheville, to drink a punch of Bourbon whisky, an old Washington habit of his.

When we joined the ladies Madame de Bellechasse, with the pretty imperiousness that was natural to her, ordered me to take what I could rescue of her sofa from the deluge of her toilet. She began to speak of Cabell in a confidential manner, which at once rendered me the envy of all the Frenchmen there, who could not dream of any thing but a flirtation couched in a semitone and a foreign language.

I was usually ranked among the victims of Madame de Bellechasse. I saw a good deal of her. I was very much attached to her father. They were both very kind to me. I believe the only thing Adèle saw in me that was worth her respect was that I did not love her, and did not flatter her. This was something phenomenal in her experience of men. It gave her a disproportionate confidence in me. She told me more than any one else, I believe. She thought aloud in my company. I was very much interested in her. But I was more in love with the Venus of Milo than with Adèle de Bellechasse, and with a better chance of a return.

I have said all this to explain how I came to know the story of Shelby Cabell's love. Adèle told me of it lightly and mirthfully, as she told me of a dozen declarations she had received in a week. She had grown utterly skeptical on the subject of genuine passion. Her endless "successes" had brought her to this. She saw few men she respected. She had never for an instant loved. So far as that god was concerned she was an Atheist. Her lovers filed before her like an unreal pageant, constructed for her amusement. She could not think of any thing real behind the scenes.

Yet even in talking of Cabell she seemed haunted by a vague suspicion that this man loved her. She did not care for him, and would not marry him if she loved him, she frankly said. But she would be sorry not to know beyond a doubt if she were really loved once in her lifetime. "He talked very much like the rest, but with less parade of passion," she said, finishing her story, "and when I said I would be glad to see him often as a friend, he smiled and said I did not know what I was talking about. I like a little rudeness in such circumstances. Altogether, his manner impressed me a little, and that is why I remembered his face, and asked you about him."

"I believe that Shelby Cabell loves you well enough to die of it some day."

"C'est un-peu fort ça?"

She was always unusually heartless when she dropped into French. So I rose and went my way.

I have no heart to repeat the story she told me. It resolves itself into this. Cabell saw her one night in a Bal Masqué in Thale. The King himself had asked her to personate his kingdom. She marched at the head of a cortège, representing the nations of the world. She had a walk, in those great ceremonial occasions, that was worthy of the Kemble family. Incedo regina she could say if any could. Cabell was dazzled. He was presented to her, and was dragged for a while at her chariot-wheels. When she came to Paris he followed her, and a year before he declared his love; and with the unreasoning presumption of all true passion he claimed her love in return. She refused him as she would have refused a porcelain vase to a child who cried for it.

For her it was the amusement of a half hour. For him it was Life against Death. A thousand to one on Death.

From that night I was a prey to inquietude on Cabell's account. I had the key to his riddle. He affronted death with that utter calmness I had thought affectation, because he had no good reason for living. In the agony of his first despair he had resolved to die; and during the long months that followed he had grown so familiar with the idea of violent death, that it had become the settled habit of his mind to think of "dying in his boots," as they phrase it in the West, just as other people think vaguely of dying, ages hence, in bed. I could not call him insane. He was enthusiastic on the subject of artistic suicides; but the mania of a gambler or a tourist was no less incomprehensible and often far more hurtful. I remembered all the old saws against suicide, and used them desperately on him. But his reasons for, I felt, were stronger than mine against, in their effect upon a mind and a nature like his.

One day he said, "Suicide is generally considered the result of insanity. You have said so even. Tell me, do you think a man who coolly throws away a life that is useless and tiresome is as crazy as one who sacrifices in a duel a life full of pleasures and hopes and duties? Yet you call one act madness, and the other a necessary regard for the opinion of mankind."

I was silent, for I had been silly enough to say that. I thought if I could get him away from Paris I could cheat him by degrees out of his purpose. But he would not leave the city. He said that he intended to live as long as his money lasted, and he could not afford to travel. "My mind once made up to 'go off,'" he reasoned, "I am satisfied and happy enough for the few days that remain. The world has ceased to trouble me. I look on myself as a dead man, and have a foretaste of the delights of the grave. I am like a prisoner who will be free next week, and begins to be interested in the daily life of the jail, which was horrible before he heard of his pardon, and would be again if his pardon were withdrawn."

We were smoking one afternoon in the garden of the Luxembourg. A little child ran up to Cabell and kissed his hand.

"Ca va toujours bien, ma petite?" he said, kindly.

"Oh yes!" she said, "and we all pray for you every night, though papa says such a great gentleman does not want our prayers."

"Papa is wrong. I want them very much. Don't forget!"

"Jamais," said the little one, as she ran back to her brother.

"That expansive juvenile makes me remember that I am going off sooner than I had intended," he said.

"What has happened?" I asked.

He had filled his mouth with an enormous volume of smoke. Two thin blue lines crept out of his nostrils over his mustache, were caught by the undertow and dragged into his mouth. The tortured smoke came slowly out of his lips, and was in turn captured and drawn into his nostrils. A moment more he opened his mouth, and the balsamic vapor shot out all at once like burned powder from a cannon, and curled slowly up into the withering foliage of the elms. I was so lost in admiration of this elaborate master-piece of pneumatics that I forgot his story.

"Where did you accumulate all that science?"

"I got it," he said, "from a fellow in the Overland Pony Express. But I was going to tell you something else. What was it? Oh yes! I heard last week of a poor wretch who made up his mind, if he had one, to lay his head under a trip-hammer in an iron-rolling establishment. Not a bad idea, either. But the poor creature's heart failed him when he got by the side of the vast monster, beating on its quivering anvil with the force of a regiment of Vulcans fused into a single arm. So he thought he would begin with his fist. It was a hard, horny, proletarian fist, but the smooth, shining face of the iron came down and flattened bone and blood and brawn out into a something like an unsuccessful buckwheat cake. Of course it did not hurt him in the least, the whole nervous system being too much shocked to feel. He stood staring with the amused face of a stupid child at what was left of his hand until they carried him home. I remembered his address, and it caught my eye as I walked through the Rue Mouffetard a few days ago. I thought I would go up and talk with him. I might get some useful new idea out of him. I introduced myself as a Visitor of the Poor. Two or three frightened and ragged children crept into corners as I entered. His wife was crying at the window. I could make nothing of the poor devil: hunger and weakness of spirit had driven him into his folly. I talked with the wife and the babies. The woman seemed to have some grit. She had been a flower-maker; said she was sure of a living if she could raise 500 francs to begin upon. In three years she could save 4000 francs and set up a shop of her own. I thought, 'Here is a chance to do something. This poor woman is brave and industrious, and having brought those two little Gauls into the world, she ought to have a chance to continue her experiment with them.' I had in my pocket five notes of 1000 francs each, besides some odd hundreds. I had settled at Munroe's that day and drawn my whole balance. I gave her 5000 francs, and told her what my address was in case any body asked where she got so much money. I had the incubus of a husband carted off to the Hospital, and now every thing goes with them on wheels, as the happy creature says. She sits in her little shop all day at work at hideous roses and impossible coquelicots, which are bought as fast as made, and dreams of some day seeing her son an advocate and her daughter the wife of a notary."

"And does not this convince you that you have your work in the world to do? Seeking the happiness of others, you will find your own. These things always hunt in couples. Don't you see you have gained a victory over yourself?"

"A victory of Pyrrhus. Only it doesn't need another such to undo me. I have not the wherewithal for many more days. I am not sorry for that, however. This project of mine has been hanging by the eyelids long enough. So you need not be surprised to see me figuring before long in a fait-Paris. Good-day," he said, "I dine to-day chez Duval, and to-morrow—Quien sabe?"

I watched him moving off with his light, springing stride, graceful and free as an Indian's, and I would not believe so much life and beauty and strength was to be quenched. He turned at the first corner and looked back to nod to me again. The level sunlight was pouring its last rays through the dusty street, and I saw him in a sort of nimbus that does me good to remember now. It seemed to grow suddenly darker when he was gone.

I went home feeling very anxious. I was entirely powerless against his quiet, firm purpose, which had been cherished so long as to become to him a matter of course, neither to be questioned nor defended. Had I called him insane and asked for a "commission," any dozen doctors in Paris would have called me insane after the inquest. I resolved to play my only card. I still preserved the promissory note he had given me. He had paid the money long ago, but had not thought of his note.

I sent for a half-starved limb of the law whom I had employed in one or two little matters. Jacques Loup was a small, wiry, sharp-looking man, with a brown wig and the most remarkable eye-teeth I ever saw. They gave him a look of unutterable craftiness and malice. Yet the little man was as amiable as a sheep, and had no passions but for marionnettes and candied chestnuts.

I told him I would give him the full value of the note if he would put the debtor into Clichy within the briefest possible delay. I did not want the money; I wanted the body of the debtor.

"I see perfectly these have somewhat of mysterious there within. That does not regard me. I will impress myself to execute your vows."

Loup prided himself on his English. I could understand a good deal of it.

The next day I found Cabell's card at my house: he had scrawled on it "A little black-guard with big tusks dunned me to-day for that note I paid you. I kicked him a little. Was that right? Stole it, I suppose."

Poor Loup was having heavy weather, it seemed. I kept out of my apartment for a day or two, coming furtively in for cards and letters. I find another card from Shelby—"My little friend with the big tusks is suing me for that note. When can I see you?"

The evening of the fourth day I was in my parlor and heard a furious ring. I squared myself to meet Cabell. But little Loup came tottering in. He was about to fall on my shoulder. I moved aside and he collapsed into an arm-chair.

"It is barbarous and savage, Monsieur, your debtor. I have execute your vows; but, mon Dieu, at what costly cost!"

He began to grow fearfully rhetorical and involved. I said, "Mr. Loup, your English is perfect, but a trifle too artistic for purposes of business. Please tell me in French what you have accomplished!"

This did not take long. The furious and blood-thirsty Cabell was in Clichy since noon. The process, though deeply interesting to Mr. Loup, would lack interest to the general public. I paid Loup his fee with a thankful heart. He went away, after expressing his firm intention, first, to box Cabell (whom he called Buteur de Sang) on the public streets; second, to fight him in the Bois de Boulogne, if Buteur de Sang could find a person comme il faut to serve as witness; third, to drag him before the Police Correctionnelle for assault and battery, with intent not to pay his debts. All this, when the Honorable Monsieur Har-r-r-dang should be graciously pleased to let the blood-drinker out of jail.

I was almost happy that evening. I was sure of Cabell for a week or two, I thought; and I hoped to bring him to listen to reason before I released him. I had made up my mind to return to America if I could induce him to go with me. I felt so excited at the successful termination of my stratagem that I was too restless to stay at home. I looked at my cards, and saw that it was Madame de Rostainville's evening "at home." I went there. Madame was charmed to see me, and called me by the thirteenth name she had invented for me since our acquaintance began. I took it as a special attention until I learned that the Rostainville's fort was forgetting people's names.

The first group I saw was ranged around Madame de Bellechasse in various attitudes of adoration. I was lounging by, when she gave the word of command, "Halte-là." I assumed the position of the soldier.

"Private Harding," she said, "will escort the Commandante to the lemonade. The Commandante is perishing with thirst."

But before we reached the buffet the Commandante forgot her thirst. Her infirmities assumed another shape. She was ready to sink with fatigue. Mr. Harding would lead her to a causeuse.

I was tempted to break my rule and fling myself at her feet. It would have been like the hundred millionth wave at the foot of Teneriffe, I know. But she was almost too bewitching for fallen human nature that night. Her eyes were dancing to a measure that Strauss would have lost his breath in attempting to follow. Her cheeks were ruddy as a child's. An impish spirit of mirth lurked in every dimple and curve of her lips. Her hair, which was trained down to the perfect brows, added to the effect. The great lady and the clever woman were gone on an indefinite leave of absence; nothing was left but the fresh, sparkling, intoxicating beauty.

Her first word startled me a little.

"Now hold up your head and answer; loud and distinct; you can't deceive me: what did you put your friend in jail for?"

This brought me back to serious matters "with a round turn," in nautical phrase. The thousand seductions which were wooing me to make a fool of myself sank into the background.

"For his own good?"

"How long are you going to keep him shut up?" The brown eyes were dancing like mad.

"Until I can persuade him that a man can be happy and useful in this world, even without the smiles of Madame de Bellechasse."

This young girl was always a mystery to me. But to-night she was more sphinx-like than ever. What was she smiling at so strangely? What mischievous goblin was capering in the depths of her eyes? She wore that evening, over a robe of "illusion," out of which she seemed escaping at the top, a broad, bright cherry-colored scarf, tied like a belt so loosely that while one side of it was fastened at the slender, serpentine waist, the other side hung half-way to her feet. She frequently indulged in these graceful originalities, whose art lay in their apparent artlessness. She reached to the lowest point of this trailing cestus, and took from a pocket concealed there a letter, which she handed me, saying, "Read; and the next time you try to excite mutiny among my subjects, come to me, and I will give you some valuable hints."

This is the letter I read; Adèle's inscrutable eyes watching me, a dozen French eyes watching her, and the music wailing an air from the Traviata Infelice:

"DEBTOR'S PRISON, Clichy.

"MADAME,—You once told me the best thing I could do was to go home. I was about to take your advice and leave Paris when I was arrested to-day for a small debt, at the instance of my friend Harding, who does not wish me to go. My preparations were all made, my means thus all exhausted. This debt is not just, but must be paid before I can go home. I owe one large debt, but can pay that after I am released.

"Please send me 300 francs by the bearer.

"Also,

"To-morrow, when you return from the Bois de Boulogne instead of coming into the Place de l'Etoile by the Avenue de l'Impératrice, I beg that you will turn off at the Rue de Presbourg and approach the Arch of Triumph by the Avenue de la Grande Armée. I will be where I can see you once more before I start on my journey.

"I ask of you these favors because I love you, and wish to be under some great obligation to you.

"You will grant them because you do not want my love, and will be glad to see me cured of it."

"Yours, even unto death," SHELBY CABELL."

"You understand this," I said.

"Perfectly. The man has a lucid interval, and is going back to Kentucky to 'reconstruct' himself. You have been frightened by his wild talk, and have put him under lock and key."

"You will not do what he asks?"

"Yes and No."

"You will not send him the money?"

"No, I will not," with laughing emphasis.

"But I will make the whimsical détour to-morrow that he requests."

"He will not see you from the windows of Clichy."

"My poor dear friend, you are so delightfully stupid this evening. I said I would not pay him out, because I have done it already."

"Cabell is free?" I gasped.

"As free as you are. Freer, because you are with me, and I suffer no liberties in my presence."

This was said with a smile and a glance that would have brought the Stylites from his pillar.

"Madame de Bellechasse," I said, "I fear you have done to-day an irreparable wrong. I beg you will not complete it by keeping that rendezvous to-morrow."

"Mr. Harding, you are growing tiresome. A gentleman as cool as you are in love-affairs should know that men don't slay themselves for honest women nowadays. I believe your friend Cabell loved me a little. I am grateful for it. I am glad he has recovered from his fancy. So I got him out of the Donjon-keep to-day, and I shall bow to him to-morrow with my best manner, as I roll in solitary grandeur up the Avenue of the Great Army. You will oblige me by calling les gens de Madame la Marquise de Bellechasse."

She passed out of the salon, nodding and smiling to the favored ones.

I hurried over to Cabell's quarters. Of course he had not returned. His concierge told me he had left the house in the morning, with a man of the law, and seemed high in wrath. I passed my night plotting and confessing that plotting was useless. In the morning I determined to try the Police. I should fail, I knew. I should be laughed at, and if Cabell chose, I should be in greater danger of being caged as mad than my imperturbable friend. But I hoped to gain a day or two of time, and now that Cabell seemed out of my reach my head was full of the most unanswerable arguments against suicide. If I could see him I would overwhelm him with my powerful and novel reasoning. I obtained from the Commissioner of Police two sergeants de ville, and in the afternoon we went to the Arch of Triumph. I gave them an accurate description of Cabell, and went with them to the top of the monument. He was not there. We descended, groping our way through the vast dark chambers, from one staircase to another. "How many doors are open to-day?" I asked the guard. "Only this." I placed my two sentinels on duty, and prowled around the vast monument, more at ease than I had been for many hours.

It was five o'clock, and already the reflux tide was pouring down the Avenue from the Bois. I was standing outside the great arch, on the western side, looking through the gathering haze to Neuilly, nestling on the right among the willows of the Seine; on the left the highlands stretching from St. Cloud to Mount Valerien, displaying its enormous bastions against the rosy sky. A paper pellet struck my hat and fell at my feet. I picked it up. It was a crumpled card. I read:

"Good-by and God bless you! I was in the dark chamber at the foot of the second staircase when you passed. I wanted to shake hands, but circumstances over which, etc. Give my love to the Bear Creek Boys. Her carriage has turned down the Rue de Presbourg."

I looked up. He was standing on the verge of the monument. He bowed and smiled.

I shouted to my policemen, "Le voilà, là-haut!" They rushed at the stairs. I turned and saw the Daumont of Madame de Bellechasse flashing and clattering into the Place de l'Etoile. Adèle started from her languid attitude in the cushions and nodded graciously, with a smile like a burst of sunshine. I saw the smile fade into an expression of horror. She fell back, covering her face with her hands.

I heard a rush and a splashing crash behind me. I saw that my boots were sprinkled with blood.

MRS. ROTH'S BRIDAL TOUR.

I.

THE good-bys were said; the family carriage returned with the parents to their home in West Fourteenth Street; and Spencer Roth was riding out of New York at the close of a day in June, in a sleeping-car of the Hudson River Railroad, with his new-made bride sitting beside him.

There were a few mild tears yet gleaming in the eyes of the beautiful girl-woman who a few hours ago was Miss Effie St. John—who was now Mrs. Spencer Roth. Very happy at heart was the petite wife, as she sat by the side of the true-hearted man whom she had given her deepest love—"My own darling husband now and forever," she whispered to herself—and those mild tears were but a daughter's tribute of filial love. Tears very easily forgiven by the fond husband, on the occasion of a first separation from the parents who had cared for her so tenderly these eighteen years, surrounding her with every good that wealth can bring.

But there was no occasion for serious grief, as Effie well knew. It was to be but a two-months' absence, this bridal tour of the newly married; and then they were to return to New York and live quite near the paternal residence—in the same street, in fact. And the tour was not even going to take them out of their own country.

It was near the close of the month of June. The programme of the tour lay for three or four weeks among their friends in different Western cities. And in the latter part of July they intended going to the cool and delightful regions of the Lake Superior country. Spencer Roth had spent one of his bachelor summers there, and he was naturally anxious his wife should enjoy that which he knew from experience to be so very enjoyable. He had often pictured to her the weird beauties and the novel experiences of the region; its wide-expanding fresh-water sea; its desolate yet beautiful mountain wastes, where the foot of man had never yet trodden; its picturesque mining towns climbing the sides of thickly-wooded hills; its whirling canoe-rides in the rapids of the Saut Ste. Marie.

"And shall I really see wild Indians too?" asked the little wife, with childlike interest.

They were conversing anew on the never-wearisome theme, as the cars bore them through the long hours of the Westward ride.

"How wild those Indians will be whom you will meet," was the reply, "will depend on our chances. The Indians the ordinary tourists see are possessed of a certain air of civilization, slight though unmistakable. Some peculiar opportunity may show us Indians of a more savage nature."

"Oh, I hope so!"

"Yes, I hope so too. Still you will see real Indians—those who perhaps a dozen years ago were quite savage in their mode of life; and in fact they still retain so much of their native wildness as to present a spectacle of deep interest to me, and to all city-bred people, I fancy. The true savage nature is in them yet. The glosses of civilization which cover the outside, so to speak, of their characters, do no more than that. Among themselves they are pure savage, with the ghastliest superstitions and idolatries."

"Do they worship idols?"

"Yes; they worship Lake Superior, in many instances, and have in their wigwams material idols, taken from the waters of the lake—bits of 'formed' copper as it is called. Other tribes hold to the commoner Indian superstitions about the Great Spirit and the Spirit Land. I saw an Indian funeral party that summer that I was there, who buried the dead man's accoutrements with him, and killed his dog upon his grave, that he might not be companionless in his long journey to the Spirit Land."

"How beautiful!" cried Effie.

"Very—in a poetical sense; but in a religious sense quite the reverse."

Mrs. Roth's mind was very much occupied during the whole of the month they were traveling among their Western friends, with the subject of their Lake tour. Her eagerness to "see Indians" might have led to an earlier start, but Mr. Roth knew that the trip would be much pleasanter in July and August, when the weather off the lakes is at its hottest.

Still this first month was a very happy one for the wife. Every where that they tarried expectant friends greeted them with holiday welcomes. And when, near the close of July, they finally left Chicago on the voyage up the lakes, some half a dozen of these friends went with them—namely, Dr. Burton and his wife, his mother-in-law, Mrs. North, her daughter, Jennie North, John Silversmith, and his sisters Kate and Julia Silversmith.

The long ride by steamboat was full of delights. By day a constant succession of novel scenes greeted the eye. The cool, delicious evenings were made happy with dancing and merry-making in the long cabins, and moonlight promenades on deck. The good Saturn plowed steadily on her way, freighted with a little world of humanity, from cities in every part of the United States; through wide Lake Michigan; through pleasant Huron; through silver-bosomed little St. Clair; and at last for days and nights through mighty Superior, with its ocean-like expanse of pure, cool waters.

It was in the curious-looking region that bears the name of Portage Entry, that the attention of our friends was first forcibly drawn to the behavior of a gang of half-breeds attached to the boat as deck-hands, who were continually pulling ashore with a heavy cable. This narrow channel is navigable by the steamers only with the utmost caution, being quite shallow as well as narrow, and winding about in a constant series of short curves, in which the long hull of a steamer is often at a loss for freedom of motion. It is only by taking a line ashore, and fastening it about tree-trunks, etc., that so large a vessel can be hauled about and made to pick its way through the devious passage. The half-breeds mentioned, who manned the boat that carried the necessary line, were all of them fine physical specimens of strength, but their faces bore an expression of the grossest stupidity. There was one of their number, however, who differed from his companions in the latter respect. He was a magnificent example of a civilized Chippewa—lithe, dark, and sinewy as the rest, and with a stronger arm, while beneath his forehead were two large black eyes, that shone like the eyes of a panther. He wore no hat, and his long black hair blew about his face with picturesque effect, as he sat in the boat pulling the strongest oar, or sprang ashore with the line and made it fast with a quick celerity that was wonderful to behold.

Groups of passengers sat on the decks watching the movements of these men with curious interest. Among others our friends were there.

"Do look at that splendid fellow without any hat on!" cried Effie; "did you ever see such a striking face?"

"I have had my eye on him for some time," said Roth. "He is a very fine specimen of his kind. But if I mistake not, his is an unmanageable nature. There's a bit too much wild-fire in his eye for perfect subordination, I should say."

This judgment was proved correct by the occurrence of the following day, when the boat was steaming steadily over the broad bosom of the giant of the lakes.

Mr. and Mrs. Roth sat on the forward deck, enjoying the inspiring atmosphere, and admiring the beautiful scene, with its smooth, broad field of gleaming waters, and the picturesque shores of Isle Royale in the dim distance. Suddenly sounds of altercation were heard beneath their feet, and Mrs. Roth, alarmed by the loud and angry voices, ran to the hatchway and looked down upon the scene below.

"Curse you!" exclaimed a brutal voice, "I'll make you do it, or I'll break every bone in your lazy skin!"

"No touch me," came the response; and Mrs. Roth saw that it was the bare-headed half-Chippewa of yesterday's boat-crew who spoke. "Too much talk. Big coward!"

The half-breed's eyes were glaring fiercely on the second-mate, a burly, hard-featured fellow with a most ugly look.

"What's the trouble down here?" asked Spencer Roth, descending the hatchway, followed by his little wife, very much alarmed, but feeling safe where her husband was.

"This cursed Injun disobeys orders, that's all," the second-mate made answer. "I ordered him to scrub down this deck, and he says it's clean enough now. What's that to him? I'll show him, burn him!"

With this utterance the enraged mate suddenly turned upon the half-breed, and struck at him a ponderous blow with his brawny fist. If it had reached its aim on the Chippewa's side-head he would have fallen like a clod. But the lynx-eyed fellow was too quick for his antagonist; in his hand he held a heavy broom, and lifting it with a dextrous and rapid movement, he received the blow on the broom-handle. The skin was peeled from the mate's knuckles.

In a burst of rage the mate flashed his long knife from the sheath on his hip, and rushed upon the half-breed with the purpose of stabbing him. Spencer Roth, who was a large and powerful man, coolly but quickly seized the mate's arm in his firm grasp and held him. At the same moment Effie Roth impulsively ran forward to the wondering half-breed with a gesture of protection.

At that moment good-natured Captain Jack Laurence brought his round red face on the scene. He ordered the mate to sheathe his knife, and the order was sullenly obeyed.

"Up to your old tricks, are you, Sam?" said the Captain, turning to the half-breed.

"Mate ugly," said Sam. "Make me work when no use. Deck all clean—see! Been working hard. Up all night at wheel too."

"That's true enough, Sam; but we can't have men on this boat who disobey orders. I told you what would come of it if you cut up any more. We'll put you ashore at Ontonagon."

And with this the easy-tempered Captain walked away.

"Now then, you red imp, I'm quit of you!" said the mate.

The half-breed replied only by a look—a side-long, contemptuous look out of his sloe-black eyes—but it was like fire to the powder of the enraged mate's soul.

"What do you mean by that look, you hound? I'll fix you, burn you! Jackson, fetch handcuffs. I'll fix you for the rest of this trip, by blood!"

"Don't iron Sam!" said the Chippewa. "No use. Sam hurt nobody."

"Mr. Jones," said Roth to the mate, "this seems an unnecessary cruelty. The man is not disposed to harm you or any one—that is plain enough. I will vouch myself for his good behavior the rest of the trip."

The half-breed's black eyes glowed like fire as they looked first at Mr. Roth and then at his little wife, who still stood by. What the look meant it was hard to tell.

"Leave my business alone, will you?" said the mate, in a boorish growl. "I'd thank the passengers on this boat to mind their own affairs and not interfere with mine."

At this juncture the handcuffs came.

"Now, burn you!" said the mate, "I'll cut your rotten liver out if you make any more muss. Put 'em on, Jackson."

But, to the relief and gratification of the bystanders, Sam made no resistance. He quietly put his hands in the irons, with another cool, bitterly contemptuous glance at the chafing mate.

"Go astern!" he roared.

The half-breed was taken down into the steerage and locked up.

Mr. and Mrs. Roth returned to the upper deck. Half an hour later Effie left her husband smoking a cigar by the wheel-house, and went in search of good-natured Captain Jack Laurence. The bluff Captain had a special admiration for Mrs. Roth.

"Any thing to please you," said he, gallantly.

So he descended into the steerage and released Sam with his own hands. The half-breed glared upon Effie again when he saw her at the Captain's back. He hitched up his pantaloons, flung back his long hair, and seated himself on a box by the companion-way.

"You'll be quiet now, won't you?" said Effie; "that's a good man. I'm sorry you're to be turned off, but I can't help it. Don't quarrel any more, please."

She put a gold piece in his hand. He stared at her as if he would look her through; ran his eye swiftly over her figure, her feet, her hands, as if daguerreotyping every detail on his memory, and pocketed the money with a satisfied grunt that spoke volumes.

It was late in the evening when the Saturn reached Ontonagon. The lights were lit, and dancing was under way in the saloon.

The custom of every evening on the present trip of the Saturn had been to remove the tables from the long dining-saloon on the main deck, and dance to the music of a small band of German musicians. The novelty of the surroundings and the wonderful exhilaration of the atmosphere rendered the amusement unusually attractive to its lovers. It was so to-night. Spencer Roth seldom danced, but Effie was fond of the graceful exercise, and her husband liked to see her happy. The pendent tassels swinging overhead with the motion of the boat; the lamps burning brightly; the merry party whirling in the giddy waltz, gliding through the smooth quadrille, romping in the monotonous contra-dance, made up a cheerful scene, in the midst of which our heroine was as joyous as the best.

"We have reached Ontonagon, Effie," said her husband, coming to her side, "and some of us are going ashore in a yawl. It is blowing some, and there is a pretty rough sea running. It is about half a mile to shore; the steamer can't get in any nearer, the harbor is so shallow. Would you like to go?"

"Oh yes," said Mrs. Roth, radiant with the gentle excitement of the hour; "to be sure I want to go where you go."

"Very well. I'll get your hat and cloak. Some half a dozen other ladies are going—the Misses Silversmith among the rest."

But when, a few minutes after, they stood at the gangway of the steamer, from which a flight of portable steps led into the yawl below, Captain Laurence said:

"If any of these ladies are inclined to get sea-sick easily, they better not go. The sea's running rough."

Thereupon the Misses Silversmith held back; they were afraid of getting sick. Mrs. Roth, however, had no fears. She had crossed and recrossed the Atlantic without that ghastly experience. So Mr. and Mrs. Roth, and John Silversmith were the only members of their own little party who went. There were several other ladies and gentlemen.

The yawl went dancing over the rough water in the darkness toward where the lights of the little mining village gleamed in the distance; and in a few minutes they landed and went rambling through the place.

After a stay of an hour or more the party prepared to return. But when they reached the yawl one of the ladies cried out that she had lost her diamond pin, and thought she must have dropped it in the parlor of the hotel. They were all in the boat now except Spencer Roth, who immediately volunteered to run up to the hotel and look for it. While he was gone the man in command of the yawl—it was the second-mate, Jones, whom Roth had incensed by his interference in the half-breed's behalf—declared he would wait no longer, and accordingly pushed off.

"But my husband!" cried Effie; "you must not leave him!"

"We can come back after your husband, ma'am," said the man, gruffly; "the yawl has got to come back any how after those stores.

It won't make no difference to him. It's no use to lose time, for there's a gale comin' up."

True enough, the wind was blowing quite stiffly by this time, and the extreme danger menacing small craft in these waters, no matter how near to the sandy shore, is well known to those familiar with Lake Superior. In a storm on a lee-shore, almost inevitable destruction awaits any small boat that is caught out. The peculiarly deep and combing sea that was now running awakened great apprehensions in the mate's mind. The result proved that these apprehensions were all too well founded. A sudden squall struck the yawl and she went over.

One moment the little boat was dancing bravely over the rough waves, the next she was capsized, and her precious freight cast into the bitter cold waters—cold as the wave of an arctic sea, even at midsummer—and darkness all about them.

In the healthful exercises of Radley School, on the Hudson, where Effie had graduated, she had become quite an expert swimmer, and had perfected herself in the art in summers at the sea-side; but in this rough water—with its icy coldness—her little strength was very soon exhausted. One look at the bright lights of the steamer gleaming in the distance, where the dancers yet were reveling—one murmured "Good-by, darling," as she thought of her husband, (safe! that was a blessed thought)—and then, in utter exhaustion, her eyes closed in darkness and oblivion.

Ten souls went down to death that hour.

Meantime Mr. Roth had returned to the shore and found the yawl-boat gone.

A couple of men stood on a heavy scow that bumped against the wharf to which it was made fast, keeping watch over a large basket of bread and some other stores for the steamer. They informed Mr. Roth of the action of the second-mate, but assured him the yawl would be back speedily after these provisions.

Sam, the half-breed, who had been put ashore at this point as agreed, came loitering across the scow to the group.

"Big wind comin'," said he. "Big sea. Bad for yawl be out such night."

"I know it is dangerous," said Roth. "I hope she will get safe to the steamer."

His voice trembled as he said this, thinking of Effie. For the second trip of the boat—in which he should later embark when there was greater peril—he had no thought. All his solicitude was for his wife.

The group waited there a long, long hour in silence; but no yawl came back. The wind grew fiercer. The lumbering scow tossed roughly at her mooring. Still they lingered, late into the night—till the rain began to pour in a drenching torrent; and at last they sought the shelter of the hotel in the village.

With the first light of the morning, the storm having subsided in the night, Captain Laurence sent a fresh yawl ashore. Spencer Roth stood on the wharf waiting with an anxious heart.

"Is—is every thing right, Mr. Christie?" he asked of the first-mate, who came in charge of the yawl.

"I'm afraid not, Sir."

"The party that went off to the boat last night—" he uttered, eagerly.

"Not a soul of them seen, Sir. No boat came in."

"My God!"

II.

Three days the Saturn lay at Ontonagon. The dead bodies were picked up one by one. John Silversmith's was the last found. The body of Mrs. Roth was still missing at the close of the third day.

"We shall have to start on the return to-morrow morning early, Mr. Roth," said Captain Laurence. "Shall you go back with us?"

"Certainly not," said Roth. "I shall stay at Ontonagon for the present."

The half-breed Sam made his appearance on board the Saturn half an hour later, inquiring for Mr. Roth. His words were few but fit.

"Come along 'o Sam," said he. "Find little wife by-'n-by."

One look into his eyes convinced the husband that there was hope in that direction. He went ashore with his baggage that night. Early the next morning he started out under the guidance of the half-breed.

Sam explained that he was born and reared in an Indian settlement back of Ontonagon, on the Three-Flint River, and that he was thoroughly acquainted thereabout. In roaming about the vicinity the past three days to "see what he could see," as he expressed it, he had come upon the deserted wigwam of one Red-arrow, a noted Chippewa desperado. From certain indications there beheld he believed that Red-arrow had in some mysterious way rescued the drowning wife, and had carried her away up the Three-Flint, where it was known he had before taken stolen goods. The deserted wigwam was so situated that it was nearly inaccessible by land. The two took a canoe and crossed over the harbor to the spot. Here Sam showed Roth a faint impression in the sand.

"That wife's foot," said he. "I know."

But this was not all. He produced the carefully-preserved remnants of a cooked salmon, which he had found there and hidden, and, showing it to Mr. Roth, remarked, "Little woman bite that and throw him away. Big Injun never bite so. Swallow such lump all one mouth. That wife."

"Let us waste no time, Sam," said the husband, now confident that Effie was indeed alive, but fearful as to the rest.

"I know," said Sam.

They re-entered the canoe and started for the Three-Flint settlement. Sam knew his way, and followed it swiftly. They soon left the waters of the lake and entered the Three-Flint. Paddles were of no avail here; the water was too swift; the canoe was urged on by "poling."

At an early hour in the afternoon they reached the Indian village.

Sam went ashore, leaving Mr. Roth to guard the canoe, and made his inquiries. Red-arrow had a family there; indeed there were two squaws together doing the honors of his household and living quite peacefully together; but they declared positively that they had seen nothing of their lord and master for more than a week. Sam, believing that they lied, laid his case before the chief of the tribe, and the result was, it was ascertained that Red-arrow had been seen there the night before at a funeral pow-wow.

The question now was where had he secreted his prize? They no longer doubted that they were on the right track.

Sam, using his knowledge of the region with a wise discretion, finally resolved that their best course would be to examine the shores of the river in the vicinity. The stream at this point was wide and still. But to venture out in daylight would give the cunning Red-arrow all the advantage. Hence they were forced to lie idle till nightfall.

They could now move about on the water in their canoe with a degree of boldness. A few strokes of the paddles brought them out into the middle of the stream. Suddenly Sam spoke:

"See light?"

"Where?" said Mr. Roth.

"There!" and he pointed to a certain spot in the dim outline of the shore.

"I can see nothing," said Roth.

But the half-breed's eyes were keener.

"Light there," said he. "I see him. Red-arrow there. Git him."

With cautious strokes they neared the shore, but it was not till the canoe grated gently on the sand that the untrained eyes of the city resident detected a faint glow among the thickly-set forest trees.

"Pull boots off," whispered Sam close at Roth's ear.

Then they drew the canoe ashore noiselessly and crept barefooted toward the light. It was the light of a fire within a wigwam of birch-bark. A low opening in front enabled the husband to see this. But presently his eyes, straining eagerly through the darkness, saw more: Poor Effie, with white, white face, lying asleep on a blanket, and a burly Indian smoking his pipe near by.

The Indian heard something—a breath—a footfall. He put his pipe slowly down, listening.

A fierce bound forward, and Spencer Roth was in the wigwam. Red-arrow sprang to his feet with a howl of dismay, and rushed toward his foe, only to feel his copper-colored neck grasped by a hand of iron, that lifted him till he stood on tip-toe, and then flung him backward in an inglorious heap.

As Mr. Roth turned to take his wife in his arms the Indian gathered himself together for a second spring, but he was confronted by a pistol in the hands of the half-breed.

"Red-arrow, lie down 'gin," said Sam. "Keep still!"

Effie, half-conscious, feeling the tender kisses of her husband on her lips, opened her eyes, fastened them for an instant on his face, and then closed them again, without a word, and drew her husband down upon her breast.

"Effie! you have suffered so much. You are ill."

"Yes; but you have come!" was her answer, infinite content smoothing all the pain out of her features.

How they returned to Ontonagon in safety; how Sam was well rewarded: how Effie's bloom came back to her face; and how they journeyed, a happy pair, home to New York again, I will not relate at length. Mrs. Roth has her story yet to tell. It may easily be believed that for some months this lady was the sensation of the hour in a large and fashionable circle; and that she related this portion of her bridal tour very often to eager listeners.

And these are the words in which she told it, from the point to which I have told it in my own:

"When I recovered my consciousness I found myself in a low wigwam, alone with a monstrous Indian—one of the Chippewa tribe, Spencer says—who was sitting cross-legged by me, smoking a pipe with a grotesque stone bowl.

"At first I thought I was dreaming. Then I was bewildered. It was still night, and the light in the wigwam was but dim. I brushed my eyes with my hands, and winked them hard; but all I could do at best was to gaze about me in silence at the hideous, copper-colored face that stared so stolidly down upon me—at the birchen roof over my head—at the fishing-nets in the corner, and the few Indian trinkets hanging about. At last I remembered the boat-ride, the storm, the capsizing of the yawl-boat, my efforts to swim, and the oblivion into which I sank.

"I raised myself quickly on my elbow then.

"You brought me here?" said I.

"He nodded.

"Where am I?" was the next question. I hoped I might be near enough to the village to return there easily with daylight.

"Wigwam," grunted the Indian.

"I see," said I; "but where? How far from Ontonagon?"

"Big way," said he; "hundred mile. No git there."

"You saved my life," said I, and tears of gratitude actually filled my eyes. "You shall be well rewarded, after you have returned me to my friends."

"He made no reply at all to that, but puffed away serenely at his curious pipe.

"But how could you save me?" said I. "I don't understand at all, and I want to know."

"Red-arrow got long eyes," said he. "See in dark. White squaw float. Red-arrow see. Go out in canoe. Bring here."

"That was the longest speech the Indian made during all the time I was with him. He wasted very few words on me.

"I soon found out that the savage had determined to carry me away from my friends instead of toward them. He said he wanted a wife, and that the Big Water gave me to him. I tried to coax and tempt him first, and then I told him he would be found out and severely punished if he carried me off. But nothing produced any effect on him. 'Go sleep,' he grunted.

"Take me to my friends, and I will give you more money than you ever saw in your life."

"Go sleep!"

"So when I found how useless words were, I lay down again and fell asleep quickly, for I was quite exhausted. I slept soundly, without dreaming; and when I awoke it was from the Indian shaking me by the shoulder. He bade me get up, and I did. How anxiously I looked about me no words can tell. It was a wild spot, hemmed in on every side by high rocks, except the side that was open to the water. It was in a cove, and the green waters murmured on the pebbly shore like music—but it was very sad music to my ear.

"The Indian went down to the shore, where lay a pile of fish that he had evidently caught before I was awake. He took a great salmon-trout in his left hand, and dressed it with a few dextrous passes of his knife. Then he produced a bit of tough yellow tinder and rubbed it with a stick till he got a light, and built a fire on a smooth rock close by the wigwam. (There is a piece of the tinder now on the what-not in my bedroom; Spencer got it; he says it is a fungus that grows on the trunks of birch and maple trees.) Then he cooked the fish on the fire, and tore off a great piece and bade me eat. I could not eat, I felt so unhappy; but he compelled me to take the piece. I was anxious not to make him angry, for his face was a frightfully ugly one, and he was evidently in his most gracious mood at that time. So I ate what I could, and flung the rest away. It was as tasteless as water to me.

"The Indian, as soon as the meal was over, went around a big rock and dragged out his canoe from where it was hidden. It was nothing but a great water-tight basket, though as graceful in shape as a fairy boat. He motioned me to enter, and I obeyed. Then he gave a long running push, jumping into the canoe like a gymnast, and it shot far out upon the smooth water.

"But oh! imagine my emotion when, as we paddled out of the sheltered cove, I beheld in plain view the steamer Saturn lying idly on the water, and the village of Ontonagon just beyond! A thrill of hope shot through my heart, and I sprang to my feet with eager joy, my face flushing hot.

"You are going to take me back?" I cried, pressing my hands on my beating heart.

"The only reply he made was to paddle rapidly away in an opposite direction. What I uttered in that moment of dreadful excitement I hardly know. I stretched out my hands toward the boat, and tears rained down my cheeks. Probably I tried to spring overboard, for the Indian caught me rudely by the shoulder and pushed me down upon the bottom of the canoe.

"Squaw, be still!" he cried. "Think swim there? Deep water! Look!"

"And I did look, for every word this man uttered was a stern command, not said for effect, but to be obeyed; and through the translucent depths I saw the pebbly bottom shining, far down below.

"Every body seems to wonder why I did not faint at that moment. Instead of fainting it seemed as if I became suddenly filled with the keenest life. It was as if I gathered all the resources of my nature to meet the emergency put upon me. I resolved I would not think of Spencer and of home. I determined to keep my thoughts as busy as possible with the objects to be seen as we rode along. I found this a great help in stilling my emotions and diverting my mind from the real horror of my situation. Every thing I saw from that time forward became stamped indelibly on my memory. Lying crouched on the bottom of the frail canoe, I rested my head upon the edge and looked down into the water. It was so marvelously clear that, as I looked down, it seemed almost as if the canoe was floating upborne in the air. Though the water was very deep, every pebble on the bottom was visible; and hundreds of fishes were swimming all about, just as plainly seen as the fish in my aquaria.

"By-and-by we came to the entrance of a little river that poured its sparkling waters into the lake, and the Indian entered this river. The current was quite swift and the water very shallow, and the Indian laid his paddle on the bottom of the canoe and used a long pole to push along the stream. It was slow work, and after an hour or so we came to a waterfall. How he would manage now I wondered greatly; but he stranded the canoe and bade me get out. Then he lifted it easily on his shoulders, and tramped along till we had passed the fall some distance.

"When we took to the water again the river was much wider and deeper, and the current very slight. The Indian used his paddle again, and we presently reached a lakelike expanse, where the current was scarcely perceptible. The shores were low and sandy, and a dense forest stretched away on every side.

"At last we came to a point where I thought the journey would end. It was the first spot I had seen thus far that was not covered with trees. It was but a few rods in extent along the shore, but how far back it reached I could not see, for in the fore-ground there rose three huge earth-mounds, the central one a little back of the others, which shut off the view completely. But I saw a line of smoke rising up from behind the mounds, and concluded there was an Indian village there. But though the Indian paddled nearer the shore he did not stop here, but went on for about half a mile further, where the forest was again unbroken. Here he ran the canoe ashore. It glided half its length out of the water upon the smooth sands, and the Indian, who sat in the lower end, motioned me to get out. He hauled the canoe out of the water and started off with it into the wood, driving me before him. A few steps brought us to a birchen wigwam, which appeared to have been long untenanted. He pointed me to a corner, and bade me lie down and go to sleep. I told him I was hungry, and he took from a pouch at his side a cold cooked salmon—one of those he had caught in the morning—and gave it to me without a word.

"Oh, the dreary watch of that long, long night! I did not sleep; I could not. I heard the Chippewa snoring where he slept in the gloomy darkness. The first faint streaks of the morning light entered the wigwam, and I was still awake. The Indian slept; and as my eye fell on the long knife he wore in his belt I felt a dreadful temptation to seize it and plunge it in his heart. How glad I am now that he awoke before I had attempted to commit the fearful deed!

"The most of that day the Indian spent in patching up the dilapidated wigwam with fresh pieces of bark and in mending the fishing-net that he had brought from the other wigwam. Late in the afternoon he came up to me, and for the first time bent on me a steady, prolonged gaze of observation. I wondered what that boded; my heart beat very fast. At last he uttered two words—"Stay here"—and went down to the beach, and pushed off in his canoe.

"I ran to the water's edge, and watched him out of sight. At first I felt only a sensation of freedom. Then I thought of my desolate situation, alone in the deep wilderness, and the darkness coming down. He had left me no food and no fire. Had he left me to starvation, or would he come back? When I thought that I said to myself, 'If he comes back he shall not find me here.'

"But where to go? The woods were deep and dense, and grew close down to the water's edge. But I was sure that behind those strange mounds I had seen there was an Indian settlement. Then I remembered what Spencer had told me about the Lake Superior Indians—how they stood in deadly fear of the white man, and would never offend him if there was the least danger of discovery. Whether this Indian village was inhabited by Chippewas or Ojibways I knew that they would have this feeling in their hearts; and though one solitary Indian might dare to risk white vengeance—just as murderers and robbers in this city risk the vengeance of the law—yet I had strong hopes that these Indians as a community would give me protection. Then I was determined to promise them a great reward; and, on the whole, my hopes were pretty strong.

"So I knelt down and prayed to God to protect me through the dark woods, and started.

Spencer says that I probably trod that night where human foot never before ventured; for the Indians never go much into the woods, because there is no game there, and they subsist wholly by the fisheries and by making trinkets to sell at the mining towns. I can't tell you what I suffered in that dreadful journey. I stumbled over brush and roots in the black darkness; I went knee-deep into the mud and ooze of dismal marshes; I tore my hands and face and neck, and felt the blood trickling from the wounds; but I struggled on, crying over and over again, 'O God, help me! help me!'—through tangled bushes and thick-growing shrubs, smelling strange scents from unseen flowers and herbs, hearing nothing but my own cries and struggles in the dead silence, slipping and falling upon slimy, moss-grown tree-trunks, into dark waters thickly covered with the broad, floating flowers and leaves of great white pond-lilies. It could not have been more than a mile, even with my repeated wanderings from the way—for I tried hard to keep the river-waters in sight as a guide—but I was hours in going that mile, and each hour seemed an age to me. Even with hope cheering me on, that night's struggling toil through the tangled wilderness was the most dreadful part of my experience—impressed my memory most forcibly with its dark horror.

"It must have been about midnight when I heard floating on the night air a mournful human howl that chilled my blood in my veins. I stopped an instant, and then pushed wearily on. A minute more and I saw a lurid light gleaming through the trees and dasky figures moving about. One more effort, and I stood upon the edge of an open place in the wood; and discerning the outline of those huge mounds against the sky, I believed I had reached a place of safety and ultimate deliverance.

"But here was no village, so far as I could discern in the darkness. There was but one wigwam visible. From this a dull light issued through a score of crevices, with clouds of smoke. There was a heap of smouldering embers near the wigwam, indicating a recent fire, but the dusky figures I had seen were gone. There was nobody moving about; so I crept cautiously up to the wigwam, and peered through one of the crevices at the wild, strange scene within.

"The habitation was as full as it could be of Indians of all ages and sexes—lying on their backs, sitting cross-legged, lolling on their breasts. Several of them were smoking—both men and women—and the wigwam was filled with such a cloud that I could hardly tell one from another at first. The place was lighted only by a fire of twigs and bark that burned in the centre of the group. An old man sat cross-legged, with a queer kind of a drum in his lap, that he was beating with a monotonous tum! tum! while he howled a horrible, dirge-like Indian song in accompaniment. His hair was white as snow, and fell in confusion about his dark face. A younger Indian, a perfect giant in size, sat by his side, beating time in the air with a great tin thing like a big rattle-box. It was a wild, mysterious scene to me, and I was deeply impressed by it. I did not know till afterward that it was a Chippewa funeral pow-wow, and that with these hideous noises all night long the ignorant savages sought to waft the spirit of a dead brave across the dark waters into the Spirit Land. But just as I was on the point of making myself known to these people a great flat hand was placed suddenly and silently over my mouth, and I was thrown over a man's shoulder in the darkness and borne away to the river.

"I tried to scream, but it was useless to try. He kept his hand on my mouth till he had placed me in his canoe, and tied a blanket tightly about my face. I was nearly smothered; but it was only a few minutes before I was released again, and the canoe stopped.

"It was Red-arrow, and he had brought me back to his wigwam.

"'White squaw fool,' said he. 'Be sick now.'

"How sick I was Spencer can tell you. He found me, as you know, and brought me home at last."

This was the way Mrs. Roth usually ended the story of her bridal tour—told, woman-fashion, just as its sights and incidents impressed her.

As to the Indian, Red-arrow, it is believed he was killed outright by his tribe, having perpetrated a series of grave offenses against the whites, whom he hated fiercely, but whom his fellows feared with an abject and cringing fear. Certainly he has never been heard of by the people of Ontonagon since his elopement with Mrs. Spencer Roth.

SLEEP.

WE may fairly apply to the subject of Sleep the well-known theory of Auguste Comte, that each of our leading conceptions, each branch of our knowledge, passes successively through three different theoretical conditions: first, the theological; secondly, the metaphysical; and thirdly, the positive or scientific. It may be doubted, however, whether, in the minds of the many, sleep has even now come forth from the first of these, or at any rate from the second, which is but a modification of the first. The supernatural and the mysterious still envelop sleep and dreams, and men in general, as well as poets or metaphysicians, are far from that knowledge which Comte would have called positive.

In the old days, when there were gods on Olympus, nay, even at an earlier time, before the Titanic divinities fell from their high estate to "wander in vain about bewildered shores," Sleep, the son of Erebus and Nox, gave rest to mortals and gods. Sleep, the brother of Death (consanguineus leti), dwelt in his dark cave with Dreams around him, and Morpheus as his minister to guard him from noise. Sleep and Death together bore Sarpedon's body to the land of the Lycians: and at the very vestibule and gate of Orcus did the pious Æneas see the same twin brethren seated when he visited Pluto's realm. Sleep was as godlike an agency to the nations of old as death itself. The death of each day's life it still seems to us, and men tread softly and speak low in the presence of the dead, as though they fear to wake them from their everlasting rest. "It is that death by which we may literally be said to die daily: a death which Adam died before his mortality: a death whereby we live a middle and moderating point between death and life. In fine, so like death, I dare not trust it without prayers, and an half-adieu unto the world, and take my farewell in a colloquy with God."*

Passing from the theological, we come to a stage, where, if sleep be not a divinity, it nevertheless is supernatural, beyond the physical, metaphysical. Something which metaphysicians and psychologists have much pondered and marveled at—something which they have hoped would explain the union of mind and body, and the disunion thereof: from which great men even of to-day think we may learn the mind's independence of matter, its capacity of existence without matter, illustrated by all the wonderful phenomena of dreams. The long succession of images passing through the mind in a moment of time has seemed to prove our independence of time and space. "We are somewhat more than ourselves in our sleeps, and the slumber of the body seems to be but the waking of the soul. It is the ligation of sense, but the liberty of reason; and our waking conceptions do not match the fancies of our sleeps. Were my memory as faithful as my reason is then fruitful, I would never study but in my dreams."† In this metaphysical stage of inquiry dreams, not sleep, are the phenomena to be investigated. But who shall exhaust the subject of dreams, or who shall review the treatises written thereupon, and the speculations they have called forth? All have experience of them; all have marvelous stories to relate, and all have theories to correspond. But "man is but a patched fool" if he go about to expound his dreams, and so I do not intend to examine the metaphysics of them.

Let us approach the positive view of bodily sleep—that sleep, kindly and beneficent, "which covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak, that is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the hot."‡ This is the sleep which we can really examine positively, as we see it in others, as we see others enjoy it or fade for want of it, as we see it in the infant who passes more than half its whole life asleep, as we see it in the stripling, the sound and dreamless sleep, the dulcis et alta quies of healthy vigor, or the sleep of old age, when the inactive brain is either refreshed by short slumbers, or, in its atrophy and second childhood, sleeps away its declining days. For excessive proneness to sleep is a sign of decay and waste of brain. It has been noticed in the wane of many a once great intellect. It was noticed only the other day in one of the giants of our own time, William Whewell.

Whereas the metaphysician speaks of the soul as quitting in dreams its earthly tenement, and wandering at its will, knowing no laws—the physician looks on sleep as the rest, and the only rest, of the brain, of that portion of the brain wherein reside those functions which we call mind. All parts of our bodies rest at one time or other: they can not always work, but for their rest they need not all sleep. They rest when not in active work, between their work, some more, some less; but the brain proper, that is, the higher mental part thereof, rests only in sleep. It may labor little, it may cease, as many have to cease, from extreme toil; but it only really rests and recruits itself for fresh work when sleep is present: and so in many illnesses, in the fierce raving of delirium, in maniacal frenzy, and the wandering of fever, we know that sleep must come, or death. The other parts of the bodily system, as of the nervous system, are at work during sleep, though with slackened pace. The heart beats slower, the breath comes more quickly and less frequently; but heart and lungs do their work, and are supplied with due nerve-power in sleep as well as in waking. The same with the great organs of alimentation, digestion, and so on. All that are concerned with the vegetative life of the organism discharge their functions during natural sleep. Even the muscular organs are more or less at work: we can sleep sitting in a chair or on horseback, nay even standing. The muscles may be relaxed, the head may sink upon the chest, or fall back against the chair, but the body does not fall as it would were muscular power totally abolished. Even movements may be executed in sleep from reflex action, or mere automatic instinct; but they are not guided by consciousness. In short, we see that, although the body and the bodily functions, muscular and visceral, partake, to a great extent, of the general respite from any thing like hard work, yet they are not stopped, like the higher functions of the brain. The body does not sleep, the higher brain alone does.

What are the higher functions of the brain, and do they all and always lie idle in sleep? Here is matter for much curious speculation. The higher functions of the brain we call collectively "mind," and philosophers are now pretty well agreed to divide mind into three groups of phenomena: 1. Those of intellect or ideas. 2. Those of feeling. 3. Those of the will. These are all of them in abeyance in perfect dreamless sleep; but in the different states or stages between waking and this perfect sleep there is every gradation in the activity or inactivity of them. If it be asked which of the three groups is most completely extinguished by sleep, is least compatible with sleep, we may, I think, at once answer—the will. As sleep steals over us we can neither control our thoughts nor actions. As we fall asleep after dinner the book or the paper slips from our hands, and we lose control of thought; we can not fix our attention on the page, our ideas wander and get mixed up or confused, and we slide into oblivion, to dream or not—most likely the former. Here, then, volition has come to an end, feeling and sensation will be extinguished, or nearly so; but if dreams are going on, the third, or idea-faculty, will be still active and at work, the others being at rest. Sleep, the rest of the brain, is then imperfect: ideas, memories of old events, of people past and present, long since stored up in the brain-granary and in waking-time forgotten, now course along one after the other, jumbled in fantastic mêlée, “the fickle pensioners of Morpheus’ train.” But they do not always excite feeling: we are not always surprised or hurt or grieved or pleased. When they do, when they become more exciting, and we are terrified at the lion or the bull that seems about to seize us, feeling is strongly roused, and we wake. The same with external sensations of cold, heat, noise, or light. Slight sensations we may experience, and still sleep on, but strong feeling or sensation, and sleep, are incompatible. The idea-faculty may be at work in sleep almost throughout; but feeling will be absent, except in a very slight degree, and volition will be quite annihilated; we have no control over our dreams. Volition seems to be that perfect harmony of feeling and intellect which is broken at once by sleep.

The dislocation of these two, whether by sleep or by any brain disease or disturbance, terminates true volition. But sleep, in which the idea-portion of the mind is at work, is not perfect sleep, or perfect rest of the brain. We wake unrefreshed, and say we have been dreaming all night, and if the dreams have been terrific, and great feeling has been excited, the sleep will have been all the less refreshing. Everyday experience clearly proves that the sounder the sleep and the less the mind is at work during it, the greater is the benefit derived. It is an old and vexed question whether we are always dreaming in sleep or not. It was asked by Aristotle, and is asked still, and great names may be ranked on either side of the controversy. Sir Benjamin Brodie and Sir Henry Holland say that dreams are always going on: Lord Brougham thinks the contrary, that we only dream just as we wake. It is a point not capable of demonstration; but we are often awakened out of deep sleep without having the slightest consciousness of dreaming, and if we closely observe a sleeper, we may often see to some extent whether he dreams or not. Dreams can not exist in the sleep of a new-born child for the simple reason that ideas do not yet exist. They have not as yet been laid up in the babe’s storehouse of experiences: its life is one of sensations and feelings, which when repeated and remembered grow into ideas, but time is required before this can happen. Upon the whole, it is most reasonable to suppose that in perfect sleep we do not dream, that our ideas are so reduced to inactivity, so disconnected one from another, that nothing like a dream goes on. And this only I conceive to be perfect rest of brain. In a state short of this perfect rest ideas start into train and assume shape and sequence, and constitute a dream, and this may become frightful and evoke feeling, and we wake. Further than this I do not wish to discuss dreams: I only mention them to show that, in perfect sleep, dreams, that is, idea-operations, are absent, as well as feeling and volition. The mind, or, in other words, the highest brain-function, ceases to act; nutrition and repair alone go forward in the brain. All animals and all parts of animals require their periodic rest. The heart rests between its beats, the lungs between the respirations, muscles can not always be at work, the stomach can not always be digesting. These are all nourished and revived when not at work, and so is the brain when it rests in sleep.

We may conclude from all this, that conscious feeling is incompatible with sleep. The course of ideas in a dream may be sometimes preserved in memory, and the feeling they excite, if very vivid, may by memory be kept and reproduced for a long period, but during the dream we can not be said to have been conscious of our real and actual existence. And this brings us to consider what that is which either rouses us from sleep, or forbids sleep to fall upon us, which keeps the brain at work, and hinders its repose. It appears to be a certain strong excitation of that function of the nerve-centres, which we roughly call Feeling, whether it be the feeling of emotional excitement, such as the passions or sentiments, or fear of impending disaster, or hopes of much-coveted and eagerly expected good-fortune, or the feeling of bodily pain, or even strong sensations of noise or light. All these may be grouped together under the name of feelings, and any one of them, if sufficiently potent, will prevent the access of sleep or banish it from the sleeper. Let us look at this at somewhat greater length.

Probably the most frequent cause which keeps awake those who enjoy neither the happy carelessness of childhood, nor the apathy of old age, with its torpid and blunted sensibilities, is mental worry, or anxiety of some kind or other. The professional man, whatever his calling, has constantly some important matter on hand, which may turn out well or ill, about which he can not help thinking. The physician has some patient in danger, who by to-morrow will be better or worse; the lawyer has some cause célèbre; the artist is thinking whether his picture will be hung at the Academy or rejected; the speculator is wondering whether the funds will rise or fall; each one’s bread and his family’s, his fame and fortune, is at stake; he is over-anxious, he can not sleep. Another has been sitting up late at some brain-work, and though, perhaps, he has no great fears about it, yet he has been working long and hard, and he can not forget it and shake it off, and it follows him after he has laid his head on his pillow, longing for sleep. Anticipated pleasure, no less than fear, may excite and rouse us and banish sleep. The eve of many a day of keen enjoyment to be marked with a white stone, the first of September, or the long-looked-for holidays, have brought but scanty slumbers to expecting youth. As men grow older they take such things more quietly. The giorni da festa are rarer and less gay. They are kept awake more by anticipated pains than pleasures.

Not only mental but bodily causes also may prevent sleep. There may be discomfort of every conceivable kind, from actual violent pain to the malaise of dyspepsia after an indigestible meal, or an uncomfortable position, or an ill-made bed. Most of us have been kept awake by pain of some kind, a raging tooth or a gouty toe. And most of us know the uneasiness attending upon indigestion, which, though it may not amount to pain, does nevertheless, by that mysterious process which the old writers called "sympathy," react upon the nervous centres, and stimulates them sufficiently to banish sleep. And in the same way hunger, when there is nothing at all to be digested, will often keep us awake. Cold will prevent sleep; so also will undue heat. Here, too, is discomfort, and besides this, cold extremities bear a certain reference to the general circulation of the blood, which also is affected by excess of heat. Any stimulus of the external senses will prevent sleep, and any thing to which the senses are not accustomed will stimulate them. We most of us need the silence and the darkness of the night to lull us, but fatigue and custom will overcome this habit, and many can in a short time sleep in daylight, or with incessant noise sounding in their ears. And the very withdrawal of this accustomed noise will often act as a stimulus to these persons and rouse them up.

What wakes us up when we are sleeping a healthy sleep? Very little will do it, when we have had a good long refreshing sleep, comparatively slight external stimuli—sound, light, or touch. We are said to wake of our own accord, which means generally that some little incident rouses us from our light morning sleep. It is in the morning, too, that we dream most, which goes to show that we dream in our light, and not in our profound sleep. But if we have only been asleep a short time, it takes a loud noise and a hard push to wake us. But we may be roused by other causes besides external ones: we may be disturbed by bodily pain, or internal discomfort, or by an uneasy posture. Lastly, we are often waked by a vivid dream. The feeling of the nerve-centres is strongly stimulated by something or other, and the result is action, as it is after every excitation of feeling, action either mental or bodily. A certain amount of action may take place without waking: we change our position in sleep if it be uncomfortable, and then we probably sleep on. Nay, we may even be prompted to the action of the somnambulist, or somniloquist, without waking; but if the stimulation be strong, whether it be pain, or the fright of a dream, or an external sensation, it excites the centre beyond sleeping point, and we wake.

What is the explanation of all this? Why are we prevented from sleeping: why are we aroused? What is the physical condition which favors or repels sleep? This much we may conclude from what has been already said, that, as sleep is the rest of the highest part of the brain, it must be a condition of this part which favors or repels sleep. Healthy sleep presupposes a healthy state of brain, and we must carefully exclude from our notions of sleep all those phenomena which are the result not of healthy but of unhealthy processes going on in the brain, some of which, though apparently akin to sleep, nevertheless depend on an entirely opposite condition of things. Such states as coma, trance, catalepsy, insensibility from apoplexy or pressure, or alcohol or poisons, have only this in common with sleep, that there is unconsciousness: they differ altogether in the fact that from this unconsciousness the sufferer can not be roused. From healthy sleep we can be roused easily.

Recent observations and researches seem to prove to demonstration that the sleep of man and animals depends on the state of the circulation of the blood in the brain proper. One theory, which I mention, but which is now nearly abandoned, is that it depends on the pressure of distended veins. The modern opinion, and I believe the true explanation, is, that it follows a diminution both in the quantity and rapidity of the circulating blood, and that if this reduced rate of circulation be increased by any cause sleep departs. The writings and experiments of Mr. Durham, Dr. Jackson, and others have thrown great light on this subject, and tend strongly to remove all doubt as to this being the true interpretation. As it is clearly of great practical importance that we should know what it is that we want to bring about when we are trying to procure sleep, it will be well to examine the theory briefly. The principal evidence as to the state of the human brain in sleep is derived from the observation of a woman at Montpellier, a case well known and often quoted. She had lost a portion of the skull-cap, and the brain and its membranes were exposed. "When she was in deep or sound sleep, the brain lay in the skull almost motionless; when she was dreaming it became elevated, and when her dreams, which she related on waking, were vivid or interesting, the brain was protruded through the cranial aperture." This condition has also been experimentally brought about and observed in animals, and the same result has been seen, namely, that in sleep the surface of the brain and its membranes became pale, the veins ceased to be distended, and only a few small vessels containing arterial blood were discernible. When the animal was roused, a blush spread over the brain, which rose through the opening of the bone. The surface became bright red; innumerable vessels, unseen before, were now every where discernible, and the blood seemed to be coursing through them very rapidly. The veins, like the arteries, were full and distended, but their difference of color rendered them clearly distinguishable. When the animal was fed and again allowed to sink into repose the blood-vessels gradually resumed their former dimensions and appearance, and the surface of the brain became pale as before. The contrast between the appearances of the brain during its period of functional activity, and during its state of repose or sleep, was most remarkable.*

These observations entirely contradict the theory that sleep is due to pressure from distended veins, to venous congestion. And further experiments made by Mr. Durham proved that when pressure was made upon the veins, and distension of them produced, the symptoms which followed were not those of sleep, but of torpor, coma, or convulsions. And this view is completely corroborated by what we know of diseases which are accompanied by these symptoms. Common observation, too, confirms it; we must often have noticed when looking at a person asleep, that the face appeared paler than usual, and that a flush came over it on waking; and all are agreed that the general circulation is diminished, as also the respiration, during sleep. A person in tranquil and natural sleep often breathes so slowly and so gently that we are obliged to listen attentively to discover that he breathes at all.

Can we go any further? Can we say why it is that the diminished supply of blood produces sleep and rest for the brain? We may have recourse to one of two theories, but here we can not bring demonstrative proof so easily as we did before. First, we may propound a chemical theory, that oxydation of the brain-substance, being in proportion to the vascular activity, is diminished as the latter is reduced, and then sleep follows. This is true, no doubt, so far as it goes. That the blood in the brain changes from arterial to venous, parting with its oxygen, we know, but there still remains the question, why does the arterial action lessen so as to allow of sleep ensuing? The chemists say that the products of oxydation accumulate, and by their accumulation interfere with the continuance of the process, and act as a kind of regulator, just as a lighted taper is extinguished in a close jar by the products of its own combustion. But we constantly see that this is not the case, that although the brain action be violent in the extreme, and sleep be absent for days together, no products of oxydation put a stop to the process, but it goes on till ended by death. Chemistry fails, as it always does, to explain the whole of any vital process. In the more guarded, though less mathematical, language of physiology, we may say that every thing which stimulates the brain to a certain amount of action prevents sleep, and that this stimulus must be removed before sleep can be obtained. The stimulus may arise within or without the bodily organism. External events influencing the mind, and causing cares and anxieties—hopes and fears; or affecting the body, as heat and cold—may quicken the circulation and drive away sleep. The stimulus, too, may arise from within. The disordered stomach may, by sympathy with heart and lungs, quicken the flow of blood to the brain, and either banish sleep or disturb it, and so bring to us all the horrors of nightmare. That mental emotion does quicken the brain circulation is a fact known to all; whether it be slight or whether it be violent, transitory or permanent, it increases cerebral action. And this acceleration once established does not cease of a sudden. An instant conversion of fear or anxiety into the certainty of prosperity or success may sometimes at once bring relief, and from sheer fatigue sleep may follow, but more frequently the effect of the mental tension is kept up for some considerable time. When we have been working for hours with toiling brain we do not go to sleep the moment we lay our heads on the pillow—sleep comes to us slowly and coyly. The head feels hot, and we hear the rapid pulse beating in it as we lie, and only by degrees does the quickness of this abate.

Why brain-work raises the rate of the circulation, is a question of physiology which, like many others, we can only answer by having recourse to general principles. Whenever any part of the body is actively employed a larger supply of blood is sent to it: as motion warms our hands and feet, so the working brain demands and procures a larger supply of blood than the idle one. And the brain is stimulated beyond all doubt, not only according to the quantity of the blood sent to it, but also according to the nature and quality of it. It is reasonable to suppose that alteration in this must affect the brain-function, and observation and experiments prove that it does. From all this that has been said about the various circumstances which prevent sleep it may be possible to deduce the methods of procuring it, at any rate, on some of the occasions when it appears as if it would never come. Many persons are habitually bad sleepers, and all know what it is to lie awake and be unable to go to sleep, even when they are in ordinary health. We can promote sleep by removing every thing which is likely to stimulate the brain and the brain circulation, and also by reducing the circulation by other means, and lessening the susceptibility and excitability of the brain as far as possible.

First, we must get rid, so far as we are able, of all sources of discomfort which are likely to harass and stimulate the brain. Mental anxiety and worry are perhaps the most frequent of these. But it will be said that we can not remove anxiety. This is too frequently true; and then, if it banishes sleep night after night, and the sufferer is harassed and worried and gets no rest, serious results follow. If the anxiety or grief be irremovable, something ought to be done to counteract it, and to substitute other thoughts in the place of it. Change of locality, change of companions, will often break through the dominant and painful idea, and repose and quiet will soon follow. Possibly it may be not over-anxiety, but simply over-work that for nights together prevents us sleeping, and this is more easily dealt with. The late and excessive work must cease. If we have been toiling till midnight, and then with heads full of our subject go to bed to lie down and take no rest, we must give it up or take the consequences. It will not do to lie awake, day after day, till three or four o'clock in the morning. We can not counteract this state of things; the brain is over-worked and over-stimulated, and the stimulus which keeps up the active functional circulation must be removed. Again, if sleep be prevented by bodily discomfort, external or internal, this must be remedied so far as it can. The bed may be too hard, or too soft, or too short; the pillow may be too high or too low. Heat and cold will much affect the circulation in the head. If the surface and extremities are cold, especially the feet, there will be a deficiency of blood in them, and consequently an excess in the internal parts, and in the head. In this way we are kept awake by cold as much as by the actual discomfort arising from it. Heat will directly accelerate the circulation. And although the fatigue caused by heat may in some degree counteract this, yet most people sleep less in the very hot nights of summer than they do in cooler weather. We are both prevented from going to sleep, and roused from sleep, by this cause. Excess of heat and cold are to be avoided if we wish to sleep soundly. Bedrooms must be warmed in winter and cooled in summer; people must get over the old prejudice about opening bedroom windows, and must eschew feather-beds and mountains of blankets. Many a one, if he do this, will sleep better than he has done all his previous life.

Another thing which promotes sleep is the partaking of food. As indigestible food hinders sleep or rouses us from it, so a digestible meal favors it. All know what it is to feel sleepy after a hearty dinner, nay, even a light lunch will often have the same effect if we sit or remain inactive after it. And this is not due to the strong liquids imbibed, for a dinner with water alone may have the same effect. There are different theories as to the cause of our being rendered sleepy by food. One is, that the circulation is affected by the ingestion and digestion of it: that an extra supply of blood is directed to the stomach and digesting organs, and so diverted from the head. The circulation in the head is lessened, and sleep ensues. This idea is probably not incorrect, and partially explains the phenomena, but not entirely. It seems insufficient to account for the sleepiness produced by some kinds of food, and the wakefulness caused by others. One man, at ten o'clock at night, takes a glass of beer, another an equal quantity of green tea:

the one goes to sleep, the other lies awake half the night. Therefore, we must needs suppose that the elements and material of the food taken into the blood alter the composition of it, and lessen or increase its stimulating properties. After a hearty meal the blood which is necessary for keen, clear brain-action is loaded with new material just taken in from the newly-digested food, and is less fitted, on this account, to excite and keep up the functional activity of clear intellect. This theory agrees, I think, better with the facts than that of the diversion of the blood from the head to the stomach by the digestion process. For we may often observe that sleepiness will follow the swallowing of a very trifling quantity of food or drink, as one glass of wine or beer. It is not to be supposed that the process of digesting this will divert much blood to the stomach. It must affect us, therefore, by the material entering the circulation. When a man lies dead drunk no one doubts but that the brain is affected by the alcohol conveyed to it by the blood. It can be collected in the brain after death. And what happens in the case of a large quantity of spirit happens probably in the case of a small quantity of food or drink. Again, if sleep is caused by the diversion of blood in and for the process of digestion, it is reasonable to suppose that the longer and more difficult the digestion, the more blood would be diverted, and the sounder the sleep. But, on the contrary, we know that the more indigestible the food the more sleep is prevented, while quickly-digested materials, which are easily assimilated, promote slumber. A single small cup of tea can hardly be said to require digestion; yet this will banish sleep from many, and can only do so by affecting the nervous centres.

If there is undue excitability of the brain, and the ordinary stimuli of thought or noise are sufficient to keep off sleep, if the nervous susceptibility of the individual of itself keeps him awake, what can be done in addition to the means already mentioned? We must try and lessen this excitability, from which some occasionally suffer till it almost constitutes a disease. This may be done, and often is done, by non-medical methods. In fact, we know that each one has his proper and peculiar recipe for going to sleep. One man counts tens, hundreds, or thousands—counts till he can count no longer. Another repeats from memory Latin verses, it may be, or English poetry. One man fixes his attention strongly on one subject, and tries to exhaust himself upon this. Another does just the opposite, and tries to think of no one thing, but to jumble his ideas into a confused chaos as he finds them wandering when he is dropping off to sleep; and this man probably succeeds the best. Now these plans for the most part are based upon the principle of diminishing the excitability of the brain by means of fatigue. We know that in health fatigue is one of the chief causes of sleep. Fatigue of body and fatigue of head, not calling up anxiety or emotional excitement, are excellent sleep-compellers, and fatigue, especially of body, if excessive, will so deaden the excitability of the brain that stimuli, even of a powerful sort, will have no effect upon it. This is why men and boys have gone to sleep on a ship's deck in the midst of battle. Many will sleep in any position, even the most uncomfortable, amidst great noise, or even in great dangers, from sheer fatigue. And when excessive and morbid wakefulness is present, it is a very good and natural method of invoking sleep to subject the body to hard exercise; and fatiguing the brain by counting, or the like, may have the same effect, though less surely. If by working our memory till we are tired, we can produce fatigue without calling up any anxious feelings or thoughts, without at last ceasing, and we sleep. But if sleep does not come, is there any other method?

It may be that we lie awake because we are hungry. Hours may have passed since our last meal. Whether we feel hungry or not, it is at any rate a fact that something to eat will often bring sleep. The effect of food has been already mentioned. It is a reasonable plan, but one often neglected, probably from the difficulty of procuring something in the night. There is a popular fallacy abroad that we ought not to go to sleep on a full stomach, a fallacy adhered to in the face of the fact that every animal eats before sleep, that infants almost invariably require a full stomach to send them to sleep; and so, fearing to go to bed with a full stomach, people go with an empty one, and do not sleep. Many would sleep much better with an early dinner and a good supper, than they do with their six o'clock dinner, which allows them to get hungry again before they want to go to sleep. Many have found this out and guard against it, and if they wake in the night they attempt sleep again by eating or drinking something which has been placed in readiness by their bedside.

If all means fail, and the nights get worse and worse, and the sufferer more and more restless, he needs must have recourse to the physician and his pharmaceutical treasury, and he gets a sleeping potion, which in all probability will be some preparation of opium. Now every one has his views and theories about opium, amounting altogether to what De Quincey calls "the fiery vortex of hot-headed ignorance upon the name" of it. Let him who wants to read the poetry of this drug study the "Confessions." The prose thereof is written in the pages of many medical authors, yet no two are agreed upon the mode of its action, whether the beneficial or the poisonous. Most admit, however, that in small quantities it is a stimulant, in large a narcotic, a poison. Some say that the small or stimulating doses procure sleep, and are alone beneficial, yet this is contrary to the foregoing remarks, which tend to show that stimulation of all sorts drives off sleep. That small doses of opium will keep many awake is as certain as that green tea does. It quickens the pulse in these small quantities, and stimulates the circulation of the brain. A double dose will reduce the circulation and procure sleep. The opium conveyed by the blood to the nerve-centres appears to lessen their force and energy, and to deaden the excitability both of the mental brain and also of the nerve-structures which supply the bodily organs. When the dose goes beyond this it becomes poisonous, and it not only lessens but destroys the excitability, and we have coma, collapse, convulsions, and death. But this is not the place for an examination of this question, nor for an enumeration of all the other substances which the physician employs to "entice the drowsy feathered sleep."

THE RUINED CHAPEL.

No altar now in gloomy white nor altar.

No choir to sing the angel songs;

No whispering fluster in low organ-notes,

To thrill with heavenly shivers kneeling throngs.

The monks have long departed! shadows now

Fall thick upon the pockes-pent and channel;

Long close the crying king drew angry sword,

The chamber of the fallen house to crowd.

No priests nor worshippers are left—ah! rarely

Fetch, geyser, consecrates her special places;

Time is a weed beaten, and delights

To leave no sacred things its mouldy traces.

But "No," Hope says, for where of old thine stood

The star and God's shrine so level and measured,

There now the blackbird's conscious gladness hymns,

Flowed forth with joy and gratitude pronounced.

And see, the Elder brings his pure white flowers,

So broad and level, level, and so fair,

An offering to the stammered altar-stone,

That still, though rent and mossy, smoothes there,

And still the suppliant wind, its frightened stirge

Moves touchless 'till the silent sheeted dead.

Or walks the whispering hymns when winter moans

Are sliding cold and brightly overhead.

These little vandals, the wild-flowers too,

Sown by the pitying angels, rise and bloom

Speedwell and primrose in among the stones,

Not from the arch, or away above the tomb.

None! see pray on man's frailty,

And leave each year for their builder's sake,

For the old story that's good is best,

And lies so calmly now beneath the brake.

THE COVENTRY PROCESSION, 1871.

LADY GODIVA AT HOME.

GEORGE ELIOT—who ought to be indited for not telling the gardens where the rich plums which adorn the heads of “his” chapters grew—quotes over the eighth chapter of Felix Holt the following sentence: “The mind of man is as a country which was once open to squatters, who have bred and multiplied, and become masters of the land. But there happeneth a time when new and hungry comers dispute the land; and there is trial of strength, and the stronger wins. Nevertheless, the first squatters be they who have prepared the ground, and the crops to the end will be sequent (though chiefly on the nature of the soil, as of light sand, mixed loam, or heavy clay, yet) somewhat on the primal labor and sowing.”

This exquisite illustration might be specialized by the substitution in it of “Coventry” for “country.” I mean this in the historical rather than any philological sense, though there be etymologists who might establish a near relationship between “country” and “Coventry”—that is, “Convent-tre,” tre being the old word for “town.” Walking about the streets of this old city, listening to its poor ragged minstrels singing and hawking its legends done into doggerel, witnessing the Fair and its pageant, one is at first bewildered at finding these things in the England of to-day, and at length perceives that they are the cropping up, through centuries of English formations, of an old and alien life which squatted hereon in an almost pre-historical era. The quaint and airy gables overhanging narrow streets, the airy build of churches with their cool stone pavements, the frequent use of external ornament on plain houses—so characteristic of southern people, who live out of doors, and so different from the English style, which keeps all ornamentation indoors—these suggest at every step an old French foundation. With this feeling, but with no positive knowledge of the subject, I resolved to delve among the old records and chronicles in the British Museum and the London Library, and find what I could about the ancient city and the bases of its legends—especially that of Lady Godiva’s ride through it. In this search I have come across some curious facts.

Up to the year 1016 there stood on the site of Coventry a large Saxon convent. This was entirely destroyed by Edric, who, in the year stated, invaded Mercia. From this time the history of the city becomes blended with its patron saint, Lady Godiva. Whatever, under historic scrutiny, may befall the actual existence of Godiva, it is pretty certain to survive any skepticism. That the Countess of Mercia, with whom that name is now associated, was the most distinguished devotee of the middle of the eleventh century Matthew of Westminster, who wrote about 250 years after Earl Leofric, writes:

“In the same year [A.D. 1007], in September, died Count Leofric, of worthy memory, and was buried with honor in the monastery at Coventry, which he and his wife, the devout and noble Countess Godiva, worshiper of God and lover of the Holy Virgin Mary, built from the foundation, out of their own patrimony. And the monastery buildings being erected, they so endowed them with lands and with ornaments that in all England no other monastery could be found with such abundance of gold, silver, and precious gems.”

He then goes on to mention various other towns whose monasteries she, Lady Godiva, founded and endowed. But it is evident that Sir William Dugdale, whose Antiquities of Warwickshire was published in 1656, had very thoroughly consulted every record about Coventry.

From him we learn that "Leofric wedded Godiva, a most beautifull and devout lady," and that she was the sister of Therald de Burgenhall, sheriff of Lincolnshire. With reference to the convent, which Leofric and Godiva built in 1044, Dugdale says that Godiva

"Gave her whole Treasure thereto, and sent for skillfull Goldsmiths; who with all the gold and silver she had, made Crosses, Images of Saints, and other Curious Ornaments, which she devoutly disposed thereto.... And even at the point of her death gave a rich Chain of pretious stones, directing it to be put about the neck of the Blessed Virgin's Image; so that they that came of devotion thither should say as many Prayers as there were severall Gems therein."

The monastery thus founded had twenty-four Benedictine monks, and the church connected with it was consecrated "to the honor of God, the Virgin Mary, St. Peter, St. Osburg, and all the Saints." William of Malmesbury has incidentally mentioned its extraordinary ornamentation, declaring that "it was enriched and beautified with so much gold and silver that the walls seemed too narrow to contain it; inso-much that Robert de Limesi, bishop of the diocese, in the time of King William Rufus, scraped from one beam that supported the shrines 500 marks of silver."

Leofric is a distinctly historical character. He was the fifth Earl of Mercia, a district which comprised the present counties of Warwick, Worcester, Nottingham, Northampton, Lincoln, Leicester, Derby, Stafford, Gloucester, Chester, Salop, and Oxford. He was, under Canute, Captain-General of the royal forces; took an active part in securing the succession of Harold; assisted in the elevation of Edward the Confessor, and in upholding the monarch against Earl Godwyn. He and his Countess were buried in the great porch of the church of this monastery, of which the Reformation left not one stone upon another.

But while this great monastery remained under such magnificent endowment and patronage Coventry became the centre of French pilgrims and place-hunters. Indeed these swarmed through the Earl of Mercia's realm, so that I find the most ancient laws of the city written in French. With these came the "mysteries," or "miracle-plays," with which Coventry is above all other towns associated. Thus Dugdale writes:

"Before the suppression of the monasteries this city was very famous for the pageants that were play'd therein upon Corpus Christi day. These pageants were acted with mighty state and reverence by the fryers of this house, and conteyned the story of the New Testament, which was composed into old English rime. The theatres for the several scenes were very large and high; and being placed upon wheelles were drawn to all the eminent places of the city, for the better advantage of the spectators. In that incomparable library belonging to Sir Thomas Cotton there is yet one of the books which perteyned to this pageant, entitled Ludus Corporis Christi, or Ludus Coventrie. I mysele have spoke with some old people who had, in their younger yeares, bin eyewitnesses of these pageants soe acted; from whom I have bin told that the confluence of people from farr and neare to see that show was extraordinary great, and yielded noe small advantage to this citye."

In the 15th century it became the fashion to make these plays a leading feature in royal festivities and pageants. In 1456 Queen Margaret, being at Coventry, saw "alle the pageantes pleyde save domesday, which might not be pleyde for lak of day." In 1575, in the celebrated entertainment of Queen Elizabeth at Kenilworth, "certain good harted men of Coventree," according to Laneham's narrative, "exhibited their old storiall sheaw." It is surprising what admirable courtiers the old prophets and martyrs became in the presence of royalty. I have seen, in an old Coventry book, a "gag" used by the Prophet Jeremy in addressing Henry VI. and his Queen, when they were present with their little son, Prince Edward, at the play in Coventry, in which he (Jeremy) says to them:

"Unto the rote of Jesse rote likkyn you well I may,
The fragrant flour sprongen of you shall so Euerce and sprede—"

The "floure" being, of course, the little Prince.

These courtly speeches by sacred to royal personages indicate a very important phase of the growth of the English drama out of the old miracle-plays. I must sum up in a few words what were a profoundly interesting history to trace. It is generally believed that the first miracle-plays were invented and acted by pilgrims to and from the Holy Sepulchre for their edification. At this time the subjects were exclusively Scriptural. At a later period the priesthood, seeing a means of gain in them, took them under their own charge. The Pope granted indulgences to those who went to see them. In the MS. of the Chester plays in the British Museum [MS. 2124] the author speaks of his having gone to Rome to obtain leave of the Pope to have the "mysteries" done into the English tongue—showing that they were originally in Latin. At this second period, under the priests, there was a large introduction of elements from the Apocryphal Gospels and the Legends of Saints. Toward the close of the 15th century the legend of St. George and the Dragon seems to have been a great novelty in Coventry, and had a great "run." St. George, it must be remembered, was, according to the unquestionable authority of the "History of the Seven Champions of Christendom," born in Coventry, and after his great achievements brought his bride hither:

"Where being in short space arriv'd,
Unto his native dwelling-place,
Therein with his dear love he liv'd,
And fortune did his nuptials grace.
They many years of joy did see,
And led their lives at Coventry."

Percy's Reliques.

When, in the year 1474, Prince Edward, son of Edward IV., visited Coventry, he was first addressed in an octave stanza by one representing Edward the Confessor, and afterward by St. George in armor: "a king's daughter stood holding a lamb, and supplicating his assistance to protect her from a terrible dragon. The Champion was placed upon a "conduit" "running wine in four places, and minstrelsy of organ-playing." Gradually the Scriptural personages, the saints and angels, were put more and more in the back-ground, and the present royal personages more in the front; as, in another kind of art, the Venetian nobility were represented pictorially as Madonnas and Saints by the servile masters. And yet the dramatic Darwin of the future will no doubt trace Shakspeare's celebrations and representations of kings and heroes back to these courtly interpolations on the part of the Jeremys and Josephs for the gratification of their royal patrons. Indeed Mr. Howard Staunton, the well-known Shakspearian editor and critic, has shown me several comparative notes that he has made, indicating that Shakspeare has used various expressions explicable only by reference to the plays and shows of Coventry (a short distance only from Stratford-on-Avon), which he must have seen, and which may have been the original means of kindling his genius. In the time of Shakspeare, however, the "mysteries," or "miracle-plays," had fallen more or less into desuetude, having been replaced considerably by "pageants" and "moralities."* The acting of religious subjects had been originally a real thing, and the people were solemnly impressed by the Bible stories which so few could read, and which were to them literally novels. But when they began to be patronized and appropriated by royalty, it became impossible that all the long speeches should be made or listened to. The characters were dressed up and paraded in costumes and attitudes along the streets when the kings and queens were to pass, or the play was thus transformed into the pageant.

And now came the Reformation, which swept the friars and their plays out of existence, burned vast quantities of "mystery" literature, a leaf of which could now bring any price, but which, after its first fury was past, really left the people of England very much the same as before. The passion for pageants was greater than ever before or since. All through the 16th century the chronicles are crowded with accounts of the pageants which attended every step of royalty. In these many of the personages of the "miracle" and "morality" plays—as King David, Moses, Justice, Truth, etc.—appeared in a kind of carnival. The age of Elizabeth was above all an age of pageants. Warton says that on account of the encouragement given by her to classical learning, the entire ancient mythology was wrought into spectacles for her honor. When she paraded through a country town almost every pageant was a pantheon. When she paid a visit at the house of any of her nobility, on entering the hall she was saluted by the Penates, and conducted to her privy-chamber by Mercury; in the afternoon, when she condescended to walk in the garden, the lake was covered with Tritons and Nereids; the pages of the family were converted into Wood-nymphs, who passed from every bower; and the footmen gamboled over the lawn in the figure of Satyrs.

The "Lady Godiva Pageant" which still lingers at Coventry, being one of three ancient pageants whose ghosts still haunt the England of to-day, the other two being the Lord Mayor's and the Shrewsbury Shows, is certainly traceable to the "mysteries" I have been describing. I find in a Coventry book, the author's name I do not know, a statement that there is one tradition in the city that when the monasteries were suppressed and the Catholic religion prohibited, the plays and pageants for which the city had been so famous were continued as a mockery. According to this account:

"A Naked Woman on horse back was introduced to ridicule the Sacred Host; immediately after her came a Merry Andrew, to divert the populace with profane jests; he was drawn in a kind of house on wheels, and from looking frequently out of the window, acquired the name of Peeping Tom; but one of these adventurers dying on leaving the house, no one could afterward be found with sufficient hardihood to follow his example, hence Peeping Tom ceased to form part of the Procession. Before the naked lady they placed a man in armor to represent St. George; this gigantic figure was preceded by a group of men, in rusty bits of armor, as mock guards, and the procession closed with a burlesque against the Bishops and Clergy."

This tradition adds: "From this public profanation of sacred things the city of Coventry became so despicable as to give rise to the well-known proverb of 'Sending a man to Coventry,'* which is to say, he is not worthy to be spoken to by men of reputation. As the inhabitants of Coventry have long been ashamed to acknowledge this as the origin of their splendid show, they esteem it more creditable to consider its celebration as a memorial of their gratitude to the Countess Godiva." I give, quantum valeat, this theory in which the Roman Catholic interest is very discernible, and which has a suspicious completeness, and proceed to discuss the probabilities in the case.

Only those who have particularly looked into the history of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries can know how much of the trade of England in those days was carried on by means of Fairs. Steam and advertisements have done away with much of their importance, though they are still kept up with much spirit and with considerable profit to the neighborhoods in which they occur;

* The following—which I find quoted without name in a Coventry Local Guide—seems to me a more probable account of this phrase: "The inhabitants of this inland city were formerly most decidedly averse to any correspondence with the military quartered within its limits. A female known to speak to a man in a scarlet coat became the object of town scandal. So rigidly indeed did the natives abstain from communication with all who bore his Majesty's military commission, that officers were here confined to the interchanges of the mess-room, and in the mess-room the term of sending a man to Coventry, if you wish to shut him from society, is supposed to have originated."

* "Theatrically considered, 'Mysteries' are dramatic representations of religious subjects from the Old or New Testament, or Apocryphal Story, or the Lives of Saints; 'Moralities' are dramatic allegories, in which the characters personify certain vices and virtues, with the intent to enforce some moral or religious principle. Moralities were of later origin than Mysteries, but they existed together, and sometimes each partook of the nature of the other."—Hone.

but in those days they were the means of supplying every country region with the articles it required, and noblemen sent to them for every kind of stock. Among these none was more important than that which was chartered at Coventry in the year 1217 by Henry III., and which to this day annually draws together vast crowds from every part of Warwickshire. The Corpus Christi plays occurred during this Fair, and were an important source of attraction. More particularly, it would seem, did the invariable play of Adam and Eve attract multitudes by its prurience. The destruction of the monasteries and the discontinuance of the "mysteries" was a heavy blow to the wealth and trade of Coventry. Its population was reduced by over twelve thousand, and its Fair was not well attended. The inhabitants had sufficient reason to mourn that the "good Eva" no longer exhibited herself in puris naturalibus among them annually; and there is some reason to believe that they for a time tried to revive the attraction in a pageant in which they persuaded some woman to represent Eve on horseback.

Subsequently this pageant was discontinued for at least a century, and Coventry still went downward. Its Fair had lost its fame as an emporium of commerce, and even the Restoration did not improve matters much. Under these circumstances the authorities hit upon the idea of reviving the pageant, and the licentious period of Charles II. enabled them to do so. It occurred in the year 1678. The Mayor and corporation had been always in the habit of going through the streets and proclaiming the opening of the Fair; but they were on this occasion accompanied by the trading companies of the city displaying flags. The city authorities were attended by boys fancifully dressed as pages, who took the place of the angels in the former Corpus Christi pageant; but, instead of Eve, Lady Godiva rode in the procession in a state of nudity, as the local legend affirmed that she had done to obtain the enfranchisement of the city. The ingenuity of the corporation was rewarded; the Coventry Fair became what it had been in its best days, and along with the pageant has been kept in good repair ever since.

The first historian to mention Godiva and her famous exploit was Matthew of Westminster, who has been closely followed by all others who have alluded to it. It is found in the "Flowers of History," and is, by literal translation, as follows:

"This Countess devoutly anxious to free the city of Coventry from a grievous and base thralldom often besought the Count her husband that he would, for the love of the Holy Trinity and the Sacred Mother of God, liberate it from such servitude. But he rebuked her for vainly demanding a thing so injurious to himself, and forbade her to move further therein. Yet she, out of her womanly pertinacity, continued to press the matter, inasmuch that she obtained this answer from him. 'Ascend,' he said, 'thy horse naked, and pass thus through the city from one end of it to the other, in sight of the people, and on thy return thou shalt obtain thy request.' Upon which she returned, 'And should I be willing to do this wilt thou give me leave?' 'I will,' he replied. Then the Countess Godiva, beloved of God, ascended her horse naked, loosing her long hair, which clothed her entire body except her snow-white legs, and having performed the journey, seen by none, returned with joy to her husband, who regarding it as a miracle, thereupon granted Coventry a Charter of Freedom, confirming it with his seal."

Sir William Dugdale, who wrote before the Restoration, and, I need not add, in the far pre-skeptical era of history, accepts the story unhesitatingly, and supposes the immunity secured by Lady Godiva's ride to have been

"A kind of manumission from such servile tenure, whereby they then held what they had under this great Earl, than only a freedom from all manner of toll, except horses, as Knighton affirms; in memory whereof the picture of him and his said lady was set up in a south window of Trinity Church, in this city, about King Richard the Second's time, and in his right hand holding a Charter, with these words written thereon:

"E, Lofric, for love of the Doc make Cobentre tol-free."

There is no doubt that the city received its Charter, and none that the window and inscription referred to by Dugdale existed in Trinity Church until about the fifteenth century.

The story of Peeping Tom is a much later one. No early historian makes any mention of any proclamation having been made by the lady's herald that

"—as they loved her well,
From then till noon no foot should pace the street,
No eye look down, she passing."

And indeed such a course would not have been a fulfillment of Leofric's condition that it should be in sight of all the people (populo congregato), nor explain his conclusion that her having been unseen was "a miracle." It is quite certain that this was an invention added in the reign of Charles II. The effigy of Peeping Tom which was used in the earliest Godiva procession (1678) is still preserved, and is as little like a tailor of the eleventh century as can be imagined, with his military coat and cocked hat and feather. There are several versions about this P. T., one being that Lady Godiva was somewhat moved with compassion for the poor man who alone could not resist her charms, and who had sacrificed his eyes for them, and took care of him ever afterward!

PEEPING TOM.

But dismissing all later additions, what are we to conclude concerning the legend of Godiva itself? I find it very difficult to form a conclusion. There is hardly any legend which would more nicely call into play all the rules and principles of historic doubt and historic belief; and for this reason, apart from the intrinsic beauty of the story, the probabilities are worthy of being briefly balanced.

We have in favor of the truth of the story the facts that Earl Leofric did have a Countess of extraordinary public spirit; that he did, from being very exacting on the people, on a certain day give them the liberal charter which they now preserve; and that in the time of Matthew of Westminster—250 years after the alleged occurrence of the event—the local tradition was so strong as to have been commemorated in a stained window of Trinity Church. To these facts may be added the following probabilities: It is quite supposable that an Earl intending to emphasize his refusal of his lady's request should have lightly said that he would comply if she—or so soon as she—rode naked through the town; and it certainly was in keeping with the chivalry of the time that if she had taken him at his word and complied with the condition, however lightly uttered, the Earl must have stood by his word. Moreover, if there had been any thing in the story essentially out of keeping with the age in which it is said to have occurred, Matthew of Westminster and Ingulph, who record it with evident credence, lived near enough to that age to have at least expressed some surprise at the incident, which they do not.

English historians are tender of local legends, and that concerning Godiva has not yet been reviewed from the skeptical side. Yet there seem to me several points in which it is vulnerable to the historic doubter. There is, in the first place, something very non-English in such an exploit. There is nothing more sacred in England than clothing. It is related that an Irishman once challenged a man to a duel for saying that he, the Irishman, had been "born without a shirt to his back." An Englishman would probably have been ready to settle on the field his claim to having been born in a full suit of clothes. Certainly there could be to the mind of an Englishman no disgrace comparable to that of nudity. The brother of Ophelia speaks as a true Englishman when he warns her that a woman must guard her charms even from the man in the moon. In Landseer's picture of Godiva exhibited in the Royal Academy this year, the Lady's elderly duenna is represented turning her head aside from the nude lady and shutting her eyes tightly. There is a look on this domestic's face which says plainly, "I wash my eyes clean of all such improper conduct; and before I would do such a thing every man, woman, and child in Coventry should be broken on the wheel!" Every one who looks at the picture smiles; but all see in her, rather than the mounted lady, the representative of the womanhood of England. That an Englishwoman should die for the people is imaginable; but hardly that she should ride through a city naked. But there is evidence, on the other hand, that in the eleventh century Coventry was preponderantly French. And what a difference is there between France and England in this matter! When an Englishwoman uttered the exclamation of her native land to Pauline Bonaparte, with whom she was looking at the picture for which the beautiful French Queen sat undraped—"How could you have borne the exposure!"—Pauline did but utter the reply of France when she naïvely answered, "It was not at all cold, I assure you." While Halliwell and others can not bring themselves to admit, whatever the evidence, that an exact representation of Adam and Eve on the stage could have taken place in England so late as the latter part of the sixteenth century, there is no doubt whatever that Moore, in "The Fudge Family in Paris," describes a spectacle which was drawing crowds to the Theatre Porte St. Martin in the gay capital so late as 1817:

"Here Begrand, who shines in this Scriptural path,

As the lovely Susanna, without even a relic

Of drapery round her, comes out of the bath

In a manner that, Bob says, is quite Emancipatic!"

But one need not go so far back to observe the differences of the two nations in the regard of nudity. Last year, when the Lord Chamberlain was carefully supervising Miss Menken's make-up as "Mazepa" at Astley's, to see that she did not subvert the English Constitution by an over-liberal display, nearly every theatre in Paris was reviving some old "mystery," and Adam and Eve were reappearing with little more regard for the scruples of the present generation than is implied in "fleshes." Victor Hugo does indeed rather boast of the fondness of the French for nudity as "classic." The French foundation of Coventry, therefore, which has already been taken as explaining its freedom in the miracle-plays, may be regarded by those who believe in the legend of Godiva as sufficient to have rendered her undertaking possible, even though she was an Englishwoman; even as it is now observed that the English leave a good part of their squeamishness behind when they visit the Continent. But the original Frenchness of Coventry in monastic days might equally well explain the character of the legend should it have been an invention, especially when it is considered how nearly it resembles the extraordinary scene in the play of "The Creation."

There is another point that rather seems to indicate its growth out of the Eve of the play. "Eve" was always written in those days "Eva;" and I have found, in looking through many old chronicles, that Godiva was written "God-eva," which is simply "Good Eve." In the year 1494, during some popular agitations in Coventry concerning customs on wool and drapery, there were found nailed on the door of St. Michael's Church some doggerel verses, of which I have seen a copy, and of which the first verse runs thus:

"Be it known and understand,
This shoe should be free and none is bound.
Some good Eve made his shoe,
& now 't' is pasture for well—& 't' sing's!"

This was incontestible evidence that the pattern sent of Coventry was at this period popularly recognized as "good Eve." Was this only a sweet pun on the name of "Good-eva?" Or had a "bad Eve," who had been up to a startlingly late period represented on the stage robe, and belaying woes upon mankind, suggested the invention of a "good Eve," who should bring blessings? Were this taken as pointing to a mythical origin for Godiva there would still remain to be accounted for the peculiarity, not likely to be a pure invention, that she rode on horseback. This may, indeed, have been borrowed from the style usual with the early pagans, in which nearly every character was mounted; or it may, indeed, have been a mere consequence of the fact that no locomotion except on horseback was supposed to be possible to a woman of those days.

I now take leave of antiquarian resources, and come to consider the Godiva of modern years.

There is no doubt whatever that the procession with the noble Godiva inaugurated, or revived from an older pageant, in the ancestral age of Charles II., was repeated from year to year up to a period which was not so long dead, but was scarcely far less than would have been tolerated in any other part of Great Britain. This memory of the Coventry Show was due to its being held up as a solemn act of homage to the heroic deliverer of the city. At length Lady Godiva hid herself from the gaze of posterity, the opening eighteenth century, and only now and then appeared, with rather sorry success, until the early part of this century, when the procession was revived with considerable pomp and enthusiasm, with a Godiva clad in close-fitting cambric without a skirt, covered by a variety of ornaments and a splendid pink scarf suspended from her hair; she was also furnished with a great quantity of long, flowing hair. She was also, so late as 1829, accompanied by all the city authorities. The representation of that year (1829) produced a considerable revolution in Coventry, which resulted in a complete remodeling of municipal affairs in 1835. The city seems to have elected a reforming mayor in that year, who induced the corporation to a bold step, in the inspiration of which nearly all the antique articles which had been worshipped by a succession of centuries were sold under the auctioneer's hammer, the effigy of Peeping Tom being alone left. And when, in 1840, the Procession was arranged, the town authorities, led by the mayor, refused to enter into it. So the people substituted for their various characters from history, which rather added to the interest of the Show in the popular estimation. The withdrawal of the town authorities and of some of the old city guilds made the matter over to a class which was not likely to diminish any surviving prejudice in the details of the pageant. And, as might be expected, gradually there arose a kind of civil war on the subject in Coventry. The dissenting preachers denounced the Show violently; the trades-people, and especially the publicans, maintained with vehemence a pageant which was the life and soul of their Fair, and which never failed to fill their pockets.

However, in the late exhibitions responsibility began to show its superior power; and although large posters scattered through Warwickshire allured the innumerable thousands of Peeping Toms to Coventry to hold province, they generally found the performances disappointing. The public house keepers and others increased taxes, indeed, to fear that their show would cease to attract the crowd, and so, four years ago, they presented a model of the Royal Academy of London—Madame Lemon—to rear a linen around the old eyes, to the ruin (denounced as poor Godiva's) bare skin, and it became necessary to prevent its becoming a too literal rendering of the legend by making an explicit over her, the announcement of which was a more violent attack on the procession, than the combined power of the pulpit could have effected. Under the act, the aristocrats, and the legions of the household Madame Lemon vilified—scouted—and was taken from her unmaneuvered charger into a house.

Early in 1853 it was announced that there would be another Godiva procession. The Mayor decided not entirely to hold himself aloof from it. The dissenting preachers again began to appear to the trades-people not to maintain or assist the matter in any form. Nay, this year they went so far as to put themselves in correspondence with her Majesty's Government; so that the Mayor received, one day, a letter from Sir George Grey, saying that he had intent to form that Coventry was to be, on June 4, the scene of an immoral exhibition. Now it is perfectly true, that, within the circumference of a mile around the office of the Home Secretary in London, there are scores of belief-disseminators who would be taxed rightly if they were as much clad as the Lady of Coventry has been for twenty-five years; nevertheless, the Mayor asked Sir George that he would take care that every one in the procession should be "decently clad," though any abridgment of this recommended decorum was carefully withheld.

St. Bartholomew's Fair survives now only in the pleasure George Cruikshank made of its last appearance—a stage covered with rixens, dancing men and women, scattered in a vast skillet, whose handle the devil holds, regarding them longingly as a mess for Tartarus. Mr. Hawthorne and graphically described the last Greenwich Fair which the authorities ever permitted to take place. The Crystal Fair has been reduced to half a dozen booths for beer-drinking.

Mindful of the swiftness with which the nineteenth century is sloughing these ancient customs, wishing to see the oldest fair of England and the Godiva procession, which I felt quite sure was on its last legs, I started by the train for Coventry on the afternoon of June 3. It is but three hours at most from London. It was on a clear Sunday, and I found a vast crowd hanging about the station and bridge of the old city, where Tennyson "waited for the train" and "shaped the city's legend." I walked slowly through the streets, and looking at the quaint gables and house-fronts—carved more like those which I have seen in old French cities than any that may be seen in other English cities—I admired the art with which the poet had represented that "overhead fantastic gables, crowding, stared" upon the poor startled lady. Coming to a wall covered with posters I derived, by a careful reading of them all, that during the fair, then in full blast, I might see exhibitions at Latimer's Theatre, the Alhambra Theatre, Maws's Royal Circus, and various displays of wax-work and marionnettes; also Bellamy's Paragon Models. There were also many other taking announcements. I went to the central square of the city, and there seeing the sign of the Castle Inn, put up thereat, remembering that the elephant with a castle on its back constitute the Arms of Coventry. I passed the evening in the hospitable mansion of a wealthy and intelligent gentleman of Coventry, to whom I had brought a letter of introduction.

The ladies of England, although very particular, as I have said, about dress, are the most free-spoken ladies in the world; and during the evening the theme of conversation in which the gentlemen and ladies participated without embarrassment was the improprieties of the last Godiva show, and the degree of nudity which would appear in that of to-morrow. The whole subject of dress and undress was minutely considered. Here and every where else in Coventry the walls bore witness to the profound homage which is felt for the patroness of the city, in whose actuality they all believe, being, indeed, slightly intolerant of skepticism on the subject. Pictures of Godiva on her spotless, cream-colored charger abound; and Tennyson's poem about her woven pictorially into many different forms by the silk-weavers of the city—who are celebrated for doing almost as fine work as the French—and hung up in frames as ornaments.

Next morning many thousands of eyes besides my own looked out of windows sadly, seeing that foe which Godiva processionists fear more than Mayors or Home Secretaries—it rained violently. The gloom which overspread the faces of Coventrians was ludicrous. Nevertheless, at ten o'clock the clouds all vanished and the glorious sun shone down. Then suddenly the old city blossomed into banners. Vast flag festoons draped the houses and arched the streets, as if evoked by a magic wand, and among them I did not fail to observe that the French tri-color was nearly as well represented as the Union Jack. There were numerous inscriptions, as: "Our City's Patroness;" "Prosperity to our City;" "Peace and Plenty."

But how shall I describe the crowds which poured that morning into Coventry? From north, south, east, west perpetual streams of people flowed in from the surrounding country. They were all in holiday attire, and many were decked with ribbons and badges. They came in all manner of conveyances, but chiefly in old wagons of patterns that I had never seen before, and in carriages which, known to me only in antique prints, seemed to be old saurians of locomotion returned from the fossil-beds of primal eras, in order to be in keeping with a thirteenth century fair and an eleventh century pageant. The calèches of Canada, the marsupial stage-coach of Virginia, were modern and convenient compared with many of the vehicles in which the country-folk of Warwickshire entered Coventry that day. They all went first to pay their respects to Peeping Tom, whose effigy is always given a fresh painting up and a new feather when there is to be a Godiva Show. Where the four chief streets of the city converge there is Peeping Tom, at a small square window in the second story of a shoe-shop. A more hideous being than P. T. it would be hard to imagine; and if this effigy at all resembles that "one low churl, compact of thankless earth," it really seems to me that his desperate desire to see the beautiful would be pardonable. It was evident that the crowd generally felt a generous regard for P. T.—what had we all come to Coventry for?—and a man who showed me up stairs, so that I might examine the ancient figure more particularly, accounted for the fact that its back is all scooped out by declaring that there was a rabid determination on the part of each visitor to get a splinter of the figure, if possible. Not only poor Tom's back, but all of his arms below the elbows have fallen victims to this hero-worship.

Although, as I have said, the most cultivated and aristocratic residents of Coventry admire very much, and adorn their walls with Tennyson's poem of "Godiva," that poet is by no means the minstrel who has sung the fair lady's story in the manner which pleased most the one hundred thousand people who, it is estimated, passed that day in Coventry. For there were minstrels who were singing of the lady in every street, and selling copies of each song for a half-penny each. Some of these were old; but one or two had evidently been composed for the present occasion, and these last were certainly execrable. It was sad for one who has formed his idea of the early singers of the deeds of heroes and heroines from Sordello or Tannhäuser, to come across a circle of roughs in the street standing around a coarse man and woman screaming out—

"Come all you buxom lads and lasses,
Old and young, the deaf and dumb,
Cheerily, merrily, fill your glasses
Up with ale and whisky rum;
Coventry is in her glory,
Such a sight we seldom see,
It will be talked of long in story,
When Lady Godiva we did see!"

Nevertheless I would be doing Coventry injustice not to say that I saw more people who seemed to purchase a paper headed "The Coventry Garland" (for a penny), which contained a version of the legend not without merit. It is divided into three parts: "The Legend;" "The Pilgrimage;" "The Charter." Part First tells us that

"Earl Leofric was a Baron bold,
A lion of high degree,
A wealthy Lord of many lands,
And eke of Coventre.
The inhabitants his vassals were,
And he taxed them grievously."

It then proceeds to state the engagement which the Baron entered into with his spouse. In Part Second we read:

"Now forth she came on a milk-white steed,
All radiant and fair;
No covering save her innocence,
And her long and flowing hair:
And thus on her mission of mercy she rode Through the streets so gloomy and bare.
"And through those narrow and darksome streets
She passed like a vision of light:
A Pilgrim-saint of charity,
Performing a holy rite;
But oh! such a pilgrim who hath seen,
Or a saint so fair and bright.
"And on she rode in solitude
And silence, all around,
A midnight stillness reigned there,
Unbroken and profound,
Save the echo of the horse's tread
That clank'd upon the ground.
"Now Heaven bless thee, Lady fair,
Thy pilgrim-task is done:
Thou hast achieved a noble deed,
And reached thy Castle home;
And thou wilt gain a deathless name
In history and song."

In Part Third we have, among several good verses, the following:

"And now there is joy throughout the town,
With feast and goodly cheer,
For Freedom maketh every home
A thousand times more dear:
It bringeth joy to every hearth,
And sunshine every where,
Of Freedom's victories, oh, how few
Were gained so pure and bloodless here!"

The procession started at half past eleven from the city barracks. The list of companies and characters is too long to be given here. It fills half a column of the local paper. The procession marched about half a mile when it paused near St. Mary's Hall—the oldest building in Coventry—whose great portals swung open at noon exactly, and as the wondrous chimes of St. Michael's Church immediately over us pealed

a merry music, out rode on a magnificent white horse—Lady Godiva. The multitude pressed forward in great surges to see her, and there was at first a breathless silence, save for the rustling and trampling as the Hussars made with their horses' breasts a lane through the crowd for the Lady. Then came cheer after cheer, and plaudits which, as she passed on, were caught up from place to place, and from street to street, a continuous cheer extending thenceforth throughout the city. Nevertheless, these cheers ever grew feebler, and there were not wanting goodly numbers of the P. T. fraternity, who expressed their contempt at a Lady Godiva dressed up like a rather careful ballet-dancer. The Lady was represented by a Madame Panton, of London, favorably regarded, it was said, by the artists of the Royal Academy, who was a very good-looking lady of thirty, and sat her horse well. She had a bodice of white tulle, her shoulders and arms being bare, a white satin skirt reaching almost to the knees, and silken hose, but no slippers. Her black hair fell loose, adorned with a long, white veil; she bore a bouquet in her hand, and looked meekly down at the neck of her horse. She was, however, evidently uncomfortable, and, I think, fairly earned the ten guineas she is said to have received. Of the other characters the less said the better. The costumes were well enough, but rouge and spangles are dreadful under the full blaze of day. Maid Marian, the little Shepherdess, the Four Seasons, and the little girls who acted as pages, were well enough done; but St. George was a puny little man who was a mere wreck in the heavy armor which he wore, or which wore him. He had not his dragon, but he was surrounded by dragoons, who tried to prevent his drinking a glass of beer which some friend slipped into the procession to give him, but did not succeed. The cars and horses were very fine; and I recognized painted on the former many forms and scenes which I could trace to through a succession of pageants and moralities back to the original "Mysteries" of Coventry.

Entering a residence, where I had been invited to meet a company and enjoy a collation, I found the room filled with ladies who had been gazing on the procession as it had just passed under the window, and were commending very warmly the entire respectability and decorum of the Show. They were especially hearty in appreciating Godiva's skirt, which it was plain they had only seen from the right side of the Lady. Presently, however, it became rumored in the room that the Lady was not dressed in the exact fashion of Rotten Row, and the following series of remarks occurred:

Mrs. A. "That's why all the gentlemen insisted that these windows didn't command such a good view as across the street."

Miss B. "We'll laugh at them well when they come back."

Mrs. C. "I take back all my praise of the Lady's decency; don't you, Mr. D.?"

Mr. D. (with a glance at Mrs. C.'s liberal corsage). "Yes, Madam!"

At length all the gentlemen returned (rather sheepish), and had to pass a gauntlet very blushing but very sharply arranged by the ladies. I do not know that it was more than a fancy; but I found myself receiving, at various times during my visit to Coventry, an impression that there was an abnormal bravery about the women of that old city. May not traditions, remaining long enough, mould and at length create character? Besides Godiva, there are other memorable and purely historical associations of Coventry with heroic women. When Charles I. was trying to take possession of this city, and Lord Brooke was holding it for Parliament, a part of his garrison was made by the women of Coventry, who organized themselves and bore arms, and were headed by an Amazon who drilled them daily. Mary Queen of Scots was twice imprisoned here. It is possible that the young girls of Coventry would feel the peculiar relation of their sex to the city, and be led by bolder ideals; and it really seemed to me that such was the fact.

In the afternoon every body went to the Fair, which I find to be as indescribable as the Derby. Passing through a long lane, or double lane, where, in fourfold booths, all manner of nick-nacks, ginger-cakes, nuts, pictures, jewelry, etc., are sold; passing through toy-temples and pin-cushion palaces; arrested at every step of these lanes without turning by shop-girls tugging on every side, each shoving her wares into one's face like so many pistols and demanding one's money or coat-skirts; one is at last borne on human surges and stranded on the large open square of the Pleasure-Fair. Recovering my senses after a few moments one sees vast wheels made up of human beings revolving vertically or horizontally. On one side a huge hand-bill and a greasy Stentor are beseeching all to come to his great show of wax-work, the leading attraction of which is "Wilkes Booth assassinating Abraham Lincoln"—and "both puff-bek likenesses." Innumerable persons are anxious to have all who wish to see "Lady Godina"—so the country-people insisted on calling her—take a look at their peep-shows. Resisting these attractions one reaches the large space devoted to "Richardson's Shows," Wombwell's Menageries, Circuses, Temples of Magic, and Monsters. For threepence you have the invaluable privilege of seeing the Living Skeleton; one penny is the ruinous rate at which the Hottentot Venus is exhibited, along with the Intelligent Jackass; and twopence is the sesame to the abode of a nondescript Sea-monster—very like a whale—which, the proprietor shouts to the ends of the earth, was captured stone-blind, "which was the cause of his losing his freedom;" three gallant British seamen losing their lives in the adventure.

The people, however, mainly throng the "Richardson's Shows." These are large canvas-theatres with platforms in front, on which the entire stock company of each is engaged dancing, wrestling, and performing gymnastics. Queen Elizabeth here waltzes with the clown, and the melancholy Hamlet pirouettes with the danseuse. Each has a corps de ballet which is striving to outshine the Circes of neighboring establishments, and a red-faced band which would drown with "Slap, bang" the screaming "Dixie" of the next door. Managers stand shrieking through trumpets praises of their own and denunciations of their neighbors' performances. The dress-circles of these shows cost sixpence, the pit threepence. When the tent is full the company goes inside to perform; but very soon after the play is resigned to one or two heavy performers, and all the attractive ones are again on the front platform alluring a crowd for the next exhibition, whither the unsixpenced spectator must follow if he wishes to see the best part of the performances.

Having very soon got enough of this I passed out into the region of the "Cheap Jacks," who are standing on their carts in a row within sound of each other's voices. Each protests that "he gives the people their money's worth; he does not defraud them of their money like some others"—the words being accompanied by looks of utter contempt at the adjoining Cheap Jacks. They are excellent jugglers; they put into a little paper a piece of mock-jewelry, a port-monnaie, or other article worth one or two pennies; they then drop a shilling or a half-crown into it; and offer the whole for a shilling. There is always a purchaser, and he always finds that he has exchanged his shilling for a twopenny article and a copper. It is almost impossible to discover the trick. I looked all along the array of Cheap Jacks to see if there were any one of them who might be a Dr. Marigold; but although their harangues were sufficiently amusing, their aspect was as little suggestive of romance as can be imagined. Yet while I stood and watched the most repulsive of them all—a low-browed fellow, strongly pitted with small-pox, whom I would have brevetted on the moment as "Cut-throat"—there came up to him a little boy of ten years who handed up his shilling for one of the packages the man was trying to sell. The man looked at the boy and his shilling for a moment, then said, "Keep your shilling, young un!" and turned to the crowd, now roaring with laughter, and, I fear, much more pleased with the implied confession of a trick than with the kindness of the action. That fellow, I concluded, would under favorable circumstances turn out a Dr. Marigold.

Here ended my visit to Lady Godiva, and my ramble through the old city in which she dwelt. As I had that day seen her Ladyship vanish under a satin skirt, so did I follow her through the old chronicles until she disappeared in the past almost as completely as in the present; nevertheless, be she a myth or not, I shall ever thank her for having led me in the one case into one of the most interesting by-ways of early English history, and in the other to some of the quaintest and merriest scenes which I have witnessed in the Old World.

SEPTEMBER WOODS.

GIRT round by meadows, wearing shabby weeds
 For clover's early death, and sentried by
 The tireless locust, with his muffled click
 Of secret weapon, at each footfall, stand
 The woods.

September, smiling treacherous smiles,
 And bearing in his hand a hollow truce,
 Which gentle Summer trusts, can enter free:
 Oh, fatal trust! Her sacred inner-court,
 Of Hollies Holiest, the lovely queen
 Throws open to the ally of her foe;
 By day with sunny look, and gracious air,
 He wins her heart, and wears her colors. Night
 Beholds him, in his white and gleaming mail
 Alert and noiseless, following the dews,
 Her faithful messengers, waylaying them
 With sudden cruel death, and in their stead
 His own foul treason bearing through the realm.
 Lured by his guile, green twining vines
 Array themselves in parti-colored robes,
 And loosely flaunt, unknowing 'tis their death;
 The low Bunch Berry her tunic white lays by,
 And wearing scarlet satin, decks her breast
 With knots of scarlet beads. This sin, oh sweet!
 In resurrection of the coming spring
 Shall be forgiven thee, and thou again
 Shalt rise, as white as snow.

The fragrant Ferns,
 And clinging Mosses, to whom Summer kind
 Had been, more than to other lowly things,
 Are true, and not till they are trampled low
 By icy warriors, will they refuse
 Their emerald carpet to her tread; and there
 In cold white grief will die, around her feet;
 The simpering Birch, unstable in the wind,
 Is first to break his faith, and cheaply bought
 By gold, in brazen vanity lifts up
 His arms, and broadly waves the glittering price
 Of his dishonor: Poplars next, and Elms
 Grow envious of the yellow show, and hold
 Their hands for traitors' wages; but more scant
 And dim the golden tokens gained by them;
 For now disloyalty has spread and grown
 More bold of front; whole clans are easy won.
 In hostile signal-fires, from hill to hill,
 The Maples blaze; the tangling Sumac-trees
 Of glowing spikes build crimson ladders up
 The wall; ungainly Moosewood strides, and creeps,
 And shakes his purple-spotted banner out,
 Defiantly: the sturdy Beeches throw
 Their harvest down, and bristle in a suit
 Of leathern points; all is revolt! and all
 Is lost for Summer!

Vainly, now, she showers
 By brook and pool her white and purple stars,
 And lifts in all the fields her golden rod;
 In vain their scarlet streamers sets along
 The meadows, and, to Gentian's pallid lips
 Of blue, calls back the chilled and torpid bee.
 Sweet queen! Her kingdom rocks! Her only stay
 And refuge now her loving Pines, who wait
 In solemn grief, unmoved and undismayed
 By guile or threats, and to their farthest kin
 A haughty and untarnished race, will keep Eternally inviolate and green.
 Their sworn allegiance to her, and all
 Her name!

Encircled by their arms she dies;
 And not the deadliest thrusts of wintry spears,

Nor sweeping avalanche of snow and ice,
 Can daunt them from their silent watch around
 Her sepulchre, nor, from their faithful hold
 Can wrest the babe, who, hid in sacred depths,
 And fed on sacred food, and nurtured till
 The fated day, shall lift her infant hand,
 And, slaying the usurper, take the throne
 Next in the royal line of summer queens!

ROBBED OF HALF A MILLION.

SO you want to hear that little story about How I lost half a million, do you? Now, to begin with, you must know that I actually lost half a million. There should not be any doubt about that fact. My report, telling just how I lost it, is on file in the War Department, carefully drawn up. The troops in our Department were generally paid bi-monthly, according to the Regulations, but on this particular forenoon in the summer of 1863, when I was summoned to head-quarters, four months' pay was due. For this reason the check handed me was several hundred thousand dollars larger than usual. The order read:

"You will proceed, with five other paymasters, without delay, by the shortest and safest route, to pay the army lying at, or near—"

"Without delay," said I, folding the order, "means to-morrow morning, Colonel. But the army lies three hundred miles from here, scattered along at various points. It is a rough region, tumbled into wooded hills, mountain spurs, and tangled ravines, swarming with outlaws. There are few cavalrymen that can be spared to escort us, and I fear a raid."

"Raids, Sir," said the Colonel, swelling with the importance of the announcement, "are like ocean storms. No good shipmaster delays sailing because storms may cross his path. He fights them out when he meets them, and that's the way you must do with raiders."

Of course there was nothing to be said against this display of Grand Tactics.

"But," said I, still anxious to delay, "I don't see how we are to get the blanks and money ready. The Sub-treasury clerks say that the last two millions were in thousand and hundred dollar notes. We must have at least a million in as small bills as fifties."

"Yes, they always send us whales when we want mackerel and sardines," he replied; "but you must change off large for small bills at the banks, and with sutlers in the field."

It was hard work, with no time for dinner or supper, but we got together, from the various money dens, several bushels of small bills; ragged and rotten, and emitting a very offensive smell. Some officers counted only large bills, and took the others for what the packages were marked; but my clerk, Wooddie, was very careful and patient, so we counted every piece of our share.

"Too much money is a 'weariness of the flesh,' an endless grind and bore," said poor Wooddie, as he crept into bed. "I hate every thing under a hundred-dollar bill, and I can't for the soul of me see how people become so miserly as to hoard up the vile stuff."

He roused up at intervals all night to vent his spleen in similar speeches. I tried in vain to sleep, but the night was feverish, and seemed groaning with internal agony, as if it had swallowed a whirlwind and was trying to throw it up. It was thick, black, and foreboding. The wind came in fitful gusts from the southwest, sounding like the advance skirmishers of a severe storm. No wonder that daylight found Wooddie sick and unable to move; it was some time before I could be convinced that I wasn't down sick myself. But there was no escaping the trip now, so I hastened to the Sub-treasury building.

On the window-sill, inside, looking through the round iron bars, sat old Toby, the watch-dog, and behind him stood Uncle Daniel, his master and companion. They looked exactly alike. Uncle Daniel had been vault-porter twenty years, and had lugged so many tons of gold into the vault and out, and shoveled it up into bags, and weighed and watched it so long that he and the dog had grown very yellow, and that is why I noticed that they were a thought paler than usual this morning. I nodded, but they paid no attention to me. They were looking across the way at a very old building, so I looked too. Its iron blinds sogged heavily on hinges; the walls were black with smoke, and every window was hung with festoons of dusty spiders' webs.

It had been a stanch fire-proof dwelling-house in its day, with marble cornice and carved window-caps, but since its coarse burly neighbors, the business-houses, had encroached on its yard; and especially since a big-throated chimney near by had commenced puffing smoke into its eyes, ears, and nose, day and night, the respectable mansion had fallen into a decline, and gone to entertaining all sorts of characters for money. As the necessary consequence of absorbing so much unwholesome matter, its face had become pimpled with an eruption of signs, and the door-posts had broken out into yellow blotches, inscribed "Rooms to Let." One room, however, was not to be let, evidently, and that was the one at which old Toby and Uncle Daniel were looking. The first thing visible, through the raised window, was a pair of patent-leather boots, and the next thing was the wearer, sitting in a chair smoking. He didn't look like a photographer or dentist (half the tenants in such buildings usually are one or the other); besides, their days don't begin till about ten o'clock. I had no time to puzzle longer, for the balance of the party had come up; the door was opened, our safes, cots, and chests loaded on the dray, and started for the dépôt.

Uncle Daniel called me behind the door, where old Toby eyed me with grim tolerance, evidently reserving the right (after our two years' acquaintance) to take me by the throat at any time he chose, without violating past pledges.

"Now, Major," said Uncle Daniel, shaking his head, "I'm afraid you'll have trouble."

"What's the matter? Any packages short, Uncle?" said I.

"No, nothing of that kind," said he; "but you start on an unlucky day, and that man over the way is a spy, I think. The city is overrun with rogues. I see 'em walk past here, looking in at the money with their robber faces. The country is full of bushwhackers where you're going. I hate to spare him, Major, but I believe I'll let Toby go with you."

"Thank you," said I, "but I guess it would be a little safer for me to take a basket of torpedoes on my arm as a protection. I'm afraid I'd have to be iron-clad if he was along."

"Oh no," said Uncle Daniel, "you'd get along if I only told him to mind you. He hasn't had orders to mind any body but me yet, you see. Here!" said he to the dog, "go with the Major, go!"

Toby followed me out, and the door clanged behind us. I noticed that the window across the way was closed. As I hurried up the street, and turned down toward the dépôt I glanced back at Toby. He was close by and didn't look amiable; it was rather unpleasant, in fact, to see how that dog tried to hold me "with his glittering eye." He didn't act to me like a dog who was conscious of having a master quite so close to him as I was. The farther I went, and the faster I walked, the plainer it became that Toby was guarding me instead of obeying my behests. I whistled to him and he growled; I said "Get out," in a modified way, and he showed his teeth rather closer to my legs than was pleasant. I called him "Good doggie," which he resented as much as a boy resents being called "Bub."

I found him determined to hasten hostilities, and, as I had no iron armor, I went to a tree-box to tear off the top slat for a club. He discovered this overt act, and made such a ferocious attack that I was forced up the tree. Confound the dog! if you've never been treed you have no idea how much he had grown in the last few seconds, and how unnatural his neck looked. It was impossible to coax or compromise. He had misunderstood his master, and only his master could set him right. I should certainly miss the train and lose my money. I called to a German for help, but he turned and hurried down the street for a policeman, under the impression that I was a burglar.

Just as I was getting ready to leap down and take my chances a large man, wearing a slouched hat, came down the street in haste, evidently going to the train. He stopped, greatly surprised at seeing the dog; and old Toby seemed to instantly recognize the stranger as a natural enemy, and started for him. I jumped down, and ran for the dépôt—we all ran—the slouched-hat fellow being just enough ahead of the dog to shut the car door between them. Old Toby licked his lips, looked about, then went and lay down on our safes by the baggage-car, "the monarch of all he surveyed."

The fellow in the slouched hat, having taken a good survey of matters from the window, passed cautiously into the baggage-car, and taking a lasso he threw it over Toby's head, and pulled him up to the door.

"Taken a spite at me, eh?" said he to the dog, kicking him. "Perhaps you'll know me next time," snarled the man, still kicking his head; and at each kick old Toby snapped at his boots, and trowsers, and the side of the car—he was so blind with rage. "Perhaps you'll want to follow me up stairs again," continued the man, still choking and kicking him. "Perhaps you don't like my looks. Maybe my hair isn't parted to suit you."

"There, I guess that will do," said I, stepping up to him and taking hold of the rope.

"He's a particular friend of yours, is he?" said the man, savagely, looking down as if he intended to lasso me too.

"No," said I, "but you needn't kill the dog because he don't like your looks. You are not so handsome that you need be jealous of a dog's opinion."

He looked at me as Toby did when I was up the tree, then walked back into the car, and I told a policeman to deliver the dog to Uncle Daniel.

We were all day riding the hundred and twenty miles, and I had time to examine the passengers' faces. Uncle Daniel's spy was not on board, unless he was the man who wore the slouched hat. I could not believe he was the one. His clothes were coarse and his boots heavy. But I had never before seen such a restless, hungry, leaping eye. A Grand Jury of physiognomists would have found a bill of indictment against him without other evidence than his face. He seemed to know that I knew he was a rogue; and sometimes he looked at me with defiance, and sometimes furtively, as if he suspected I was on his track. I was, and had made up my mind to continue the healthy prejudice against him that old Toby seemed to entertain.

Five o'clock brought us to the railroad terminus—a sea of mud, navigated by six mule-teams and covered army wagons. The sutlers' shops had drifted in irregular rows on to a shoal of oyster cans, and the proprietary Jew inhabitants had red shirts hung out in front as signals of distress. Every body seemed to be away from home and hungry for oysters; but the great and reigning monsters of this miry ocean were the mule-drivers—a vicious, obstinate, and profane race; embodied lawlessness; migratory insurrections; beings about as much like men as mules are like horses. While looking at one of these teams I saw the man with the slouched hat getting into a wagon, and he had a pair of patent-leather boots in his hands. I followed him, clambering over bales of hay, barrels of pork, and boxes of crackers, scattered along the shore of mud, winding about among great, rough-boarded warehouses crammed with army blankets, clothing, boxed arms, gun-carriages, hospital cots, trenching spades, and axes mixed in endless profusion and confusion, to the Quarter-master's office.

"Who is that?" I asked of the Quarter-master, pointing to the man I had seen get on the wagon.

"He's an M.D.," said the Captain.

"An M.D.? What regiment is he surgeon of?"

The Captain laughed immoderately. His six clerks looked up from their writing and laughed too, but quite respectfully. "Why, M.D. means Mule Driver," said the Captain.

"You don't pretend to say that he is one of your drivers?"

"Yes, Major, I do say just that," replied the Captain.

"But who is he? Where did he come from? Is his character good?" said I.

At these questions every body in the room laughed, and this time without the slightest respect. Asking about a mule driver's character was too good a joke to be resisted.

"We can't be particular, Major," said the Captain, "and the less I know about their histories the better I like 'em. I generally ask two questions: Can you drive? Did you ever get stalled so you couldn't get out yourself and nobody could help you out? If they answer these questions right I hire 'em, no matter if they've got shackles and State's prison clothes on. I believe our best driver is an ex-burglar. He's strong, and takes pride, as most men will, for a time, in doing a new business well. Some of our worst drivers are horse-thieves. You see they naturally like horses, and of course they hate mules and won't feed 'em. Mules must be fed and watered, and that's about all they want. Now all this is business. When it comes to pleasure, like marrying into this fellow's family; or private matters, like having him for partner in trade, I'd object. I wouldn't like to meet him alone in a dark night. But he knows all this country; the fords, springs, and foraging places, and is on that account very valuable in a train. He calls himself Beaumont. He's off and on, and don't drive regular."

"By-the-way, Captain," said I, willing to change the subject, "my clerk is sick; can't you spare one out of your office?"

"No," he replied, "a good one can't be spared, and a poor one you don't want; but I think you can get a fellow named Hickey—nephew of the post commander at —, right where you are going. He came down on the train with you; was dressed in military clothes. You can talk with him; that won't hurt any body."

"Well," I replied, "I will look into the Provost Marshal's office for a clerk, and then come around."

Such an ignorant and hopeless crowd I never saw before. "Nobody among these refugees fit for a clerk, have you?" said I to the Provost.

"No, Sir," he replied, emphatically, "fit for nothing, not even fit food for powder. They don't know how to do any thing, and they are too lazy to work if they did know how."

I met Hickey as I went down the steps, and promised to take him if I didn't hear from Wood-die in the morning.

As I sat in the ambulance next morning ready to start, knitting my brows with vexation, trying to avoid my fate, I suddenly raised the curtain, and putting out my head told Hickey to get in. He had been about head-quarters long enough to get poisoned by its bad atmosphere. A perfect flunky is not an American production, but Hickey had all of the natural and most of the acquired qualifications. He was devoid of honor, subservient to power, and merciless to weakness or misfortune. He was not a safe man to help handle half a million of money. I found that he was a Southerner, and had been in the enemy's country till 1863. All these things came out, and all these doubts were raised, before we had gone ten miles. I was thinking of Uncle Daniel's warning, and looking ahead, when I was startled by seeing the eyes of Beaumont looking back at me under his slouched hat.

"Hallo there! Who are you?" said I, in my first surprise. He did not reply, or turn his head. "You driver, there!" I continued, "I mean you. Who are you? Where did you come from?"

He made no answer.

"I'd have him arrested," said Hickey.

"You can't," growled an old clerk named Stretcher.

"Can't? I'd like to know why not," said Hickey.

"Because," said Stretcher, "he ain't an enlisted man, and ain't obliged to answer any questions. He hired out to drive mules, and so long as he does that right he's safe."

"Well," said Hickey, "I know the Colonel, my uncle, arrested a driver one day for not saluting him."

"Yes," retorted old Stretcher, who had been for twenty-five years a clerk in the regular service, and consequently despised every thing that wasn't regular—"I suppose your uncle, the Colonel, would arrest a mule for he-hawing in his presence; that's all you volunteers know. Now you might just as well ask the driver to answer a conundrum or a problem in mathematics as ask him where he came from. It don't make any difference where he came from if he only goes to the right place."

"That's true of humanity generally," said I, to turn the conversation.

"It's true of mule-drivers any how," growled Stretcher.

"But maybe he came from State's prison," said Hickey.

"Probably," replied Stretcher; "but that's no matter, so long as the mules don't find it out and become demoralized."

Hickey couldn't talk much with this splenetic old veteran, and we all fell to discussing the deep fords, heavy hills, and horrible roads. Old Stretcher declared the country wasn't worth conquering, and wouldn't pay for what it cost monthly to scout it over; and as for the inhabitants, they wasn't half so good as we could get by the hundred thousand every year for nothing from emigrant ships.

I noticed that neither Hickey nor Beaumont liked this kind of talk, and I saw also that they seemed to recognize each other. We camped at the mouth of a gorge on the bank of a river that night, and while I sat in a bushy cover overlooking the little valley where we lay Hickey and Beaumont came up to the spring below me for water.

"Don't you know you ought to be arrested?" said Hickey.

"Don't you know you dare not do it?" replied Beaumont.

"I can have it done though," said Hickey.

"So I can have something done," retorted Beaumont; "but that's no sign I will have it done. You let me alone, and I'll let you alone; that's fair for both."

A knot of cavalymen of the escort coming to fill their canteens drove this precious pair away. It was plain that they were a couple of rogues from the enemy's country. So long as they quarreled I was all right.

In the morning we found the ragged skirts of a storm dragging over our heads; the landscape soaked with last night's rain; the trees hanging their arms down hopelessly; and nothing but a canal of mud wending its snaky way over the hills where the road should be. We started up this canal and got stalled; we struggled and fought; we waded on foot along its sides, and finally camped thirteen miles from our last stopping-place. I had noticed that when we got out to lighten the ambulance Hickey had staid in and talked with the driver. That night the driver had Hickey's blanket—they had compromised—and I must look out. Our pickets were driven in, and we stumbled about in mud and darkness getting ready for an enemy that never came, all night.

Eight days of the same roads brought us to the last permanent post, three days' march from the main army.

I had resolved to discharge Hickey, and the Colonel commanding was resolved that I should not discharge him. This patriot divided his duty up into five parts, so he could be sure and attend to it. The first one served was old Colonel Hickey himself. If it was necessary to take all day for that purpose he took it. After Colonel Hickey came his family (he kept a distinction in his own favor there); next followed his friends; then his State; and, lastly, the United States.

Wooddie telegraphed me asking if the roads were passable; and as all dispatches went through the Commandant's hands, he replied that the roads were impassable. He did many small things to secure his nephew a place. But late one night Wooddie rode up in a dispatch ambulance. Head-quarters was offended, out of humor, and frowned. A frown from there passes down through a camp or garrison like a pestilence. The Quarter-master was impudent, the escort was glum, the drivers sour, and the very mules seemed more obstinate than ever. I had determined to go alone, with half a million of dollars, and pay some regiments lying on the extreme right wing, leaving the balance of the party at the post to figure up the rolls of the main army.

Hickey and Beaumont were the only ones who knew the road, and though I had once determined not to have them, I thought, on reflection, it would be better to keep them with me than have them away plotting. I told Hickey that I wanted him to go, and Beaumont to drive. He turned red, and said he believed Beaumont was sick and out in the country with some friends. I knew that was false, for I had seen them both drinking together an hour before. He returned at noon to say that Beaumont was sick, and could not go. Before night he sent word that he was sorry that even he would be unable to go. My only way now was to get a large escort and a guide, and push through at once. I called on the Colonel and asked for 100 picked men and a guide.

"Of course! you Paymasters always want big escorts," said he, testily, "but I can't spare men, and you don't need 'em either. There's nothing on the road to hurt you. You'd understand this if you were in the field fighting. The enemy is getting ready to attack us, and their forces are all drawn in. I wish," he continued, "Government would put none but military men in the disbursing department, instead of appointing from civil life."

"I suppose a few appointments from uncivil life would help matters," I replied.

"Yes, Sir," said he, flushing up and scowling.

"I don't think," continued I, coolly, "that our department could absorb all the uncivil office-seekers."

"Adjutant," said he, "have twenty-five men ordered for an escort to start to-morrow; tell the Quarter-master to furnish a guide." And he paced the floor as if he felt the faces of his enemies beneath his boots.

"Thank you, Colonel; good-day;" and I sauntered out.

That night my ambulance axle-tree was sawed off, and it took all next day to fix it; but we were ready for the next morning, and I got up very early. I met old Stretcher hunting for something to drink.

"I can't sleep, Major," he said, "and I must have a thimbleful of something to kill this morning fever-fog. I wish I was going with you out of this filthy hole, only that ain't a very likely strip of country you are going through. It's where the Horse Creek gang used to range. Fifteen years ago a stranger's life wasn't worth sixpence there. I don't believe there ever was a time when it would be safe for a man to ride a good horse through that region. We've got a specimen of the inhabitants. Your driver, Beaumont, came from there, and he ain't a man calculated to call in emigrants, is he?"

"How do you know he lived there?" I asked.

"Because I heard him and Hickey talking about it. I don't know exactly what they said.

I saw Beaumont riding out of town yesterday morning early."

"On which road?" said I.

"North road," he replied.

"North road? All right. I hope he won't stop till he gets to the Russian Possessions," said I, relieved to hear that it wasn't the west road, which I was to take.

The escort was late and no guide could be had. The Quarter-master thought the road was plain; the Colonel had no doubt I could inquire the way; and the commander of the escort didn't apprehend any trouble, so we were off on the west road at a trot, and found every thing the first day as we desired. By the next noon we were at fault, and wallowing along till three o'clock, we came to a better road, which we passed down as fast as we could, anxious to find a good camp. The farther we went the more forbidding the surrounding country appeared.

Along the river bottoms the thickets were almost impenetrable, and the open upland was entirely uncultivated. No houses any where; no fences; no sign of civilization except horses' tracks. Grass grew in the middle of the road, and in many places clear across it. At last we reached a scrub-oak plain, and, passing down out of that country, we came to a ford, trampled by horses, but clear, and beyond that, on a ridge of beautiful timber, where the woods stretched up into a growth of tall trees and there was no underbrush, we found a large log-house with a yard fenced in by rails. One white man and an old colored woman lived here. The man said we were half a day's ride from the right road.

"What is this mud-hole back here?" said I.

"That is Horse Creek, and this is called Horse Creek Crossing," said he, looking as if he didn't expect us to be pleased with the name.

"Is it a good lively country for bushwhackers?" said I, getting out.

"Wa'al, I don't know exactly," he drawled. "I wouldn't be surprised if there was some scattered around."

"I wouldn't either," said the commander of the escort, riding up, "but I guess they won't trouble us to-night. We must stay here any how, the horses are tired out."

It was a delicious place; shady and silent, with only a few shy wood birds flying occasionally from tree to tree, high up from the ground, their strange notes adding to the hermit-like seclusion of the forest. Grand rooms these, with extra high ceilings.

Nothing in this quiet nook had been disturbed by the war. The cattle were untouched, the granary full, and the cellar supplied. I was surprised, however, to find so many evidences of woman's presence, but no woman except Aunt Sarah the colored cook.

After supper, in walking about, I noticed that the top rails of the fence, and the trees in the road had been gnawed by horses. I showed these signs to the commander of the escort, and told him I feared we might be attacked. He said he didn't fear any men who fought in the woods. They were cowards, and we might as well laugh as cry; we couldn't do better than wait.

It was a beautiful night, so Wooddie and I put our cots under a large tree in the front-yard.

As the shadows deepened the whip-poor-wills commenced their songs; now startling the listener with their sudden sharp cry near at hand, then calming us with the faintest reply in the distance, sounding as soft as a fading echo. The night-hawks darting above the tree tops sent down their clear, deep voices, saying, "Sleep, sleep!" and the crickets, from every crevice of the log-house, and the leaves in the woods, chirped, "Peace! peace! peace!" as though men knew no more of brimstone than Adam did in Eden. Out of the reach of hunger, and orders, and brass buttons; here in the woods, with the birds, we found the first real rest since we had entered service.

"In such a place as this, Wooddie," said I, "under the shade of melancholy boughs, I would lie down at last and sleep, beneath the roots of these old storm-fighters."

"You'll excuse me," he replied, "but I wouldn't like to enter into the matter so deep as that yet, though I'm awful sleepy: so good-night," and he was soon in dream-land.

I lay listening to the birds, and I thought, after a long time, that I noticed a peculiarity in one whip-poor-will's note, and that the bird seemed to be slowly approaching the camp.

"Wooddie! Wooddie!" said I, shaking his cot, "get up, old fellow!"

"Eh?" said he, sitting up, rubbing his eyes, and looking over—"I dreamed you called me."

"So I did; listen to that whip-poor-will."

"Listen! why," said he, "there's a thousand of 'em. I might as well listen to the rustle of a single leaf in these woods."

"But there is a particular one," said I, "over beyond the well, and some distance off."

"I hear the scabbard and spurs of the guard," said he; "and, now I think of it, can you tell me why every guard we have placed over our safe has spurs with bells on 'em?"

"Perhaps to keep them awake," said I; "but don't you hear my whip-poor-will now?"

"No; I hear one in the other direction, exactly opposite," he replied.

I heard this, and the two seemed to be answering each other. Wooddie laughed at this, and fell asleep again. The birds had stopped. It was getting past midnight, when two birds in opposite directions took up the song; then all four joined in, one after another.

I had just reached over to wake up Wooddie when the pickets fired their guns; there was a thunder of horses' feet coming each way along the road, a scrambling rush through the trees, and the yard was black with horsemen. I had been knocked down and trampled upon. I remembered seeing Wooddie running toward the well. I wonder now how I could have been so cool, as I crawled up to a tree and sat there with a burning sensation in my back, saying to myself, as I rubbed my hands over the bruised spot, "This is a bad job—a very bad job, old boy, and you ain't quite equal to it!" Then I fell over on my side, oblivious of this world's tricks upon travelers.

The next thing I knew it was late in the morning; the sun shone, the birds were singing, and I could see the shadows slowly moving to and fro in the woods as I lay on my cot, in the log-house, unable to move.

"This is cool," said I to the post-surgeon, who was present; "but how did it all happen, doctor?"

"Well, the old Colonel got scared about you, fearing that he had not given you enough of an escort," said the Doctor; "so he sent out two hundred men, and an ambulance for the wounded! We got to Horse Creek late, and were just dismounting when we heard firing over here, and pushed on, to find you in possession of four or five hundred guerrillas, who fell back, and our party followed up, leaving me here."

"But where is the money? Where is Wooddie?" said I.

"Brushed and gone," replied the Surgeon; "and there's what's left of the wagon!"

I looked through a chink in the logs and saw a heap of ashes; but among the tires, hub-rings, braces, and bolts, I could see nothing looking like a safe.

"So the hounds have chosen my better part and taken it away, eh? Well, Doctor," said I, "that ruins me!"

"There's nothing that time won't cure," he replied.

The troops came back that day, bringing no safe, no Wooddie, no news.

Alone at last, with the blessed rain pattering down through the high halls of these woods on to the log-house roof. Blessed the delicious night, bringing sleep and forgetfulness! and twice blessed the sunshine and the womanly face that I found bending over me next morning! Maybe she wouldn't have been much of a woman on Broadway; but she was a great deal of a woman there in the woods at that time.

"Are you badly wounded?" she asked, in a low voice.

"Not bodily," I replied; "but I've lost half a million dollars, and that hurts me."

"But," said she, "was it your money?"

"No, Madam," I replied, "but a trust-fund from those who relied on my discretion and courage; and though not criminally negligent, nevertheless I am stung with regret that I was not over-careful. I should have staid at the post, and insisted on a larger escort and a guide."

I turned over, conscious that my head was getting light, and awoke to find the insects droning the drowsy afternoon away.

"Who is the lady?" said I, to Aunt Sarah, the cook.

"Missus Adeline I call her," said she. "Missus Adeline Danton is her name."

"Is the man we found here her husband?"

"Blow us, no!" she replied. "He ain't nobody here. He was just saying. He's gone now, sure enough. Missus is a kind of widow."

"A kind of widow?" said I. "What kind?"

"Wig, them kind," said she, "where their husbands ain't dead."

"Her husband must have been a great villain to have left her," said I.

"Blow you, chile," she replied. "He's chief of the House Creek gang, and she got a divorce from him, or some kind of a paper breaking up their wedding; but he or some of his gang killed the old Judge that wrote out the paper, so they say poor Missus is just the same again as she was afore."

I was smiling at this novel notion when Mrs. Dawson came in, glad to see me home.

In two days I was able to have my suit moved under the trees. Of course I thought of the half million. It was the ghost that came out of the woods to haunt me at midnight. I dreamed more of being in prison, and on the black walls of my prison cell were the figures $500,000 written in fire.

But while I dreamed in the woods old Hickey worked against me outside. An exaggerated statement of my loss had been telegraphed to head-quarters, and on the seventh day came the order:

"Discontinue Movement, Joe — Wt."

"What —," having been, as I assumed, notified of a large amount of Government funds, is ordered to report to these head-quarters, to permit, immediately.

"By Order," etc.

It took ten men and an ambulance to bring the news. As I could not go in person over the whole road Mrs. Dawson wrote a report, in detail, of my loss, and drew up a certificate in due and staid form, stating that it was impossible for me to report in person without great danger to life, and that this certificate was given because there was no surgeon to certify. I signed these, and they were handed to the Lieutenant commanding, and he started off.

"Do you intend to leave the ambulance?" asked Mrs. Dawson, with a look of alarm and distress.

"Yes, that waits for the Major," said he, knocking his hat and riding away through the woods, with his men thinking at his heels.

I raised my head, and, sure enough, there was that scoundrelly driver, Beament, sitting under a tree smoking. This it was that had so distressed Mrs. Dawson—she feared to have me alone in the woods with that villain, after my description of him to her. I tried to console her, but to little purpose. I had never seen her so distressed before. The matter was getting too serious for me to be there still, so I determined to get up and test my strength.

Toward evening I made my way by aid of a stick on a shady place near the house where Anne usually washed, and sat down on a log to watch the minnows play.

"I will do any thing you ask," said a man.

"Then leave me," replied Anne.

"No, never till I have him safe in my hands," said he.

"You know I can not consent," she replied.

"You must," said he, severely. "I am a content and desperate man, and will not be trifled with. When I leave this spot he must go too. He shall go."

I stood up, and through the branches saw the driver Beament. His wig was thrown aside, disclosing a high, white forehead, contrasting strangely with his brown cheeks and fair discolored with passion. At sight of me his eyes flashed with hate, and springing into the open space where I stood he snatched a pistol at my head. It missed fire, and I managed to strike a stinging blow on his hand with the stick I held, and knocked the pistol down. He turned, and, leaping into the bushes, was gone; and well for him too, for we heard the tramp of horses by the house. Twenty men, loaded, armed, and dandy, brought an order to take me to the post. I was amazed! On what charge think you? Wig, whispering with the country, to wit, a certain gr named Beament, whom by the United States lost a large sum, to wit, half a million dollars. "Wasn't this a daisy dish to set before a dog?" To spice the entertainment Mrs. Adeline Dawson was subpoenaed as a witness.

In preparing the ambulance for me with pillows, so I could ride easy, Aunt Sarah tossed a small water-proof umbrella, which she lent me, saying: "There 'tis, as God, I reckon."

They belonged to Beament, and I put them deep down in a safe corner of my valise, and went morning only a satisfied content House Creek going toward the post, and near the head of the procession rode Adeline Dawson and the man who lost the money.

The charges and specifications were so long and formal that the reading of them produced a sensation of doubt and gloom in my mind. It took much telegraphing and many orders to get up a court-martial. They are queer contrivances, being good or bad according to the humor of the man making the deal. I had little to hope from old Colonel Hickey, and still less from his tools, composed of the wretches which had drifted back from the main army and lodged about the post. He was allowed to arrange matters as he pleased.

After four weeks of fasting, one afternoon in August the court assembled; principal witness for the prosecution, F. Hickey Esq., civilian. If there was any thing tending to distress Hickey, or his uncle, or friends, and to depress me and my loved and friends, that wasn't sworn to by said F. H., it must have been all oversight on his part. "An error of the head and not the heart," I found from his testimony, and the Judge-Advocate's remarks, that my design had been to strike the tower, church and steeple, to Beament, Woodie, and myself. He believed I had contemplated this plan in part, and that the money had been taken by the enemy. The money would probably now be found concealed in the woods; perhaps I had left it at the post before starting. In proof he introduced several dozen witnesses who knew nothing about me or my money; and still others who didn't know much about any thing, and a note from Wooddie, which ran thus:

"DEAR MAJOR.—I'm in the enemy's hands. The rations are good, but you know money is almost indispensable to an invalid in the condition I am. To be well I must have delicacies—send some. Please forward this note to my mother. She told me that I must beware of strong drink. I think constantly of her words. Remember me to Mr. Hickey; remember me also to our old driver."

"Love to Adeline."

"WOODDIE."

"Here," said the Judge Advocate, "he asks for money. How can the defendant have money if he has been robbed? If he has money it must be stolen. As to this clerk being remembered to Mr. Hickey, Mr. H. repudiates him; but that he should send his regards to a co-conspirator—Beaumont, is natural, and so with regard to Adeline Danton, who might, for aught he knew, be a conspirator too. He relied much on that letter, and would submit the case on the part of the Government."

I was to put in my defense the next day. I thought Wooddie's letter contained a secret dispatch, and so I took a copy by permission. It was neither blank verse nor poetry. I read every other word, and so on up to every ninth word, which last made this sentence: "Rations indispensable. To please me think Hickey to."

Only one thing was clear; he was living on Andersonville fare, poor fellow! and had feared to say so in his letter lest it should be suppressed. I divided my money and sent him half. The next day I put in my defense. It wasn't much. I was sick and discouraged, careless and impudent. The Court's dignity was offended. I was thought hardened, and found guilty. I was glad to know the worst, and have Mrs. Danton permitted to return to her home. On the morning of her departure I showed her Wooddie's note, and asked her how she came to know him.

"I don't know him," said she.

"But he sends you his love," I replied.

"It must be some more favored Adeline," said she.

"But there is no other in the world that I know," I replied.

"Well," said she, "I'm glad some one loves me, and I can't do less than send mine in return; and if he or you will come to my house again, I hope you'll meet not quite so warm but a much more hospitable reception than you did the first night."

"Well," said I, forcing a smile, "expect us when I have finished my time at the 'Dry Tortugas.' Good-by." She shook her head as the ambulance rolled away, and I saw her handkerchief up to her face—thinking of my sentence, poor girl! It might yet be disapproved, and I restored to duty, so I went back to study over the note. Adeline must be the key. It had seven letters, but every seventh word meant nothing. Finally, I transcribed it into lines of seven words:

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 197.—U C

"DEAR MAJOR.—I'm in the enemy's hands."

The rations are good, but you know money is almost indispensable to an invalid in the condition I am. To be well I must have delicacies; send some. Please forward this note to my mother. She told me that I must beware of strong drink. I think constantly of her words. Remember me to Mr. Hickey. Remember me also to our old driver."

Eureka! An acrostic dispatch! The first two words, then the first; the first two twice, then the first read: "Dear Major.—The money is in the well." The good and faithful boy had run to the wagon and thrown the safe into the well when the first gun was fired almost, and was captured there. The last words of the last four lines read: "Beware of Hickey, driver."

I showed the dispatch to no one. It was blowing hot through the War Department in those days, and healthy blasts they were too. One of them swept away our old General, and a new one came riding down—a gentleman fit to command. He looked at the epaulets nature put on men instead of the straps of the tailors. I saw him, and he trusted me at once. He said Wooddie should be exchanged; and the next day I was riding down to Horse Creek Crossing with a hundred men at my heels. Adeline looked pale and frightened, then very red and glad when I rode up. I soon had hooks in the well, and an hour afterward the safe was up and opened, showing a mass of pulpy green—a visible, rich green—worth half a million to me. I returned to the post and telegraphed my success. The court-martial finding came back "Disapproved," and I was restored to duty.

Wooddie had returned, and Colonel Hickey had been ordered to the front. Now came my turn. I had evidence sufficient to convict young Hickey of the charge against me; to wit, conspiring with the enemy, one Beaumont, a spy, to rob the United States of half a million of dollars. He was arrested, and the papers belonging to Beaumont (given me by Aunt Sarah), with others found near the house, were put in evidence.

Indeed, Aunt Sarah herself came forward and swore to some very curious and stunning things. Hickey and Beaumont had been engaged in a robbery some time before, and Beaumont having done most of the work claimed most of the money. They had quarreled; Beaumont keeping all the money. Hickey, hearing that his uncle was an officer, had come through the lines to get a place under him. Beaumont had been a doctor and a gentleman. He married Adeline Danton six years before, and they had a boy, the very image of Adeline. The Doctor drank, gambled, and finally became such a villain in many ways that she got a divorce from him, and sent her boy inside our lines. His father was roaming up and down the country as a driver, looking for the child, and picking up booty, when he fell in with a rogue in the city, who put him to watching the paymasters from the old, dingy building where I first saw him. He found Hickey. They made up the old quarrel on the road with us. They agreed to rob me and divide the spoil; but as Hickey got no booty he thought Beaumont had been false again, and accused me of conspiring with him as a spy—thus revenging himself on Beaumont and injuring me. It came out that Hickey had actually furnished Beaumont the pass, stolen from his uncle, to go outside our lines and gather a band the day previous to my leaving; that Hickey was the one who sawed off the ambulance axle-tree; and that Beaumont was close by when I was attacked. Hickey was sentenced to imprisonment during the war.

Beaumont roamed the woods—a fiend incarnate—with an outcast and desperado gang, ready to do his bidding. He was sworn to kill a great many good and loyal citizens of the United States, and, among others, myself. This, of course, he was to do “at sight,” as all such oaths ran.

Well, in the merry month of October, I went down into the Horse Creek region with plenty of money and plenty of men. We smoked, we shouted, we sang, and reveled in the sunshine and bracing air like boys let loose from school.

Not two hundred rods from Horse Creek Crossing we were popped at from the bush. In a moment after a powerful black horse bounded into the road ahead of us and disappeared. His saddle was empty and bridle broken. We searched the woods and found where the horse had stood under a tree, and not three rods off lay Beaumont with his neck broken. His head had been dashed against a lower limb when the horse started. We buried him where he lay.

The fences about the old house were burned, and the ground trampled into mud by horses' feet. It looked gloomy enough. Adeline had gone North.

“See here,” said the Major, who had been relating this story, pointing to the garden behind his office. — The Sentinel.”

There was Aunt Sarah, and the handsome boy, who looked so much like his mother; and the beautiful bright face of the woman who used to be Adeline Danton was turned toward the office. Wooddie was junior partner, in the front-room smoking, with old Toby under the table as deaf as a post—military or otherwise.

THE BURNING OF COLUMBIA AGAIN.

THE article on the Burning of Columbia in the August Number of Harper's Magazine was evidently written by an officer who was desirous of telling the truth, but who has fallen into some errors which ought to be corrected. The writer of this was a citizen of Columbia, and, like the author alluded to, an eye-witness of that unhappy event, and most cheerfully bears his testimony to the general truthfulness of the narrative. But as there are some inaccuracies which would readily be admitted by the author if he were here, so there are others which are the result of deductions from unsound premises.

After General Sherman had promised Mayor Goodwyn that “the people and their houses should be respected,” it would indeed be making him out a deliberate falsifier of his word to charge him with the burning of Columbia. It is not to be supposed that a gentleman educated at West Point, accustomed to the society of American army officers who have been proverbial for their high sense of honor, and who had visited much in the best families in Carolina, could have assumed Mayor Goodwyn (as he unquestionably did) “that the town should be protected; that he might retire to his bed, and rest quietly after the fatigues of the day; that he [Sherman] would take care of the city, which was much safer in his hands than it could be in the hands of the Mayor,” and then give orders to burn and pillage the very city he had promised to protect. To suppose this of General Sherman is too monstrous a libel on human nature, and we must find out some other hypothesis on which to base a probable solution of this vexed question.

And yet there are citizens of Columbia who believe Sherman capable of this enormous baseness; who believe that he treacherously lulled them into a false security by his promises of protection, and then fired the town to give his soldiers an excuse for plundering the burning buildings. They believe that the soldiers had been promised the pillage of Columbia from the time they left Savannah; and that General Sherman knew the feeling which existed, and of their intention to take ample vengeance on the inhabitants of the capital of South Carolina. They believe that certain rockets (I saw them myself), which were sent up from the neighborhood of head-quarters about 8 o'clock of the evening of the 17th of February, were the signals for the burning and plundering to begin. They believe that many of the officers, who had been profuse in their assurances of safety and protection, suddenly changed their tone on the appearance of these rockets, and warned many of the inhabitants of the approaching ruin.

Without being able to account for these rockets, or to explain their purpose (which has never yet been done, so far as I have heard), I still cling to the belief that General Sherman intended to protect the persons and private property of the citizens, and that both he and his officers, who so repeatedly assured the citizens of their intention to protect them, were honest and sincere in their promises; and General Sherman himself, and many of his officers, labored hard to fulfill the assurances they had given; but from causes which he and they were unable at the time to control the town was fired and plundered by the soldiers of Sherman's army; and that, when the fire (which was begun in many places at the same time) had gotten fairly under way, no human power could have stopped it—not all the men of Sherman's vast army could have checked that raging fire during that noc-nado of wind which swept over our devoted city from 5 o'clock of the evening of the 17th of February to 5 o'clock of the morning of the 18th. There was no need for any burning flakes of "cotton lint, and tinder" to ignite the dwellings of Columbia, when "burning boards and shingles" were carried in a perfect shower of fire from square to square, spreading the terrible conflagration beyond the power of mortal man to arrest it.

The author of the article in question is certainly wrong in saying the wind was from the south, and that the southwestern portion of the city was destroyed. This error is easily accounted for. Columbia is situated on the eastern side of the Congaree River, which forms the western boundary of the corporate limits of the city. The general course of Sherman's march was toward the north, and as the army crossed the river about two miles above Columbia the faces of the soldiers were turned south when they entered the city, and any one might have easily mistaken the points of the compass from this reversal of the line of march. There were but three places within the city of Columbia where there was any fire during the whole of Friday, and for many hours after the occupation of the town by the Federal Army. These were the Charlotte Railroad dépôt, on the extreme eastern side of the city; the Charleston Railroad dépôt, on the extreme west; and in the main street near the State House, where some bales of cotton had been fired about 11 o'clock in the morning, it is thought by accident. The only importance which attaches to this error consists in the fact that, as the wind was from the north instead of the south, it was utterly impossible that the northern part of the city could have ignited from fires in the southern portion, with the wind blowing a gale from the north.

There is no exaggeration in the author's eloquent description of this terrible fire: "The northern and western sky was not only all aflame, but the air was filled with myriad sparks and burning brands. They fell upon the wooden house-tops; they dashed against the window-panes, lurid with reflected light; they fell in showers into the garden and among the trees; they mingled with the eddying dust which whirled along the street. It was the rain of fire, which is so sublimely expressed in music, in that grand oratorio—'Israel in Egypt.'" Such was the terrific force of this furious wind that it was not possible for the conflagration to have spread in any other direction than from north to south. And in this direction the city was doomed, no matter what efforts were being made to save it, so long as the wind prevailed and there were buildings in its path.

But what had General Hampton to do with the burning of Columbia? All that General Sherman alleges against him is that he distributed combustible materials—"cotton lint, and tinder"—about the city, which spread the fire after the burning had begun.

There were many hundreds of bales of cotton stored in various parts of the city when Sherman's army approached Columbia. To prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy there was an order issued for its destruction. But to prevent the burning of the cotton from destroying the buildings in which it was stored a great part of this cotton was taken out of the various store-houses and piled in the middle of the streets, which are every where 100 feet wide. As before stated, one lot of this cotton was placed in the main street, not far from the State House; and this cotton was fired, and the fire put out, about 11 o'clock in the morning. The rest of the cotton was not burned until the evening; and some of it, which was a little out of the line of the fire, was not burned till Sabbath morning.

At 4 o'clock on Friday afternoon there was not a vestige of fire remaining within the limits of Columbia, save, perhaps, at the two dépôts before named, and they were so situated that no wind from the north could possibly spread the flames. At this hour I saw the smoke and flame from two large buildings about a mile from the city, and on inquiry found they proceeded from the dwellings of General Hampton and George A. Trenholm, the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury; and a short time after the beautiful residence of General Hampton's sisters, called Millwood, was burned to the ground, with all its valuable furniture and numerous works of art. It was not until nearly 8 o'clock in the evening that the general conflagration began, and at that time General Hampton was twenty miles from Columbia.

About the same time that General Sherman's advanced column marched down the main street I saw General Hampton, at the head of a detachment of his cavalry, ride down the Asylum Road, which leads toward Winnsborough, while another detachment, headed by Colonel Rutledge, filed off toward Camden. This was, as near as I can remember, about half past 9 or 10 o'clock on Friday morning, fully ten hours before the burning of Columbia had begun.

But why should General Hampton be charged with "adding a deeper shame to a dishonored name" because he has sought to relieve his name from the deep disgrace of having destroyed his native town? General Sherman had sought to throw this responsibility upon him, and surely he had a right to exculpate himself, and put this responsibility upon the proper persons.

Is there any such difference in the standing and character of these two gentlemen that one of them may do what the other may not do without "dishonoring his name?" General Sherman says, in his "well-considered and remarkable report:" "Without hesitation I charge General Wade Hampton with having burned his own city of Columbia, not with malicious intent, nor as a manifestation of 'Roman stoicism,' but from folly and want of sense." And this, according to the article in question, is to be "the verdict of history."

In his "well-considered and remarkable" letter to the Hon. Beverly Johnson, General Hampton charges the burning of Columbia upon the soldiers of General Sherman's army. And surely, when impartial history comes to be written, it will be much easier to put the responsibility of the destruction of Columbia upon the General who commanded the army which captured and occupied the town than upon that other General, who merely distributed combustible materials, which would have been entirely harmless but for the high wind on that fatal night and the igniting matches of General Sherman's soldiers.

I have no disposition to detract from the very great merit of General Sherman. His memorable march from Atlanta to Savannah, and from Savannah across the State of South Carolina to Fayetteville, did most unquestionably put an end to the war. It is true General Lee surrendered to General Grant, but it is equally true that it was Sherman's cutting off his supplies which compelled the surrender. Nor does our author relate a title of the cruelties and kindnesses shown by General Sherman to those families in Columbia with whom he had previously been acquainted, nor the many instances of previous evictions made by his officers, and occasionally by his private, to save our women from insult and our property from destruction. Among these honorable men let me mention the names of Colonel Sumner, Captains McQueen and Symonds of Iowa, Captain White of Indiana, and Goshard of Michigan. There were many more, and I greatly regret that their names have faded from my memory—men whose humanity kept pace with their patriotism; and who did not believe in this warning upon women and children, old men and maidens. These gentlemen were mortified and distressed beyond expression at the apparent want of good faith, after their repeated assurances that no harm should happen to persons and private property.

General Sherman has himself declared that his policy and his army required that his march through South Carolina should be with fire and sword, and that a stern military necessity made it his painful duty to burn and destroy what his eyes could not carry away. This policy was carried out from the hour he crossed the Savannah River till he reached the boundary line of North Carolina. And after having burned the village of Grahamville, and indeed every planter's house in the rich district of Beaufort, nearly all of the villages of Beaufort, Barnwell, Lexington, and Wadesboro, it does seem passing strange that he should wish to place the responsibility of burning Columbia on General Hampton.

But who did burn and pillage Columbia? It was done by the soldiers of General Sherman's army, aided and abetted by some of the escaped prisoners, who had concealed themselves in the Arsenal yard when their main body had been ordered to Danville. I have been assured by many of the most responsible men and women in Columbia that they were present and saw the torch applied to their own dwellings by the soldiers of General Sherman, and in some instances they were led on by men whose gait indicated that they had escaped from the prisoners' camp.

I can not believe that General Sherman was cognizant of their intentions, or winked at their insubordination, or, at least of all, ordered the burning and sacking of Columbia, after having volunteered to the Mayor his powerful protection. This would have been such a miracle of hastiness and treachery, such a stain, not only on himself but upon the American character, that it may be set down as simply impossible.

One remark of the author of the paper in question has much force, and merits a passing observation. Many a Confederate gentleman, glowing with patriotism, boasted of the sacrifices he would make when the Yankee invader put his foot on our "sacred soil." In the author's language, "they would immolate themselves on the ruins of their homes;"—yet when the Federal army did appear these persons were as eager to preserve their homes and household loves as any Jew or Scotchman among them." It is not from head-mounted and blustering patriots, either North or South, that we may look for great self-sacrifice. Men who have much are always slow in their performances; and it will hold good at the South, as well as every where, that those who promise "to die in the last ditch" are seldom to be found when the last ditch is reached. It is mortifying that Southern gentlemen could have been so serious as to leave to their "second order thoughts" that, when all hope of success was gone, they should have written to assure their universal friends south of their household goods as General Sherman's despoiling march had left to them. At the same time it can not be denied that no people ever made greater sacrifices for the cause they had espoused. They have suffered entire ruin for this cause, and proved their devotion to their principles by a heroism which has few parallels in history.

The author of the August article has alluded to "Mr. Wade Hampton's Colored name." When and where was General Hampton's name ever dishonored? If the author simply means that every name connected with "the Great Rebellion" is dishonored, then nothing more need be said. The same stigma which rests upon Kossuth in Hungary, upon Robert Emmet in Ireland, on Russell and Spilling in England, all unsuccessful rebels, rests on Wade Hampton. The same dishonor, and no other, which would have rested on the renowned names of Washington and Hancock, had the American Revolution been a failure, rests now on the names of Lee, Johnston, Beauregard, and Hampton. The disgrace which attaches to their names would win for them the highest consideration in any foreign country, and in one-third of our own land.

If the author means any thing else, he surely has not informed himself of Wade Hampton's position in his native State. Here in Columbia he is known as the quiet, unpretending gentleman, the good master, the good citizen, the good man — courteous, kind, considerate, and brave. His escutcheon is untarnished, his good name a household word, his reputation the common property of our citizens. Without having been an original secessionist, he sprang into the saddle when his country demanded his services, and devoted himself, his sons, and his fortune to the Southern cause. A believer in the doctrine of State Rights and State Sovereignty, he knew no authority but the State in which he lived, and such government as she chose to institute. Being in the vigor of manhood he could not escape military service, and he must do battle for or against his native State.

I do not intend to enter upon the discussion of the "vexed question" as to where a man's allegiance is due. This question has been discussed on many a battle-field, and it has been decided at the point of the bayonet and at the cannon's mouth; and General Hampton, in common with the great mass of his countrymen, submits to the settlement. He has literally beaten his sword into a plowshare, and with his former slaves (now freedmen) he has become a tiller of the ground. Let no man attach dishonor to his name. His record up to the present time is made. The future depends upon himself.

The foregoing paper, by James McCarter, Esq., of Columbia, South Carolina, is designed mainly to corroborate, but partly to supplement and partly to correct, the account of the burning of Columbia by Major Nichols, contained in this Magazine for August. A personal acquaintance of many years with both of these gentlemen warrants us in vouching that neither of them is capable of making any intentional misstatement of facts. We think, however, that Major Nichols, being a member of Sherman's staff, and on active duty during the day, had better opportunities for observing, and that upon the few points where they differ his account is to be received.

Mr. McCarter undertakes to correct Major Nichols as to the direction of the wind on Friday the 17th of February. Nichols says it was a "southern wind," not necessarily directly from the south, but from a southerly point. McCarter says that it was "blowing a fierce gale from the north," and offers as an explanation of the manner in which Nichols was led into error, that Sherman's column had, without noticing it, changed its direction of march from north to south. We can not accept this explanation, because Sherman in his Report says expressly that he approached Columbia from the north. Nichols being on his staff could not but be aware of the direction of this advance, and he could not be mistaken as to whether this fierce gale was blowing upon his back or in his face. He says, also, that in the afternoon "the air was filled with dust and twigs and smoking flakes of cotton flying over our heads," which could not have been the case if the wind was from the north. Moreover, every account which we have seen represents the wind that day to have been from a "southern" direction. Thus the Columbia Daily Phoenix contained an account of the "Sack and Destruction of Columbia," which was afterward republished in pamphlet form. It is written in a spirit of bitter hostility to the Union army. This account says: "The winds had been high throughout the day, and steadily prevailed from southwest by west, and bore the flames eastward." This discrepancy is of some importance, because if, as stated by Mr. McCarter, the gale was from the north, a conflagration from the cotton which was burning in the southern part of the city could not have spread to the north, as the fire certainly did, and therefore must have arisen from fires set to the north of this burning cotton. We explain the error into which we think Mr. McCarter has fallen by supposing that he writes from recollection of what he observed during the night, after the conflagration had fairly got under headway. Then the heated air would rise upward, and the air would rush in from every direction to supply the vacuum thus created. To one stationed north of this centre, as we presume Mr. McCarter was, the wind would come from the north; to one south, from the south; and so through every point of the compass. But the light burning material, whether cotton or shingles, borne upward by this ascending current, would, when released from its influence, fall in every direction, and so spread the flames to every quarter; the prevailing direction being that of the main current of the gale, which was from the southwest, as stated by the Phoenix, to which, says this account, "we owe the preservation of the portions of the city lying west of Assembly Street."

Mr. McCarter also seems to us to be certainly in error when he says that, with the exception of the two railroad dépôts, the burning of which he affirms had nothing to do with the general conflagration, there was but one place "where there was any fire during the whole of Friday, and for many hours after the occupation of the town by the Federal army," this place being in the main street, near the Capitol, where "some bales of cotton had been fired at about 11 o'clock," the fire, as he afterward says, being "put out at about 11 o'clock." That is, it lasted only a short time. But Major Nichols, during the day, saw the air filled with "smoking flakes of cotton, catching in the branches of trees already white with cotton, or falling upon the shingled roofs of houses," and late in the afternoon, but before evening, he "passed through the main street of the city, and observed that the smoke still ascended from Wade Hampton's cotton bales." So Sherman saw, as he entered the city, "some of these piles of cotton burning, and especially one in the very heart of the city, near the Court-house, but the fire was partially subdued by the labor of our soldiers." The truth seems to be that during the whole day the fire in these bales of cotton, only "partially subdued," was still smouldering. Fire in a tightly compressed bale of cotton is almost unextinguishable. It will smoulder for hours after it appears to be put out, and then will suddenly burst into flame. With the air thus filled with flakes from the opened bales, many of them burning and lodging upon trees and roofs already white with cotton flakes, it is incredible that during this whole day there should have been no fires except this one, which, according to Mr. McCarter, was extinguished at about 11 o'clock.

That there were others is shown by the Phoenix's account. "At about 12 o'clock," says this, "the jail was discovered to be on fire from within.... The fire in the jail had been preceded by that of some cotton in the streets. Both fires were soon subdued by the firemen. At about half past 1 that of the jail was rekindled, and was again extinguished." How these fires arose is another question. The Phoenix supposes that the jail was set on fire by some of the prisoners. At all events it is clear that through the day there were fires, and that they were subdued as they arose until the approach of evening, when they broke out again in many places almost simultaneously. How could it be otherwise with the streets filled with loose cotton and the air white with flakes driven by the fierce blast?

According to this same account, "Among the first fires of the evening was one about dark, which broke out in a filthy purlieu of houses of wood on Gervais Street, occupied mostly as brothels." Now, as recorded by the Phoenix, there was at daylight on this Friday an explosion at the South Carolina Railroad dépot which had been broken into by a band of plunderers of all colors and both sexes belonging to the dregs of the city population; there was considerable powder there, and this became ignited; the result being that from 17 to 50 persons lost their lives. Soon afterward "the commissary and quartermaster's stores were thrown wide, the contents cast out into the streets, and given to the people. The negroes especially loaded themselves with plunder. Wheeler's cavalry," continues the account, "also shared largely of this plunder." This body, as is shown by Major Nichols, did not content themselves with plundering public stores, but robbed private houses. Hampton's cavalry, according to the Phoenix account, remained in Columbia until 10 o'clock, an hour after the city was formally surrendered by the Mayor; and "scattered groups of Wheeler's command hovered about the Federal army at their entrance into the town." "At about 11 o'clock the head of the Federal column reached Market Hall on Main Street," near which the cotton bales were burning; so that this fire, from which we think resulted the conflagration of the evening, could not have been caused by Sherman's troops; whether this resulted from "accident" as Mr. McCarter supposes, or was the work of Wheeler's men who were "hovering about" will probably never be known. It is indeed hardly worth while to inquire, since General Hampton, as we shall soon see, expressly denies that "any cotton was fired in Columbia by his [my] order." We give full credence to this denial, for this was a matter of which he was personally cognizant; and he affirms that not only was no cotton fired by his order, but that he "gave a positive order, by direction of General Beauregard, that no cotton should be fired." But his further denial "that any cotton was on fire when the Federal troops entered the city" is certainly unwarranted; for the Federal troops reached the central part of the city about 11 o'clock, and at that time, as stated by Mr. McCarter, not only had cotton been on fire, but the flames had been put out. Of this General Hampton was doubtless ignorant, for at this time he was some miles away.

Mr. McCarter's special object in his paper is to vindicate General Hampton from the charges of having burned his native town of Columbia; and then of having endeavored to "exculpate himself, and put this responsibility upon the proper persons." But according to Mr. McCarter's own belief, repeatedly expressed, General Hampton, while exculpating himself, has not put this responsibility upon the proper persons. Mr. McCarter certainly fails to represent fairly the charge brought by General Hampton. He says that Hampton "in his well-considered and remarkable letter to the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, charges the burning of Columbia upon the soldiers of General Sherman's army," especially italicizing the word "soldiers." Now the exact words of General Hampton upon this point, in that letter, which was read in the Senate of the United States on the 18th of May, are these:

"I pledge myself to prove... that he [General Sherman] promised protection to the city, and that in spite of his solemn promise he burned the city to the ground, deliberately, systematically, and atrociously."

Sherman's charge against Hampton, as given in his Report, and indorsed by Major Nichols, is:

"I charge General Wade Hampton with having burned his own city of Columbia, not with a malicious intent, or as the manifestation of a silly 'Roman Stoicism,' but from folly and want of sense in filling it with lint, cotton, and tinder."

That Hampton's charge against Sherman is unfounded Mr. McCarter affirms. As a truthful man he could not do otherwise. All the evidence shows that Sherman, when about to take possession of Columbia, gave orders "to destroy absolutely all arsenals and public property not needed for our own use, as well as all railroads, dépôts, and machinery useful in war to an enemy; but to spare all dwellings, colleges, schools, asylums, and harmless private property." This was the protection promised by him to the Mayor of the city. That he took all measures which seemed necessary to insure the execution of this order is unquestionable; and that when the conflagration broke out he and his officers exerted themselves to the utmost to check it is beyond question. Mr. McCarter affirms this quite as strongly as does Major Nichols or General Sherman. So that, upon the admission of his voluntary advocate, the charge made by General Hampton in his letter to Senator Johnson can not be substantiated. Whoever was guilty of the burning of Columbia it was not, as General Hampton asserts, General Sherman.

The part which General Hampton bore is, we think, clearly susceptible of proof. He ordered the cotton—"many hundreds of bales," says McCarter, "thousands of bales," says Nichols—to be "taken out of the various buildings in which it was stored and piled in the middle of the streets;" and "to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy there was an order issued for its destruction." This destruction could, in the nature of things, be effected only by fire. Cotton tightly packed is almost incombustible. It was prepared for the flames by cutting the rope and bagging. Now "many hundreds" or "thousands" of bales could not be burned in a street, even though a hundred feet wide, under the most favorable circumstances, without rendering a conflagration almost inevitable.

This was the situation in which General Hampton deliberately placed his native city. But he asserts in his letter to Senator Johnson that "I gave a positive order, by direction of General Beauregard, that no cotton should be fired." We do not question his veracity upon this point. He does not state when he gave this order. If it was before the order directing the destruction of the cotton, it was of course superseded by that. We can not suppose him capable of such a palpable suppressio veri, and assume that the order forbidding the firing was later, and so superseded that for the destruction. Then what he did was simply this: he placed the city in such a condition that, if his order was carried out, its conflagration was certain. Not of his own accord, but "by direction of General Beauregard," he reversed the order for firing the cotton, still leaving it to the mercy of chance whether the torch would not be applied, by accident or otherwise. It was applied, and Columbia was burned.

General Hampton indeed asserts, in this same "remarkable and well-considered letter," that "not one bale was on fire when General Sherman's troops took possession of the city." But the positive data furnished by Mr. McCarter and the Phoenix show that he was in error. We do not charge this upon General Hampton as an intentional misstatement; for he himself was miles away, and could have had no personal knowledge of the facts. Whether the fire that was set to the cotton in the main street, which, apparently extinguished in the morning, still smoldered through the afternoon and broke out in the evening, was the result of accident, as Mr. McCarter supposes, or was lighted by some of the returning Confederates, acting either in violation or in ignorance of the order given by direction of General Beauregard, forbidding the firing, no man can say. It is certain, however, that it could not have been the work of the Union army. That "army," using the word in its proper sense, saved from destruction what was saved of Columbia. We can not, therefore, except with great modification of the term, concede to the opinion of Mr. McCarter, that "the town was fired and plundered by the soldiers of Sherman's army."

Yet we are constrained sorrowfully to believe that, in the wild tumult which ensued after the breaking out of the conflagration, there was burning and pilaging committed by men who belonged to the Union army. This is admitted by General Sherman in his Report, by Major Nichols in his article in this Magazine, and in his "Story of the Great March." Sherman, after telling how it was necessary to bring in a whole division to combat the flames, and saying that he "was up nearly all night, and saw Generals Howard, Logan, Wood, and others laboring to save houses," adds:

"Our officers and men on duty worked well to extinguish the flames; but others, not on duty, including the officers who had been long imprisoned there, rescued by us, may have assisted in spreading the fire after it had once begun, and may have indulged in unconcealed joy to see the ruin of the capital of South Carolina."

Major Nichols says the same thing in effect in his Magazine paper; and still more fully in the "Story of the Great March."

"I am quite sure that the fire originated in sparks flying from the hundreds of bales of cotton which the rebels had placed along the middle of the main street, and fired as they left the city. . . . There were fires, however, which must have started independent of the above-named cause. The source of these is ascribed to the desire for revenge from some two hundred of our prisoners who had escaped from the cars as they were being conveyed from this city to Charlotte; and with the memories of long sufferings in the miserable pens sought this means of retaliation. Again it is said that the soldiers who first entered the town, intoxicated with bad liquor, which was freely distributed among them by designing citizens, in an insanity of exhilaration, set fire to unoccupied houses."

Whether the houses of Mr. Trenholm, General Hampton, and his sisters were "unoccupied" we are not informed; but there is certainly sufficient reason to believe that they were set on fire by the Union prisoners; for they were directed by General Sherman to go to his head-quarters, which were in the eastern part of Columbia, and these dwellings were about a mile to the east of the city.

We have no disposition to call in question the justice of the eulogium which Mr. McCarter passes upon the personal character of General Hampton. We admit that it was unstained save in the matter of his active participation in the "Great Rebellion;" and in respect to that no dishonor rests upon his name which does not rest in just the same manner and to a greater extent upon the names of Lee, Johnston, Beauregard, and hundreds of others; for they, unlike Hampton, had entered the military service of the United States, and taken the sacramentum, or military oath; and if, as we are willing to admit, the political opinions in accordance with which they acted relieve them from personal dishonor in taking up arms against the Nation when called upon to do so by their States, the same admission must certainly be made in the case of General Hampton.

Nor do we at all question his right "to endeavor to relieve his name from the deep disgrace of having destroyed his native town." We admit that he has done this, so far as showing that he did not intentionally "cause the destruction of the city." But we can not admit that he has succeeded, to use his own words, in "fixing upon the proper author of that enormous crime the infamy he richly deserves." General Sherman, in his Report, says: "I disclaim on the part of my army any agency in this fire; but, on the contrary, claim that we saved what of Columbia remains unconsumed." And still more explicitly in his letter, quoted by General Hampton in the Reverdy Johnson letter, "I gave no orders for the destruction of the city; but, on the contrary, the conflagration resulted from the great imprudence of cutting the cotton-bales, whereby the contents were spread to the wind, so that it became an impossibility to arrest the fire." Yet in the face of these emphatic assertions Hampton charges, and pledges himself to prove, that Sherman, in spite of his solemn promise to protect Columbia, "burned the city to the ground, deliberately, systematically, atrociously." Mr. McCarter believes with us that this charge is untrue; and it seems to us, therefore, that he is shut up to the conclusion that General Hampton, in order to relieve himself from the specific charge brought by Major Nichols of having dishonored his name "by his renewed efforts to hold General Sherman responsible for the burning of Columbia and its terrible consequences," must either fulfill his pledge to prove the accusation, or must retract it as publicly as it was made. This he can do without dishonor by declaring that the charge was brought upon mistaken information as to the facts in the case.—Ed. Harper's Magazine.

THE FREEDMAN'S STORY.

[I have thought that a plain, unvarnished account of a servant's trials in his efforts to secure his freedom might not be uninteresting. It is given as nearly as possible in his own words. Oby is now with me, my dining-room servant. He has learned to read himself what I have written.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VIRGINIA.

M. S. DE V.]

MY name is Oby; they say it is because my father was an Obeah man, when he lived down South in Florida and drove a stage. I have heard him say, to the contrary, that he belonged, at the time I was born, to a man by the name of Overton, and that that is my true name. So when I went down to town the other day, and the Provost-Marshal asked me if I could sign my own name, I boldly wrote down "Mr. Overton Paragon."

I was raised at this place, by people who were ever so kind to me as long as I can remember them; but that was not very long, for they were poor white folks and could not keep me, or my mother, or my father either. So we were hired out to a very good master, who took good care of father especially, because he had hired him for more than twenty years, and I was living with them in his house, though I could not do much work, being rather weakly and, I am afraid, lazy too. One fine day master comes down stairs and says to father: "Uncle James, you have served me faithfully these ten years, and you know I only bought you because I did not want your master to set you in your old days to hard work. But I do not like to own you, and you are free. You can go whenever and wherever you choose. I can not give you your freedom in any other way, because the laws of the State do not permit me to do so, and we all have to obey the law; but you must understand that you can stay or go as you choose."

Father could not say much, for he was not handy with his tongue, but he told master that he did not want to leave him as long as he cared to keep him. But when master had gone up again, he comes in and tells mother, and Uncle Henry, who was there, tells him he had better go across the line and live at the North. Father had been there when master sent him all the way to Boston with a fine horse—his name was Topaz—and they tried very hard then to make father stay. But he did not like their ways; he said they were not genteel at all like our old family servants, and he came back and was mighty glad to be again in Old Virginia. So father staid, and mother staid, and I was taken up to the dining-room, and mistress taught me to wait, and to wash the china and the glass.

I was nearly grown—I may have been about nineteen or twenty years old—when the Yankees came right down upon us. We had been expecting them often before, and many is the time Uncle Henry came running in where mother was and cried out, "God be thanked, they are coming, they are coming!" And mother asked him, "Who are you talking about?" and he would say, "Our deliverers, the Yankees, whom God sends to make us all free!" But mother did not like his ways at all, and when he was gone she would take me and brother Henry by her little stool close to the fire and say: "Now, boys, don't you think you'll be so much better off when you are free. Folks have to work every where, free or slave, black or white; and it's much better for you to be with genteel folks, and go to church, and have nothing to do with poor niggers, than to be way off, where you have not any body who cares for you."

Mother was mighty good to us, and I know she meant it all for the best, but, to save my life, I could not help thinking of what Uncle Henry said, and what a fine thing it would be to be free, and to have twelve dollars a month and nothing to do. So I went over to Colonel Wood's Aleck and we talked it over behind the wood-pile, where nobody could hear us, and he told me how he knew a plenty more who would go away as soon as ever the Yankees came. He said they were fighting for us, and if we wanted to go we need not run away by night, like a poor three-hundred-dollar nigger, but we might ride off on a fine horse, in the middle of the day, and our masters could not say a word against it for fear of the Yankees. So I promised I would join him, and when we heard that General Sheridan was coming this way, with a hundred thousand men, we knew that the Confederates could not stand before him, and we agreed we would go off all together.

I remember it well; it was a dark night, but the stars were all out and the mud awfully deep, when all of a sudden Uncle Henry comes rushing in by the side gate, quite out of breath, and tells us that General Early has been beaten all to pieces, and that the Yankees are coming across the mountains. They did not know any thing of it in town, and I had heard master say at supper-table that we need not be afraid; the Yankees would again go up the Valley to Lexington and pass us by. But we knew better, and mother would have told mistress, whom she was mighty fond of, but Uncle Henry would not let her, and mother was terribly worried about it. He told us that we must all put on our Sunday clothes, and be very polite to the soldiers, because they were coming to make us all free, and we were just as good now as they. Father was very uneasy about us, for he did not believe half of what the others said, and shook his head and groaned as he sat before the fire and smoked his pipe; but he said nothing, only now and then he would look up, and when mother looked at him at the same time, he would shake his head and sigh, until it made me feel quite badly, and I did not know what to do.

At night, when the white folks had all gone to bed, we, Aleck and I, took an ash cake and a piece of middling, and we ran up the turnpike, miles and miles, until we came to the top of the long hill, where Doctor White's house stood before it was burned, and there we sat the livelong night, and watched the camp-fires against the dark mountain side, thinking what the Yankees were doing up there, and why they did not come to help us all. It was very hard to trot back again in the morning early, and to go to work splitting wood for the cook before breakfast, but Aleck and I thought if we could but once see the bluecoats coming down the hill, and their horses standing by the side of the lake, we would be perfectly happy.

And so it did come about one fine, clear morning. On Monday a man in gray had come racing up the turnpike, looking right and left under his broad-brimmed, slouched hat, and gone into town. Uncle Henry had met him as he came up, and shook his head and said: "Now, I should not wonder if that was a real Yankee." They all laughed at him, and asked him if he did not see the Confederate gray and the ragged hat the man wore. But he shook his head and said: "Now, I'll tell you, boys, it may be so, and it may not be so; but that man there did not ride like one of our folks, and he had his eyes too busy and his hand too near his revolver to be one of our soldiers." That morning early there came two, and three, and at last a whole number of these graycoats, and somebody said in a whisper, as we were standing at the stile close to the turnpike, "Those are the Jessie Scouts, you believe me!" But we looked at the old man who said so, and as nobody knew him we did not believe him. It was all the same true; it turned out afterward that they were Jessie Scouts, as they called them from General Fremont's wife; and there had been a dozen of them in town all day long, and nobody had known them. We knew how little our soldiers cared about spies and that sort of men, and so it was not very difficult to come in and find out every thing.

But on Tuesday, early in the morning, as soon as master had had his breakfast, we all slipped out and went down to the road, where we found a great many people standing about and talking of what the Yankees were going to do with the house, and the servants, and the town itself. Down by the lake, where the road from the house comes into the turnpike, and not far from the little lodge, stood a heap of gentlemen, who had come up from town to beg pardon of the General, and to ask him not to burn them all out. They were mightily scared, and Mr. Fowler, the tailor, who is a great goose, as I have heard it said often and often, looked white and shook in all his limbs. It could not be from the cold, for although the rain had stopped overnight, it was quite mild in the morning. Alongside of them, but a little apart, stood master and some of his friends; I don't know if they had come too to ask the Yankees to spare the house. Soon one man came flying down the hill, and then another, and then three or four together, galloping right by us without ever stopping, and just crying one after another, "They are coming! they are coming!" I slipped up close to where master stood, and I could hear them say that it was a mighty hard thing to stand there and not to know whether they would have a house over their head next night or not; and what would become of the ladies and of the little ones. One I heard say distinctly, "Oh, gentlemen, we'll all go up before night, sure enough!" William Gibbons, who preaches down in the big bath-house every Sunday, said the gentleman was very wicked, for if God would take us up we must all be ready at any time; and he, for one, was quite willing to go to heaven.

Every now and then somebody would cry out,

"There they are!" and we all looked up to the top of the hill, behind which the road was hid, and when a man slowly rose over the brow and it turned out that he was on horseback, we thought sure enough there were the Yankees. So we stood hours and hours, and just when we thought they would not be coming that day, two men rode up the hill and down again slowly, then three more, then a dozen or more all in a body, with flags in their hands; and at last the whole turnpike was blue, and we knew for a certainty they were come. We just looked at one another, and I felt mighty queer; but Uncle Henry and all the others, who stood way down by the stile, looked exactly as if they were going to shout to the sky and to jump out of their skin. Aleck looked at me too, and winked, and shut his eyes, and shook all over, till I could not help myself, and I laughed, and they all laughed, and it set the others down at the stile a-laughing, and we held our sides and did not mind master and his friends looking at us as if they did not like it at all.

When the first officer came up to where Mr. Fowler stood, he rushed forward and came near falling between the horses' feet, and they all cried out together, I don't know what; but the tailor had the biggest mouth, and he talked loudest. So I suppose they heard him, and one of the officers said something about private property being spared, but public property must be given up.

Just then master walked up himself, like a real gentleman that he is, and although he was on foot and had not even a spur on his boot, he looked as good a man as the big officers on their fine horses. One of them told him he was not the General, but he would send up a guard as soon as they got into town. Then they moved on, and such a sight! They looked very different from our poor Confederate soldiers, with their sleek horses and bright swords, and there was not a ragged jacket or a bare foot among them all. They had, every one of them, a pile of good things strapped up behind and before their saddles, and a good many had a fine horse by their side with all sorts of packages and parcels strapped upon their back, ever so high, but nobody in the saddle. But I thought, what wouldn't I give if I could but ride one of those fine horses and be a soldier and as good as any white man! I looked at Aleck, and I saw he thought so too; and what is best about it, it did not last long, and it all came true, sure enough. We stood there and looked and looked until we were tired, for there was no end to the horses, and the big guns, and the wagons, and oh, they had every thing so nice and so whole, though they were bespattered from head to foot; I did not think soldiers could look so well. At last they were nearly all gone, and I and Aleck went back.

When we came to the other side of the lake we saw Miss Mary and some of the other young ladies standing by the window up stairs, and some of them were crying; but Miss Mary waved a little flag, such as our soldiers have, right in the face of the Yankees. But master looked up and gave her such a look! Miss Mary went away from the window, and when they sent for her to come down to dinner, she told Flora to tell master she had a bad headache and did not want any dinner. Soon after the bell rang, and when I went to the front-door there stood a big Yankee officer, with his sword by his side and the mud all over him, and he asked in a very soft voice if master was at home. I did not like much his talking of my master and he a Yankee, but I knew I must be polite to strangers, and I asked him to please walk in. He said he wanted to see master, would I request him to come to the front-door for a moment. I can't tell exactly what it was, but there was something in the officer's voice, and in the way he spoke to me, that made me feel a big man, and as if nobody ought to call me Oby any more. Master is mighty good to me, but he always talks to me as if I was a little baby and had not any sense at all. Now the officer spoke right sternly, though his voice was so soft, but somehow it did not hurt me in the least, and I felt all the better for it. I ran in and told master, who came out at once, not at all flurried but like a grand old gentleman, and he begged the officer very politely to walk in. But he would not come in, and merely told master that he was on General Sheridan's staff, and that he wished to know where he should place the guard. I wanted badly to hear what they were going to say to each other, but master sent me down stairs to tell Aunt Hannah to cook a big dinner for the soldiers. We had done that often enough when our poor Confederates came by, and there was not much left in the smoke-house; but when the folks in the kitchen heard it was for the Yankees they were going to cook they set to work with a will. Aunt Hannah said she would sit up all night to work for them blessed Yankees, and Flora laughed and cried out that she hoped there was a handsome captain coming to take her to Boston.

Now I did not like that at all, for Flora was a mighty sweet girl; she was not one of your mean black niggers, but quite light, and had the most beautiful hair I ever saw in my life, and a waist—why she could wear Miss Mary's dresses, who is not bigger than a grasshopper, and they were still too large for her. So I sat down angrily, and turned my back upon them, and whistled to myself. All of a sudden there comes a hand and shuts up my mouth, and a voice says to me: "Why, Oby, you are not at all gallant to-day!" Up I jump and make her a fine bow, and say, "Oh, Madam, I did not know you was here, I hope you are well." She did not say a word, but looked at Aunt Hannah and looked at me, and then she burst out a-laughing and cries: "Oh, Mr. Paragon, you must look sharper, or one of these days Miss Flora will bloom in another garden." They had spoilt her mightily, and told her that her name meant "Pretty Flower." The young ladies on whom she waited gave her quantities of nice things, and when she went down on Sunday to church she looked every bit as pretty as a lady, and prettier too. Colonel Wood's Aleck was very sweet on her, and he and I had had many a fight about it—who was to escort her to preaching, and who was to hand her into supper, when Aunt Betsy's daughter was married. She went more with Aleck than with me, and many is the cry I have had about it; but then she would look so sweetly at me, and say with such a soft voice: "Get along, you handsome nigger!" that I could not help myself, and all the money I ever got went to buy her ribbons and candy.

I went up to her and said: "Now, sweet angel, don't you be angry with me, and you shall have that big red shawl that hangs out at Mr. Abraham's store window;" and I put my arm around her and was just going to—when there came such a pull at the door-bell that I jumped up and thought the Yankees were breaking into the house.

I ran up the stairs as fast as I could, and as I was trying to unlock the door—we did not use to do it, and so the key would not turn very quickly—somebody rang and rang until I got frightened out of my wits. When I opened the door there stood Miss Polly, as red as a peony, her dress all in tatters, and her hair hanging about her as I had never seen a lady do in all my life, and rushes by me to master's study. Master had just come out to see what was the matter, and she ran nearly over him. Then she began telling him to come, for God's sake, to her house; how the Yankees had come there and broken every thing to pieces, and were misbehaving shamefully. I did not believe a word of it, for they had been very polite to us all and to master too; but he did not say a word, put on his hat, gave Miss Polly his arm, and walked right off with her. I followed him, for I thought he might want me, and I heard Miss Polly rattling away like a water-mill, telling him how the soldiers had come to the house, and first broken into the kitchen and eaten all the dinner that there was, and then came into the sitting-room and asked for whisky. Her brother, who had been shot in the Valley and was lying with a broken leg on a couch, had gotten very angry and called them names. The Yankees did not like that, and went to work smashing every thing in the house. So she ran over to our house to get help.

When we crossed the road—it was knee-deep in mud—we saw Miss Emma, with her three little children, sitting on the big oak stump right by the house, crying bitterly, and in the house all the windows and doors smashed, and such a row as I have not heard in my life. Master puts Miss Polly down by her sister's side, and tells her to sit quiet, and then he walks as boldly up to where the Yankees were as if he were General Sheridan himself. I was afraid to go after him, so I staid by the ladies, who, I thought, wanted somebody to protect them, and they were so full of the misfortune they told me every thing. All the silver was gone, and all the china was broken, and the pictures cut to pieces, and the books thrown out of the window; and as they were telling me the soldiers came out. Some had a pillow-case full of flour, another a tureen filled with meal, and still another had two big gold watches in his hand. At last one came out with a silver cup in his hand. When Miss Emma sees him she jumps up and catches hold of it, and says, "You sha'n't take away my poor baby's cup!" "But I will," says the soldier—a great big fellow with a sword by his side. "But you sha'n't!" cries Miss Emma again, and the big tears ran down her cheeks. And there they pulled, she on one side and the gentleman on the other side, and I thought she was going to fall down, when master comes out and very quietly puts his hand upon the soldier's arm, and says, "You will surely oblige the lady and let her have the cup." The Yankee looked quite bewildered, but he had let go, and Miss Emma ran back to her seat with her baby in her arm; and the baby held the cup with her dumpy little fingers, as if she knew what she held, and master looked pleased and said: "I am glad, Sir, you can act so handsomely." I thought the soldier had a great mind to tell him he did not want any of his praise; but I know most men were rather afraid of master, he looked so stiff and so stately; and he went slowly away. Then master called out in a clear, loud voice: "Mike O'Rourke! Mike O'Rourke!"

I was half frightened, when all of a sudden there stepped out from behind a big oak-tree a great red-haired Yankee, with a sword, and a carbine, and a pistol in his belt. "What do you want?" says he. Master answered, "Were you not placed here as guard, Sir, to protect this house?" "Well, I believe I was." "And when these marauders came, and the ladies begged you to protect them, you ran away and hid?" The soldier looked as if he did not like at all being talked to in that way, and perhaps he had not a very good conscience; so he said, in a sulky tone: "I could not stop all those fellows; they were too many for me!" Master said, very quietly: "You know very well that your orders are to do your duty, and to shoot down the first one who breaks the safeguard." The Yankee looked rather taken aback; but then he cried out very angrily, "I don't know what all this is to you, Sir, but I would have you know that it is very hard for a man whose house has been burned over his head, down in Pennsylvania, by these beggarly rebels, and whose old father and mother have been driven out by night and ruined for life, to stand here and protect people who, for all I know, may have been the very ones to do so to me." With that he turned on his heel and walked to the house. I don't know what master thought; but he looked rather puzzled, and went up to Miss Emma and began talking to them in a low voice.

Soon after the Yankees made a great uproar in the house, and then they came out, one by one, the red-haired man shoving them out with a laugh and a curse, until the house was clear again. I had been watching them, so that I did not hear what master said to the ladies, but just as the last one went down the hill I heard Miss Polly crying bitterly, and saying: "And would you believe it, Sir, one of these wretches told me I was the ugliest woman he had seen in the Confederacy; and as for Emma, she was too ugly to live?" I looked hard at master, to see what he would say to that, but I thought he was trying all he could not to laugh. Then he smiled and gave his arm to Miss Emma, and asked her when she had heard from her husband, and they all went back to the house.

The red-haired man came out and sat down on the bench in the veranda; and when he sees me standing there, he says, "Come here, man, and bring me some water; and, look here, bring me some whisky too, or I'll cut your head off!" I was certainly afraid he would do it, too, so I ran as fast as I could to Uncle Tony close by, who I knew had some apple brandy, and telling him that it was for a Yankee soldier he gave me some. I ran back to the Irish gentleman—for I knew him to be Irish, because we have so many of those folks around us, working on the canal—and brought him the whisky. I was running for the water too, but he called after me, and said he was not thirsty now, I need not go for water. So I sat down on the grass by his side, and looked up at him, and got hold of his sword, and made the little wheels on his spurs play as fast as they would go.

All of a sudden he looks at me and says: "Hallo, Cuffee, how would you like to have a fine horse and ride along with us all?" My heart jumped when I heard him make such an offer; but I did not know if he was in earnest, so I only laughed and laughed until he could not help himself and had to laugh too. But after a while he looked very sober, and said: "Nonsense, Cuffee, nonsense; don't laugh that way, but tell me soberly would not you like to go with me and become a soldier?" When I saw that he was really in earnest I jumped up and said, as loud as I could, "Yes, Sir, that I will, and I have long waited for the day; God be thanked it has come at last, and I shall be a free man!"

He told me then to follow him, and we went over to Burr's Hill, where the General had his head-quarters, and the red-haired man's regiment had their camp. When we got there I found out that he belonged to the artillery, and the whole wood was filled with guns, and wagons, and horses, and all about the hill were fires lit, and the men were sitting around them eating their supper. I felt all of a sudden as hungry as a rattlesnake, for there they had coffee, and white sugar, and lemons, and all the good things we had not seen at our house for ever so long. We went past them all, until we came close to the house, and there I saw a great number of colored gentlemen standing around in a circle, and in the middle were some Yankee soldiers. Just as we came up I heard one of them say,

"Here is another fine lot; what's the bid?" I felt as if I was turning to stone, when I found out that he held Bob, my second cousin, by his right ear, and pushed him forward in the bright light. I thought sure enough it was all the old story over again, and we were not free yet, but to be sold just as we were before. Somebody cried out, "I'll give a ham!" and another, "I bid a loaf of sugar!" Now I wondered more than ever, for Bob was a powerful fellow, and could plow better than any man on the plantation, and that was no price at all, even in Confederate money. But I soon found out that they were only offering something for the right to choose their servants, and that we were really free, only we could not choose our masters, but they chose us.

When I understood that right, I turned round and said, very politely, "Master, I wish you would not offer me to any body but keep me yourself. I would rather be your servant than any body's else." He seemed to be quite pleased at being called Master, and slapped me on the shoulder, and said, "Well, Cuffee, if you wish it, you may do so." I did not like to be called Cuffee, which is not respectable for a nigger who moves in good society; so I said, "Master, my name is Oby; and if it is the same to you, I would rather you should call me by my name." I don't think he heard me, for he said nothing for a while, and then he showed me his horse, a fine big bay, and told me to rub him down: "But mind you do it well," he said, "or you will be bucked." I did not know what he meant by that, for the boys had often called me a "Buck," and I had always taken it for a compliment. I soon found out however what it was, for Jack, the doctor's boy, who was up here too, and who had refused to cook supper for his new master, because he was so tired from doing all they had made him do ever since dinner-time, lay not far off, bound up in the most curious way I have ever seen, and was hollowing most awfully.

My bay did not give me much trouble, only he had an ugly way of kicking, when you touched him at a particular spot; and he was so quick at it that I got one or two kicks against my shins before I was aware of it. I disliked it mightily, for I did not know then that his kicking was to save my life when nothing else could help me. They did not offer me any supper that night, so I ran home and told Flora all about it. how the soldiers said I was free now, and how I was to have a fine horse and become a sure enough soldier, and have my fifteen dollars a month, all to myself.

She was not half as glad as I thought she would be, and asked me if I thought it was better to be the servant of a Yankee than to serve a gentleman like master. I did not like her saying so at all, for I could not tell her why I liked it better; and still, I knew it was better. I had thought I would ask her to come along with me and become my wife, when we got to the North. But somehow I had not the courage, she looked so wicked out of her eyes; and then Aunt Hannah stood by, and although she made-believe she was busy with her pots and plates I knew she had heard every word I said. But I could not help looking at Flora, and just to say, "Oh, Miss Flora!" and I thought she looked as sweet as a rose-bud, when she cast her eyes down and picked at the pretty belt I had given her the Sunday before, and seemed to think very hard.

Just then Aleck came up, and asked me when I was going away. That put me in mind, that last week master had called us all up into the hall and told us, if we wanted to go when the Yankees came, we must be sure not to sneak off like a parcel of runaway niggers, but to come up like men and tell him, and he would see to it that we had some clothes and something to help us on the way when we went. I thought it was my duty to go up stairs and tell him that I had made up my mind to leave. I pulled off my shoes and went up softly into the veranda, where I knew he would be sitting. And so he was, in his old arm-chair, with Maida right across his feet and Miss Lucy sitting by his side, reading to him out of the big old Bible he uses at prayers, when we come up in the morning and the evening. She read so low I could not hear where she was, but I made out that it was something about God being our rock and a very present help in trouble; and when I looked at master I saw the big tears were coming down his white cheeks slowly, one by one. I knew then he was thinking of young master, who lay dead and killed way off in Spottsylvania, and nobody knew where. When I saw that I could not go up to him to save my life, so I slipped down again, and did not know what to do.

Master had always been mighty good to me, and I had never wanted any thing on this earth but he had given it to me; and I knew as long as I staid with him, and he had any thing to live on, he would provide for me. But I wanted badly to be a free man, and I knew I could never earn fifteen dollars a month, as I could at the North; and perhaps they were going to give us each a farm, and we would not have to work any more. It was a bad night for me, and my head turned all around in a whirl; now I wanted to stay, and now I wanted to go. But when the red streaks came out over the mountain, and then the big sun rose right behind the old cherry-tree at the tobacco patch, I remembered what William had said, when he preached to us at Uncle James's funeral, about the rising of the Sun of Liberty, and our going to glory here upon earth, by the word of Mr. Lincoln, and I ran as fast as I could to Burr's Hill, and told them all that I had come to be free.

My new master showed me a beautiful horse that I was to ride, and when the light came through the trees and I could see every thing clear, I saw it was Master William's great big stallion. I did not like to get on him, because every body about here knew him, he had stood so often down in town, but I was told to take him down to water, and I did not like to be bucked like Bob. I went down to the spring, and I could not help thinking he was the handsomest horse I had ever laid eyes on, and it would be a great thing for me to ride alongside of all the gentlemen on such a fine horse. When I came back to the fire they showed me a quantity of bags and bales, all nicely fixed in white cotton sheets, which I had to strap on the horse; there was just enough room left between the pile in front and the pile behind to get into the saddle. They did not give me any breakfast either, but I did not mind that much, for soon the bugles sounded—it made me feel like a gentleman to be called by a bugle like all the others; and my new master, who was a corporal or a major, had some other gentlemen under him, and when the guns were all ranged in beautiful order, the Colonel came out and looked at us, and off we marched with the music at our head.

First came the Colonel and some officers, then came the music, with all sorts of instruments such as I had never seen before; after them came men who bore a number of flags, which I knew nothing of, and after them, before all the regiment, came we colored people, about fifty of us, all on fine horses, and the happiest boys ever you saw in your life. It was glorious. But when we got to the corner by the tobacco-house, where the gate has been out of order for many years and the lane is quite low and narrow, they all stopped and we could not go any farther. The mud was awful, and the horses could not pull the heavy guns and the wagons.

Just then who must come up but master. I felt mighty badly, but I could not run away, and I looked for my new master to stand by me and let them all know that I was free. When master's eye came slowly down the line and at last fell right upon me, I thought I was going to sink into the ground. It made me feel sick. When I looked up again he was making his way through the horses and the cannons right up to me, and did not mind the mud, and the way the soldiers all looked at him, and the horses that wanted to kick him. When he came up to where I sat on my horse, he just said, "Oh, Oby!" and before I knew what I was doing, I was out of the saddle and standing right before him, with my new cap in my hand. He said, in his quiet way, "Oby, you know you are not strong enough to sleep out in the open air; you have not even a blanket, and it is not three weeks since you were sick with pneumonia. Come home, my boy, and don't distress your father and your mother. You know it will kill them!"

I knew that what he said was but too true; but then again, when I looked at the fine horse I was on, and all the gentlemen around me, I felt quite undecided. Master said again, very quietly, "Come home, Oby!" and I followed him, I did not know why. But just as we were getting out of the crowd, on the side of the road, my new master came dashing up to where we were, and with a terrible oath told me to mount my horse and be ready to start. I was so frightened I did not know what to do. Master never said a word, but just looked at me as if he pitied me from the bottom of his heart, and I could not stand that; I did not think of father and mother at home, nor of Flora, nor of the nice times we had had together in the fields at night, but I just looked at master and went away with him. But the soldier was not satisfied yet; he came straight up to us, and swearing worse than ever, he said to master, "How dare you, Sir, force that man away? Do you not know that he is free, and has a right to go where he will?" Master changed color; I knew he was not accustomed to be spoken to in that way, and I wished I had never thought of enlisting as a soldier. But he said nothing at all, and although the soldiers all turned around, and my new master pulled out his carbine and cocked it, he made his way between the horses and the guns, I following him close by, until we came out on the other side of the column, and then he said very quietly, "Now, Oby, go home and tell your father not to distress himself about you any farther." I was just running up the road, when I heard somebody galloping up, and as I turned round I saw it was a great officer, with a sword in his hand, who rode up to master and asked him what was the matter. I could not hear his answer, but the officer said, "We do not force servants to go with us, and if your boy wants to stay, let him stay."

When I came home I found father and mother, Uncle Henry, and all of them in mother's room, and when they saw me they all cried out, "Oh, Oby, what have you been doing?" Well, it made me right angry to be treated thus like a baby, and I went out into the yard. There stood Flora, and what must she do but come up to me in the prettiest way of the world and drop me a little courtesy, and say in a little lisping way, "Oho, Mr. Paragon, you had not the courage to go with your friends? Don't you look like a little whipped boy? Shall I ask Miss Lucy for some candy for you?" It made me mad to hear her talk so, when she had all the time been telling me that I ought to stay, and not run away like the poor stupid field-hands.

I turned round without looking at her, and ran over to Uncle Bob, to ask him what I ought to do. He was not in, but Aunt Betsy was there, with the children about her, packing up all her things. I wondered what she was doing, but she would not give me any answer, and I was too mad to go home again; so I staid and waited for Uncle Bob to come home again. They had some nice middlings that day, and goody-bread with the sweetest cracklings I ever ate, and we all laughed, and talked, and I danced a jig for Aunt Betsy, and others came in until the house was full.

Late in the evening Uncle Bob came home, and such a sight he was! He had a double harness hanging over his shoulders, and a saddle on his head, and his hands full of bags and satchels, and a big gun under his arm. He looked very tired, and threw it all down; then he opened the door again and laughed, and when we went out there to see what it was, we found a nice carryall and two good, strong horses fastened to the fence. I knew the carriage well; it belonged to old Miss Mary Fitch, and the horses were Uncle Bob's master's. I did not like his goings on much, but he was an old man and I had no right to say any thing to him. When he had had his supper he lit his pipe and looked around him, and when he noticed me he opened his eyes wide, and said, "Why, Oby, I thought you had gone with the Yankees!" I felt mightily ashamed. I had to tell him all about it, and when I had done he called me out and whispered to me, "Now, look here, Oby, don't you make a fool of yourself, but come along with me to-night and be a man." He talked and talked, and before I knew exactly how it was, I had promised to go with him. He had a way about him that few could resist, and when he wanted you to do any thing he was sure to get you to do it.

It was a dark night, the moon was behind the clouds, and at times you could not see the hand before your eyes. Uncle Bob had hitched up and put Aunt Betsy and the four children inside the carryall; he sat on the box, and every corner behind and before was stuffed full with bags and parcels. I do not know why they took so much; but Aunt Betsy would take every thing; and there was her spinning-wheel, and her split-bottomed rocking-chair, and the cradle for the baby. Then there was Colonel Wood's Aleck, and Dr. White's Jimmy, and I. We walked pretty fast, and listened with all our might, for we thought we might meet some gentleman and he might stop us. But there was nobody about that night; every body was afraid of the Yankees, and kept very close. Besides, the roads were awful, and Uncle Bob's horses could hardly pull the carryall at a snail's pace. Every now and then they would stick fast in the mud, and then we had to take rails from the fence and put them under the wheels and help Uncle Bob. It was not half as pleasant as riding on a fine horse among a crowd of gentlemen, or even sitting at home in mother's room and having a nice supper. After a while Uncle Bob became angry, and the next time the horses stalled he pitched Aunt Betsy's wheel into the road; then went the chair, and the cradle, and a great many other things. Aunt Betsy did not dare say a word, but she groaned and groaned. It sounded awful in the dark night and in the black woods where we were. At last we could not get any further, and just then we saw a light through the trees, and when we whipped the horses on both sides to get nearer to it we found an army wagon in the middle of the road, with the mud over the hubs of the wheels, and one of the mules half-dead and half-buried in the mud. The drivers and some of the escort had made a roaring fire in the woods, and we joined them. I was so sleepy I fell down where we stopped, and did not know what happened any more.

I was just dreaming of my young master's calling me to saddle his pony when somebody touched me on the shoulder. I could not wake up at once. It always went hard with me to wake in the morning, and then I heard somebody call my name. It sounded very sweet to me somehow, though I did not know where it came from, and when I got my eyes open at last I thought I was dreaming still. For there was Flora standing by my side, looking up at the top of the tree, as if she did not know I was lying right before her. After a while she turned her eyes all around her, and when they came back to me she cried out, "Why, Oby, if that is not you! Where on earth do you come from?" Now that was a nice question to ask me; so I just jumped up and laughed heartily; and then she began laughing too, and before I knew what I was doing my arm was round her waist and I had kissed her twice. She pretended to be very angry, but I only laughed the more, and at last she told me how she had heard from Uncle Bob's son, who stays at master's mill, that I had gone along with him. Then she had made a little bundle of her nicest clothes and had followed us all the way, never saying a word, until she felt so cold in the morning she could not stay away any longer from the fire. When I asked her what she had come for, she said: "You would not have me let Aunt Betsy go away with all those babies and no one to take care of them? And then, might not somebody have come and frightened Mr. Paragon out of his wits and sent him home again crying?" At first I did not know how to take her, but there was something funny in her voice that I knew well enough from of old. So I jumped up, as quick as a squirrel, and before she knew what was coming I had my arms around her once more, and kissed her as hard as I could. We must have made some noise, for all of a sudden there was a crowd around us, and all cried out upon Flora and wanted to know how she got there and what she came for.

We were still talking and laughing in the jolliest way, as if there was no trouble in the world, and we were down at a corn-shucking, when bang went a shot, and another, and before we knew what was coming the wood was full of smoke that could not get out fast enough through the branches of the pine-trees. We all stood still, and my heart beat fast enough, not that I was much afraid of the shooting, but I thought it might be the gray-jackets, and if they should catch us and carry us back! I would not have minded the going back so much, for I knew they would not have punished us, but I could not have stood before master and seen him look at me again, as he did when he wanted me to come home with him from among the artillerymen. I did not stand long idly there, but I just took Flora's hand and told her to come along, and then I pitched Aunt Betsy and the little ones into the carryall, and all the bundles I could find. I was as in a dream, but it was not long before the horses were put in, and Uncle Bob was cracking his whip, and we were running after them as fast as we could.

When we were a little more quiet again we looked around, and then we found out that we had left our friends the Yankees, and were quite alone by ourselves. There were about five or six colored ladies with us, some of them had babies on one arm and a big pile of clothes and such things under the other; then there were one or two elderly men who looked scared and did not know, I believe, what they were doing, except that they must go on, on until they got to the North; and lastly, there were three or four little children who were just running along with the rest of them for the fun. After a while I began to feel hungry, and when I looked at Flora in the bright daylight I thought she looked hungry too; at all events she was very pale and drooping, and I saw she had no shoes on, and could hardly walk. I went to help her, but she tried to hold up, and said it did not matter. I saw, though, it would matter pretty soon, for we had not a mouthful of bread nor meal among us, and, except Uncle Bob, who was rich enough, there was not one among us who had any money. And here we were alone, left by our natural friends and protectors, and not likely to be received on any plantation.

It seemed that all of our party felt the same way, for no one said a word. Every now and then one of the children would begin to whine and be told to hush up. Then some girl would laugh right out and suddenly stop short, as if she was frightened at the sound of her own voice. Uncle Bob, who knew best, had his hands full to drive his tired horses and to pull the carryall, with its heavy load, through the awfully bad roads. I walked steadily on, Flora right behind me, Indian file, and what with the cold, drizzling rain, wetting us to the skin, and the loads of mud that stuck to our feet, and the heavy thoughts that weighed on our minds, we did not make a very merry couple. I thought, every now and then, what a glorious time I would have at the North. I knew I could make as good a shoe as any white man, and I thought of a nice little shop I might have in Cincinnati, where Peter Hite went when he was made free, and of Flora being my good wife, really married, and the beautiful things I was going to buy for her, so that she might look a real lady. But in the midst of my thoughts I stumbled against a big, old root, or Flora sighed behind me, and then coughed a little to put me on a false track, or asked me some question, to show that she was not sad at all, and my dreams were gone in a moment, and I saw all our troubles clear before me again.

We tramped on until late in the evening, when we met an old field-hand, with a bag of potatoes on his back, who told us we were still eight miles from the canal, and that he had seen no Yankees any where. We asked him to let us have his potatoes, but he said he did not want to have any thing to do with runaway niggers, and was going away to leave us, when Uncle Bob came up and asked him what he would take for them in greenbacks. When he heard us speak of greenbacks he became very polite at once, and sold them for ninepence to Uncle Bob, who made him promise to bring some fat middling and some corn-meal up to the old tobacco house, where we meant to spend the night. We all went in there, and it was a nice enough place for us to get dry in; there was some hay in a lean-to on one side, and I made a nice little bed for Flora; but we did not dare make a large fire for fear they might see it at the house and send the overseer down to turn us out. Uncle Bob got his middling, and Aunt Betsy cooked all they had for herself and her children, asking me and Flora to come up and help ourselves. I did not like much going there, when there were so many others who had nothing at all to eat, but Uncle Bob told me to make no hesitation—he always loved big words—and to partake of his victuals. I took Flora by the hand and pulled her along with me to the fire. Aunt Betsy looked at us, and I thought she was going to have a hearty laugh, but somehow there was none of us that night could laugh heartily, and we ate just to satisfy our hunger, but it did not taste good. Then we had a chew of tobacco, and Uncle Bob proposed we should sing a psalm about the mansions in the sky, and hallelujah, but we broke down pretty soon, and then we all lay down, one here, one there, as we were sitting. I was tired enough, but I could not sleep; the thoughts would come into my head. I could not drive father and mother out of my head, and every time I saw them in my mind they looked so sad it made me feel very badly. Then the children cried and moaned and asked for something to eat; and some of the old ones groaned too, and cried out: "O Lord, O Lord a-mercy!"—it was very hard to hear it all and not be able to help them in any way. So I was right glad when the mist broke in the morning and the sun rose, first red, like blood, and looking as if it were angry at us, and then clear and bright, like the dayspring from on high.

I ran down to the spring, where there was a plenty of water, to wash, and when I came back I saw Flora talking very anxiously to Aunt Betsy. They hushed up when I came near, but I could see well enough that Flora had been crying, and that somebody had given her an old pair of shoes that were twice as big as her feet. She did not have big splash-feet, like a field-hand nigger woman, but hers were nice enough for any white lady. I felt mighty sorry for her; she was not accustomed at all to rough work, and down at home she had hardly ever been sent out of the house. I knew she could not stand it long, and I was determined to make her go back. I did not mean to speak to her directly. I knew she would not listen to me if she once had made up her mind; but I thought she would mind what Aunt Betsy would say to her. I took the old lady aside, and told her all about my fears and troubles, and she promised at once to talk to Flora and to persuade her to go home again.

I went behind the big oak-tree, lest she should see me, and I noticed Aunt Betsy going up to her and talking to her very friendly and very soberly. But I must have been too curious, for no sooner had she ended than Flora comes straight up to where I stood and said: "And of all men, Oby, that you should want me to go back!" and with that she broke out into such sobs and sighs that I did not know what to do, and just had to beg her to stay and to go along with us. I told her I would stand by her as long as I was alive, and she could trust me now and forever. In the mean time they had all gotten ready to start, and as there was not much over from last night for breakfast, we were soon on the tramp again.

It was an awful time, though, we had; the road was worse than ever, for Sheridan's men had been right ahead of us, and they had trampled the mud knee-deep, and if the carryall once got into the ruts the army wagons had made, there was hardly any way to get it out again. We were soon left behind, for we had to pull the horses out when they stuck fast, and to mend the harness, that was all the time breaking, and take the rails from the fence and pry the carriage up to let the poor starved horses pull it out again.

At last we came to a sandy stretch in the pine woods, where it was a little better, and as we turned round a corner, there, right in the fence, lay Aunt Phoebe, and by her side two of her little babies, the one three years old and the other about nine months, and never a word did any one of them say. I went up to Aunt Phoebe and shook her, and asked her what was the matter. At first she would not answer at all; at last, when Flora came up and whispered into her ear, and begged her to speak to her, she said, very faintly, that she could not possibly go a step further, and that she had not a drop of milk left for her baby. Aunt Betsy came down too, and when she saw what was the matter, and turned the children round and found them look ashy pale, she called for Uncle Bob and fell to crying bitterly. He came up slowly, and looked at them all without saying a word. Then he pulled the mother and the children together into the fence-corner and put a quarter, a silver quarter, into the hands of Aunt Phoebe and left her there. We all followed him back to the carryall with our hearts ever so heavy, but what could we do? I asked Uncle Bob if he thought she would die? He did not look at me at all, but just said in his beard, "I don't know; maybe she will, maybe she won't; perhaps it's better for her to die than to live on as she has done."

After that we were sadder than ever before. Poor Flora lost her big shoes every other step, and most of the ladies had to throw away their bundles, and even then they could hardly get along. Whenever we met a colored man we asked him how far it still was to the canal, for we knew we would meet the Yankees there sure enough, and they would not let us starve, but give us all rations. It seemed as if we were never getting nearer to it, for every time we asked it was still some four or five miles, maybe six. We met some white gentlemen, too, on the road, but they just looked at us with stern faces and rode by. Once we came to a little bit of a house by the way-side, and saw an old lady sitting by the door, with a cat lapping up the milk in a gourd she held on her lap. I could not stand seeing that, so I walk up to her and make her a polite bow, and say, "Oh, Missis, I see you are a mighty good lady, won't you be so kind as to give me a little of that milk for a poor girl who is half dead over yonder?" The old lady looked at me and then at Flora, who was standing at the gate, staring with her big eyes at the gourd as if she had never seen milk in her life. After a while she said, "Well, I don't care; take it if you want it." I was just taking the gourd by the handle, being careful not to spill a drop, when a great big man in a gray uniform and a large revolver in his hand comes out of the passage, and swearing at me, as they did in the army, says, "Now, you rascal, you clear out here or I'll shoot you down like a dog!" I felt so mad I would have liked to run up to him and snatch the pistol out of his hand and shoot him myself; but I did not have the courage, that is the truth of it, and I knew also I must not get my friends into trouble before we got to the soldiers again. When I came back to where Flora stood I saw she had dropped down upon a big rock they used to get on horseback by, and when I spoke to her she said she could not get any further. That finished me, and I swore to God Almighty I would have something for her or take a man's life. But just then something came between me and her, and when I looked up there was the old lady with the gourd in her hand and a piece of corn-bread I had not seen before, and she said: "Never mind my son, boy; he is in bad humor because all our servants have left us in a body yesterday and taken our horses with them. Poor child, what is the matter with her?" And then she took Flora's hand in hers and rubbed it, and told her to sit up and eat and not to cry any more. I talked to her too, and after a while she did set up, and the way the milk and the bread went! It would have been a pleasure to me to see how she enjoyed it; but I was terribly hungry myself, and I counted every mouthful she took and every gulp that went down. When she had done, she stood up and looked much better, and then she thanked the old lady, as she had learned to do from Miss Lucy. The old lady had big tears in her eyes and looked mighty sad; she said something about God's Providence, which I did not understand, and about somebody's being ground between the upper and the nether millstone, which, I think, is somewhere in the Bible.

We had to walk fast enough to overtake the others, who had gotten far ahead of us, and it was late in the evening when we saw them all standing in a crowd together on a high place. The sun was just about setting, and the sky was golden, and as we looked at them we could see every ray of their clothes and every hair on their head. They all talked very loud, even Uncle Bob, who seemed to be very angry. We came up slowly, for we were terribly tired, and Flora could hardly drag one foot after the other. When we came up to where they stood, we saw we were on the side of the canal, and there on the tow-path sat Aunt Hannah, crying and screaming all together, and the others stood around her and looked as angry as could be. We pressed close up to Aunt Betsy, and I asked her in a whisper what was the matter. "Oh, Oby!" she said, "just think of it, Aunt Hannah was the first to see the canal, and she walks right up to where we now are and takes her poor little baby—it was not more than two months old—and before we knew what she was about she had thrown it into the water, and there it lies now. Oh, Oby, these are awful times! God have mercy upon us!"

I could not say a word. I had never seen or heard of such misery in my life. Flora went quietly down to where Aunt Hannah was rocking herself, weeping like a child, and then screaming out aloud, and sat down by her and tried to take her hands and to soothe her. But Aunt Hannah would not be soothed; she cried out: "Leave me alone, you! leave me alone! You don't know what it is to have a baby and to see it die on your breast. She is happier down there than she could ever have been in this world. I only wished I was there too. Can't you leave me alone? or give me something to eat? I have not eaten any thing since day before yesterday, not a mouthful. Oh, my baby, my baby! She was the sweetest child I ever had!" And with that she began screaming again, as if she were distracted. I could not stand it any longer; so I touched Flora and told her to come along, Uncle Bob was going and we must try to get something ourselves, or we would be starved too, or get mad like poor Aunt Hannah.

Flora got up and followed me, but she did not say a word. The tears were just running down her cheeks, and she did not mind it in the least. Uncle Bob was driving along on the tow-path, and we all followed in a long string, very slowly. At last we came to another turn, and there, right before us, lay a big mill, and behind it the town. On the mill-race stood a soldier in blue, and I could have shouted aloud, for now I knew our troubles would surely be at an end. I do not know what made me so bold, but I walked right up to the soldier and asked him if he did not know somebody that wanted a really good servant. He looked at me and then at Flora, who was standing behind me, and said: "You mean two good servants, don't you? I can't afford keeping a servant, but there is the sutler; I heard him inquire a little while ago for a handy fellow, who understood horses and knew how to make coffee and such things."

● hardly let him finish, for that was exactly what I was good for, and Flora made beautiful coffee. I just asked him where the sutler was, and when he showed me some way down the street a splendid team of four gray mules, standing before a large, fine house, and said that was the sutler's wagon, I took hold of Flora's hand and ran down as fast as I could. But when I came between the mules and the house I saw a whole crowd of servants standing around the door and crying out: "Take me, master, take me!" I thought it was all over, and I had lost my first and last chance, when Flora suddenly let go my hand and fell down like a log of wood, right between the wheels of the wagon. I tried to lift her up, but there was such a crowd, and the mules began to kick, and I thought she was going to die right away. Just then a man who had been inside the wagon popped his head out, and seeing Flora lying there, he asked: "Hallo, what is the matter, my man?" I told him as well as I could, and begged him for mercy's sake to help me, for Flora was sure enough dying. He laughed and stepped down leisurely over the swingle-trees, with a piece of hard tack in one hand and a bottle in the other. He poured some out of the bottle into his hand and rubbed her head with it, then he poured some down between her teeth, and when I could see next, she was sitting up with her head leaning against the wheel, opening her eyes as if she had been fast asleep, and munching a little bread in her mouth. I thanked the gentleman for having saved her life, but he only laughed the more. Then he asked me if I was not hungry too; and before I could say a word he pushed a whole pile of crackers into my hands. When Flora was all right again, he asked us what we were going to do with ourselves, and we told him as fast as we could, for we were both mighty grateful to him for his kindness. Then he told us that he was the sutler himself, and that if we promised to do well and be faithful servants to him he might find something to do for us both. He called to his clerk, who was in the house, and told him to see to it that we got a place to sleep in and some supper. When I looked a little around me I saw they had a beautiful flag flying from the top of the house, and that was the first night I slept under the Stars and Stripes, a free man.

THE UGLY TOAD.

"UGLY as a toad," has come to be a proverb in many languages. Shakspeare will have it that the toad is "venomous" as well as "ugly." Now although one "Learned Theban" has endeavored to prove that the great dramatist was profoundly versed in legal lore, and another that he was "well up" in medicine, and several that he had fathomed the depths of theological science, no one has yet, as far as we know, attempted to show that he is to be accepted as authority in Natural History. As to toads, he is clearly wrong, saving the one point that they are indisputably "ugly." Yet if the proverb, "Handsome is that handsome does," were literally true, the Toad should be considered most comely; for there is not, as far as mankind is concerned, a more well-behaved, harmless, and useful creature upon earth. What bugs and insects would say of him, could they speak and write, is quite another question.

Toads, considered from the human point of view, are quiet, unobtrusive, and disposed to keep out of every one's way. They engage in no turmoils; rarely collect in numbers to constitute a social community; nor are they disposed to set at defiance any of the regulations of mankind. They delight in cultivated grounds, but never to the disadvantage of the proprietor. In the daytime they are rarely seen, unless an old log is rolled from its bed, a root wrenched from its place, or a stone is upturned which had been undisturbed for years. With extreme sobriety of deportment, a never-failing appetite, and unsurpassed digestive powers, they have been compared to aldermen, who are facetiously said to grow fat at the expense of the taxpayers. Like street-watchmen, sleep through the day, but at dark take position for a beat. If undisturbed, they sometimes occupy the same cozy residence under a door-step or some similar retreat, from whence there is a communication with a garden, or any other equally agreeable foraging spot, for years in succession.

Their longevity is uncertain; but if it is true that they are occasionally found boxed up in the solid wood of immense trees, from whence they were incidentally liberated; or stranger still, discovered hermetically sealed in firm, compact stone, brought from deep excavations in the bowels of the earth alive, it is morally certain we have no data for determining their duration of life.

Somewhere in the records of Natural History reference is made to a toad that was known to have resided thirty years in the same inclosure. Contrary to his usual custom, attracted by the sun's genial rays, he ventured out upon a grassy eminence near his hole. A tame crow belonging to the same establishment pounced suddenly upon the unsuspecting patriarch, presumed to have been wrapt in contemplation, and unluckily picked out one eye. After that misfortune, being no longer able to catch food, in consequence of a disturbance in the focal axis of vision, about to be explained, the poor creature was supposed to have died of starvation.

From the revelations of geology the fact has been demonstrated that there was a time when the globe was in the complete possession of reptile monsters of gigantic size. They dragged their huge bodies through lacustrine swamps, under a torrid sun—rioting in universal slaughter among themselves. At that early condition of the earth's surface the batrachian family was there, as large as a house. Such a declaration would be considered as ridiculous and incredible as Gulliver's description of Brobdinag and the Lilliputs, were it not true that the actual fossil remains of those mammoth reptiles were on exhibition in various cabinets, an undeniable evidence of their former existence. Our present representative of a great antediluvian ancestry are but diminished shadows of an ancient lineage.

The Pipa, a huge toad of Surinam, a foot or more broad, is a wonder in its way. Each wart on the back is really a cell, into which its eggs obtain a lodgment after extrusion, by assistance of the male, where they are hatched, and the young ones are carried about by the mother, with their heads out, enjoying the prospect, as she hops over field and moor.

Toads, as well as frogs, subsist exclusively on living insects, as flies, bugs, worms, slugs, etc., caught when out of their hiding-places. Nothing is more curious in their nature than the well-established fact that they universally refuse to feed on any thing that does not give to them ocular evidence of being alive. They were predestined to keep down the too great multiplication of insects. If, therefore, they were to depart from the instinct that governs them, and feed indifferently on dead materials, nature would fail to accomplish the design contemplated.

Such is the fact in regard to serpents. They only feed on living prey. Their eyes may be deceived, and sometimes they may make a mistake, as in the case of a boa-constrictor which swallowed a wooden blanket in Deson, a few years since, and subsequently voided it unimpaired.

In consequence of this instinctive appetite for living insects, a rapid digestion and capacious membranous stomach, capable of remarkable distention, toads are incalculably useful to the gardener, by protecting his tender vines from their nocturnal depredations.

Tree-toads carry on precisely the same useful function in the tops of fruit and forest trees. Each toe is a perfect air-pump, enabling them to hold to a twig with extreme tenacity, as they leap from branch to branch in pursuit of game. The top of the head of the remora, a marine fish, is constructed upon the same principle. They fasten to any passing fish they choose, and ride ad libitum, like Sinbad's Old Man of the Sea, while there is pleasure in the excursion.

Neither chemical compositions nor mechanical appliances, however ingeniously contrived, are to be compared with toads in the destruction of every kind of leaf-destroying, flower-gnawing, and fruit-biting bugs, flies, and their progeny. By an inherent predisposition, no better understood than why fishes or birds annually migrate, or the law by which a tortoise unerringly finds its companion at the distance of miles in a locality it never saw, or where the mate was never before confined, the toad knows just the haunts of its prey. If openings are left under fences they will ultimately find them, pass into the garden noiselessly, and commence operations.

If the place is satisfactory, and they are unmolested, their excellent services may be depended upon through future successive seasons.

Immediately after an evening shower they might be collected in baskets and transferred to the turnip-lot, the cucumber, melon, cabbage, and squash yards. No educational preparation is required. If the picking is good they manifest no desire to leave. In one night a single toad, taking his position by the vine-hill, would destroy more bugs than thirty active men in twice the number of hours. There is no overstatement of their powers in this commendatory notice of their beneficial efforts.

Toads and frogs catch their prey with the point of the tongue. It is a marvelously constructed organ—occupying but little room just within the tip of the under-jaw—appearing like a small fleshy eminence on prying open the mouth. It is singularly elastic, and may be projected at the pleasure of the animal, from one to six and eight inches, and perhaps more. Unlike the tongue of other animals the point is directed toward the gullet. The projectile force is exerted with the quickness of a flash of light. An extremely tenacious secretion exudes from it, so sticky that the slightest touch with the object to which it is thrust holds it firmly, while the contraction of the fibres instantaneously delivers the struggling captive exactly at the opening of the fauces, where it is taken off, as our teeth detach a morsel from the tines of a fork. The muscular tissues of the tongue of the ant-bear, the snout of the tapir, the cleft upper lip of the camel, the tongue of the giraffe, and the trunk of the elephant, are similar in their anatomical composition. Each serves as a sensitive, prehensile finger.

Again, there is a peculiar prominence of the eyes in the batrachians. The globes seem to be fixed quite outside the skull instead of being confined within bony orbits. This gives them a wider range of vision—full two-thirds the arc of a circle. It might be adduced as a splendid illustration of Divine care in making ample provision for securing to the individual the means for providing for its necessities, although a singular departure from an apparently normal plan in respect to the visual organs in other animals. It sees its prey from all directions at the same instant, and calculates accordingly. In chameleons with a similar prominence, the eyes move independently of each other—hence they actually look two ways at once.

The visual axis, or point where both eyes meet on the object, is exactly at the distal extremity of the extended tongue; and so it is with the eyes of birds—the focus of distinct vision being at the tip of the bill—thus they see to pick up very small particles. But the poor toad of whom we have spoken, whose eye was picked out by a crow, on being tempted by a struggling fly on the point of a needle, invariably missed the hit; and as though reflecting upon the cause of the mishap, turned about an inch to the right and struck again, each time falling short about the same distance. The experimenter who adjusted the dainty morsel purposely to ascertain whether the hungry unfortunate had reasoning elements, came to the conclusion that the difference between instinct and mental action are not within the ready grasp of philosophers. In seizing a fly, for example, on the floor, within an inch of their nose, the tongue resembles a red narrow leaf as it is thrown out—scarcely an inch long. Perhaps the next insects may be taken seven inches distant. Thus the distance is measured with an accuracy exceedingly surprising. It never goes by the object, or falls short.

Both toads and frogs extrude their ova in still water, to be hatched by solar heat. Toads drop their eggs in water, ordinarily in those stagnant places occupied by frogs, but the young leave and never afterward return to it, as soon as their tadpole transformation is finished. Sometimes a string of eggs one or two yards in length may be seen. Frogs' eggs are mixed up in mass of gelatinous matter; hence it is easy to determine to which they belong.

When tadpoles leave the shell they breathe by gills, and feed at first on the gelatinous mass in which long strings of eggs are entangled. Nearly ninety days are represented to be necessary to bring about a change in their respiratory apparatus to make them air-breathing. In the mean while four limbs are gradually developed, which existed from the beginning in an embryotic form. First the hind legs appear, and next the arms, which protrude through natural openings in the skin—as a gentleman slips his arms through hemmed slits in his cloak. And finally the tail is gradually absorbed. At once they emerge from the water, the lungs are inflated, the gills close, never again to move, and the toad and frog thus become ever after air-breathing, carnivorous reptiles.

Neither of them are amphibious, as vulgarly supposed, inhaling either air or water, as most convenient. They breathe exclusively through minute nostrils till the mouth is distended, when by acts of the will it is forced into the membranous lungs—the whole mouth performing the office of a bellows. On imparting its oxygen to the blood, the air is expelled by a contraction of the muscles of the abdomen.

Such are some of the singular metamorphoses those apparently insignificant, harmless reptiles undergo. It is said by some authorities that four years are required to give a perfect development so that they are capable of propagating the race.

They have a single heart and cold blood. Their vital tenacity is such that the oxygen taken into the circulation by a single breath will suffice to maintain life for months in succession. In diving, therefore, it is merely suspended respiration. On rising, however long they may have been submerged, oxygen is demanded again.

Water must be introduced into the system to dilute their food, and yet they can not drink by the mouth. It is imbibed by cutaneous absorption. Thus it reaches the stomach to facilitate digestion. In showery weather, in summer, shoals of young toads are hopping about in great glades. The object is to be refreshed with pure water, which, pattering on their backs, is rapidly appropriated within. It is to that sagacious cutaneous provision for absorbing fluids that they may have survived for centuries. If life with them is thus prolonged, by absorbing vitalizing properties from the atmosphere, through minute excrevices it apparently solid rock, or the capillary tubes of manumet trees.

These unsightly excrescences which stand the backs of old toads particularly are not calls for secreting a poisonous fluid, which they can eject. Shakespeare gave currency to a prevailing prejudice on that account common in his day, which has been transmitted to ours. But it is an error made classical.

We are taught by these investigations that even the insignificant toad may be turned to practical account. Unobtrusive, positive in character, never interfering beyond his appointed sphere, it accomplishes the business for which it was intentionally designed, viz.: to keep insects within reasonable bounds of control, thus their excessive multiplication should not operate to the permanent disadvantage or extinction of tender plants or other races. In various ways they subserve the best interests of the farmer and garden. They are as important in one specific direction as the birds in another, when unimpaired and allowed to act out their own instinctive disposition.

COST OF A HOME.

IT is all very well to talk about the opportunities—the opportunities which young unmarried men have within their reach. But libraries and model coffee-shops don't sew or button, nor is it without the help of the most lively imagination that a clerk, or indeed any other sensible person, can perceive his best ideal of a little household angel in the great spectacled fiddler who preside at the finger lecture-room just around the corner. As applied to unmarried men in general, and to clerks in particular, to all the associations and societies which have for their aim the amelioration of the condition of such people—to all such societies that fail to furnish a home for a man, we have one grand objection to offer: It don't pay. As far as employment goes, the sum is very vulgar—but it is telling—in it true. To be informed that one never misses that which one has never possessed is small consolation for a homeless man, because, in his case, the assertion is false every time that he is impressed with the comparative conditions of life; and such impressions are of hourly occurrence. And if this were not the case, it would require the truest imagination conceivable in order to discover home life in the fashionable arrangement which sometimes the birth, marriage, and death take place within the walls of a boarding-house.

The problem to be solved, is to ascertain the pecuniary minimum that will serve as an assured basis of a private household, or home; or, in other words, to enumerate the items commanding our attention, and with the synthesis to present the reader with a form not only rational but comprehensive as a treatment of the most remediable ills of the class of men and women whose cause we are advocating.

Giving our observations a direct application, let us assume $2000 to be the income of a man desirous of enjoying life in the true sense of the word, and let us likewise suppose him, through rigid economy, to have laid up that amount during the eighteen months previous to his marriage. He will then desire to invest his money in a manner calculated to render him, in time, independent of the precarious condition of householders in general, to say nothing of the unpredictable demands which are annually made upon his income in the form of house rent. The possession of even a modest building site in a city gives a man the air of substantiality that justly belongs to owners of real estate; and possessing a lot in a respectable neighborhood, free from all liabilities, the proprietor will experience no difficulty in finding persons willing to advance $5000 to a mortgage upon the lot and upon the house which is to be built. Along some of the car routes of Brooklyn, within an hour's ride of the city of New York, lots of 25 x 100 feet can be purchased for the cash price of $500 per lot; and granting the house owner to spend $1500 on furniture (such a designated "average furniture"), the following statement would be an exhibit of the outlay of his $2000 and of the money raised for building purposes:

Cash paid for building lot	$500
" " " " furniture	1500
Mortgage on house and lot for 2 years, renewable for 4 years	$5000

This statement shows the entire property to be worth $1500 more than the mortgage calls for, should the furniture be included; and inasmuch as $400 per annum is regarded as a rent so low that many persons are anxious to take a lease for a considerable number of years upon a dwelling at this figure, it is most reasonable to apply the same amount toward the canceling of the mortgage suggested—which, indeed, can be very nearly accomplished within the time above specified. The schedule of payments on the following page involves the principle suggested.

According to the rule there employed it is evident that the canceling figure will be $191.56 in excess of the previous yearly sum of $400, or, in other words, $591.56 will be the amount of the final payment upon the mortgage.

To a stranger newly arrived in the city of New York, and ignorant of the domestic evils that reign in the land of penny, it must appear highly absurd that a man enjoying an income of $2000 per annum should be forced to apply extraordinary ingenuity in the current manage-nance of his family. In London, in a healthy and respectable neighborhood within thirty or forty minutes' walk of the commercial portion of the city, $300 per annum is regarded as a very respectable rental. Living in general is not high; so that a man with a yearly salary of £300 can afford to keep house and to enjoy some of the luxuries even of life. But in the city of New York, under the present system of management, the equivalent sum of $1500 goes no distance at all toward the support of an establishment. But this condition of affairs can not exist forever. The yearly increase of buildings in the city of London, even relatively considered, is quite equal to that of the city of New York—a fact that goes to show that, while there appears to be no ordinary prescription to the growth of a city, the maximum valuation of real estate, in a given locality, is speedily reached, and that a subsequent inflation in its rate of value is but a temporary evil. The fact likewise shows that the magnitude of a city depends not upon a positive and absorbent wealth of its denizens, but upon enterprise founded on a partial money basis. Leaving the present extreme inflation of prices entirely out of the question, it is fair to presume that, eventually, the valuation of real estate in New York will be coincident with that of London to-day, and consequently the average of every description of rates will correspondingly decrease.

To have a home without a majority of unnecessary luxuries is called, nowadays, a sort of offense against society. And yet we do not think a man will greatly err in braving Mrs. Grundy and seeking his terrestrial heaven in a neat, substantial frame dwelling twenty-five feet front by thirty-five or forty feet in depth. The house would be small, but large enough to fall under the title of being respectable; and the fact of its being of wood does not prevent its being the abode of refined people, who, rather than to let Happiness shiver on the broad stairs of ideality, are sensible enough to seek, in a Christian spirit, a reasonable amelioration of their condition, and to surround themselves with the blessings of domestic life.

Whatever care children may require, until they shall have reached a considerable age, they demand but a small figure of the domestic expense. Thus, for the first few years, the reasonable annual outlay for the necessities and the comforts of life can be rated at an aggregate sum of $1500 per three persons, and about $500 per each extra couple of adults that might be added to the family circle. As regards food, fuel, and a moderate indulgence in the luxuries of life, the military tables of subsistence furnish us an excellent guide to the rule of quantity; and if to these we add an acknowledged judicious outlay upon wearing apparel, we can not greatly err in our estimate of cost of the entire responsibilities entailed upon domestic life. We here offer the reader a fairly estimated table of the quantity of provisions (and their prices) necessary for the sustenance of three persons during a single week. The rule of quantity is founded upon "The Revised Regulations of the Army of the United States (pages 277, 279, 280): Philadelphia, 1861." We have based the prices upon what tradesmen term "a wholesale purchase" of all imperishable articles of food, and the perishable articles are rated at the retail prices demanded for first-class provision.

Inasmuch as prices are variable, while the official titles of given quantities are invariable, the rules of relative quantity, and consequently of price, can always be predetermined by the following table, which we give from The Revised Regulations, etc. The only precaution to be taken in calculating the various quantities is to deduct one-tenth the weight or measure from each item, as the military excess allowed for wastage.

not in itself the ultimatum that is within their reach. To this class of beings appears to be intrusted the duty, the privilege, of maintaining an intellectual home. Possessing all the susceptibility to refinement that characterizes the majority of people born in a more fortunate condition of life, and yet flung, as it were, upon the very edge of a class that has want and vulgar poverty for its companions, the people whose cause we are advocating stare the misfortunes of the latter class in the very face, and are thoroughly alive to the benefits, the social education, which their more fortunate fellow-creatures are able to buy. But if one is to borrow trouble, is it necessary that the children of parents in narrow circumstances should receive but a wretched primary education; or because it is a rule followed by the greater portion of the wealthy classes, is it obligatory upon clerks to trust an expensive school with the inculcation of those moral and æsthetic refinements which are most properly acquired at the mother's knee? The instant we make home influence and (even a partial) home education the foundation of family government, the question of domestic life assumes a light wholly differing from that in which it is commonly viewed. And with regard to people so immediately connected with the extremes of the whole community, so considerable in number, and so impressible as the class to which we have dedicated our article, their establishment in the domestic scale of life, and the infusion of such principles throughout the body, must unquestionably affect in a beneficial manner the entire chain of society. For the present we must conclude with the remark, that while something remains to be done for this numerous class of individuals, much remains to be undone. It ought to be an empty regret for us, if the sister of our belle idéale chooses to marry the rich Smith, or if Miss Jones, who is "such a perfect lady," disdains to live in a cottage, or indeed in any thing short of a boarding-house, "a large one, where there is plenty of society." There is no dearth of sensible Miss Smiths, and la belle idéale will find that all the men are not geese. The truth is, that there is so much real misery in humbug, and such thorough humbug at the bottom of our little miseries, that it is a subject for wonder why sensible men and women have not called a convention and tumbled the betinseled deity down the back stairs of society. And especially when humbug is involved in the subject under consideration, in nine cases out of ten, if a man and woman have just cause for mutual love, they are fools not to be happy together under merely tolerable circumstances, instead of living separate in the tinsel of a condition not far removed from that which they appear so heartily to dread. And if it will superinduce the overthrow of the god HUMBUG from his pedestal in the hearts of such men and women, we assure them that their determined status in the domestic condition will be immeasurably more respectable than the flimsiness with which they envelop their stilted, unreal course of life, the veil of which is penetrated by every body except themselves. The fiat of a self-constituted Opinion has promulgated laws as groundless in justice as the claim by which it sways the silly multitude. A false and irresponsible order of society brands us with a peculiar term of its own invention, and we tremble as though the thunders of Truth had been hurled against us. We will not be happy because we can not afford to torture ourselves with the criticisms of envious neighbors. It is the old story of "the man, the boy, and the ass," rehearsed in broadcloth and cheap finery; but with "The Moral" left out. It is so comme il faut to smother "The Moral" under gingham and home-spun; to say nothing of lugging into the presence of refined society such vulgarities as the being who travels nightly to his haven of rest, the welcome voices that greet his return, the conviction that the word home sounds no longer like a mockery in the ear—the quaint adage, that "home is home, be it ever so homely."

Life is but an imperfect labor if it does not involve the highest duties of its state. Like a butterfly, we may flutter along the surface of the social state, and paint our wings with a thousand hues; but we gather no treasure in our summer day, and an after-season will sweep us beneath the dead leaves, an unsightly, nameless worm. The man who can be happy at a cheap price is a fool to pay roundly for the certainty of being miserable; and those who will be fools must suffer the penalty.

STRANDED.

FLUNG out, a poor waif, on the Stream of Time—

The rushing river of Might and Mind—
She rests where Old Trinity's sweet bells chime:

A young girl, helpless, poor, and blind.

A spray of bead-work her fingers hold,

Which she fashions to trinkets fine and small:

Oh who shall guess what prayers are told

As she counts her beads by the church-yard wall!

Little by little, and tier on tier,

She builds as a wild-bird builds her nest;

While unfledged hopes and nameless fears

Flutter out from her brooding breast.

O'er her cheeks the flickering sunlight glows;

Hot tears on her thin hands sparkling fall;

While the throbbing city ebbs and flows

Past the maiden that weaves by the church-yard wall.

Six pretty globelets of pearly white,

With one of gold—and the mesh is made;

In the Dead-Sea waves of her endless night,

Netting—how vainly!—for daily bread.

Wan thoughts, like birds o'er a sunset pool,

Dimple her features, thin and small,

While the human tide whirls on to its goal,

Blind to the woe by the church-yard wall.

Alas! for the Blind that will not see!—

Alas! for the Deaf that will not hear!—

While want and woe and misery

Darken the daylight and stun the ear.

More hope for the Heathen, with never a creed,

Who basks in God's sunlight, that shines o'er all,

Than the Christians that pass in the hour of need

The poor that starves by the church-yard wall.

Editor's Easy Chair.

WE hope that none of our British cousins were disposed to smile at our enthusiasm over our royal visitor, Queen Emma of the Sandwich Islands. True wisdom, the philosophers tell us, is to make the most and the best of what you have. Of course our British brethren, who have the privilege of maintaining royalty of the very first order—who keep a Queen and Princes and Princesses, and royal Dukes and Duchesses and Highnesses at an enormous expense—who pay for royal palaces and castles and seats at discretion, besides exhibiting a royal crown under a glass case in the Tower—will think, in their own expressive phrase, “small beer” of our raptures over her Sandwich Majesty. They have bought the right to be critical in such matters. But our monarchical critics should remember that most of us never saw a Queen, and we have been carefully taught that we must be very good indeed if we expect, even when we die, to go to Paris and see a real Emperor and Empress; while, perhaps, superior and prolonged virtue may carry us so far as beyond the Rhine to behold an actual Serene Highness of Schlippen-Schloppen, or a Grand Duke of Pumpernickle, in the flesh. But these are visions of ecstasy—the possibilities, merely, of another and a higher sphere.

The truth is, that our moderate and unsophisticated tastes in royalty would be satisfied by a King of the Cannibal Islands, if we could do no better. We had, indeed, a few years since the opportunity of contemplating a living Prince of Wales; and of the large crowds with which New York greets every fresh spectacle that which waited for his coming seemed to be the largest. It filled doors, windows, roofs, steps, sidewalks, lanterns, posts, awnings, trees, railings, and was as good-humored and well-behaved a throng as the sun ever shone upon. A large part of those amiable spectators had seen the mermaid, and the Albinos, and the fat woman, and the stuffed elephant at Barnum's, for twenty-five cents, and here they were—such is the benignity of Providence to a model republic—about to behold a living royal Prince gratis. The faithful historian will record that they were worthy the high privilege. As for the elect damosels who afterward danced with him, and broke down in his august society through the impromptu floor of the late lamented Academy of Music, they preserve the incident doubtless in sacred family tradition, and the memory will be transmitted to the ultimate generations of their houses as a precious heirloom. Indeed there are matrons comely and gracious still to be encountered in the most perfumed circles, who have the air of peculiar darlings of fortune, and bear themselves with a mien of affable superiority to all contemporary events, but the secret of whose beatification is not comprehended until they are pointed out with awe as partners of the Prince de Joinville at Mrs. —'s famous ball of a quarter of a century ago. Did any of those mild matrons, who might have been at Washington four years since, recognize in a very quiet, very deaf old gentleman, who went about modestly peering into every thing, the royal and gallant sailor Prince of that earlier, rosy time?

The British brother who feels that he has an undivided thirty millionth part of interest in the remotest Plantagenet or princely Tudor, was doubtless inclined to smile at the idea of a grand-daughter of more or less honest John Young, a British Jack tar, appearing as a queen, and graciously giving audience to the special ambassador of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the United States respectfully inviting her to become the guest of the nation. But the same brother would kneel, tingling with delight at the overpowering condescension, if the Empress of France should proffer him her lily hand to salute. And why not the grand-daughter of John Young as well as Miss Montijo? Nay, did not Victoria, Defender of the Faith, descend the grand staircase at Windsor Castle, and offer her ineffable cheek to the oscular salutation of Miss Montijo's husband? That was not only right, but right royal, by the etiquette; yet who was that husband but the nephew of a Corsican lieutenant of artillery?

That is only saying that the most umbrageous oak springs from an acorn. All royalty has a beginning, good British brother. Kings first crown themselves, as the Corsican lieutenant did with the iron crown of Lombardy at Monza. Indeed, only those who are able to crown themselves found royal lines, and “King by the grace of God” really means only king by the grace of an ancestor's right arm or cunning brain. That grim jester, Count Otho Von Bismarck, who has been turning Germany and Europe upside down, says with a fine feudal air, “Prussian monarchs have received, not from the people, but by Divine Grace, a practically unlimited power, a portion of which they have voluntarily granted to the people.” Felix Holt would treat the Herr Count's remark with exactly the respect it deserves by saying, “Grace of fiddlestick! He gets his power from the elbow grease of the old Counts of Brandenburg.” And when we have come so far, why is not that original ointment of royalty as respectable in a British sailor as in a German man-at-arms, or a Corsican lieutenant?

In a late admirable letter from Paris we read, with ardor and satisfaction, that the ruler of France has usually one or two kinds of soup, a bit of fish, a plate of roast, and a chop, at dinner, with a light pudding and perhaps a crumb of old cheese by way of dessert. But we confess reading with an equally respectful awe that the dowager ruler of the Sandwich Islands “partook heartily of gumbo soup, chicken, green pease, succotash, and all the other delicacies of the season.” Our kind Parisian informant, writing to the papers, also described the country costume of the Corsican lieutenant's nephew. He wears high boots, it seems, of convenient material and form, when he rides to hunt in the park at Compiègne—a domain which is kept for him by the people of France in gratitude for his great public services. But Mr. Jenkins, our amiable fellow-citizen, conveys no less gratification in informing us that “Her Majesty wore for the drive in the Park a black and steel-gray grenadine dress, of small pattern, with a Japanese cloak of the same material, trimmed handsomely, and a black velvet jockey hat with black and white feathers. Also dark kid gloves, and a single jewel of unusual brilliancy fastened in the collar of the dress at the throat.” Mr. Jenkins reserves the following fact as a bonne bouche: “Her visiting cards have a mourning border, in memory of his late Majesty, husband of Queen Emma, King Kamehameha IV., now dead.” Mr. Jenkins, of Paris, does not speak of the visiting cards of his Imperial personage; but they too, without doubt, have a mourning border in memory of the fellow-Frenchmen of his Majesty who died suddenly of grape-shot in the streets of Paris on the 3d and 4th of December, 1852, and for those who more lingeringly perished at Cayenne and elsewhere.

As for the public services of the two potentates, Her Majesty the Queen, as Mr. Jenkins further states, being a dowager, "and not having any affairs of state to engross her attention—she being a sincere Christian, as above stated," is a member of the Episcopal Church, and is engaged in raising money for the propagation of Episcopal Christianity in her soft and sunny realms. In England Her Sandwich Island Majesty was honorably received by Her Britannic Majesty, and obtained about fifty thousand dollars for her pious purpose. Her imperial cousin of France is also engaged in propagating his gospel of Caesarism by the pen and otherwise, both at home and abroad. He has undertaken, on the one hand, a mission to the barbarous Mexicans, and, on the other, he is striving for the conversion of savage Republicans, and the gay and gallant nation, more used than we to such luxuries as kings and emperors, foots the little bills.

The British brother and cousin may smile; but her Majesty in steel-gray grenadine, and busy, in her Japanese cloak and black velvet jockey-hat, with black and white feathers, in teaching High-church Christianity to the soft Pacific Islanders, has quite as satisfactory a patent of royalty, if not quite so ancient and dusty, as the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Braganzas, or the Bonapartes. As for the Guelphs their representative is also a Queen, honored and beloved, and there shall be no comparisons. But the mot of the old statesman is more than ever the motto of modern conviction, "Your Majesty's self is but a ceremony." If the British and other foreign brethren prefer to maintain it at its necessary expense, of which the money is the smallest part, we will not quarrel. We are wholly content to indulge in the ceremony no further than in following with attention Mr. Jenkins's graphic account of the royal progress of her Sandwich Island Majesty at her own cost.

A GREAT historical event has occurred since our last talk, and it has been received almost as a matter of course. The distance between Europe and America has been practically annihilated; the Atlantic ocean has been abolished; steam as an agent of communication has been antiquated; we read every morning the previous day's news from London or Paris, and there is no excitement whatever. Scarcely a bell has rung or a cannon roared. Not even a dinner has been eaten in honor of the great event, except by the gentlemen immediately concerned; and the salvo of speeches which usually resounds upon much inferior occasions from end to end of the country has been omitted. Indeed, the first thing was caviling and sneering, and an insinuation that the ocean telegraph was no "great shakes" after all. Persons of a cynical turn, however, observed that the defamatory strain proceeded from the newspapers, upon which the success of the enterprise imposed a heavy outlay. For the insatiable public must have all the news at the old expense; and experience has demonstrated that, to the public, no news is worth more than three or five cents.

Indeed, the possible results of the immediate union of the two continents are so incalculable that all the commentators have avoided speculation. They will be so rapidly developed that we can well wait. The first and inevitable consequence has been the sweeping away of the old and intense general interest in the heading of "Three days (more or less) later from Europe," which has so long heralded the arrival of the ocean steamers. The steamers bring the cream no longer. That is shot electrically under the sea, and the ships suddenly convey only skim milk. They are yet young men who remember the arrival of the Sirius and the Liverpool and the Great Western. Their coming was the occasion of a thousandfold greater excitement than the laying of the cable. Yet if some visionary enthusiast had said to his friend as they watched with awe the steaming in or out of those huge ships, "Before we are bald or gray we shall look upon these vessels as we now look from the express train upon the slow old stage-coaches," he would have been tolerated only as a harmless maniac. But this kind of maniac is very apt to prove the only wise man. The sole folly is in setting limits to the scope and results of invention.

Of course, there will be something very tantalizing in hearing only the central and important fact of important news. The details are often essential to intelligence as well as satisfaction, but the cost of sending messages is so great that for the present the explanatory details must be often omitted. Thus at this very time of writing the telegraph has just said that Louis Napoleon has asked of Prussia an extension of the French frontier to the Rhine. Under what circumstances and upon what conditions we do not hear, and we are left a prey to boundless speculation. But this is a difficulty which will correct itself, and the transmission of news will become a science.

The name which will be always associated with this historical event is that of the man who has so patiently and unweariedly persisted in the project, Cyrus W. Field. With an undaunted cheerfulness, which often seemed exasperating and unreasonable and fanatical, he has steadily and zealously persevered, no more dismayed or baffled by apparent failure than a good ship by a head wind. We remember meeting him one pleasant day during the last spring in the street by the Astor House in New York. He said that he was going out to England by the next steamer.

"And how many times have you crossed the ocean?"

"Oh," he replied, with the fresh enthusiasm of a boy going home for vacation, "this will be the twenty-second voyage I have made upon this business." And his eyes twinkled as we merrily said good-by. We heard of him no more until we saw his name signed to the dispatch announcing the triumph of his blithe faith and long labor.

A PARAGRAPH in the papers announces that Dr. Stone of Washington has been commissioned to make a marble statue of Alexander Hamilton, to be placed in the Capitol. Of the merits of Dr. Stone as a sculptor we are wholly ignorant. Indeed we do not remember to have seen his name before. Nor does it appear who has commissioned him. But there can be no doubt that it is a work worthy to be done. There is a statue of Hamilton in Boston, carved by Dr. Rimmer, in Quincy granite, by a private order, and admirably placed in Commonwealth Avenue. But Quincy granite can not make an expressive statue, and whatever the skill of the sculptor may be, the effect of the sculpture is not satisfactory. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Dr. Stone is an accomplished artist, for as the work is worth doing it is worth doing well.

Indeed, if the money that has been spent upon Persico's performances and upon sundry pictures—let us name, not invidiously, Mr. Powell's De Soto—had been devoted to a series of simple statues of the great fathers of the Union, placed either within the Capitol or upon the spacious terraces around it, we could contemplate the national expenditure for works of art with more satisfaction than is now possible. Among the chief of these fathers would stand Alexander Hamilton—a man who has been ardently idolized and reviled, but whose truly appreciative life has never yet been written. During the late war an Englishman, by the name of Riethmuller, published a brief biography, very much made up from Mr. George Ticknor Curtis's History of the Constitution, in which the amiable author, who was of the Spence school among his countrymen in his view of our politics, zealously attempted to show that we were in a trouble which Hamilton had foreseen, and for which he had declared there was no remedy. It was a new thing to find Alexander Hamilton quoted as justifying a war for State sovereignty in the Union; but it appeared that the author's view was that the trouble sprang from the very defects which Hamilton tried vainly to remedy; but having vainly tried, and the defects being left in the instrument, there was no remedy. It was a very great pity, but the only Constitutional fate for the United States was total ruin.

The book was evidently written for the purpose of setting forth this pleasing truth, and the biography was incidental. It was not republished in this country, although one house, at least, announced it; and the loss is not great, for although it was a clear and fluent narration, it was merely an easy compilation, and of no value as an appreciation of the character and power of Hamilton, or of his relation to the events of which he was so conspicuous and illustrious a part. The Honorable Fernando Wood, also, when he was Mayor of New York—a position to which that honest patriot was invited by many of the most "Conservative" gentlemen in Wall Street and elsewhere in the city—went to Richmond, in Virginia, and delivered a discourse upon Hamilton. It was reproduced in the papers, and so the world is not deprived of Thersites's portrait of Achilles. The work of John C. Hamilton is valuable as a collection of Hamilton's writings, but the proper, just biography is still wanting.

Alexander Hamilton was undoubtedly the mastermind of his time in our history; and although the Constitution was not what he would have made it, no man more sincerely accepted it as the best thing attainable, infinitely better than the old Confederation, and nobody labored more zealously and successfully than he for its adoption. Undoubtedly he believed its defects were serious, if not fatal; but unquestionably he anticipated that the Union would so vindicate itself that amendment and improvement would be gladly and peacefully made. He said to Josiah Quincy, in 1802, that he thought the Union as it was might endure thirty years. But he could not foresee, as no man could, a development and a discovery; the development of nationality, and the invention of the cotton-gin. It was the consequences of this development and this invention which produced the war; and the tendency which has saved the Union, and which will modify the Constitution, is that which he always favored.

Hamilton was no less faithful to human rights than Jefferson. In the great debate which immediately preceded the Revolution he was too young to take a very conspicuous part. Yet in his earliest writings there is the most glowing and eloquent assertion of the rights, written "as with a sunbeam" upon the soul of man. He loved the English precedents rather than the French, because he believed progressive liberty was surer under Anglo-Saxon than under Celtic guidance. Much of the general popular impression of Hamilton is derived from those who bitterly opposed him, who were his political and party enemies; and no man should presume that he knows what Hamilton was until he has faithfully studied what he wrote, and has carefully considered his public career.

A noble statue of him in the Capitol of the Union of which he laid the corner-stone would be a truly national ornament and inspiration.

A FOREIGN correspondent says that Jenny Lind was lately hissed at a concert because her voice was so much gone. If it were a Parisian audience the story may be true, because Jenny Lind always treated Paris with disdain, and Paris retorted by calling her a pretty ventriloquial singer. But if it were an English audience we should be very slow to believe the report, for Jenny Lind always commanded so much respect as a woman as well as admiration for her wonderful artistic power, and she was so peculiarly honored in England, that it would be the basest ingratitude and indecency to insult her in the way described. It is the more unlikely to be true of England, also, because when Grisi sang in Loudon during the spring, she was informed by expressive silence only that her spell was powerless. If it were not for the cruel streak in the Anglo-Saxon, the old Bersekir who sometimes shows himself, we should think it impossible that Jenny Lind could be hissed any where in England because she did not sing with the same voice as formerly.

Yet it is very hard for any actor or singer who has once drained to the bottom the foaming cup of enthusiastic popular applause to relinquish its hold. They are like women who have been belles and who can not abdicate, or buckish youth who can not consent to become older and to dress more soberly. We have seen a woman who at the age of seventy still wore a low-necked dress and bared her arms to the shoulder. We know a gentleman of the days of George the Fourth and of John Quincy Adams's Presidency who still wears the costume of that period. He was a buck then; he is a Guy now. But if we look kindly upon such fond tenacity, how much more generously and regretfully should we regard the reluctance of a great artist who has seen the delighted world at his feet, to believe that his power is gone and his spell outworn.

Of course we must not expect of the public refinement of courtesy and feeling. We, for instance, who remember Pasta in her prime, or the young Grisi, or Malibran—we old gentlemen and ladies who stepped stately quadrilles before ever waltzes were, forty and fifty years ago, must remember that the audience of to-day, like the dancers of the German, are of another generation. They do not see with our eyes nor feel with our hearts. When Pasta sings, it is not the magnificent lyrical queen whom they see and hear with their memory who is before them, but an old lady with a cracked voice.

Yet for her traditional glory they will silently tolerate what they can not applaud. Fifteen years ago Pasta sang for the last time. It was in London, at a morning concert at "Her Majesty's" Opera House. The Easy Chair stood in a corner and looked on. It was a very painful spectacle, except that the old habit of command and the noble method still remained. It was impossible to applaud, but the silence was full of respectful sympathy. The old spinet which Handel played upon would be a very doleful thing to hear, but who could laugh at it?

So in Paris the Easy Chair heard Duprez. His voice also was gone; but he, too, could not believe that he had lost his power. He sang at the Grand Opera, the scene of his old, nightly triumphs. The throng was immense. His reception was enthusiastic, for the audience honored in him the exquisite skill and the touching grace of "a day that is fled." Had he passed across the stage silently bowing, he might have had some thrill of the old feeling. But he tried to sing and he could not. His voice broke. It was thin and sharp and false. Sometimes no sound would be heard, and then suddenly a single clear sweet note rose out of the ruin, and charmed every heart. The next moment all was chaos again. There could be no enthusiasm, no affectation of pleasure, and the curtain came down, chilly, upon an uncomfortable audience, and upon an artist stung to the heart with mortification and shame. The army will applaud to frenzy the superannuated General as he rides along the line clad in the remembered glory of great deeds. But if he assay to conduct the battle, the enemy will ask no other favor.

Surely for a singer the silence, and, if necessary, the smallness of the audience will be enough. Hissing is an insult to every one who has truly honored the artist. Grisi sang but one evening in the spring—and no one would feel so deeply as Jenny Lind herself the failure of her voice. If she has been hissed in Paris, which did not hiss Duprez, it was because of the old resentment at her refusal to sing in Paris in her prime. If she has been hissed in England it was a disgrace to the people.

THAT the cholera has not stricken the country with panic is mainly due to the thorough discussion of the subject and the ample preparation that was every where made. Yet the resistance of various kinds offered to the operations of the New York Board of Health has been a mortifying illustration of the want of a truly generous public spirit. Instead of aiding in every way the strenuous and essential efforts of the Board they have been opposed by protests, injunctions, and slanders, as if they were a despotism aiming at oppression and injustice. "The public is an ass, my son," said a sententious old philosopher; "but don't treat it as such, or it will kick you."

The gentlemen of the Commission, however, who have so faithfully and efficiently labored to save the city, and so far the country, from pestilence, have the immense satisfaction of knowing that, in spite of every kind of jealousy and hostility, they have had the sympathy of all sensible men. Unfortunately, however, sensible men have not the authority to enjoin injunctions, and their sympathy has, therefore, not been so practically serviceable as was desirable. But the fact seems to be established, that it is possible to keep the city of New York tolerably clean, and no Commission has existed in vain which has proved that.

We saw lately in the Round Table a vigorous and humorous assault upon the insolent ill-manners of the attendants at railroad stations and in the cars. The picture of official discourtesy was very vividly but upon the whole not falsely drawn; for although the pleasant exceptions arise in the memory of every frequent traveler in the cars, the surly style of railroad manners is unquestionably the type. The critic of the Round Table is, however, a terrible fellow. He is for unsparing measures. He will have the heroic treatment. When the laws of behavior are violated in a car the passengers are then and there to restore the majesty of law by the most summary processes. We are afraid that public opinion will still lag behind this commendable alacrity. The American is an easy-to-be-imposed-upon citizen of the world. Every day confirms the wisdom of the sage who had had much experience of travel and of mankind, and who said after observation of life upon Broadway, "What a pusillanimous people! Nobody dares to complain of the thirteenth man in the omnibus!"

But how John Bull would complain! How "Aristides" and "Viator" and "Cato" would thunder in the Times if the sacred right of one undivided twelfth part of one omnibus seat were unlawfully infringed! Let us honor him for it! The service of John Bull to travel is immense. He has carried the tea-pot to the ends of the earth. He has established washbowls, sheets, and blankets in the most German of remote villages. He is the great non-conformist of travel. British toast, British eggs, and British tea, if he dies for it! Thanks to him, it has dawned upon the Italian and French mind that people sometimes want to wash themselves, and don't always want to have their food smothered in garlic. The picturesque tourist has often forgiven the clumping Englishman, with the insolent round eye-glass imbedded in his rosy moon of a face, staring and stammering and stumbling through the scenes most sacred to sentiment—St. Peter's at twilight, for instance, or the Fountain of Egeria in a tender sunset—when he reflected that this round-faced starrer and stuttrer was the queer good genius who had secured for mankind upon its travels so much solid comfort in lands whose language could not express the idea.

Since John is the apostle of comfort, how pleasant it would be if Jonathan would only be the apostle of courtesy! But he has certainly not yet entered upon that mission. It is a melancholy fact that, if the manners of the ticket-agent and the baggage-porter and the conductor and the other personnel of a railroad are distressing to the sensitive soul, so the manners of the passengers to whom these agents minister are also far from the ideal. Upon both sides it appears that there is degeneracy. If the jovial coachman is no more, the polite passenger has disappeared. "Origen," a philosopher of experience and of venerable years, writes the Easy Chair upon this very point, and he wings his delicate darts at the breasts of the baser sex. The Round Table tells us of the enormities of conduct in the officers of a railroad. Listen, then, to the experience of "Origen" concerning those of the male passengers.

"Good manners in the men are, I may say, too often the exception rather than the rule. Invariably they monopolize the best seats in the cars, those particularly on the shady side and near the middle of the car, which are the easiest to ride in. The moment the car doors are opened men, unattended by ladies, rush to these seats, and leave to the weaker sex either none at all or those which are the least comfortable. They plant themselves at the window side of each seat, and there they remain immovable, compelling ladies to sit where they are separated from their husbands or children or the friends who are with them, in seats where there is no support for the weary head, or access to fresh air, so much more important to ladies than to men, and often by the side of a man so besotted with alcohol and tobacco as to be disgustingly offensive." Here is a Dutch interior, in style. But our Teniers is sketching American boors. "Origen" proceeds to speak of the decay of public good manners.

"I traveled much before railroads were introduced. Invariably during the period of post-coaches it was the custom—and a very proper and commendable custom it was—to allow ladies to be first seated and to choose their seats; and such is now the custom where post-coaches are used." This custom, he contends, warming with the genial theme, "has conferred upon women the absolute right to seats in preference to men when there are not enough to accommodate all. A custom so obviously proper and just, so long established and so universal, in the absence of any express enactment to the contrary, is Law." He then speaks of the late case in Buffalo, where a conductor was fined five hundred dollars for ejecting a man from the car because he refused to give up his seat to a woman. Has this case fallen under the observation of the Cato of the Round Table? "Origen" contends that such a decision was a disgrace to American jurisprudence. "The conductor," he asseverates, "would not have done his duty to the railway company and the public had he not compelled the fellow—I can not call him a man—to relinquish his seat to a lady." The ejection, he grants, may be a doubtful point; but the reasonable assumption is, that, as he refused to give his seat to a lady, he was in no fit condition to be tolerated in the car.

Here seems to be the dawn of a beneficent compromise, a luxury for which the American is thought to have a peculiar relish. If, as the Round Table exhorts, the passengers are to teach the conductors manners, and the conductors are to teach the same to the passengers, why not appoint in every car some "through" passenger to be Arbiter elegantiarum, who shall point out the polite path both to passengers and conductors in every disputed point?

Every sensible traveler must be glad that the subject of railroad manners is exciting so lively an attention. Let us all bravely persevere, and we may soon reach the millennium, in which men will not cling to their seats under all circumstances, like saints in peril cleaving to moral principle, and women will acknowledge with a smile and word, which incalculably compensate, the courtesy which offers them a seat.

THE wonderful events of the time upon the peninsula give a remarkable historic value to a most delightful work by William D. Howells which is just published under the title of "Venetian Life." Mr. Howells went as United States Consul to Venice half a dozen years since, and lived there for two or three years, and he did not lose his opportunities. After seeing and hearing and studying, as it were saturating his mind and imagination with Venice, he has given us the most vivid, accurate, and poetic description of life in Venice that we recall. To one familiar with the city Beckford's few touches are more satisfactory than the detailed accounts of more stolid and prosy observers, but in Mr. Howells's book, while no local charm or characteristic spell of romance is wanting, the daily movement and habit of the place are photographed with pathetic fidelity. No one who is not somewhat familiar with the city and its life can tell with what extraordinary skill its peculiarly forlorn and unique character is imparted to the reader by this book.

Indeed, its information is so copious under the gayest and most graceful air of loitering observation, that it is sure to become a gondola companion. The lover of the strange old city will repay the debt he owes her for enriching his life and imagination by enabling her beauty to be more wisely seen and her character more truly appreciated. He can not indeed, for his book is truthful, paint the Venetian as honest, earnest, and industrious; but he describes his indolence and frailty so sagaciously, he discriminates between the north and northwest aspect of falsehood so dextrously, that, despite the author's modesty and doubt, we can see a Venetian studying the book like a looking-glass and smilingly confessing the amusing veracity.

Like every competent observer of Venice Mr. Howells is a man of poetic imagination, mingled with perfect good sense. His admiring appreciation, therefore, does not become tiresome with rhetorical raptures, but a delicate and airy humor keeps every thing in its place. It is so easy to be extravagant and sentimental about Venice, and to blur your picture by the washes meant to soften it, that Mr. Howells's truthful touch, which leaves the charm natural and unexaggerated, is all the more admirable. It is, however, the life of Venice which he describes, and the pictures, the monuments, and the history are all subordinate in his treatment to the main object; and whether it is that the aspect of the subject which he selects has been usually omitted, or that his fresh and original observation invests an old theme with the fascination of novelty, the impression is that of an entirely unhackneyed topic. Most English and American tourists go to Venice with Childe Harold and Rogers's Italy in their minds and hands, and are pleased in the degree that what they see confirms the conception they bring. But Lord Byron is neither a hero nor a historian to Mr. Howells, and he very quietly tells the truth about the Bridge of Sighs and the Piombi, without, however, the least intimation that, because the tyranny of the Republic may have been misrepresented, the old times of Venice were a little heaven below.

The book, indeed, although, as we said, gay and graceful in form, leaves the reader with two very grave thoughts; that the present paralysis of Venice is in great part the result of Austrian rule, and that a population so long dead to noble aims, and unused to self-respect and energetic industry, will not be regenerated by the mere fact of regaining an acknowledged Italian nationality. Yet this is somewhat relieved by what we learn from our author of the political and social ascendancy of the intelligent professional class, to which Daniel Manin belonged, and which must furnish the leadership of the national union movement. It may console those who are disposed to despond of our own condition to compare the difficulties of Italy, as of every other country in the world, with ours, Ci vuol pazienza!—Patience, patience! It is a contest of tendencies every where; but he ought never to have lived to this time who does not see the day breaking all around the horizon.

OUR Record closes on the 1st of September. It embraces some important political movements at home, and the conclusion of the European war, which has in a measure remodeled the map of Europe.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

The "National Union Convention" met at Philadelphia on the 14th of August. This Convention has special importance from its being the formal inauguration of a party to sustain the policy of the President, in opposition to that of the majority in Congress. Delegates were present from every State and Territory. General John A. Dix of New York, was appointed temporary Chairman, and delivered a brief speech, the purport of which was that we were not now living under the Government ordained by the Constitution, because ten out of thirty-six States were not represented in Congress. The President, not acting under any Constitutional power, had proposed conditions for the admission of the revolting States to the exercise of their functions as members of the Union. These conditions had been complied with; and the exaction of new conditions as proposed by Congress was "unjust, and a violation of the faith of the Government." The amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress could never receive the sanction of three-fourths of the States, and "to insist on the conditions they contain is to prolong indefinitely the exclusion of more than one-fourth of the States from their right to be represented in the Legislative bodies." The President had done all in his power to correct this wrong, and General Dix hoped that the Convention would confine its action to this point.—From several States more than one set of delegates were sent, and some difficulty was apprehended in settling their conflicting claims. Moreover the previous course of several of the elected delegates had been such as to render them obnoxious to the great body of the Convention. Prominent among these were Fernando Wood of New York, and Clement C. Vallandigham of Ohio. These, however, declined to present their credentials, and the Convention was organized without difficulty. The delegations from Massachusetts and South Carolina, headed by General Couch and Governor Orr, entered the hall arm in arm. The Convention was formally organized by appointing Hon. J. R. Doolittle, Senator from Wisconsin, as permanent Chairman. He made a brief speech, endorsing all that had been said by General Dix. Apart from these, there was no speech-making in the Convention, its action being embodied in a series of ten resolutions, forming a "Declaration of Principles and Purposes," and in an "Address to the People of the United States," submitted by a Committee, of which Senator Cowan of Pennsylvania was Chairman. Both were, however, drawn up by Hon. Henry J. Raymond of New York, editor of the Daily Times. The following, much abridged, is the Declaration of Principles:

I. We hail the end of the war and the return of peace.

II. The war has maintained the authority of the Constitution unabridged and unaltered, and has "preserved the Union with the equal rights, dignity, and authority of the States perfect and unimpaired."

III. Representation in Congress and in the Electoral College is fundamental and essential to the existence of our republican institutions; "and neither Congress nor the General Government has any authority or power to deny this right to any State, or withhold its enjoyment under the Constitution to the people thereof."

IV. The people of the United States are called upon to elect to Congress "none but men who admit this fundamental right of representation, and who will receive to seats therein loyal representatives from every State in allegiance to the Union," subject to the right of each House to judge of the qualifications of its own members.

V. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and among the rights by it reserved to each of the States is that "to prescribe qualifications for the elective franchise therein, with which right Congress can not interfere. No State or combination of States has the right to withdraw from the Union, or to exclude, through their action in Congress or otherwise, any other State or States from the Union. The Union of these States is perpetual, and the authority of its Government is supreme within the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution."

VI. Amendments to the Constitution may be made only in the mode prescribed by the Constitution; "and in proposing such amendments, whether by Congress or a Convention, and in ratifying the same, all the States of the Union have an equal and an infeasible right to a voice and vote thereon."

VII. Slavery is abolished and prohibited, and there is nowhere any desire or purpose to re-establish it; "and the enfranchised slaves in all the States of the Union should receive, in common with all their inhabitants, equal protection in every right of person and property."

VIII. All obligations incurred in making war against the Union are wholly invalid; and the National Debt is sacred and inviolable.

IX. It is the duty of the National Government to meet promptly all its obligations to Federal soldiers and sailors, and to extend generous and considerate care to those who have survived, and to the widows and orphans of those who have fallen.

X. Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States, "has proved steadfast in his devotion to the Constitution, the laws, and the interests of his country," and in him the Convention "recognizes a Chief Magistrate worthy of the nation, and equal to the great crisis upon which his lot is cast; and we tender to him in the discharge of his high and responsible duties our profound respect, and assurances of our cordial and sincere support."

The "Address" is an elaborate argument in favor of the "Principles" above set forth. Speaking of the policy pursued by Congress, the following language is used:

"No people has ever yet existed whose loyalty and faith such treatment long continued would not alienate and impair. And the ten millions of Americans who live in the South would be unworthy citizens of a free country, degenerate sons of an heroic ancestry, unfit ever to become guardians of the rights and liberties bequeathed to us by the fathers and founders of this Republic, if they could accept, with uncomplaining submissiveness, the humiliations thus sought to be imposed upon them. Resentment of injustice is always and every where essential to freedom; and the spirit which prompts the States and people lately in insurrection, but insurgent now no longer, to protest against the imposition of unjust and degrading conditions, makes them all the more worthy to share in the government of a free commonwealth, and gives still firmer assurance of the future power and freedom of the Republic."

The present position of the people of the Southern States is thus described:

"They accept, if not with alacrity, certainly without sullen resentment, the defeat and overthrow they have sustained. They acknowledge and acquiesce in the results, to themselves and the country, which that defeat involves. They no longer claim for any State the right to secede from the Union; they no longer assert for any State an allegiance paramount to that which is due to the General Government. They have accepted the destruction of Slavery, abolished it by their State Constitutions, and concurred with the States and people of the whole Union in prohibiting its existence forever upon the soil or within the jurisdiction of the United States. They indicate and evince their purpose, just so fast as may be possible and safe, to adapt their domestic laws to the changed condition of their society, and to secure by the law and its tribunals equal and impartial justice to all classes of their inhabitants. They admit the invalidity of all acts of resistance to the national authority, and of all debts incurred in attempting its overthrow. They avow their willingness to share the burdens and discharge all the duties and obligations which rest upon them, in common with other States and other sections of the Union; and they renew, through their representatives in this Convention, by all their public conduct, in every way and by the most solemn acts by which States and Societies can pledge their faith, their engagement to bear true faith and allegiance, through all time to come, to the Constitution of the United States, and to all laws that may be made in pursuance thereof."

The practical action recommended by the Convention is this:

"We call upon you in every Congressional district of every State, to secure the election of members, who, whatever other differences may characterize their political action, will unite in recognizing the right of every State of the Union to representation in Congress, and who will admit to seats in either branch every loyal Representative from every State in allegiance to the Government, who may be found by each House, in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, to have been duly elected, returned, and qualified for a seat therein."

Several speeches were made, not in the Convention, by Southern delegates to that body. The most notable was by Governor Orr, of South Carolina, before the Johnson Club. He said, as reported:

"He and his audience had been brought up in widely different political schools. He had been taught that the States were supreme: they that the General Government was supreme. His section had demanded its supposed privileges; the North had denied them. The South claimed the right of secession; the North denied the existence of any such right. The South seceded, and with the North appealed to arms, and finally both sections threw down the gauntlet to settle their dispute upon the field of battle. The war ended in the defeat of the South. The South had appealed to arms—the last and highest earthly resort—and the decision had been against them—a decision far more complete and final than any which could come from the highest judicial tribunal. The question of the right of secession had been settled completely and forever, and the results of the war had decided that the General Government was supreme. In this decision the Southern people, and he among them, acquiesced in all sincerity; and he came here on this the first opportunity to say it to a Northern audience—to declare that the South renounced the right of secession, and accepted in good faith its allegiance to the General Government.... And I, a participant in this rebellion, come here to-night to say that I renounce the right of secession, the right of an appeal to arms, and acknowledge the supremacy over me of the Government of this Union. And the South, too, now that it was once more a part of our common country, had an interest in the national debt. That debt was created by the war, but it was created by his country as well as by the country of those whom he addressed. He, as a citizen of the Union, had an interest in its payment equal to that of other citizens, and he could say, on behalf of the Southern people, that on their part there was no intention to repudiate. They recognized it in all its force, and nothing was further from their intention than to repudiate the debt of their common country.... The South is a part of the country, and should have its just share in Congress; yet their representatives had been for eight long months knocking at the door of Congress, and, by the ruling of that power, had been refused admittance. He asked that privilege for none but loyal men, but contended that loyal men should have it. Those Representatives do not profess loyalty merely to obtain admittance, so that afterward they can throw off the mask and endeavor to imperil or overthrow the Government. They do not ask admission merely to create discord. They come and knock, and ask it in order, in all sincerity, to aid the legislation for their common country, to enjoy that right the Constitution grants them, and to help to make laws for a Union they love equally with the people of the North."

RESTORATION OF TEXAS.

Texas has been for many months the only State governed by military authority or by a Provisional Governor. This State was specially excepted in the President's proclamation of April 2, 1866, declaring that armed resistance to the Government had ceased, and that the authority of the Union was restored. This exception was annulled by a proclamation bearing date August 20, 1866. After reciting the several acts of the Government bearing upon the case, the proclamation concludes by declaring that "the insurrection which heretofore existed in the State of Texas is at an end, and is to be henceforth so regarded;" and that "peace, order, tranquillity, and civil authority now exist in and throughout the whole of the United States of America." Previous to the issue of this proclamation an election had been held in Texas at which J. W. Throckmorton was chosen Governor by a very large majority. The inaugural address of the Governor was delivered on the 9th of August. He had been opposed to the secession of the Southern States, and had in the Convention of Texas voted against it. But, he says, "while I regarded secession as impolitic and ruinous, I looked with scarcely less dread upon that doctrine which asserted an undefined and unlimited power in the General Government to use its military force against the States of the Union. When the appeal to arms was made, however, I pursued what seemed to me the path of duty. I followed the majority of my fellow-citizens, and shared with them the fate of the conflict." He says that "the President has extended to the people of the South liberal terms of restoration;" that he believes the great mass of the Northern people wish to see the South restored to all the benefits of the Government; and that it will be the chiefest of his duties to "inculcate among our own people the necessity of so demeaning themselves that the breath of suspicion shall not sully their reputation for fidelity to the Government, and in this regard shall labor to remove any erroneous impressions that may have been made as to a want of good faith and sincerity on the part of the people of the State."—On the 11th of August the President notified Mr. Hamilton, the Provisional Governor of Texas, that the time had come to remit the Government of the State to the authorities chosen by the people thereof, and informed Governor Throckmorton that the Provisional Governor had been relieved, and that the authority of the Government was placed in the hands of the elected Governor. This dispatch closed with the assurance that the co-operation of the Government of the United States would be tendered whenever it might be necessary to effect the permanent welfare of Texas. Governor Throckmorton in response "assures the President of the appreciation entertained by the people of Texas of the just policy, and hopes to convince the most skeptical of the fidelity of the people to the General Government."

GENERAL GRANGER'S REPORT.

General Gordon Granger, having been in May sent on a specific mission to the South, was also directed "to examine carefully into the disposition of the people of the Southern States, through which he might pass, toward the Government of the United States." He reports that he found no symptom of organized disloyalty to the General Government; that Northern people who came to the South to develop the resources of the wasted country were welcomed; that he heard rumors of secret organizations for the renewal of the rebellion, but upon investigation he could discover in them nothing but charitable institutions, chiefly for the relief of the widows and orphans of Confederate soldiers. He says that the people of the South may be divided into two classes: (1.) The industrious class, who are laboring to build up what has been broken down, and mainly occupied in providing food and clothing for themselves and their families. This class forms the great majority. (2.) An utterly irresponsible class, composed of the young men who were the "bucks" of Southern society before the war, those who remain being the disturbing element in the community, and doing much mischief; but they are an insignificant minority, and are "actuated not so much by a feeling of opposition to the Government as by a reluctance to earn their own livelihood by honest labor and individual exertion." The cases of individual outrage, apart from those committed by this lawless and dangerous class, are, according to General Granger, few and far between, and are no indication of the general condition of Southern society. Wherever lawlessness and turbulence have manifested themselves out of this loose class, it has been owing to some local or specific cause. "Chief among these," he says, are bad government, pillage, and oppression. For five years the Southern people have been the subjects of gross misrule. During the war their government was a military despotism, dependent upon the dictum of a single individual; since the war they have been left in a more or less chaotic state—their government semi-civil, semi-military, or rather a division of rule between the military, the Freedmen's Bureau, and the Provisional Governments." The Report of General Granger speaks severely of the action of the Freedmen's Bureau and of the Treasury Agents of the United States in the South. His general conclusions are: that the people of the South "had universally complied with the conditions granted and accepted at the final surrender of their armies and cause;" and that "what is needed to restore harmony and prosperity to the entire country, both North and South, is closer and better acquaintance with each other." He says: "The broad lands of the fertile South are now lying almost waste for the want of means and capital to cultivate them, when every acre of the beneficent soil might be a gold mine to its possessor, were the political relations of the people better understood and acted upon."

SPEECH OF GENERAL BUTLER

General B. F. Butler made an elaborate speech at Gloucester, Massachusetts, late in August, in opposition to the policy of the President, and especially the admission of Southern Representatives to Congress. He said: "In 1861 the Representatives in Congress of the present eleven insurgent States, aided by some others, left their seats in the Congress of the United States for the purpose of destroying this Government. I am of those who believe that they now desire to return to their seats for the same purpose." When the South was captured the people were "public enemies, captured in war, surrendered by the surrender of the armies which they had raised to uproot the Government of the United States; and when we captured them we captured every thing they had. We captured men and property, their slaves, their rights, constitutional and otherwise. All were conquered." He criticised in severe terms the whole policy of the President, and the principles laid down by the Philadelphia Convention. With respect to the admission of Southern Representatives, he said:

"We see by the tone of the papers that these people are not ready for reconstruction. There is a mass of overwhelming evidence upon the subject. I for one do not believe that any portion of this country is ready to participate in the government of the country until any man of any part of the country has equal rights with every other man. And until that can be done in every portion of the United States, that portion is not ready to be admitted as a portion of the United States. The Southern man, whether arrived at the common age of man or not, knows that he can go to any part of the North and speak his sentiments freely, and I do not want any part of this country represented in Congress until you and I can go and argue the principles of free government without fear of the knife or pistol, or of being murdered by a mob. And when men ask me how long I would keep these men out, I say, Keep them out until the heavens melt with fervent heat, until they will allow free speech and free press throughout their land. And if it should not come in this generation, we will swear our sons to keep them out till they become fit for a republican form of government."

He was equally emphatic in respect to Negro Suffrage:

"The true Democratic principle is equal rights to every man, and there is no such thing as having an exception in favor of or against the negro. Come back to the true principles of justice for all—equal rights for all men. Away with the idea that this is 'a White Man's Government.' It is God's Government. It is made for white men, black men, or gray men—all men, and all men with a perfect equality."

The corner-stone of a monument to Stephen A. Douglas is to be laid at Chicago on the 6th of September. The President, a portion of the Cabinet, General Grant, Admiral Farragut, are to be present at the ceremony. The Presidential party left Washington on the 28th of August, reached New York on 29th, and on the 31st were at Auburn, the residence of Mr. Seward. The President made speeches at several of the principal places on the route; the most elaborate being at a banquet given to him in New York. He defended the general line of policy which he had adopted, the main point being that the Southern States were entitled to be represented in Congress. "I do not wish them," he said, "to come back into the Union a degraded and despised people. If they come back so they would not be fit to be a portion of the great American people. I want them to come back with all their rights and privileges." He animadverted in very severe terms upon the policy pursued by the majority in Congress. General Grant, when he took the field in Virginia, declared that "he would fight it out on that line;" "I was with him," said the President, "and did all I could, and we whipped them on that line. I am now fighting these men on the other end."

FOREIGN.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico the general current of intelligence seems to indicate the approaching downfall of the Imperial Government of Maximilian. The revenues at the utmost are hardly equal to half of the necessary expenses of the state. The mission of the Empress Carlotta to Europe is said to have been a failure, so far as the effort to induce the French Emperor to grant direct pecuniary aid is concerned. It is said, however, that Napoleon consented to postpone, from November until January, the departure of the French troops, and would furnish Maximilian supplies from the French magazines in Mexico, and would give him a French general to command the Mexican forces organized by him.—Maximilian had some time since issued a decree declaring that "the port of Matamoras, and all those of the northern frontier which have withdrawn from their obedience to the Government," were closed to foreign traffic, or, in other words, to be blockaded. On the 17th of August the President of the United States issued a proclamation declaring that this blockade by "the Prince Maximilian, who asserts himself to be the Emperor of Mexico," was null and void, not being maintained by any competent military or naval force; and that, being in violation of the law of nations and of treaties existing between the United States and Mexico, "any attempt which shall be made to enforce the same against the Government or citizens of the United States will be disallowed."—The feeling of the Government of the United States is clearly indicated by what took place at Auburn, New York, on the 31st of August. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, introduced Señor Romero, the "Minister from the United States of Mexico," adding that he hoped "by next November our sister Republic would be delivered from the last vestige of foreign invasion;" and General Grant gave a toast "To the health of Señor Romero, and the cause which he represents."

The war on the Plata appears to have come to a stand-still. The allies, Brazil and the Argentine Republic, having advanced a little beyond the frontiers of Paraguay, find their progress by the river checked by the strong fortifications at Humaita, while the entire absence of roads precludes any further advance by land.

EUROPE.

Our European intelligence, received by mail, comes down to August 18; telegraphic dispatches bring it to August 31. Taking up the thread of the narrative where it was dropped in our last Record, we find that on the 22d of July the remnant of the Austrian army had fallen back close to Vienna, apparently in a condition to make a strong defense of the capital; while the Prussians had followed on so closely that their advance was fairly within sight of the spires of Vienna. On that day a sharp encounter took place near Presburg, a considerable town some 40 miles from Vienna, whither a portion of the Austrian force had retreated, followed by two strong divisions of the Prussians. This action, in which both sides claim the advantage, the Prussians apparently with the more justice, was interrupted by tidings of the armistice agreed upon the day before. This armistice, at first entered upon for only five days, was subsequently extended to await the progress of negotiations, which at length took the form of a definitive treaty of peace. The preliminary stipulations were arranged on the 26th of July, the negotiators being Count Bismarck for Prussia, Count Karolyi and Baron von Brenner for Austria. The full text of the treaty has not yet been published. The preliminary treaty consists of nine articles, which we abridge as follows:

1. The Austrian territory remains intact, with the exception of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. The Prussian forces to be withdrawn from Austria.

2. Austria recognizes the dissolution of the Germanic Confederation, and assents to a new organization, from which Austria is to be excluded. The States to the north of the Main to form a new Union, under the guardianship of Prussia; those south of the Main to form a Union, the relations of which to the southern Union are to be settled hereafter.

3. Austria gives up to Prussia all the rights which she has claimed in respect to the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein; but North Schleswig may be re-united to Denmark, if the people desire.

4. Austria pays to Prussia, by way of indemnity for the expenses of the war, 40,000,000 thalers (about $28,000,000), from which is to be deducted one-half, which the Prussians had already received in various ways.

5. The kingdom of Saxony is to remain as at present; but Saxony is to settle with Prussia as to what she shall pay for war expenses, and as to the place which Saxony is to hold in the new Confederation. Austria to recognize the new Confederation which Prussia will establish in the North, with the territorial modifications consequent thereon.

6. Prussia guarantees that the King of Italy shall agree to the treaty of peace, as soon as Venetia shall be made over to him by the Emperor of France.

7. Ratifications of the treaty to be formally exchanged within two days.

8. When these ratifications have been exchanged, plenipotentiaries to be appointed to arrange the details of the peace.

9. The armistice to be extended, upon their application, to several of the minor States—Württemberg, Baden, and Hesse Darmstadt, "based upon the present military state of possession."

This last article is, perhaps, the most important of all, for upon it is based very important territorial acquisitions gained by Prussia. No mention is made of the kingdom of Hanover, which was wholly in the possession of Prussia, the permanent absorption of which by Prussia seems to have been considered as a settled fact. This kingdom contains a population of nearly 2,000,000. Bavaria will also be required to give to Prussia 1,000,000 of population, and several minor States more, in all 5,000,000. At the opening of the war Prussia had a territory of 109,000 square miles, a little more than that of the States of New York and Virginia, with a population of about 19,000,000. The acquisitions now made are about 42,000 square miles, a little less than the State of Pennsylvania, with a population of about 7,000,000, 26,000,000 in all. The great States of Europe, in respect to population, now rank in round numbers about as follows: Russia, 70,000,000; France, 39,000,000; Austria, 32,000,000; Great Britain, 30,000,000; Prussia, 26,000,000; Italy, 25,000,000; Turkey, 16,000,000; Spain, 16,000,000. But Prussia will practically wield the power of all Germany, excepting the German part of Austria, with a population of fully 35,000,000; and, considering her admirable military system, may be considered fully a match for either France or Russia.—The treaty of peace was formally ratified by Austria and Prussia on the 30th of August. The treaty with Bavaria has been approved by the Bavarian Chambers, where a motion was also made that a close union between Bavaria and Prussia was necessary.

It is said, apparently upon good grounds, that the French Emperor, in view of the great territorial acquisitions made by Prussia, demanded that the French frontiers should be extended to the Rhine; this was peremptorily refused by Prussia, and Napoleon withdrew his demand, stating that it was made only because it was imperiously demanded by the public sentiment of the French people. The French Emperor has made over to the King of Italy the province of Venetia, ceded to him by the Emperor of Austria; and he has formally denied that he had any design to annex to France any portion of the Belgian territory.

The British Parliament was prorogued on the 10th of August. The Queen's speech touched upon the Continental war. It was, she said, a contest in which neither the honor of the crown nor the interests of her subjects demanded any active intervention. Her Majesty gracefully recognized the friendly action of the Government of the United States in the late Fenian irruption into Canada, and said that the suspension of the habeas corpus act in Ireland must continue for the present.

Editor's Drawer.

COLONEL B— was of the genus "Mohawk Dutchman." He was a wealthy farmer, who lived in S—, in the central part of the State of New York, and who loved his rye and his gelt "like never vas." He came into the store where my friend was book-keeper, and having called for him, began to converse on the state of the country and the crops, occasionally asking the use of certain agricultural implements the like of which he had never before seen. Of a sudden he stopped his talk, turned his back, to my friend, and looked with drunken amazement toward a "meat-safe," whose appearance evidently struck him with great astonishment. Steadying himself as best he could, he slowly lowered to his hands and knees, then looking up from the bottom he scrutinized the "safe" in every part. Evidently failing in his purpose, he raised himself carefully by holding on to the counter, and turning to the book-keeper, who could scarcely "contain himself," he asked: "Where in [hie!] do the bees get in?"

MAJOR B— and Mr. H— went fishing in a boat together. Mr. H— having but poor luck, left the Major, and taking another boat rowed off several rods, and some time after was observed to rise in the boat, beat the air wildly with his hands, and fall backward into the lake. His body was at length recovered, and his funeral was attended by a large and sympathizing group of neighbors and friends. Mrs. H— was relating the circumstances of his last appearance to "Aunt Polly," a tea-loving matron of the village, who listened with extended mouth to the story. "Do tell!" she exclaimed, as the narrator closed; "how terrible! But, tell me, Mrs. H—, did he catch any fish?"

THE late Judge B—, of Vermont, had a good horse. One day C— came to his office with a very fine-looking horse. C—'s horse had the heaves, but did not show it, on account of being "out to grass." Judge B—, admired C—'s horse, and finally exchanged with C—, giving him a large sum to boot. Judge B— soon discovered the horse was worthless, and sued C— for damages before Justice W—. C— appeared and defended his own case before the Justice. The Justice gave the case to Judge B—, with a small sum in damages. C— paid up, and then turned to the Justice, in the presence of Judge B— and his neighbors attending court, and said:

"I honor your decision."

"How is that? I have decided the case against you."

"I know that," said C—; "but after paying your judgment I have now cheated Judge B— more than one hundred dollars!"

DEAR DRAWER,—There is probably no class of men in existence who are made the butts of more ridicule than country editors. Our village boasts of several geniuses of this persuasion, and among them is one possessing more brilliancy than generally falls to the lot of these unfortunate individuals. Billy L— is known throughout his section as one of the most important (in his own estimation) of men in the county; and being publisher and financial agent of the only Democratic paper in the place, is, of course, entitled to wear the honors which are lavishly heaped upon him. Billy is not as familiar with the English language as was Noah Webster, and knows nothing of French. One day during the late war he picked up a daily paper, and, glancing over the telegraphic dispatches, happened to notice the arrival of Hooker's corps at Nashville. A look of surprise overspread his features, and remarking to a by-stander that Joe Hooker was dead, read as follows: "General Joe Hooker's corps(e) passed through Nashville yesterday." The person to whom he read the dispatch doubted the fact, and requested to see the paper. Y^e editor raised it to his friend's eyes, and said, with a knowing look, "There it is: 'General Joe Hooker's [spelling out the word and pointing to it with his finger] c-o-r-p-s —(corpse) passed through Nashville yesterday!'" Those around smiled slightly, but said nothing to dispel the illusion; and to this day Billy L— believes that Hooker's corpse passed through Nashville, and is now "mouldering in the ground."

OPENING the "Dear Drawer" in the month of July just past, a "good thing from over the water" reminded me of a similar occurrence this side.

Several years since, having just installed ourselves in a new boarding-house, I had occasion to call upon the chamber-maid (who officiated as waitress also) for some nut-crackers, never thinking it possible that she would not know that I wished to crack nuts. She returned soon to my room with a plate of small crackers! saying, "We has none unless these 'll do!" I gravely explained what I wished for, and did not laugh until she was quite out of hearing.

BUT longer ago than that, when I was a very small girl, living in the country, a recently-imported Irish girl, seeing a huge black snake that my brother brought home as the result of an afternoon's gunning, exclaimed, starting back in horror from it: "Indade, Masther William, did ye shoot the ugly baste a-flying?"

FROM Nashville, Tennessee, an old soldier sends the two following:

When the army was at Tampa Bay, Florida, much drunkenness existed. Scarcely a day passed without fifty or sixty men being brought in from the numerous grog-shops around in all stages of intoxication, from a little high to dead drunk. The usual remedy to sober them was a pint of salt and water, administered internally, a quantity of it being kept mixed for the purpose in a bucket. It was a severe remedy, but never failed in a single case. One day an Irishman was brought in and reported to the officer of the guard as uproariously drunk.

"The usual dose, Sergeant!" said the officer, and Pat was handed a tin cup of the universal remedy.

"Drink!" said the Sergeant, going through the motion.

"What! wather?" said Pat, gazing contemptuously into the cup.

"And salt," said the Sergeant, grinning.

"Salt and wather! did mortal man iver hear of such a thing on illigant whisky? Here! take the cup, man—I'll not do it!"

We stumbled on a while through the mud, and finally Ceph shouted to us that he had found a nest of the ferocious beasts. The guards were plenty, and the great object was to hit the hog on the head a sure blow, so that it would not squeal, and thus betray us. As I have said, it was awful dark, and cautiously Ceph proceeded to do his work. Thinking he had the matter all right he aimed a huge blow, and down went the axe with all the vigor that a strong arm could give it. Much to our dismay the hog squealed, and we found out that Ceph had hit him on the wrong end!

DEAR DRAWER,—There was a little spontaneous incident, or accident, last night that I think would not disgrace you.

A party of us were discussing the "state of the country" in very animated style, when one of the speakers by a magnificent gesture plumped an attentive listener square on the nose, which strike was promptly responded to by a cry of Murder! We "dropped" the country and "picked up" the offender, and instantly arraigned him on a charge of murder in the first degree. Two were selected to plead the case pro and con; L— for the country, and G— for defendant. We certainly should have hung him à-la-mode moot; but G—, in his exordium, so overcame our prejudice that—but here it is, with the result:

"Gentlemen of the Jury—Conceit is not faith. And though the one may level the mountain with the plain, the other will not raise the plain to a mountain. The craving for exaggeration has become so great that, in order to view an elephant, you must look at it through a magnifying-glass. Gentlemen, the only way to get a correct idea of the real magnitude of any object is to look at it with the naked eye, and I would have you look at the case you are trying through the naked eyes of truth, and not through the exaggerating eyes of imagination and buncomb. Gentlemen, I have seen a silk bag that was carried in a basket suddenly grow as big as a house when filled with gas; and this simple case of passion has been blown to a profundity of crime which would shame a Borgia. . . . Gentlemen, I think I see you giving assent to the fact that the case is not murder but passion. And what is the law for the punishment of passion? Not hanging! No, gentlemen! The majestic justice of the law awards the punishment for passion to be a fine of a supper for six, and the culprit to be ducked three times under any town pump! Gentlemen, my client submits to law and justice."

CLIENT. "No, no; I—!"

Half an hour after a young man might have been seen slinking up Tenth Street appearing to have been out in all last Saturday night's storm.

Nor a hundred miles from Utica, New York, lives one Jim T—, who loves a joke about as well as he does "old rye," and is always getting one off. Right opposite Dr. B—'s there is a mud-hole, which has remained in the same state since my earliest recollections. The other evening, among a group of the citizens collected on the steps of Eugene R—'s store, was Jim T—, all engaged in discussing the weather, crops, etc., when along came the Doctor's son, driving his old nag, and without trying to avoid the mud-hole, drove through the middle of it. George H— spoke up, and wanted to know "if that hole would ever get filled?" "Yes," replied Jim, at the same time ejecting a copious supply of the extract of tobacco, "next winter, when it snows!"

A WESTERN friend sends the following:

We have in our town a good-hearted and well-meaning man, who sometimes, in endeavoring to be profound, "gets off" some very queer sayings. Among other good qualities he has an implicit confidence in Providence, which he once qualified in this way. He had just returned from a long and tedious ride on a wet and cold winter's day. Sitting down by the fire and warming himself, he remarked to a friend: "Peter, I really believe if it had not been for the blessing of a kind Providence and these thick pants I would have caught my death of cold!"

At another time, when looking at the refraction of light through a prism, he produced the following sage remark: "I do not see why these beautiful colors could not be extracted from the light, and used for painting and dyeing!"

In September, 1860, the electors for Tennessee were addressing a mass meeting at Nashville in favor of the Presidential candidates. Governor Neill S. Brown delivered one of his most flowery speeches. Colonel P— was next called. He stepped upon the platform, raised his hands to an angle of forty-five degrees, and said: "Now, gentlemen, I will show you my position on this great national question." And taking a step back, seemingly to get room to spread himself, he went over flat on the ground! Shouting is no name for the applause.

A NEGRO came to Green Bay, Wisconsin, to keep a barber's shop. Soon after he opened a Western speculator presented himself to be shaved. His charge was asked; the barber said 25 cents. The customer named several cities he had been shaved at, and all for less money. The negro straightened himself up, and said: "Do you suppose I am going to leave good society in the East and come here among you backwoodsmen to shave men for ten cents?"

LONG and Lynch kept a law-office in Salt Lake City, and over their door had their names on a large canvas sign, and underneath, "Attorneys at Law." They dissolved partnership, and Lynch continued practicing by himself, merely cutting his former partner's name out of the sign. The first-named gentleman, not liking to be cut out in that style, retaliated, during the absence of Lynch for a week in the country, by engaging a scape-grace to further deprive the sign of the words "Attorneys at," thus leaving it to read LYNCH LAW.

SOME of the best things in the Drawer are said or done by the clergy. Here is an example:

An old minister, who was out making pastoral calls, with his gray mare, was met recently by a dandy, or fast fellow. The old man's whip was a little the worse for wear. The dandy, with a supercilious air, shouted as he drove up: "Hallo, old cove! what will you take for your whip?" "Your back!" was the quick reply. The dandy drove on rapidly.

HERE is another, rather at the expense of "the cloth," from a Western city:

Some months ago a country clerical friend of an M.D. here came to the city, and was invited by the Doctor to go home and stay with him over night. After supper the guest was shown to his room, the gas lit, and he left to retire. Some two hours after the Doctor "smelt a mice," and soon discovered that gas was leaking somewhere about the premises. His first thought was of his country friend, and so to his room he went. Sure enough the gas was leaking. The gentleman, upon being awakened, asked what was the matter? He was informed that the gas had not been shut off, and had been leaking. With an air of sorrow he rose up and looked over the foot of the bed at a spot on the floor under the burner, and asked, with great innocence: "Did it spoil the carpet much, Doctor?"

MR. L——, an elderly, blind gentleman, better known as "Blind L——," used to travel round with his guide to do his own trading. He was subject to short convulsive fits; and was once feeling of some pants, preparatory to purchasing, but not having the right size the clerk had gone to the warehouse for a fresh lot. During his absence the old man was overtaken with one of his fits, and the clerk, ignorant of the fact, was returning with the pants, when he was asked by the "boss"—who was in the office, and could see the old man's contortions—"if he had got a fit?" "Well, Sir," said the clerk, "within half an inch! he wears 31×31 , and the nearest we have is $31\frac{1}{2} \times 31$, but I can scratch out the $\frac{1}{2}$, and he won't know the difference!" The affair caused lots of laughter, in which the old man himself joined when he had recovered and was told of the clerk's misconception of the word fit.

THERE are so many smart children that they can't all get in the Drawer at once. Here are a few as a specimen of many:

Some weeks ago, during a severe thunder-storm, a lady friend was telling the children not to be afraid: that God held the thunder in his hand, and would not let it hurt them unless He thought it for the best. She had hardly concluded when a very loud clap was heard. "There, now!" says a four-year-old, "God has let go of it, and gone home out of the rain!"

THERE appeared in a late Number of Harper's a Christmas story, entitled, "What Hope Bell found in her Stocking." Thinking to amuse the little ones, who were turning the leaves with me, I suggested to the children assembled that we guess in turn what the contents of said stocking might be. But Jamie, the youngest, not yet four, put an end to all surmising, by saying, "She found her leg!—what do you s'pose?"

A YOUNG friend of mine, aged five years, asked his aunt "if he ought to mind his mother?" "Certainly," replied the aunt; "you should always obey your mother." "Well, then," said the prodigy, "she told me to ask you to buy me a fiddle!"

"Pa," said little Channing to his paternal ancestor, holding up a Sunday-school picture-book, "what is that?" "That, my son," gravely replied the father, "is Jacob wrestling with the angel." "And which licked, pa?" innocently continued the young hopeful.

In the early days of Michigan the County Courts were presided over by a Chief Judge and two associates, who were called Side Judges.

At a term of Court held in Allegan County, a few years ago, on the assembling of Court one morning, a lawyer named Smith said to his brother attorney, Jones, "We have the most expensive judiciary in this county of any place in the State." "How so?" said Jones. "Why, we are maintaining a hundred Judges on this bench at every term of court." "A hundred Judges!" said Jones; "how do you make that out?" "Well, there is Judge R—— is one, isn't he?" "Yes, but where do you get the balance?" "And the other two side Judges are mere ciphers. One and two naughts make a hundred, don't they?"

At a term of Court in Kalamazoo County, under the same organization of the bench as above, a decision had been given by one of the side Judges in violation of all law, and in opposition to the testimony in the case. Lawyer B—— arose, and in no very measured terms denounced the Court as grossly wanting in knowledge and common-sense. Judge R—— interposed, and wished to know if the counsel intended to include the whole bench in his remarks? Mr. B—— instantly replied: "No, Sir. May it please your Honor, only one corner of it!"

In the Circuit Court at Vicksburg a negro girl, testifying in a criminal case, developed a boldness of invention which, if it did not achieve success, certainly deserved it. She testified that she saw the prisoner find the $10 bill which was alleged to have been stolen. The whole case hinged on the truth or falsity of this statement. After standing a rigid cross-examination to disprove it, as a last resort three $10 bills were put in her hands, and she was told to tell the jury the value of the different bills. After several minutes' profound study, amidst the breathless attention of every spectator, she held one up in her hand. The question was asked, "Is that a $10 bill?" "No." "What is it then?" "It's a $9 bill!" The spectators collapsed, and so did the defense.

A WASHINGTON correspondent says:

I was a passenger on the same train with Lieutenant-General Grant as he was returning home from his late trip West. As the train stopped at Martinsburg, Virginia, lively cheering was heard. An old lady who had just got on the cars, and was ignorant of the General's presence, inquired the cause of it. On being informed that it was in honor of General Grant and "suite," she replied, "Sweet, sweet, sweet! Oh yes, I know now; sweet means his wife! I'd really like to see her!"

A NEW YORK correspondent sends a couple of specimens of stupid children, as a kind of set-off to the many smart ones that appear in the Drawer:

One of the scholars in a celebrated boarding-school in the town of W—— was taken sick with congestion of the lungs. The teacher sent Al. B—— (another scholar) for the doctor. On his way he stopped to tell the boy's aunt. She asked what the matter was. Al. replied, "He is very sick with digestion on the lungs." This Al. was sixteen years old.

A WHILE after the teacher sent Al.'s brother (a lad of twelve years) to a neighbor's for "Butler's Analogy," when the boy astonished the neighbor by asking for "Butler's Neuralgia," or, as he called it, "Neuralgy."

A QUEER story is told of the device which a couple of pious ladies adopted to avoid the sin of swearing. A certain Spanish abless and one of her nuns was proceeding on a journey, which it was a matter of life and death to complete with the utmost speed. The man who drove the mules of their carriage was urging his beasts to speed with the usual profuse oaths and blasphemies which are in vogue with Spanish muleteers in general, and the pious ears of the two nuns were so shocked at what they heard that they insisted upon the man's abstaining from the offensive words. The mules, not hearing the accustomed oburgations, speedily slackened their pace, and the driver informed the ladies that nothing but strong swearing would make them move quickly. The nuns were at their wit's end. Every half-hour was most precious; but, on the other hand, their consciences revolted at the idea of authorizing such blasphemies as they had been hearing. At length a happy thought struck them. The most odiously profane phrase is, of course, made up of words which, if taken singly, may be of a perfectly innocent description. They therefore agreed to divide the muleteer's cursings into their component parts, and so, by assigning one word to the abbess, another to the sister, and a third to the muleteer, and pronouncing their series in their proper order, the complete anathemas were made to reach the ears of the mules, while not one of the speakers could be considered guilty of uttering any thing wrong.

This is a sad example of the contagious influence of bad company even upon asses and nuns!

AN ex-major writes:

DEAR DRAWER,—As I see military stories are not quite out of date yet I send you the following from New Orleans:

In the spring of '64 I was a Captain, and stationed at Port Hudson. My Second Lieutenant, George B—, was celebrated for his dry humor. One evening, about 11 o'clock, I, being regimental officer of the day, made the rounds, and came to a sentinel who was stationed very near the Lieutenant's tent. After going through the usual formula with the sentinel I heard the Lieutenant sing out, "I know what the countersign is, Captain." Knowing that I had not spoken it loud enough for any one but the sentinel to hear, I said, "I'll bet you don't. What is it?" Says he, "It is 'correct;' I heard the sentinel tell you so."

A FRIEND of mine, an ex-officer of the army, while in the employ of the "Bureau," was stationed in a certain parish in this State. Calling one evening on a young lady, she amused him by playing on the piano. After banging away on a piece for about half an hour he professed himself highly delighted, and asked what it was. "Why," said she, in a tone of mingled surprise at and pity for his ignorance, "That's 'Bonaparte's retreat from Boston!'"

PEOPLE who wish to obtain favors from others ought to write their requests in a legible hand. Many ludicrous blunders have occurred from a neglect of this caution. A good story has been told of the way in which the Duke of Wellington once made himself a laughing-stock by the unpardonable chirography of a lady:

Mrs. J. C. Loudon, widow of the celebrated landscape gardener, took a great delight in prosecuting the favorite studies of her husband's life. On one occasion, wishing to make some researches in the department of arboriculture, she wrote the Duke of Wellington for permission to see his Waterloo beeches—the celebrated avenue planted on his estate to commemorate his greatest victory. Mrs. Loudon's chirography was none of the most legible, so that when the Duke read her letter he mistook "beeches" for "breeches," and supposed the epistle a request for the inspection of that indispensable garment worn by him on the field of Waterloo. At the signature he was again deceived. The u in Mrs. Loudon's name he took for an n, and accordingly read the whole signature "J. C. London," which was none other than that of the Bishop of London himself. Accordingly, though much astonished at such a desire on the part of a grave dignitary, he wrote him in answer a note, which we may imagine created equal astonishment in the recipient:

"MY LORD,—My valet tells me that the breeches I wore at the battle of Waterloo were long ago given away to Mr. Benjamin Robert Haydon, for the purposes of his historical painting. Regretting deeply that I have not the breeches to show your lordship, I remain "Your Lordship's very humble servant,

"WELLINGTON."

A PHILADELPHIAN writes:

We have in our store a son of Erin who is sometimes very green. He was preparing to close the store one rainy night, and, taking off his coat, was about to go outside, when I asked him why he went out in his shirt-sleeves in all the rain. "Sure," says he, "don't I want a dry coat to go home in?"

JOHN SMITH affirms that these stories have never been published, but the Drawer will not allow that statement to be made any longer, and therefore sets them up here for its readers:

An individual by the name of M—, of the town of B—, State of Michigan, is well known to be not overstocked with brains. Some years since he connected himself with the Methodist Church. He was very forward, and liked to tell his experience in class-meetings. On one of these occasions he said: "I have been seriously thinking, my friends, what duty calls me to do, and have finally decided to study for the ministry, and then rule a circus." Charitable hearers supposed that he intended to "ride a circuit," but he is better fitted for the ring than the pulpit.

NOT many years since there resided in the southern part of Michigan a well-to-do farmer that had moved there in an early day, when the country was new and times were hard. But for all that his eldest son thought it was time to get married. So preparations were made, the minister came, the knot was tied, and a bounteous table was spread out. The guests had assembled around it, and the bridesmaids came to escort the bride to the table. "Well," says the bridegroom, "there are so many at the table I guess I'll wait."

A CANADIAN incloses these stories to the Drawer. The Drawer is glad that they can find amusement even in a Fenian raid:

Three years ago, while stopping at a hotel in the worn-out town of B—, not many miles from Toronto, there came along a photographer and his wife, and engaged rooms to "secure the shadows" of the people. In furnishing the "gallery" the happy couple got into some dispute, which quickly drifted into a regular fight. The noise soon attracted the guests, who came just in time to see the gentleman beat a hasty retreat, leaving his beaver huff in possession of the field. In coming among us, drenched, short of breath, and shaking his head, he said: "God! if it hadn't been a woman I'd 'a' fit all I died!"

AFTER the Fenian battle of Limestone Bridge several ladies volunteered to go to the front, at Fort Calhoun (whether the Volunteers had retreated), to attend to the sick and wounded. Among them was a Mrs. S——, wife of one of our leading clergymen. After looking among the red-coats she came to a wounded Fenian, and addressed him: "What do you come over here, mending, wounding, and killing us? We have nothing to do with Ireland. What have we ever done?" Not being able to give a very plausible answer, he glanced at her, and seeing a green tie around her collar, said, "I like the color of your ribbons, ma'am." She immediately left to look after the wounded boys in comfort.

On Sunday, the day after the "battle" with the Fenians, all was excitement and people gathered about the Times office waiting for the next "extra." At last a few wires came out of the window. One was caught by a big, red-faced Englishman, who was troubled with irregularity of W's. For the benefit of the crowd about him he read it out. He soon came to this: "The fight was witnessed by thousands on the American side, who cheered the Fenians on to victory." This seemed to make him fairly boil, and he yelled out, "Hill warrant you, but warrant you those Hibernians are eloping them 'till they can! Where hare our Regulars? They 'll be sent out to the Horse Guards and get court-martialed!"

SOME twelve years since a belated party, returning from their wedding-tour, stopped at a hotel in the town of F——, New Jersey, for the night. Their baggage was placed in one of the halls of the hotel. During the night one of the trunks was taken out and carried a short distance from the hotel to a low piece of ground, broken open, and rifled of its contents. The parties engaged in the affair were seen running the next morn'g up a person who was not rather late, but thought nothing of it until the following day, when the story became generally known that a robbery had been committed. Then he stated that he saw some three or four colored individuals carrying a trunk at a late hour in a certain direction, and named two of them; the others he did not recognize. Warrants were accordingly issued for their arrest. The officer proceeded to carry out his instructions, and after a short search he found the parties named, in company with three or four others, conversing. Among said number was a noted individual of color named Adam J——. He was accordingly arrested with the others upon suspicion, but afterward released, with the understanding that he was still a prisoner. Adam was a noted individual from the fact that he had for several years "graced" the offices of our lawyers, and also of the banks, in the capacity of sweeper and fire-builder in chief, and nothing black ever shone upon his character, if it did upon his skin. Upon the investigation before the Grand Jury it was clearly shown that Adam had nothing to do with the affair, and was perfectly clear of every suspicion. Still, he was a good subject for a little sport, and he felt terribly affrighted lest he should be indicted. Upon the adjournment of the Grand Jury Adam was told that he was indicted. The trial of two, who were really indicted for the offense, was set down for a given day, and upon the arrival of said day Adam was also in attendance. Judge N——, who presided upon the bench at the time, was a man who heartily relished a joke, and was always willing to aid in carrying one on. During the trial of the guilty ones a recess of ten minutes occurred, during which the Judge, upon seeing Adam in court, called out:

"Is Adam J—— in court?"

Adam at once stood up and made known his presence.

The Judge called him up before the bar, and in substance said:

"Adam, the Court is surprised and pained to see a man in your standing before them. Adam, it has been shown by evidence that you had nothing to do with the robbery alleged against you; still, Adam, you were found in bad company, and therefore arrested. Now, Adam, let this be a warning to you to keep out of bad company."

Adam was overwhelmed with joy at the glad news of his acquittal, but felt a little sore upon being found with the guilty parties, and thought that it was but just that he should apologize, which he did as follows:

"Most honorable Judge—Sir—In fact, our bad company and bad company looks so much like now-days dat you can't tell de difference till you git in em."

A perfect roar of laughter followed Adam's remarks, in which the Court took a full share.

A CONTRIBUTOR sends the following from Wisconsin:

DEAR DRAWER,—There is a good story of our present Bank-Controller, General R——, which I must tell you. In the good old days before the war the General was the genial Boniface of the Buck-eye Hotel, in the village of V——, in Wisconsin. He fed and lodged the weary traveler (and 'tis said he did it well), and purchased supplies of the surrounding burghers.

We knew less of military matters then than now, and instead of "General," we all called the landlord "Jeremiah," or more frequently "Jerry." In the same village, on the outskirts, lived the Methodist preacher old elder B——. The elder was subject to all the weaknesses of great men, and would, when especially provoked, get very angry. He did so one day while trying to drive an unruly old sow belonging to him out of his garden. The elder succeeded in cornering her, and in making a very impressive gesture with a fence-stake broke the old torment's back. She was long, lean, lank, and leathery, but in her lifetime had represented a certain number of almighty dollars, and to lose her was too bad. So when the elder's temper had somewhat cooled he turned the matter over in his mind to find some way to turn the defunct porker to account. Finally he hit upon a plan. He butchered the hog in due and ancient form, and proceeded forthwith to the Buck-eye, where Jerry, having in mind a luscious hock for his guests, bought the pork. In due time some of it was cooked, but never eaten. It was too tough for ordinary grinders. Soon the story of the unfortunate and tragic manner of the old sow's death came to the ears of Jerry, whose wrath knew no bounds thereat, and he spoke of vengeance. He declared "he would punish the elder if the law would let him." Soon after there was a camp-meeting close by, and the elder, as was his wont, took a very active part. He was in the middle of his sermon, his audience was large, and he had made a proposition which he was quoting authorities to sustain. With much vehemence and terrific gestures he interrogates himself with "What did Hosea say?" and then he tells what he did say. "What did Ezekiel say?" "What did Jeremiah say?" At this point one of his auditors—Joe S—, a long-limbed, stoop-shouldered, red-headed fellow—rose about half-way up, and leaning forward, with his dexter finger pointed dead at the elder, answered the question, in his own peculiar, drawling, nasal twang: "He says, by mighty! you'd better settle up that old sow scrape mighty soon, or you'll git sued—that's what Jeremiah says!"

The elder's sermon was finished. He did settle with Jerry, and with his congregation too, and it was his last sermon in V—.

THE following comes from Iowa:

Away out here, in our beautiful, grove-embowered city, lives one of the everlasting Smith family, who piques himself not a little on the quality of his dinners, but at table invariably bores his friends with out-of-place apologies and far-fetched excuses because the viands—sumptuous though they may be—are not better, etc. Now it happened that on a certain day Smith got up an elegant feast for a newly-married couple and their friends, but a heavy rain setting in they sent a big, bungling, matter-of-fact brother of the groom's to tender their compliments, and communicate their deep regrets that the unfavorable weather would prevent their participation in the enjoyments they knew were awaiting them beneath his hospitable roof. Smith, although disappointed, received the brother graciously; the repast was served, and the proxy of the absent friends, with the family, sat down to discuss it. Smith's old malady was upon him, and, grace over, he commenced slandering the good things before them, and at last brought up by apologetically expressing to his guest the mortification he felt that he "had nothing better to offer him." "Well," blurted out the fellow, "I guess I can stand it one meal, if you can all the time!"

A WISCONSIN friend, who values the Magazine, and especially the Drawer, sends the following:

Not long since, in conversation with a lady, she gave me the afflicting information that there "had been discovered in the Lake Superior country an inexhaustible mine of humbug!" We made up our minds at once never to farm it in that country.

A "CONSTANT READER" should become also a constant contributor, if he can send more like the three following:

In the town of St. Albans, away down in the State of Maine, lived, a few years ago, an old fellow by the name of Jim, who was drunk fully half of the time, and, as the result, was everlastingly in some kind of scrape. One dark, wet night, while on his way home from a neighboring town, where he had been to get his jug filled, he drove his team into a ditch, making a perfect wreck of it, and burying himself in the mud. The next day he stumbled over to the village tavern, the "head centre" of all the loafers in the place. Among the number collected on this occasion was a spruce young lawyer who prided himself on his wit, and took every opportunity to show it. Here was a rare chance, at the expense of a poor old drunkard.

"Jim," said he, "I understand you was out late last night."

"Umph! b'lieve I was."

"And met with an accident, I heard."

"Well—yes."

"Held one rein tighter than the other, I suppose?"

"No—wrong there," says Jim; "'twas because I didn't hold it so tight!"

EVERY one in the Army of the Potomac has heard of General P—, that sturdy old veteran of Florida and Mexico, whom years of service had made brown and grizzled, and years of discipline stern and inflexible in his ideas of duty, but whom neither years, service, nor discipline could make any thing but the faithful soldier and Christian gentleman. The General has a voice of immense power, a piercing eye, and a grimness, not to say sternness of manner, which made him a veritable "terror to evil-doers." Withal, a kinder-hearted man never breathed, nor a more genial when among his friends. He has, too, a deal of grim humor, which frequently displayed itself in the means he adopted to maintain discipline, and if not often showing itself in laughter, certainly caused it often enough in others.

On one occasion a sergeant belonging to one of the regiments of the General's brigade was picked up by the rear-guard for straggling, having been discovered milking a cow in a field near the road, and, for want of a pail, catching the grateful fluid in his mouth. At night he was duly reported to the General, and ordered to approach the dreaded presence, which he did in fear and trembling, the loss of his stripes being the mildest of the visions which danced before his imagination. Now the General's knowledge of his men was almost as minute as Caesar's, and he knew the sergeant to be a good soldier, and seldom guilty of any infraction of duty. Perhaps, too, he appreciated the temptation; at any rate, fixing his eye on the culprit, he thundered:

"So you are the man who sucked the cow, eh?"

"Yes, Sir."

"You great calf, go to your regiment!"

THERE was one regiment in the brigade, the —th New York, the officers of which were never contented unless they were doing things differently from any one else, and not a little trouble had their propensity caused the General. One day, when in battle, the brigade was ordered to support a certain battery, for which purpose they were marched to the slope of the hill on which the battery was posted, and in its rear, and ordered to lie down. Now, to fully appreciate the situation, you must know that the battery was then engaged in a lively artillery duel with the enemy, and the air thereabout was full of shot and shell, and while men were comparatively safe lying down, standing up was unpleasantly hazardous. Of course the General's order was obeyed with alacrity by all but the —th, whose officers, seeing that the General had not dismounted, thought to gain credit for their regiment by declining the proffered safety, and kept their men standing. The General sat on his horse studying a map, as unconscious of fire as in his quarters, but looking up after a few moments, called out: "Lie down, —th!" and went on studying. Looking up again, and seeing his orders not obeyed, he again cried: "You had better lie down, —th!" But still their pride kept them up. Just then, however, a shell struck in the midst of the regiment and burst, knocking over half a dozen poor fellows, and causing the rest to "hug the ground" in ludicrous haste. Looking up in grim satisfaction, the General saluted them with: "There! Now I guess you'll lie down!" That regiment never "put on airs" again.

THE General could see a joke even when the point was turned the wrong way. The —d New York was once in his command, and a great source of trouble it was, too. The officers gambled openly in their tents, and the soldiers could not reasonably be expected to do any better—so the result was a noisy, ill-disciplined regiment, and a perpetual "thorn in the flesh" to the order-loving General.

One night, hearing a "row" of unusual dimensions in the camp of the —d, he dispatched a squad of the head-quarters' guard to make a raid on the camp, who returned with a brace of the offenders, whom they had caught gambling. In the morning they were paraded before the General, who sent to the Quarter-master for an empty shoe-box, which he placed just in front of his tent; then procuring a greasy pack of cards and a pint of beans, he seated one man each side of the box, divided the beans equally between them, and set them to playing their favorite "draw poker," the "pot" being limited to six beans, that the supply might last. He kept them at it until dark, the necessary time for meals only being allowed. Next morning they were "put on" at daylight, and kept steadily at work (or rather play) until night. On the third day the same performance was commenced; but, near noon, one of the incorrigibles, seeing a sergeant of his company near, called out to him: "Sergeant! please give my compliments to General P—, and ask him if if he won't release me? If he won't, tell him he'll have to send this other fellow some more beans, for I've got him scooped!" The man was released, and the General gave up trying to reform that regiment in that way.

EVEN the grave and potent church courts sometimes furnish incidents that are provocative of laughter. No one that was present when the following scene took place will ever think of it without what Mrs. Partington calls a "heart-felt smile:"

The Synod of Kentucky was in session. The subject of raising the salaries of certain professors was under discussion. The Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge, D. D. (of whom his nephew, the new Vice-President, said, "If uncle Robert had been appointed to a command in Mexico they would have been fighting to this time!") was on the floor, making a speech in opposition to the measure. It had been said that ministers of high standing and large means, clothed in fine linen and faring sumptuously every day, did not sympathize with those whose salaries were small. To this Dr. Breckinridge was replying. He scouted the idea that ministers live for money, or desire the luxuries of the world. As for himself, he challenged any man to say that he lived more frugally than himself. Drawing himself up to his full height, and standing six feet high at least, he displayed his proportions, and exclaimed: "As to the fine linen, if there is a man on this floor who dresses more plainly than I do, I offer to exchange clothes with him this moment."

Directly in front of the Moderator, and in sight of most of the members, sat the Rev. Mr. Hopkins, one of the planting clergy—a short, thick-set, and rotund brother, whose circumference exceeded his altitude—and in this respect no man in the house presented so strong and striking a contrast with the tall and courtly Kentuckian. But the proposition to swap clothes had hardly escaped the lips of the speaker before Hopkins wriggled himself out of his seat and on his feet, and cried out:

"Mr. Moderator, I'm his man!"

The effect was instantaneous and tremendous! The image of Breckinridge, with his long arms and legs protruding from Hopkins's toggery was up before the eyes of the Synod. They could see nothing else—think of nothing else—and for a while they gave way to uncontrolled laughter, in which no one joined so heartily as the discomfited speaker.

THE following christening anecdote comes from an English clergyman who is fond of telling a good story:

The rector of a parish bordering upon my own was once requested to baptize a male infant by the name of Vanus.

"Venus!" cried he to the godfather, very sharply, for he is of a choleric temperament, although as kind a soul as breathes—"stuff and nonsense! In the first place, Venus is not a man's name at all, but a woman's; and, secondly, it was the name of an infamously bad woman. You ought to be ashamed of yourself to wish that any Christian child should be so named!"

"Grandfeyther was christened Vanus," returned the sponsor, doggedly.

"Your grandfather was christened Venus, Sir! Impossible! Is he alive? Where is he?"

At these words an exceedingly ancient person, looking as little like Venus as can possibly be imagined, tottered slowly forth from the congregation, for the christening was taking place during the afternoon service.

"Is your name Venus?" inquired the clergyman.

"Well, yes, Sir; they always calls me Vanus."

"And do you mean to say that you were christened by that name?"

"Yes, Sir; at least I believe they write it out Sil-vanus, but they always called me Vanus."

At the charter election of one of our cities a man who was notoriously intemperate was a candidate. On all ordinary occasions he was passably drunk, but on this particular day he had outdone himself. In the evening, while the votes were being canvassed, "old Rot" was there, and the crowd became noisy. On their being requested to keep quiet and not disturb the Board, "Rot" exclaimed, in a thick, pathetic whisper: "Y-yes, keep still! Y-you'll defeat me!" It was necessary to request the crowd a second time to keep quiet.

A NOTED character is Jack M'Gill. He delights in (mis)quoting words out of the sphere of his learning. Some years since his house took fire from a cooking-stove. After it was extinguished he was delivering himself of the pent-up wrath generated thereby, and concluded by saying: "Confound the man that first convented a cooking-stove any how!"

Having a difficulty with a neighbor which was likely to terminate in a suit at law, he thus proposed to his opponent: "Now, A—, I am willin' to leave this matter to three interested persons, and bind myself to divide by their incision!"

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NO. CXCVIII.—NOVEMBER, 1866.—VOL. XXXIII.

THE CIDER MILL.

UNDER the blue New England skies,
Flooded with sunshine, a valley lies:

The mountains clasp it, warm and sweet,
Like a sunny child, to their rocky feet.

Three pearly lakes and a hundred streams
Lie on its quiet heart of dreams.

Its meadows are greenest ever seen;
Its harvest fields have the brightest sheen:

Through its trees the softest sunlight shakes,
And the whitest lilies gem its lakes.

I love, oh! better than words can tell,
Its every rock, and grove, and dell:

But most I love the gorge where the rill
Comes down by the old, brown cider mill.

Above the clear springs gurgles out,
And the upper meadows wind about;

Then join, and under willows flow
Round knolls where blue-beech whip-stocks grow,

To rest in a shaded pool that keeps
The oak-trees clasped in its crystal deeps.

Sheer twenty feet the water falls
Down from the old dam's broken walls,

Spatters the knobby boulders gray,
And, laughing, hies in the shade away,

Under great roots, through trout-pools still,
With many a tumble, down to the mill.

All the way down the nut-trees grow,
And squirrels hide above and below.

Acorns, beechnuts, chestnuts there
Drop all the fall through the hazy air;

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1866, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 198.—Z z

And burrs roll down with curled-up leaves,
In the mellow light of harvest eves.

For ever there the still, old trees
Drink a wine of peace that has no lees.

By the road-side stands the cider mill,
Where a lowland slumber waits the rill:

A great, brown building, two stories high,
On the western hill-face warm and dry:

And odorous piles of apples there
Fill with incense the golden air:

And heaps of pumice, mixed with straw,
To their amber sweets the late flies draw.

The carts back up to the upper door,
And spill their treasures in on the floor:
Down through the toothéd wheels they go
To the wide, deep cider press below;
And the screws are turned by slow degrees
Down on the straw-laid cider cheese;
And with each turn a fuller stream
Bursts from beneath the groaning beam,
An amber stream the gods might sip,
And fear no morrow's parchéd lip.

But wherefore gods? Those ideal toys
Were soulless to real New England boys.

What classic goblet ever felt
Such thrilling touches through it melt

As throb electric along a straw
When boyish lips the cider draw?

The years are heavy with weary sounds,
And their discord life's sweet music drowns;

But yet I hear, oh! sweet, oh! sweet,
The rill that bathed my bare, brown feet;

And yet the cider drips and falls
On my inward ear at intervals;

And I lean at times in a sad, sweet dream,
To the babbling of that little stream;

And sit in a visioned autumn still,
In the sunny door of the cider mill.

THE WORK-HOUSE—BLACKWELL'S ISLAND.

THE WORK-HOUSE—BLACKWELL'S ISLAND.

DRUNKENNESS and small thefts are two of the main qualifications for a residence in the institution which forms the subject of this article. The writer, therefore, has been prevented from emulating an English brother of the pen who created no small sensation by his treatment of a similar theme. He has not become an inmate of the Work-house for the sake of a novel experience and the desire to give a vivid description. He may premise, however, that he has had advantages far from common in eliciting information concerning it, and that "our artist" was on the spot when the accompanying sketches were made.

The Work-house is the most recently established of the institutions upon Blackwell's Island. Previous to the erection of the present building the classes that now fill it were distributed among the District Prisons, the Tombs, the Penitentiary, and the Alms-house. It was originally recommended, "for the employment of able-bodied inmates of the Alms-house," by a committee from the Board of Aldermen. As such the proposal was adopted by the Common Council in 1849, and passed by the Legislature in 1850. The corner-stone was laid in November of that year. The architectural plan of that date exhibits many features not seen in the structure as completed. The engraving at the head of this article shows that it comprises two wings, the one extending northerly, the other southerly, from an extensive centre building. A third wing, projecting immediately back of this, is also to be desiered in the original plan, as well as four outhouses of considerable architectural pretensions situated on the corners of an inclosure in which the main structure was to stand. None of these have been erected.

The northern wing contains the female wards, the southern the male. They are similar in exterior and interior construction, and the presented view of the galleries and rows of cells in the northern wing gives a fair idea of the appearance of each. In the middle of the further extremity will be seen an altar-like structure, containing a mammoth reflector, which at night illumines the entire avenue. There are three stories to the edifice, to which exceptions, however, exist in the cross buildings at the end of each wing; these comprise four with a loft besides. In them are the work-rooms, the offices, and the reception-rooms. The centre building contains the apartments of the warden and physicians, the kitchens, the laundries, and the church auditory. Contiguous to and back of it, a small outbuilding with the usual tall chimney, is the engine-house, whence steam is generated for the whole institution as well as the Retreat, a structure now pertaining to the Lunatic Asylum, but which formerly belonged to the Work-house.

INTERIOR OF THE NORTHERN WING.

Like that of all institutions upon the Island, the edifice is constructed of blue stone rubble masonry, the materials obtained from the insular rock. There are also several wooden outhouses belonging to it, a stable, a carpenter shop, a blacksmith shop, and a boat-house. The last contains not only the boat and crew of the Work-house Warden, but those of the Resident Physician of the Asylum as well.

The grounds of the institution comprise about ten or twelve acres, which, carefully cultivated by certain of the prisoners, afford fair yearly returns in a variety of vegetables. They are consumed by the institution. The paid officials of the Work-house number some thirteen, of whom the highest in rank is the Superintendent or Warden. Next in order come the Clerk, then the Engineer, the Keepers, and the Matrons. The Bellevue Hospital furnishes two physicians from its staff; which staff also fills the medical departments of the Penitentiary, the Alms-house, and the Island Hospital, its members taking turns in serving at every place.

It is supposed that it would be possible to crowd two thousand prisoners into the Work-house, although it can not be strictly said that there are accommodations for them. In the female wing are some one hundred and thirty cells, each of which contains four beds. The male wing is not so regularly divided into small cells, some within it holding twenty-five beds, but its general capacity is doubtless the same. The largest number ever at any one period incarcerated within the walls has been 1700. This happened at the time of the riots in the city concerning the draft during the late war of secession. In 1855 the number of inmates was 200; in 1856 the daily average was 625, upon which, from that year to 1860, the annual increase was about 100, the daily average being, in 1860, 1208. Since that date there has been a gradual decrease, although in a fluctuating manner. For the past three years the daily average has been from 700 to 900. The expense to the city of each inmate is about fifteen cents daily, sometimes a trifle more, sometimes a trifle less.

The utmost economy prevails, and the labor of the prisoners produces no inconsiderable amount of money. This labor, contracted for by manufacturers in the city, has in times past brought as much as $6000 to the institution in a single year. The manufacture of cigars was then carried on in a somewhat extensive manner. The receipts from contracts fluctuate not a little, the principal cause being the occasional suspension of a manufacturer. In the past year the receipts were only $2975, to which sum the Hoop-skirt Factory contributed its quota. There have also been cap and stocking contractors. Garments for United States troops were made here during the war.

The greater proportion of work, however, done by the prisoners is consumed by the institution and the various other departments under the control of the Commissioners. Carpenters, coopers, boat-builders, blacksmiths, wheel-wrights, tinsmiths, etc., are all employed at their respective branches, and their products, as may be required, are sent to the Alms-house, Bake-house, Bellevue steamboat, Bellevue Hospital, City Cemetery, Island Hospital,

WORK-HOUSE SHOEMAKERS.

Lunatic Asylum, Small-pox Hospital, Penitentiary, City Prison, Commissioners of Emigration, and Randall's Island.

The carpenters are mainly employed in making coffins for the use of the above-named institutions and the outdoor poor; from 700 to 900 are constructed yearly, of various sizes. The tailors do all the repairing and making required by the Work-house in coats, pants, vests, and caps, and also that needed by Randall's Island in boys' clothing. The women of the department are largely employed in the Sewing-room upon stockings, socks, dresses, under-garments for both males and females, shrouds, and mittens.

Latterly the Work-house women have been greatly used as help in other Island institutions as scrubbers, cooks, washers, and ironers, the Lunatic Asylum being well furnished with them. Including patients to the Island Hospital, the number of transferred inmates to other institutions as help during the year 1865 amounted to 1329 males, and 3336 females. These numbers, it will be understood, refer to different commitments merely, and include those sent up for a term of ten days as well as those for six months or a year. The daily average of inmates was 772. The males have been mostly employed in the grounds in tilling land, digging excavations for cellars and foundations, wheeling dirt, breaking stones, leveling, etc. Not a few wooden structures have been lately erected by the Commissioners, and Work-house mechanics have been largely used. The Penitentiary convicts appear to be employed in occupations requiring greater strength either of body or mind. They blast the rocks of the Island and hew the stone, the larger proportion of masons and house-carpenters coming from their ranks. The more fatiguing work is evidently apportioned to them. A large quarry engages them continually.

The number of deaths in the Work-house, considering the population, is very small. Of over 12,000 commitments during the past year, 1865, only eighty died. The number of elopements is, however, not so minute, over 400 having escaped in the same period. This is owing in a great measure to the scattering of the inmates among the institutions.

It will be found interesting to examine the history of the Work-house, for a casual glance will determine that it is not now exclusively used for the reception of the classes for which originally it was erected. The inquiry can not be held tiresome, for it embraces a period of but sixteen years. We learn from a report of distant date, emanating from the Superintendent of the Alms-house, that a majority of the inmates of that edifice had always been accustomed to idleness, and did not care for nor feel shame consequent upon pauperism. It was adjudged that a great point would be gained if there could be some line drawn, some distinction made—which could be impressed upon the feelings of the poor themselves—between those reduced by uncontrollable circumstances and those of a lazy, shiftless disposition. It was urged that the establishment of two institutions might tend to draw the line of this separation. It was asserted that the Alms-house should be a place of comparative comfort, liberally though economically maintained, a refuge from the evils and miseries of life—in fine, what the poor-laws contemplated. The Work-house, on the other hand, should be a place of hardships, of ample though coarse fare, and administered with strictness and severity. It should be as repulsive as is consistent with humanity, it being evident that humanity is far more concerned in using every method to incite the laboring classes to depend on themselves rather than upon charities for support.

Upon such principles the institution which forms the subject of this paper was originally founded. It was to be a kind of House of Industry, one of its main objects to impel the decrease of pauperism. With this intention, in the first two years of its history the Work-house people were paid a small amount for their labor. In 1850 they received, according to their class, 50, 40, and 37½ cents per day. But in 1851 the scale was reduced 15 cents on each sum, because of inmates merely looking forward to a few dollars to spend in a drunken debauch in the city. Payment in money was shortly after abolished altogether, and the institution being still regarded as a connection of the Alms-house those reasons were given:

"When the industrious man can with difficulty obtain subsistence it is most unjust, as well as most detrimental to the moral well-being of the individual, to encourage him in idleness by the gratuitous offer of a better, or at least a sufficient subsistence. We feel for the old, infirm, sick, all who are providentially afflicted, and are anxious that every attention should be extended to them to make them comfortable and happy; while the able-bodied, who are paupers from choice and capable of work, should not be allowed benefits without conforming to rules and giving an equivalent in labor."

The Work-house began to be regarded now more as a purely penal institution. Study of the history of Blackwell's Island can not fail to impress one with the progress that has been made in the management of the various departments, and with the belief that improvements are to succeed. Under the Board of Ten Governors the Penitentiary exhibited a spectacle that was to be deplored. The Island Hospital at that period was a branch of it, the patients being necessarily prisoners. Their cures effected, they served a certain term in the Penitentiary as payment. The Warden's report conveys the idea that the prison was a perfect Pandemonium. Diseased prostitutes, with their victims and associates; drunkards and vagrants of all kinds, lame, maimed, and blind; wretches half-idiotic through debaucheries; thieves, rowdies, and ruffians; children without parents, and old and hardened offenders, are by him enumerated as comprised within the walls. In cases of pauperism inefficient magistrates seemed to send, ad libitum, to the Alms-house and the Penitentiary, poverty being adjudged a crime by certain of them.

With the changes that we have already noted as having taken place in the Work-house it is easy to see that it would soon absorb a large class formerly sent to the Penitentiary, and such now is the case. To state the matter concisely, court prisoners are sent to the Penitentiary, while police prisoners are sent to the Work-house. The charges in Work-house commitments are drunkenness, vagrancy, and disorderly conduct. Small thefts are also punishable by the Work-house, although petty larceny is a Penitentiary crime.

Doubtless some little of the confusion that once existed as to the proper place of punishment for certain offenses yet prevails. Careless officials not unfrequently send up quite innocent persons through some unfortunate circumstance of time or place; and it occasionally happens that the policeman himself is more deserving of punishment than the individual committed upon his charge. Drunkenness "covers a multitude of sins," however, in the case of a majority of the prisoners. They may well be thankful it is the only charge that can be proved against them. With these facts in mind, it is gratifying to know that destitute boys are no longer kept here until indentured to a master, as some three or four years ago they were.

For an insight into the variety of characters and professions that find their way to the Work-house, the reader will please take his stand on the dock at the foot of Twenty-sixth Street, East River, just previous to the starting of the steamboat Bellona for the Island. tion, present, in accordance with its regulations, such a uniformity of costume that a very close examination, and indeed conversation, is necessary before one can determine, with any degree of certainty, their previous rank in life and occupation. Concerning any woman, however, it is generally a safe guess that she is a thief and a prostitute; and concerning any man, that he is a worthless drunkard, a vagrant, and a villain. There are many who do not fall under all of these rules, as will have been seen from previous remarks; but of more, what I have written serves ill to express the depths of depravity to which they have sunk.

But the sour-looking policeman who has charge of the Bellevue Dock opens his gate, and we are freed from odors and unpleasant company to the crowd that presses before it. Descending to the stateroom, farther on, we await the arrival of the "Black Maria," so prized on occasion, the passengers of which are to be our study. While so doing we can not refrain from wondering glances at the wretched mass upon whose backs we have made our exit. Who are they journeying to the ill-famed isle? A well-dressed gentleman, accompanied by three ladies, positions by the air of refinement which rings about his party that he is a visitor merely, animated like ourselves by various amusement-seeking the public buildings of New York city; though less fortunate than we, he has not succeeded in getting the bag to Genoa. Close by him sit three decently-attired female passengers, attendants in the Alms-house or the Lunatic Asylum; all seem to be of Irish extraction, though American-born appears the long-bearded individual conversing with them, a keeper in the Penitentiary. Upon the women-travelers of every member of the remainder of the assembly either disease or vice is stamped most legibly; and upon them all the watchful eye of the one-legged guardian of the visitors' receiving-room is ever cast.

Quite a philanthropist is that man; and one well-versed in the ups and downs of human life—something of a philosopher too. A philosophical tone is given, indeed, to the minds of many of these remnants of the Commissioners. It arises from the nature of their duties and the many impulses to reflection continually received. To the school of Epictetus they, however, mostly belong. The object of our gaze arises and examines tickets presented to him by two young girls who have not reached, apparently, eighteen years. They are rather well stored; but no impudent look is stealing over a least modest front, and denotes them to be of the class of the unfortunate and erring. They are for the Island Hospital, and many of their frail sisters, less fair, stand about them, accompanied, in several cases, by heavily-dressed, heavily-mustached, and low-browed young ruffians, their so-called "protectors." Examine them well; they are of the order that recruits the Work-house.

A few years more, their good looks gone—male and female—their posthumous existence draws to a close. Drunkenness and theft, with other continued delinquencies, drag them lower and lower—they are in the Work-house or the Alms-house. Some more enterprising run the gamut of all the institutions. Their greater abilities and bolder flights grant them occasional incursions in the State Prison or the Penitentiary; then follow the Hospital and Work-house, and the Insane Asylum may perhaps see the end of their career.

The most antipathetic understanding apparently exists between the girls and their "men." Albeit their life of shame is known to all on-lookers, they chat pleasantly and laugh gaily with each other; and yet that continued round the eye borne by powder-pale-faced young women, was doubtless given her by the brutal, foppish youth by her side, upon whom she smiles so sweetly. Lusts and abuse are her portion in life. What little heart she has is bestowed unreservedly upon him, base enough to share her degradation. Curses and blows she expects. Yet he is kind sometimes—that sullen, miserable wretch—and the willows of her whole soul is his due. She knows no better fate, and in her ignorance can hardly conceive of nature superior to her own and his. A degraded immortal, she loves her Ferdinand! Another party of her frail sisters arrives, the truth to confess, hardly are shaven, and jaws are freely enlarged, but of other character we may fairly judge, from the fact that women-travelers about them wear a shocked expression, and the before-mentioned gentleman hastily withdraws his companions. The one-legged workman hurries up on his crutch, and a devout silence prevails.

Who is that shabbily-attired woman in black, carrying a large basket? The mother destitute of some young thief confined in the Penitentiary; to-morrow herself is may be and suffering concealed agony. That man beside her, with such a look of man despair? A pauper journeying to the Alms-house; his aimless shreds help one to surmise the cause of his destination. From the gate of the yard of Bellevue Hospital now emerges the unaccounted Sybil, and ghastly, emaciated countenance of a Chinaman. His parted and parched lips, his upturned vacant gaze, seem pointing at mortal pangs. Two men support his exhausted frame. For the hospital he, undoubtedly. Will he live until he arrives there?

A rumble of wheels, the crowd parts, and our reflections are cut short by the coming of the prison van, which rattles past the packing and stage before us. The whistle of the Bellevue steamboat at the same moment rattles our ears, and its black hull crops along the wharf. Its upper and lower decks are densely covered by some three hundred medical students—a wild, ill-favored multitude, just arrived from a "clin" at the Island Hospital. Like a flock of frightened sheep they surge pell-mell from the boat and hurry to the lecture-rooms of their college.

The repatriate is ready to receive his passengers for the return trip, and the driver of the "Black Maria" dismounts from his perch and enters the door of his vehicle. A singular circumstance that; not unlike the menagerie cars containing the cages of wild beasts. No windows are visible, ventilation being supplied by apertures near the roof, fitted with three slats of fixed window-blind.

"Come out, there!" The hand of the driver rudely grasps the arm of the nearest occupant, and arouses her from a drunken stupor. A mass of rags and filth gradually discloses itself. Can it be that the creature before us is a human being? A torn shoe on one foot, a man's boot on the other; bare, bruised, and begrimed legs visible to the knee, through the wires of a battered crinoline picked from an ash-barrel; a short petticoat above this, foul and discolored with the garbage of New York streets, and fringed with its own rags; a scanty shawl alone covering the upper portion of the shivering and swollen frame; the face bloated, inflamed, distorted; its deep-sunk eyes encircled by a hideous black aureola. Can this brutish monster, casting malevolent side-glances as it sluggishly and painfully descends from its den, be or have been a woman? Not only that, but once, perchance, a beautiful and a lovable one. It seems difficult, nay impossible, to realize it; yet naught but seduction and the consequent career may have wrought this awful effect. Not the least lingering trace of education is visible on her features; yet forty years ago her conversation may have possessed a magic charm in the social circle, and she have been the delight of fond parents. Such reflections appear far-fetched as we gaze upon her; and so in truth they are; but none the less are they allied to fact. Her present station is alone thought of by the jeering spectators. We question a policeman as to whence she comes.

"What, that old bummer? Oh, from some vile den in Cherry Street; she has served a term of six months, and was liberated yesterday; got on a spree; raised a row, and is back again to-day for another term. She's a hanger-on of one of the lowest dance-houses; drinks all she can get, and pilfers what she is able."

Used to such sights though he be the speaker's countenance indicates disgust as he conveys his information.

A certain great thinker has said that he never heard of a crime that he could not himself have committed; one of those paradoxical sayings that are to be taken with many reservations. In its real meaning Shakspeare was pre-eminently a man who might have declared the same. It is well-nigh equivalent to an assertion that the state of mind of the doer of the deed was fully comprehended, and to a confession of one's consciousness that he is human, and, under certain circumstances, with merely the same degree of knowledge others possess, would do as they have done.

Yet the author of that singular declaration could never, at the time he spoke, have entertained an idea of the loathsome profession of the wretch now hurried to the steamboat, or he would have little wished to startle his auditors by its enunciation. It is too vile to hint at. "Drunk and disorderly" is the charge which has sent him up this time. He, like most of those now showing their faces from the recesses of the car, are old acquaintances of the prison authorities.

The Work-house has its regular habitués. There are many who may be said to live there, with occasional excursions to the city, lasting from one day to a week. It is nothing unusual to see thirty women leave the institution on Monday to be all brought back by Saturday.

An exception, doubtless, to this general rule is the hatless youth who springs from the vehicle with greater agility than is shown by his companions. He is distinguished from them also by having in his countenance no such look of utter abasement as they exhibit. Deep-seated shame is there, not careless indifference. It is the first time that public chastisement has been visited upon him. His garments, though soiled, have a somewhat fashionable cut. A stranger to the city, his anxiety "to see life" has led him among bad associates. Too much loose change and a reckless, idle spirit has purchased a swift descent into debauchery. The intoxicating cup, a bar-room fight, an inroad of police, the station-house, the Tombs, a sentence of six weeks' imprisonment in the Work-house, are some of the most prominent items in his recent history. Experience is a dear school-mistress. Let us hope that in his case she is a good one too, and has taught him an effectual lesson.

There follows close upon his heels a wild-eyed German, of a large and bony frame. His clothes are torn and in great disorder; his expression is haggard and imbecile. Handcuffs are upon his wrists. One of the boat's crew takes him in special charge. He is a lunatic en route for the Asylum.

And now emerges a girl of not uncomely countenance, holding before it her faded jockey hat and feather. "Not altogether shameless, then," is our thought, when a cynical observer mutters, "She don't want to spoil her future prospects." The charge against her "vagrancy," most likely.

The remaining occupant of the car pushes her bold front into sight. "A born thief!" would be our ejaculation, did we not know the warping influences of poverty and evil association. A more incorrigibly vicious creature in appearance it would be difficult to conceive. Her furtive glance, her thin and compressed lips, her low brow, denote ignorance, rapacity, and cunning.

"How many have you there?" asks the driver, referring to a paper in his hand.

"Eight," responds the Captain.

"All right; there are ten more coming," and the speaker closes and bolts the door of his vehicle. Another like it takes its place, and the same scene is repeated with variations. A bloated and rough over-coated individual, with a collection of rheumatic umbrellas under his arm, is the first to descend. Of Jewish extraction evidently, his appearance is so swinish that we must believe his society is tabooed by his tribe at least. To the rag-picking fraternity he is closely allied. Vagrancy and drunkenness are written in letters of fire on his lurid visage.

"One of the roughs—a 'Cosmos,' is the next to appear. With his red shirt, black pants, and slouched felt; his tobacco-stained lips, swaggering walk, and insolent expression, he is a characteristic sample of the rowdies who infest the corners of the Bowery. "Hi! hi! there's Joe!" shouts a voice at the gate. It proceeds from one of the gay companions of the flashily-attired girls.

"How long you're in for?" continues the speaker.

Joe casts behind him a defiant grin of recognition and responds: "Ten days," adding, enigmatically, "Be sure you're there when I'm out." A rude grasp on the shoulder from an attendant policeman hurries him forward.

A painted, emaciated cyprian, with torn finery, follows. She seems exhausted, and with painful steps joins the gang. A broad-shouldered, pug-nosed, thick-set young ruffian, creates a small sensation as he shoves his bulk into view. There is a muttered chorus from a crowd of juvenile dock-loafers and pickpockets at the gate. "That's him, isn't it, Bill?" "Yes; he's a case—a jolly cove." Inquiring elicits the information that the renowned worthy is the hero of a recent prize-fight, in which "Black Mike" was badly "punished." The spoils of war, some twenty-five dollars, have been spent with the plainly visible effect. A female "sneak thief" and a 'longshoreman now appear. That haggard, and yet regular-featured wretch, the intellectual sparkle of whose eye is not entirely lost through liquor, has been a noted counterfeiter and served a long term in the State Prison.

Most of those whom we have seen have committed crimes for which the Penitentiary is the fitting place of punishment, though vagrancy, with disorderly conduct, is the only charge that can be positively proved against them in the courts. The Work-house gang is completed by the addition of a rum-eaten creature, even now so overcome with "stimulant" that she has to be supported by two of the boat attendants. The way to their proper receptacle on the steamboat is cleared, and the dingy, ragged gathering is marched forward, some twenty persons in all. Following, we see them disappear, single file, into the hold, through a door behind the engine-room in the centre compartment of the vessel. Although it is regularly cleaned, a noisome den must be that dépôt for so much filth, disease, and vice. We have no inclination whatever to ask to be allowed to examine its interior.

Now that we are upon the Bellevue, it is worth our while to employ our curiosity upon an institution which is so prominent a feature in the history of the criminal. Its name, Bellevue, is an euphonious title given (lucis a non lucendo) from a greater appreciation of sound than sense.

Though a new boat, its appropriately funereal garb makes it a dismal sight as to its exterior, harmonious with the wretchedness to be described within. The poetic designation given it by Island residents is somewhat more true, a "Tub of Misery." It has another claim to recognition in this essay, from the fact that it is mostly manned by Work-house prisoners, whose faded and patched jackets are every where obtrusive. A stigma is plainly fixed upon them, in the name of the institution to which they belong printed on their backs. A sullen crew are they; a cringing, slave-like expression upon the countenances of two or three; yet at times much gayety is observable among them. Like most specimens of degraded human nature they, as a rule, possess little kindness of feeling, even in respect to each other, and their sport frequently consists in tormenting one of their number more imbecile than the rest. Used to scenes of extreme suffering, their hearts have become hardened, and they look with lazy indifference upon that which causes a pang in the ordinary man. Were it not for the officers over them, the agonized Hospital cases would often fare badly in their hands; and they appear to regard with especial disgust those sent to the Island upon the same charges upon which they themselves have been committed. A drunken woman falling helplessly upon the deck would be there left to lie but for a command; and an aged though dissolute cripple might again and again entreat assistance, it would be denied him. Many of them feel little or no humiliation in their ignoble station. They have never known much better. The world visits upon poverty and ignorance the same contempt which it adjudges to crime, and to that contempt they have been all their life used. It is their normal state. One or two, as is to be expected, possess a fair share of intelligence. They were doubtless good mechanics until drink overthrew them. Keen remorse will sometimes assail these, but they summon an ignoble philosophy to their aid; they acknowledge themselves mastered by their passion, and supinely make no struggle against its influence.

There are some four or five Work-house women employed on the steamboat in keeping the vessel clean. What they are the reader has been already told in the general survey of the character of the inmates. They seem good-humored creatures (though the Ishmaelite expression is to be seen in their eyes), and conduct themselves with great decorum.

It is well known that crime, though a great leveler, has yet its aristocracy, and it may amuse the reader to learn that the Penitentiary prisoners look with disdain upon their fellows in the Work-house. Being the greater criminals, they in so far show more ability in running counter to the laws. Smartness and pluck, by those acknowledging no moral virtues, are of course the qualities most to be commended; hence doubtless their feeling of superiority.

ON BOARD THE "BELLEVUE"—ARRIVAL AT THE WORK-HOUSE DOCK.

As a class they are, indeed, much more noble-looking beings. Drink destroys the body, mind, and heart; selfishness, the main-spring of crime, exercises its debasing influence upon the heart chiefly, the intellect, though warped, losing none of its energy. The Work-house man is more harmful to himself than others; the Penitentiary prisoner one whom society may more justly fear. In truth, not only by themselves, but by a large proportion of the smaller Island officials, are the Penitentiary people the more respected; nor need it excite surprise when it is considered that they but think it in strict accordance with the code of worldliness, itself founded on pure selfishness. To the ordinary Work-house case there is naught in the future; but the Penitentiary convict may reasonably aspire to much. Brutishness reigns in the Work-house; a demoniac spirit in the Penitentiary. Demons are more respected than brutes.

In that "cleanliness is next to godliness" we see another reason why the Work-house prisoner is so much despised. The memory of that proverb explains the feeling prevalent in the boat on which we are; a comparatively decent set of men were those descending into the hold through that gangway in the bow of the vessel—thieves all, convicts for the Penitentiary.

Accommodations for Hospital cases are to be found in a side cabin in front of the paddle-box; where, too, the patient for the Lunatic Asylum is brought. Alms-house paupers may sit at pleasure on the lower deck. That blind old man, with his countenance covered with blue specks, is one of them. A gunpowder explosion occasioned his deformity and loss of vision. If we mistake not, we have seen him, and that little girl beside him, as beggars in the city street no long time since. That tearful woman in black near by, so thinly clad, is a companion in misfortune, destined to the same abode.

"Charity Hospital and Penitentiary!" shouts the Captain.

We have arrived at our first landing. There is a delay of ten minutes, in which we see the prisoners from the bow of the boat, arranged two abreast, under charge of the Penitentiary keepers, and marched to their place of punishment.

It is the close of winter as we glide by the Island, and although some of the buildings thereon attract a pleased vision, it possesses little of that picturesque charm which the foliage of summer lends it.

"Alms-house, Work-house, and Lunatic Asylum!"

We have reached our destination, and in company with other visitors disembark, the author stopping for a short period to take a sketch of the prisoners emerging from the hold. While so doing he notes a spectacle that did not strike him before—a woman with an infant in the midst of the imbruted group. Hers is the last stage of the drunkard's career. Her rags, her pallor, her bruises, hint at all the most dire effects of drink. Yet, as we learn, she has claim to the two sacred titles of wife and mother, though sacrilege it seems to call her by them. Wifely feelings, it is easy to surmise, she has entirely lost. Her own husband preferred the charge which has sent her into six months' imprisonment; a reptile he himself, rioting in some lodging cellar. Does she possess ought of maternal tenderness? Not one jot; she suckles her young as would a beast; would throw it in the gutter to grasp a glass of gin. We are thankful to know that her offspring will be taken from her while she is serving out her sentence, and sent to the Foundling Hospital of the Alms-house.

A gray-bearded individual in Work-house garb marshals the prisoners on the wharf, separating the sexes. He is an old habitu  of the institution, thoroughly acquainted with its whole management. His excessive demerits are in a certain sense beneficial to him, he becomes a sort of non-commissioned officer through his knowledge of the tactics; and thoroughly posted as to ways and means, gets many a luxury that his brethren in misfortune are deprived of. He is interrupted in his employment of counting the party and referring to a list in his hand by a shout.

"Hi, there! Take care of that man!"

Shrieking with extended arms, and fingers spasmodically clutching the air, his eyes distended in a frightened gaze, his blue lips quivering and his whole frame shaking with terror, an emaciated member of the gang backs toward the edge of the wharf.

"Catch hold of him, he'll drown himself!"

He is speedily seized by two of his companions and kept in the ranks.

"Ha, ha! he's got the horrors, worst kind," laughs one of the women.

"What did yer see, old Flibbertigibbet—old Sooty?" asks another.

"Yer ain't there yet, old boy; yer time ain't come," enigmatically sneers a third, and the whole party indulge in merriment at the expense of the victim of delirium tremens.

He, poor man, lost in a world of frightful imaginations, makes no response, and doubtless does not hear. But the frosty air cutting the ill-clad limbs of many, and unpleasant anticipations of what is in store for them, soon silence all mirth. We watch the dismal procession plodding wearily along until the female part disappears in the further extremity of the northern wing of the Work-house.

The bath-room now awaits those who need it; and what member of the party we have seen does not? The clothes upon them are exchanged for the coarse uniform of the institution, and, made into a compact parcel, are docketed and deposited in a place of safety, there to remain until the owners have fully served their periods of imprisonment.

And now let the writer introduce the disagreeable pronoun I, excusing it on the plea that it is necessary to the interest of the narrative. When, therefore, I started on my excursions in and about the Work-house I was accustomed to fill my pockets with carefully-dissected plugs of tobacco, that being, as soap once was in Texas, the current coin of the realm. At its appearance woebegone countenances brightened, content drew near, and confidential histories were unfolded. The male prisoners, almost without exception, are devotees of the weed, while the institution to which they belong considers it a luxury and does not furnish it. Upon my first stroll through the building the value of my foresight was made manifest.

"I say, boss!" was my greeting in an excited under-tone from a haggard individual peering through the iron-latticed window of a cell, "Got any tobacco, Mister? I haven't had a chew for a week."

"Yes, I can oblige you, I believe. How comes it you're not at work?"

"Thank you;" the piece of plug went to the fevered mouth with great rapidity, and his features lost much of their pained expression. A gleam of light had stolen into his dungeon. "Why ain't I at work? You see my eye, don't you? If I go out the cold will inflame it and make it worse."

He exhibited a discolored optic, which had evidently received a severe injury, the epidermis about it was cut and abraded to a considerable extent, while his countenance elsewhere showed contusions.

"So you don't prefer staying here to working, eh?"

"Of course not; being shut up all day and night in a cell is a hard lot. If I was well I wouldn't be allowed to do so either."

"What sent you up?" My face wore the expression of a man who sees another deeply wronged.

"Oh, a confounded fool of a policeman. You see I was returning from my work—I am a printer by trade—and as I crossed the Bowery I was attracted by something in the street, turned to look, and a Third Avenue car ran into me and knocked me down—hurting me as you see. An M. P. then rushed up, collared me, and said I was drunk. So I was committed here."

"Yours is a sad case," I rejoined, and, turning on my heel, renewed my inquiries concerning the charge against him by addressing a keeper.

"Oh, that fellow, he's an old customer. A fight in a disorderly house brought him here this time, along with several others, men and women. Knives and clubs were used as well as fists. He's a hard nut."

My curiosity was excited respecting the dismal inhabitants of other cells, and addressing a heavily-mustached, pale-faced man of some thirty years, I asked him how long he had been shut up.

"Oh, I came in at noon. I'll be put at work to-morrow."

"Have some tobacco? So you know something about the institution then; been here before?"

"N-no! What makes you think so?"

"Why, you seemed to know the programme pretty well; spoke of going to work—"

"Well then, yes, I was here four years ago for the first time, though of course I ain't proud of it;" and he smiled a sarcastic smile. He seemed a good-natured individual, more weak than villainous. I continued my inquiries.

"How long are you in for?"

"Six months, with a thousand dollars bail."

"Phew! that's pretty steep," I observed, adopting the style of language to which I supposed my vis-a-vis was accustomed. "What rumpus did you get into?"

"I'll tell you how it was. I had made the acquaintance of two Spaniards at a hotel I was stopping at, and we went to the theatre together. Returning from it late at night we were stopped by a policeman, who arrested us. I had a string of keys in my pocket belonging to boxes and rooms I owned, some cheaply made like skeleton keys, and the policeman said I was a burglar. That's the reason of my heavy sentence."

"Well, that's singular—I'm sorry for you;" and I walked off in apparent indignation at the abuse of power shown by officials; but the reader shrewdly surmises my cogitations were not entirely of that description. His story was hardly of the character which inspires belief. It is not wise, however, to discredit all the narratives given by the inmates; for although prisoners are not as a rule willing to confess their sins to an outsider, and lie persistently and even ridiculously, there is no question, as has been already noted, but that not unfrequently those are committed to the Work-house who do not properly belong there. In cases of insanity, particularly, this is even common. The rapid manner in which the magistrate of a police court receives depositions (from oftentimes ignorant persons) and examines prisoners is one cause of this. It is difficult to detect casually whether a person disorderly is so from liquor, evil inclinations, or lunacy.

As I continued my walk a physician from the Insane Asylum appeared in the ward, and, with a keeper, entered a cell to examine into the state of a supposed madman. It sometimes happens in the Work-house, and more frequently in the Penitentiary, that prisoners will "play crazy" for the purpose of being transferred to better quarters. They, however, seldom succeed. The madman in the case now presented was a bona fide specimen, and, involved in his strait-jacket of canvas, was soon escorted to the hospital for mental diseases. In the year 1864 thirty-six persons were thus transferred; but the number annually is often much greater. Sometimes almost two a-day for weeks will be sent over. An attaché of the Work-house informed me that most of the inmates who became thus afflicted were from the ranks of those employed about the sinks. He seemed to have established a theory that their occupation had somewhat to do with the misfortune; but in his statement that those selected for such purposes were the lowest, physically and mentally, of the prisoners, may, I think, be seen the true reason.

A procession of some dozen young men, white and black, attracted my attention before I left the ward. They made their exit from the bath-room, and had all just donned the dull gray, patched kersey garments furnished by the Commissioners. Each one carried in his hand the dirty bundle of his own clothing tied with a string, to which a wooden ticket was affixed. They were escorted by a prisoner to a large cell on the second tier, and there locked up.

JUST LOCKED UP.

Being somewhat interested in the state of their minds, I followed, and establishing myself opposite the grated door, smilingly regarded them, endeavoring by my demeanor to convey the impression that I was a "Hail fellow, well met," with the group of thieving vagabonds I confronted. My urbanity was not without its good results; they soon treated me as an equal, though more fortunately situated.

"What they going to do with us?"

"Why! haven't you been here before?"

"No; we don't know what's going to turn up—do we?" responded a well-featured youth of some twenty years, addressing the group.

He seemed to be the leader of the party; the others basing their line of conduct upon his. One of them appeared to have the utmost admiration for him, watching his face for signs of approval, and gaining courage from his reckless aspect. This leader laughingly replied:

"No, Bill; we're in for it now;" and drew closer to his companion, who placed his arm caressingly about his neck.

I felt compassion for the young vagrants. The pitiable results of ignorance, want, and vile associates were before me.

"What have you been up to?"

"Oh, we were in a dance-house in Water Street, when the police came and cleared us all out."

WORK-HOUSE TAILORS.

"Well, well; young fellows will get into scrapes. By-the-way, I am something of an artist, and would like to sketch your pictures."

I drew from my vest paper and pencils. There was a muttered chorus, "He's Harper's Artist," and a hasty departure from sight was made by the troop. The "leader" of the band alone maintained his position, exclaiming:

"What yer 'fraid of? Yer scared, all o' yer;" and the young ruffian, to illustrate his own hardihood, pressed his face close against the bars. His "manliness" soon brought to his side the remainder of the gang, and a comical variety of expression was before me. My air of bonhomie gradually departed as I proceeded with my drawing, and in view of my serious aspect he became convinced his friendship had been gained on false pretenses. I was made the subject of animadversions of a disagreeable character, and at one time he was considering aloud the propriety of spitting in my face. He mollified much, however, as I finished, and asked to see the sketch.

Ascending the iron staircase to the third tier I proceeded along the gallery and entered the shoemakers' room, where some twelve men were industriously employed. The "boss" leaned back in his chair at the further end of the apartment and lazily smoked a pipe, while the most complete order prevailed. Curious glances were directed toward me as I produced my drawing materials, and silence for a few minutes reigned; then, fully assured of my innocuous nature, one of their number recommenced a narrative of his luck in business outside, the customers he had had, the amount of work he had performed. His stories seemed to contain a good deal of "brag," and chuckles were not infrequent among his hearers, while he was interrupted continually by jokes and sarcastic utterances. They seemed all to be of the best class the Work-house furnishes; habitual drunkenness was doubtless their offense. In the year 1865 this shop produced some 855 pairs of men's shoes, 1318 pairs of women's shoes and slippers, besides other articles. It also repaired 1153 pairs of children's shoes for Randall's Island, and 1356 boots and shoes for the Work-house.

In the tailoring shop opposite I discovered some fifteen or twenty personages sitting, squatting, or lying upon a platform which ran the whole length of the room, and was supported by common carpenter's benches. All these worked in sullen silence upon pants and jackets of Work-house cloth. They seemed to be repairing rather than making. I finished my sketch of oddities among them without exciting any interest save that the master left the room for a moment to consult with a keeper as to the propriety of my intrusion. Without wishing to be indelicate, I would state that mending such garments as I then saw must involve certain tribulations, as one of the party divided his time pretty equally between attentions to his own epidermis and the work in hand. During the year 1865 a great quantity of goods was manufactured here, including 334 kersey jacksets, 984 kersey pants, 1118 boys' jackets, 1185 boys' pants as well as many vests, over-coats, etc. Repairing was also done upon 7896 pieces of boys' clothing, and 2827 pieces of men's apparel.

Retracing my steps I now proceeded through the long narrow gallery to the centre building, in which, before passing through it to the female wards, I made a drawing of the Sewing-room which is located in the church auditory. My entrance produced no little snickering among the two or three hundred women assembled, which was considerably increased by my taking a seat near the altar, directly confronting them as they sat in long settees busily plying the needle. In the sea of faces upturned before me there were few that could be called even comely. The ages ranged from sixteen to seventy. The younger wore an expression of gay recklessness, the older a stolid look of debased indifference; yet among these latter I occasionally desried quite a motherly countenance. The history of the individual owning it might, however, have told me that it was merely an aspect of brutish good-nature. I recognized many faces I had seen on the Bellevue dock; but dressed now in the clean, yellowish white uniform of the institution they little resembled their former selves. A quiet air pervaded the gathering—an air even of content. I wondered at the order maintained amidst such a lawless set, superintended by a single matron, a slight woman in black, who occasionally promenaded the aisle; until I thought of the dark cell, the only punishment in vogue at the Work-house, but which is dreaded in proportion to its isolation. Insolence was sure to be rewarded by incarceration there.

A large table near me was presided over by a prisoner, an elderly and even respectable-looking woman, who examined the work submitted to her as finished by her companions. The nature of many was plainly exhibited as they did this, and were thus brought under the special observation of "Harper's Artist." The opportunity to give a display of hardihood was not to be lost, and comical were the grimaces and extravagant the gestures that one woman especially made, to the great delight of her fellows. They were then mostly employed in knitting and darning stockings. This department of the Work-house turned out last year nearly 2000 pairs of women's stockings and 1000 pairs of men's socks, about 1500 dresses for women and girls, etc., etc.

As my eyes rested on interesting countenances among the workers, I could not help believing that one or two of them owed their presence there to injustice, and I called to mind an anecdote communicated to me by a worthy clergyman who has long been connected with the Institutions on the Island. It is amusing on the surface, though saddening in its depths. A German prisoner related to him her story, which he afterward proved to be true. She lived at Spuyten Duyvel Creek, and having been shopping in New York city, by some means got delayed beyond the hour of evening in which it is usual for unprotected females to appear in the streets. Hurrying, then, to the ferry, she was rudely stopped by a policeman, who asked where she was going. With indignation and broken English she rapidly informed him she was going to Spuyten Duyvel.

The astute officer instantly adjudged that she was swearing, arrested her, and had her sent to the Island as a vagrant given to disorderly conduct. When my friend met her she was a most miserable woman; her wifely and motherly feelings were stirred to their inmost recesses; a husband and three children awaited in agonized ignorance her arrival at their fireside. He proved her case, and she was released from du-rance vile. The consummate hypocrisy of many inmates prevents, however, as a rule, credence to such tales. I may add, that my personal experience inclines me especially to be skeptical.

A fair-haired young Englishman, of some twenty-four years, being transferred from the Work-house to be assistant to the clerk of the Lunatic Asylum, was brought specially under my notice. His intelligence struck me, and his story won my sympathy. He was a civil engineer by profession, and, as he said, was connected with George Francis Train at the time that dignity was engaged in city railroad affairs in London. He manifested the greatest admiration for the acuteness of his principal, and his anecdotes concerning his method of business were full of interest. A frolic of a rather extravagant nature had sent him to the Island. He had arrived in New York with pockets full of money, having just resigned a situation as engineer on a Southern line of railroad, and, while looking for something to turn up, had yielded to the wild spirit of youth and become involved in dissipation. His abilities and manners won him many friends during the period of his incarceration. Upon its conclusion he went to the city for a day or two, having borrowed a few dollars, and returned saying he had secured a situation as civil engineer in a company about starting for Switzerland. The next day he again went to the city to settle some matters in connection with his proposed scheme, and the weather being somewhat cold he induced a gentleman resident in the Asylum to lend him a fine over-coat. He borrowed a few small articles of wearing apparel as well as money from other persons, and then, although he had stated he would come back to the Asylum that same evening, neither he nor his plunder was ever seen there again.

As I entered the female wards I was desirous of examining the dark cell so strongly presented to my imagination as I sat sketching in the Sewing-room. A keeper politely conducted me to its location on the ground-floor of the building, and I desisted some six of them side by side. They were merely empty stone apartments with heavy double doors, the outside one of which had the appearance, to a casual glance, of the door of the ordinary cell. Closer inspection, however, showed that its grate-work was merely painted, and that it was thoroughly impenetrable by light. With both shut and bolted the blackest night must reign in the dungeon, and to an evil conscience given up to itself therein, with the attendant demons of ignorance, imagination, and superstition, it must indeed seem hideous.

"Is there any one confined here now?" I asked of the keeper.

"Yes, one. Would you like to take a sketch?"

A clanging of iron and we were admitted into No. 80. What resembled a bundle of clothes lay on the floor in a corner, but as my eyes became accustomed to the dim light I recognized the crouching figure of a woman, her head between her knees, and her hands clasped about it.

"Get up there!" was harshly commanded.

The creature, throwing back her disheveled hair, shiveringly arose, and placing herself awkwardly against the wall, gazed upon us with frightened aspect.

The keeper regarded her with a cynical air of triumph; and if there had been aught of rebellion in her she was thoroughly mastered—there was no question about that. Compassion fairly stung me as I looked. I hastily turned away. Hard as were her features, depraved as had been her life, her complete humiliation was most pitiable.

"How long has she been there?"

"About six hours."

"What was her offense?"

"A matron had her shut up for insults and continual insolence."

I was now invited to see the women at dinner. The hour was fast approaching, and as I was absorbed in making a drawing of the interior of a cell with its occupants, two savage-looking Amazons, bearing between them a large tin vessel of soup, struck against me in their impetuous march, and considerably disturbed my equilibrium. I soon regained it and my sketchbook, however, and with unmoved visage finished my task.

"What are they in there for?" I asked, addressing some stragglers through the hall, and indicating the dismal group whose figures I had drawn.

"Ha! ha! they're just off the streets—look blue, don't they?"

They did indeed wear the saddest expression of any about me. Mortifying reflections seemed devouring each one; in dogged silence they sat, their eyes fixed on the floor. Their appearance afforded the utmost amusement to the hilarious prisoner who had answered me; but my occupation also interested her, and calling to a woman passing by she exclaimed:

"Hi, Sal! don't you want your dagrytype taken? Here's your chance; get it done cheap!" There raged a desire among all the inmates to have every body's portrait taken except their own.

The dinner-bell sounded, and from the cells soon appeared a large body of women, who, forming themselves into single file under the eye of a keeper, advanced with great decorum along the hall and up the narrow staircase to the mess-rooms. The different work-rooms also sent forth their processions, which streamed along the various galleries. It was a novel and instructive sight; the discipline maintained was evidently most effectual. The sober air which pervaded all, the whitish uniform of the females, the long corridors, with other details, presented many of the features of a nunnery, and I was lost in an imaginative reverie to be rudely disrupted by—"Take care of yourself there; you'll get the dark cell, my lady!" in the harsh voice of the keeper.

On the narrow tables, scarcely a foot wide, were placed at regular and close intervals pans of soup, in addition to which each individual received a good-sized piece of bread meted out to her upon entrance by a prisoner selected for the purpose, who presided over a large box. The meal was eaten in perfect silence—the negro portion of the assemblage forming a select circle. Enough was provided, but I could see many would have eaten more; and when, as sometimes happened, a rather smaller piece of bread than usual was delivered, it was received with an enraged sniff. The two mess-rooms seated, I should judge, some four hundred. Upon the conclusion of the meal the keeper, who had all along manifested great interest in my drawings, proposed to add to my repertory two fine samples of the prisoners. The first brought before me was a light-haired woman of forty years, who acted much as would a little girl called from the nursery for the delectation of a grave visitor of her parents. Her tongue wriggled about her lips, and both hands were occasionally pressed upon her cheeks, the fingers entering her mouth as she fidgeted upon her seat, gazing now into my eyes with a scared and mystified smile, and then casting side-glances at her amused companions, while a giggle ever and anon shook her frame.

"She's crazy, isn't she?" I asked.

"She crazy? A more cunning creature never came to the institution."

"Well, she's silly, then?"

"Yes, sometimes."

While finishing her portrait I was confronted with the second sample, whom the keeper had taken much time and care in selecting. She was, in truth, a Work-house case from head to foot; her scarred lip and bloated countenance indicated many a scene of riot and debauchery; but the presentation of her likeness spares me further description. As she came before me, she wore her gown over her head, which, it seems, was contrary to the laws, and the keeper put it down with more rudeness than I thought necessary; but I soon forgave him, for as she arose to go away, and I with much savvy was thanking her for her motionless sitting, she made a muttered remark to attract my attention, and then thrust out her hand for my watch-chain. I saw the action before it was too late, and she proceeded to her cell without having perpetrated the delicate little robbery.

In the third story I found the Hoop-skirt Factory as well as the apartment in which the manufacture of cigars had once been carried on. The contractor for the latter had just suspended business. The Hoop-skirt Factory exhibited some twenty-six women at work. They were presided over by a stout male keeper as well as a forewoman. The latter, addied by the contractor, would fare hardly amidst the reckless gathering were it not for her matronly protector, who strode about slapping his thigh with a light cane. I learned that few, if any, of those employed knew the trade before entering the Work-house, but that a knowledge of it was easily acquired, two weeks sufficing for a very ordinary intellect to master all the details and manipulation. A pressing machine was situated in a separate room, and was used to securely fasten the circlets of the skirt upon wires, crossing them at right angles, tin clamps being employed. Two of the youngest women I had seen about the institution were here at work. One of them was even pretty, with a black, bright, and malicious eye, and a thick shock of dark hair. This flying in all directions and bristling up from her forehead, gave her a very weird look, of which she was conscious, striving to intensify it for my amusement by spreading her locks more wildly. The keeper leaving the room, she at once stopped working and advanced toward me, fixing an ardent gaze upon me. I was flattering myself with the conviction that I had inspired love at first sight, when more careful observation induced the belief that my watch, not myself, was the attraction. The keeper now returning, she resumed her seat and made vigorous efforts to gain my admiration by apparently swallowing the tin clamps which lay about her in abundance. These were also used to administer to that feminine love of ornament, as noticeable and common in prisons as elsewhere. Her fellow-laborer had woven them into a net which glistening confined her back-hair.

BUILDING SEA-WALL.

My first sketch about the grounds of the Work-house was made in the middle of winter. A large party of men were engaged on a pond in cutting and transporting ice for the use of the institution. With spears they fished the sawn ice from the water and pushed it over the frozen surface to their fellows, who carried it on wooden barrows to the proper place of deposit. The Work-house spirit was seen everywhere. Those who could rested at once from their toil, and, collecting in groups, lazily smoked and talked; some of the younger men, however, seemed to enjoy the sport of jumping on large cakes, to which they had given impetus, and gliding sledge-fashion over the ice.

I have often been amused by the method of working shown by the prisoners. While the foundations for certain buildings erecting for the Lunatic Asylum were being dug some twenty men were employed in wheeling earth. They started off in a procession, each with his barrow filled, and then turning a corner were out of sight of the keeper, when instantly the whole line stopped, each man seating himself upon his vehicle. This was always done with the regularity of clock-work. One soul animated the gang, only inspired to exertion by the appearance of the officer. This lazy feeling is indicated in the sketch of the prisoners building sea-wall. Of course, seeing that no remuneration thereunto accrues, no one expects them to work with much gusto, still it is to be believed that an energetic man could not from habit refrain from being industrious in the task given him.

The picturesque, and indeed comical, aspect of a party breaking stones near the river attracted my attention. The weather was somewhat chilly; although the sun shone brightly a cold wind made the thinly clad feel uncomfortable, and as protection against this, several of the men had ensconced themselves in old baskets lying about. I discovered in the overseer of the gang an individual who had been employed at the Asylum in the more congenial occupation of writing. Drink there procured had rendered him insolent to the Warden of the Work-house, and he was in consequence reduced to his present position. The gift of a cigar established us on familiar footing, and he became quite communicative concerning his fellow-prisoners under him.

"What's that man tied his pants tight about the ankles for—that man who keeps walking up and down?"

"Oh, the poor devil hasn't any stockings; he wishes to keep the wind off. He's quite a smart old boy in his way—has an invention connected with a steam-engine he means to patent and realize a fortune from."

"You have clever men up here, then?"

"Yes, sometimes. You see that grizzled little fellow with the bright black eye, he's one of them. Commenced life as a clerk, I believe—took to drinking, wrote poetry for the Sunday papers, delirium tremens—has been to several Lunatic Asylums. In one he wrote a novel depicting life therein, rather scandalizing the institution. It fell into the Physician's hands, who burned it up. He escaped sentence for forgery in Massachusetts by a plea of insanity. Has been engaged in lecturing and in giving concerts. He can get off a good thing, too. Up there at the Asylum, where he was for a time, there's a watchman named Cordial, who had occasion to carry him forcibly back to the 'Lodge' in one of his freaks. As he was rather roughly handled, he exclaimed, 'This is what I call a Cordial reception!' Not bad, eh? Then, too, being rebuked by an official, who told him he wanted none of his impudence, 'Of course you don't, my good Sir, you've got enough of your own."

"Look at that man!" I exclaimed, interrupting the recital, and pointing to an individual who, having laid aside his hammer, had produced from his hat a beet, a carrot, and some crusts of bread, involved in a dirty handkerchief, and then unbuttoning his vest revealed a larger stock of refuse vegetables, including potatoes, which he proceeded leisurely to munch.

"Look at him, I think he's awful!"

"Offal, of course he is; he went to the dogs long ago. No amount of victuals will satisfy that fellow. As soon as he with some others come out to work in the morning, they strike a bee line for the swill tubs of the Asylum and stuff their jackets, pants, and hats with greasy beets and pieces of bread. They're used to it, the gluttons; it's the way many of them supported life while in the city."

"Don't the institution feed them well?"

"It feeds them; they get as much as others, of course; but they always complain of feeling hungry."

Near by these stone-breakers a gang of some fifty Penitentiary prisoners were engaged in blasting rocks, and I may as well state here for the benefit of visitors to the Island, that the Penitentiary men are to be distinguished from others by their uniforms of whitish material, striped horizontally with dark brown.

I have rarely observed Work-house women employed in outdoor work save in that intimately connected with feminine pursuits, such as the hanging of clothes to dry. Yet at one time I used to remark a couple of stalwart females on the steamboat dock, who busied themselves in lading and unlading a cart, which drove down from their prison. The odd situation of these Amazons, as they "chaffed" with the men around, their bold and confident looks, their apparent delight in their masculinity, fastened them securely in my memory. I have since learned they were connected with the Cigar Factory. Occasionally, as the cart was about starting on a return to the institution, one of them would bound upon it, and rushing up to the driver, amidst laughter, would throw him aside with her brawny arms, and seizing the reins, incite the horse in Jehu-like fashion.

I propose to take my leave of the Island in the barge of the Work-house Superintendent. While waiting in the boat-house for the hour of going let me descant upon the crews about me, for they deserve more than a passing glance. These men differ from other prisoners in being mostly self-committed. I presume, however, there are those employed elsewhere who have done the same. They commit themselves from a knowledge of their own weakness in combating their passion for drink, and the consequent difficulties and diseases in which it involves them; though some from inaptitude for work, and fondness for a comparatively easy time—a life free from care. Many of them have lost a leg. The number of maimed in the institution is plentiful.

"We get better feed, we boatmen, than the others," said to me a man who bore about him unmistakable marks of being "constitutionally tired." "We get roast meat quite often." And the fellow licked his chops and grinned, as though the savory viand was before him.

"You rather like it here, I guess," I returned.

"Yes; I'm found, and have easy work. Next summer, when my time's up, I shall go to Pennsylvania and get on a canal-boat. I've cooked on 'em often." He lolled back in his chair and gazed up in my face with a cunning gleam in his stupid eye which seemed to say, "You think I'm a fool; but I'm a knowing un, I am."

Some three or four possessed the average share of intelligence. Among them was a thickly-bearded, heavily-bodied man, whose forte was politics; the state of the country continually occupied his attention. Quite a philosopher, his remarks were often humorously sarcastic; but he was decidedly an Epicurean, and, though true to his school, his thoughts were not very profound.

A few surly visages were present, but the majority exhibited an easy tone of mind that was indifferent to trouble. Genuine shame at their degraded position was visible in one or two, but the remainder were evidently in their normal state. Time passed agreeably with those by the help of cards, pipes, and a few books and newspapers. Sleep had its adorers. When a dime novel made its appearance it was amusing to see and listen to the group that gathered about the individual reading it aloud. Be happy, O Novelist! thou hast not lived in vain. Tears stood in the eyes of those little used to weep when the sufferings of thy Amelia and her Adolphus were related. The brilliant description of the enraged bull and the heroic devotion of the distracted lover awakened enthusiasm; and where Amelia piteously and eloquently bewails the absence of Adolphus there arose a chorus: "That's what I call fine writing!" "That's nice!" "Lovely, and no mistake!" Although one stalwart member of the party expressed disgust, exclaiming, "That's — bosh—wishy-wash!" and strode to the open air to ease his indignation. Every thing that is good, and sentimentalism is not an exception.

But I hear a trampling of feet, and the voice of the Captain sings out:

"All aboard!"

The sturdy and active muscles of the crew urge me swiftly across the river, strong as is the current; and hoping my readers have derived as much interest as myself from my visits to the Work-house, I am landed at Seventy-ninth Street.

THE LADY OF MY DREAMS.

HER face is stern, but wondrous fair
Of feature, and her raven hair
Falls down in silken ripples where,
Wrapp'd round by sleep, I see her stand,
A visitor from some dim land,
This Lady of my Dreams.

Close to my bedside through the night,
Until the dawning of the light
Strikes feebly on my waking sight,
She stands, and at the break of day,
Like to a ghost, she flits away
With morning's earliest beams.

Twined with her locks of raven hair
Are countless brazen serpents there,
Whose hisses rend the tortured air
From topaz tongues of sharpened flame,
Forked lightnings tipped with deadliest aim,
That lure the charmed sight.

I know the time that she draws nigh,
Slow pass the hours when she is by,
A sullen fire glows in her eye,
That burns into my heart and brain,
Down deepening with a sense of pain,
Through all the troubled night.

Uplifted high above her head
Its blade all dashed with drops of red,
As if by it some heart had bled,
She holds a dagger in the air,
This woman with the face so fair,
The Lady of my Dreams.

Descending straight toward my breast,
Its hilt by her fair fingers prest,
Slowly, but with no show of rest,
Closer it nears my shuddering heart,
When, waking with a sudden start,
The gray dawn coldly gleams.

What is this vision of the night
That vanishes with morning's light,
And ever cheats my waking sight—
Is it the ghost of guilt once wrought
In lasting deed or nursed in thought?
Oh, this it sometimes seems!

Often when by myself I sit,
Bound with slight threads by memory knit,
Unseen the shadow seems to flit
Before me, she with face so fair,
The woman with the raven hair,
The Lady of my Dreams.

VENICE.

GRAND were the old barbaric days
 When in her regal splendor throned
 She ruled—a light-effulging sphere,
 By tributary kingdoms zoned;
 The Cleopatra of the earth
 She reveled then, while on her breast
 The wealth of all the Orient glowed
 •And blinded the adoring West.

Oh! saddest spectacle of earth—
 That queenly brow the common scorn,
 Its grandeur wholly passed away,
 Its beauty utterly forlorn!
 A desolation as of death
 Has stricken to that royal heart—
 What but a memory is her fame?
 Where in the present is her part?

And for the future? years will die,
 And years on years, revolving moons
 Will gild her lion's shadowy wings,
 And tremble in her still lagoons.
 But never will the hour return
 That yields her back her ancient reign,
 And never will the nations bend
 In homage at her feet again.

The past is past. No second prime,
 No second summer beauty knows,
 And she, the fallen, the forlorn,
 Has but her memories and her woes;
 No gleams of freedom stir her heart,
 No visions of recovered power—
 Only her beauty can not die,
 And it and sorrow are her dower.

WHEN the Spanish adventurer, Ponce de Leon, in the spring of 1513, came in sight of the verdant valleys and flowery savannas of the southeastern extremity of the North American Continent, he gave to the blooming region the beautiful name of "Florida." The country, as it opened before him, presented the aspect of a vast undulating prairie, with fragrant evergreen trees, scattered at such distances from each other as to allow a luxuriant growth of grass and flowers all the year round. Its climate, sunny, serene, salubrious, seemed like that of Paradise. Though subsequent explorations revealed extensive swamps and widespread barrens, yet there were vast regions of fertility and loveliness, presenting attractions such as can scarcely elsewhere be found upon this globe.

After many vicissitudes of ownership Florida was ceded to the United States in 1819. It was a grand accession to the National Government, and essential to our security and power.

The State is 285 miles long, and from 50 to 250 miles wide, containing 56,000 square miles, being just about the size of England, excluding Scotland and Wales. With great energy the National Government commenced improving its new possession, surveying the region, removing obstructions from rivers and harbors, rearing fortresses, liquidating Indian titles, and carrying on a long and bloody war with the Seminoles. In these ways it is estimated that nearly fifty millions of dollars have been expended, besides thousands of lives.

When the frenzy of Secession swept over the South, Florida had about 80,000 white inhabitants. On the 4th of January, 1861, two months before the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln, the Charleston (South Carolina) Mercury made an earnest appeal to the people of Florida to seize the United States forts. In this appeal it was stated that there were no forts belonging to the National Government more important than those in Florida; that these forts commanded the whole Gulf trade; and that if the people of Florida, in imitation of the treasonable example of Georgia and Alabama, would seize these forts, then "the commerce of the North will fall an easy prey to our bold privateers; and California gold will pay all such little expenses on our part."

On the 11th of January sixty-two men, in the State Convention, passed an ordinance that Florida did not belong to the Government of the United States. It was, according to their vote, entirely an independent realm, to remain independent, or to be surrendered, at their option, to any other power. The next day an armed mob seized the Navy-yard, at Pensacola, and Fort Barrancas. The commandant had no means of resistance, and was compelled to surrender and allow his flag to be hauled down. The Navy-yard contained 156,000 dollars' worth of ordnance stores. The United States schooner Dana was then in those waters, engaged in the Coast Survey. On the 15th that was seized by the rebels. Soon after, a law was enacted by the Florida Legislature that, should there be any collision between the National Government and these insurgents in Florida, any person who should consent to hold office under the United States Government should be declared guilty of treason and punished with death.

Fortunately Fort Pickens, at the mouth of Pensacola Harbor, on the eastern extremity of the Island of Santa Rosa, was so situated that, though held by a feeble garrison, the rebels, who had no navy, could not capture it. But they had collected an army of 8000 men under General Bragg on the adjacent shores, and had reared such formidable batteries that our blockading squadron riding in the offing could not approach the fort with reinforcements or supplies. On Friday night, the 12th of April, the night before the fire was opened upon Fort Sumter, taking advantage of the darkness, a number of boats, loaded with men and military stores, under command of Lieutenant Albert N. Smith, of Massachusetts, left the fleet, and, with hushed voices and muffled oars, glided past those rebel batteries, which, by a few discharges, could have blown their boats to fragments, and succeeded in landing such reinforcements as to place the fort beyond all immediate danger. A few nights after, on the 15th, the experiment was repeated, adding a thousand troops to the garrison. The rebels were exceedingly anxious to get possession of Fort Pickens. Among the various plans suggested, the following novel one was proposed by a writer in the Mobile Register:

"By mixing red pepper and veratria with the powder with which the shells are filled, or by filling large shells of extraordinary capacity with poisonous gases, and throwing them very rapidly into the fort, every living soul would have to leave in double-quick time. It would be impossible to breathe there."

The National Government had constructed at Pensacola a very fine dry dock, which had cost a million and a half of dollars. The rebels had towed this out into the channel and partially sunk it to prevent the passage of vessels into the Bay. They were preparing to remove it to another spot where it would effectually bar the passage of any of our gun-boats. The night of the 2d of September, succeeding a day of storm and rain, was still, but cloudy and dark. A little after 9 o'clock Lieutenant Shipley, with a picked crew of eleven men, left the beach in front of the fort and rowed noiselessly for the dry dock. To their surprise no sentinels were found on board. They had taken with them the most effective combustible materials and three large Columbiad shells. The shells were placed in the boilers, and the combustibles being properly arranged, the torch was applied. The boat's crew had scarcely pulled twenty yards from the vessel when the flames burst forth, and the shells exploded, filling the air with fragments. The whole bay was illumined with the billows of flame which shot up into the sky. All night long the conflagration raged fiercely, consuming the vast mass of timber, and when the morning dawned nothing was left of the superb structure but smouldering, shapeless ruins floating upon the water.

For some time there was now an apparent cessation of hostilities. But both parties were alike vigilant; each watching for an opportunity to strike the other a blow. The following brilliant affair, which occurred at this time, deserves special record:

There was a schooner at the Pensacola Navy-yard fitting out for a privateer. Flag-officer William Mervine, of the Colorado, resolved to destroy it. He prepared an expedition of four boats manned by 100 officers and men. Captain Bailey, of the Colorado, matured the plan and arranged all its details. Lieutenant Russell had charge of the expedition. There were a thousand rebels encamped in the Navy-yard, and a strong guard on board the schooner. At half past 3 o'clock in the morning of the 14th of September the boats left the fleet for their daring adventure. The event is thus described by a Confederate officer:

"The storm sprang not upon the most brilliant and daring act which has marked the history of the war. Some 400 men in the morning five launches, mounting about thirty-five men each, pulled across from Santa Rosa toward the Fort-cast, a distance of about two miles. Each launch had in it a small brass howitzer on a pivot. Their main object seems to have been to burn the largest entrance of our harbor police, which was anchored near the wharf. They were led by an officer with the courage of forty Virginia boys, and their success was perfect.

"Close upon the darkness, steadily, with undisturbed courage, they approached the wharf, and were not discovered until near their goal. They then pulled rapidly to the wharf and grappled to her, when their firing, under cover, 'shoot her' leading the way himself with point-blank fire, he had not a flaming fire-ball in the water. He threw the faintest star to the head of the entrance, and he had the sense that the war at Fort Pickens was over. He took to their launch and pulled the ship, so he said that a shower of grape would soon be raining about them. They pulled off a short distance; but before going they sent back a shower of grape from their howitzers, directed upon our gun as they were firing. The schooner turned rapidly and we had to cut her loose from the wharf to save her from destruction. She floated off in the night, emitting a brilliant flood of light over the surrounding darkness of the water."

Though the above narrative is not minutely accurate, it shows the impression the bold adventure produced upon the minds of the rebels. In fact, the vessel was found with her crew on board, moored to the wharf, under protection of a battery and field-piece. As our boats approached the crew poured into them a volley of musketry. The boatmen, cutlass in hand, sprang on board, and, after a short but desperate fight, drove the crew on to the wharf, where, joined by the guard, they rallied, and kept up a continued fire upon our men. In the mean time a small party landed to spike a great gun. This was accomplished by Lieutenant Sproston and gunner Horton. In fifteen minutes the whole work was accomplished, the gun spiked and the schooner fired. As our boats pulled back, when a few yards from the shore they rallied, and from their howitzers fired six charges of canister into the yard. Several of our men were killed or wounded in this brilliant adventure. The loss of the rebels is not known.

In a few weeks the rebels attempted to retaliate. For some months they had been surrounding Fort Pickens with batteries, and arming them with their heaviest guns. It was their design, by a simultaneous concentric fire, to batter down its walls as Sumter had been reduced.

The night of the 9th of October was intensely dark. In the darkness 1500 rebels landed on the eastern end of Santa Rosa Island, and attacked Fort Pickens in the rear, hoping to carry it by surprise. The midnight storm of battle was terrible, with its vivid lightnings and its pealing thunders. The assailants were repulsed, driven back with serious slaughter to their boats, and breathless, bleeding, and smitten with consternation with difficulty succeeded in reaching the shelter of their batteries.

On the morning of the 22d Colonel Harvey Brown, who was in command of Fort Pickens, opened fire upon the batteries of the foe. The fleet, under command of Flag-officer M'Kean, co-operated. There instantly arose such a tempest of war as has rarely been witnessed in this or any other land. The rebels had two forts—M'Rae and Barrancas—and fourteen separate batteries, armed with 10-inch Columbiads and 13-inch sea-coast mortars. All day long the terrific roar of battle shook the hills. For a few hours during the night there was silence, but not much repose, as both parties were preparing to resume the strife on the morrow.

The next morning the desperate battle commenced anew. The combatants were hurling enormous and deadly missiles at each other from a distance of between two and three thousand yards. Fort M'Rae and several batteries of the rebels were silenced the day before. The fire from the Union fort, batteries, and ships became increasingly deliberate and effective. About noon nearly the whole of Warrenton was in flames, and a large part of the Navy-yard. The conflict continued all day until dark, and then, until 2 o'clock in the morning, shells were occasionally thrown into the works of the foe. The scene presented in the night by the conflagration was grand in the extreme. Fort Pickens, though it had been struck by a great many shot and shell, was as efficient for action at the close as at the commencement of the combat. One gun was dismounted, one man killed, and four wounded. The rebel loss in life and limb was also small, as the gunners were so well protected. The rebel batteries were much knocked to pieces, and their loss by the conflagration severe.

The first of January, 1862, was ushered in with another artillery battle in Pensacola Bay, from forts and batteries, which was continued far into the night. The combatants stood at such a distance from each other that though they made a tremendous noise, and hurled at each other the most ponderous missiles, no decisive results were gained. The spectacle at night was magnificent. Several buildings in the Navy-yard and a large part of the town of Woolsey were in flames. The graceful curve of every shell through the air could be traced from the time it left the gun until it exploded. The illumination was so brilliant that it was seen by our ships forty miles at sea. Nothing effective was accomplished by these bombardments.

On the 28th of February Commodore Du Pont sailed from Hilton Head with quite a fleet of transports and gun-boats to take possession of important posts along the eastern shore of Florida. In the extreme northeastern corner of Florida is situated the little town of Fernandina, on Amelia Island, which is separated from the main land by a narrow sound. At Fernandina is found one of the best harbors on the Atlantic coast south of Chesapeake Bay. It was all-important to close this port against blockade-runners. Commodore Du Pont's squadron consisted of twenty-six vessels, including gun-boats and transports, and conveyed a battalion of marines under Major Reynolds, and a brigade under General Wright. As they drew near Fernandina they learned from a contraband that the rebels had been informed of their approach, and were evacuating the forts and flying from the island in terror. As the heavier gun-boats could not easily thread the narrow channel Commander P. Drayton was sent forward in the steam-sloop Pawnee, with six light-draught gun-boats and three armed launches, with orders "to push through the sound with the utmost speed, to save public and private property from threatened destruction; to prevent poisoning the wells, and to put a stop to all those outrages, by the perpetration of which the leaders of this nefarious war hope to deceive and exasperate the people of the South."

On the northern extremity of the island is situated Fort Clinch. This was so manifestly abandoned that Commander Drayton without delay merely sent an armed boat on shore to raise the American flag, and pushed on. As they came in sight of Fernandina a train of cars, laden with soldiers and military stores, was seen just starting to run down the island four miles, and then, crossing by a bridge, to escape to the main land. The road ran along for some distance on the shore of the sound. Southern locomotives are proverbially slow of foot. There ensued, perhaps, an unprecedented race between the steamboat and the railroad train. The Ottawa pelted the fugitive cars with her 11-inch shells, until the conductor, having cut off some of the rear cars and put on extra steam, succeeded in effecting his escape.

In the mean time a rebel steamer was discovered, heavily laden, also endeavoring to escape down the narrow sound. The boat was filled with women and children, flying in terror from the outrages they had been told the Yankee soldiery would perpetrate. The rebel authorities had compelled all the citizens to leave the town. As the Ottawa hurled her terrific missiles at the rebel steamer, a mile distant, the women and children with shrieks, and upon their knees, entreated the commander to surrender. Their heart-rending supplications could not move him. He owned the boat and a large number of negroes on board, and he was willing to peril the lives of his helpless passengers for the chance of escaping with his property.

The rebel steamer was overtaken and captured. Jacob Brock, of Vermont, was the captain. He had resided in Florida twenty-three years, and owned a plantation and about a hundred negroes. The Ottawa, C. R. P. Rogers commanding, after the capture, steamed about ten miles north to the little town of St. Mary, on the Georgia border, where it was supposed that the armament from Fort Clinch had been taken, and then ascended the river several miles on a reconnoissance. As they were returning, when passing a bend in the stream, where the channel brought them near to the shore, a Mississippi regiment concealed in the bushes poured upon the deck a storm of bullets. Commander Rogers was all prepared for this. His guns, heavily charged with grape, were immediately brought to bear upon the foe in ambush. The effect of one discharge, as our steamer swept along, was truly appalling. "The shrieks of the wounded and the groans of the dying could be distinctly heard, while the sailors at the mast-head could see the men falling." But five on board the Ottawa were wounded, though many had their clothes torn by bullets. The punishment inflicted upon the rebels, as they were left groaning, mangled, bleeding, dying, was dreadful.

As Commodore Du Pont examined the works at Fernandina he was surprised that they should have been surrendered without a struggle. There were forts and batteries, armed with the heaviest guns, which commanded all the turnings of the channel. The batteries were concealed and so protected by sand-hills as to afford perfect shelter for the men. Many of the guns were 38-pounders. There were several 8-inch guns, and also one 80 and one 120 pounder rifled gun. "We captured Port Royal," says Commodore Du Pont, "but Fernandina and Fort Clinch have been given to us."

A railroad ran directly across the neck of the Florida Peninsula, from Fernandina to Cedar Keys, on the Mexican Gulf. As Cedar Keys had been captured by a Union force on the 16th of January, both termini of the railroad were now in our possession. The inhabitants at Fernandina stated that the rebels intended to abandon all the sea-port towns, and make a desperate stand in the interior.

On the 12th of March four of the gun-boats, the Ottawa leading, entered the mouth of the St. Johns River to take possession of the beautiful town of Jacksonville, which contained some three thousand inhabitants, and was situated on the north bank of the stream about twenty-five miles from its mouth. Lieutenant Stevens, in the Ottawa, led this expedition. It was late in the evening before all the gun-boats had crossed the bar. The western horizon was then brightly illumined by the flames of the mills, houses, and other property belonging to Northern men who were suspected of Union sympathies. The rebel commander, General Trapier, is said to have issued this barbaric order. As the vessels ascended the romantic stream, rich in lovely scenery, they were surprised and delighted to find such decisive indications of Union sentiments. Many Northern families had emigrated to Florida, and not a few of them retained their loyalty to the National flag.

Men, women, and children, and groups of ever-friendly slaves, stood upon the banks greeting the passing boats with cheers and waving of handkerchiefs. Ladies stood upon verandas waving white flags. But as the little fleet drew nearer Jacksonville smouldering ruins alone presented themselves on each side of the river. "Nothing but the massive columns of dark pitch-pine smoke, smothered flames, and blackened piles remained of the huge saw-mills that had existed twenty-four hours previously. Such Vandalism we have never witnessed. Eight immense mills, and hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of valuable lumber, destroyed in a single night by these ruthless villains—guerillas recognized by that lovely Government, the Southern Confederacy. The principal sufferers by these incendiaries are Northern men."

At noon of the 12th the Ottawa, with her 11-inch Dahlgrens frowning menacingly upon the town, dropped anchor about one hundred yards from the wharf. If there were any loyalty in the place, it was overawed by the barbaric terrors of secessiondom. Groups of men and boys were collected on the wharf, silent if not sullen. After some little conference Lieutenant Stevens commenced landing the Fourth New Hampshire Regiment to take possession of the town. In less than two hours the regiment was landed, and the Stars and Stripes floated in security over Jacksonville. It subsequently appeared that many of the most intelligent of the inhabitants were eagerly waiting for the protection of the National flag. But an inexorable reign of terror, threatening to lay the buildings of every loyalist in ashes, and to lead their occupants to the scaffold, had silenced all such utterances.

The presence of the National flag, however, somewhat emboldened those who in heart execrated the rebellion. Though aware that should our forces be withdrawn they would be exposed to the brutalities of the most unscrupulous men the civilized world has ever seen, they ventured to organize a meeting of loyal citizens at Jacksonville on the 20th of March, in which they passed a series of resolutions declaring that no State has a constitutional right to separate itself from the United States; that the Ordinance of Secession is void, as both unconstitutional and never having been submitted to the people for ratification; that thousands of the people of Florida would hail with joy the restoration of the National authority, and remonstrating against the system of tyranny which had deprived them of freedom of speech, robbed them of their money, driven them by the terrors of an inexorable conscription into the ranks of rebellion, thus demanding the abandonment of homes and property, and the exposure of wives and children to sickness, destitution, gaunt famine, and innumerable and untold miseries and sorrows. It required more courage on the part of these loyal men to pass these resolves than to face bullets and shells on the battle-field.

The rebels were building a large gun-boat at Jacksonville, to be fitted out with a strong armament as a privateer. It was nearly completed, and would soon have been preying upon our commerce. Upon the approach of our fleet the torch was applied, and in a few hours the vessel was in ashes.

In the mean time Commodore Du Pont steamed down the coast with several vessels of the squadron toward St. Augustine. This ancient Spanish city was situated about thirty miles south of the mouth of the St. Johns River, and two miles within the bar of the bay upon whose northern shores it was built. The town was defended by a strong fort, with walls twenty feet high and twelve feet thick. Arriving off the harbor he sent Commander Rogers, in the Wabash, to the city with a flag of truce. The Mayor stated that the city had been evacuated the preceding night by the troops, and that he cheerfully surrendered it to Commodore Du Pont. The National banner was immediately displayed from the flag-staff of the fort, and all the cannon and munitions of war were turned over to our fleet.

But about fifteen hundred people remained in St. Augustine, the remainder, some three hundred and fifty, having fled. The women here, as in most other parts of the South, were found more virulent and unrelenting in their rebellion than the men. Commander Rogers, in his report to Flag-officer Du Pont, says:

"I believe that there are many citizens who are earnestly attached to the Union, a large number who are silently opposed to it, and a still larger number who care very little about the matter. There is much violent and pestilent feeling among the women. They seem to mistake treason for courage, and have a theatrical desire to figure as heroines. On the night before our arrival a party of women assembled in front of the barracks and cut down the flag-staff in order that it might not be used to support the old flag."

The rebels in their flight had taken several guns from the fort, but we obtained three fine 32-pounders and two 8-inch howitzers. About fifty miles south of St. Augustine was Mosquito Inlet, where the British blockade-runners from Nassau were conveying, by vessels of light draught, arms and other munitions of war to aid the rebels. Two gun-boats, the Penguin, under Lieutenant T. A. Budd, and the Henry Andrew, under Acting-Master S. W. Mather, were sent to this place to establish an inside blockade, capture any vessels which might be there, and guard from incendiarism a large quantity of live-oak timber belonging to the Government, which had been cut and was ready for shipment. The two steamers reached the Inlet on the 22d of March; and an expedition, consisting of five light boats conveying forty-five men, was fitted out to explore the long and narrow bay. They cruised along in a southerly direction, passing the little hamlet of New Smyrna, some eighteen miles, and, meeting with no incident, commenced their return.

When within sight of one of the steamers the advance boat at some distance from the rest landed, and the two commanding officers of the expedition, Lieutenant Budd and Acting-Master Mather, proceeded to examine some old abandoned earth-works, covered with dense forest and underbrush. Suddenly they were fired upon by a party of rebel soldiers in ambush. Both of the officers were instantly killed, and three of the five men composing the boat's crew. The other two were wounded and made prisoners. As the other boats came up they also were fired into and sustained more or less loss. The Henry Andrew the next morning was hauled up close to the scene of attack, but no foe could be found. "The commanding officer," writes Commodore Du Pont, "a Captain Bird, who had come from a camp at a distance, made some show of courtesy by returning papers and a watch as if ashamed of this mode of warfare; for these were the very troops that, with sufficient force, means, and material for a respectable defense, had ingloriously fled from St. Augustine on our approach." By these operations on the Florida coast the blockade was rendered much more effective, and the rebels were deprived of much of their power of doing harm.

At the mouth of the Apalachicola River, on the Florida coast in the Gulf of Mexico, is the thriving town of Apalachicola, from whose commodious harbor very considerable commerce was carried on. The stream was navigable for small vessels seventy miles above its mouth, and for boats four hundred miles. It was reported that there were quite a number of blockade-runners at or above the city. The latter part of March Commander Stellwagen, with two gun-boats, appeared off the place and organized an armed boat expedition to ascend the river and capture or destroy any rebel vessels which might be found there. They found the place almost entirely abandoned by its male inhabitants, the fort dismantled, and the guns removed. The inhabitants who remained welcomed the expedition and promptly raised the United States flag. The boat expedition captured quite a number of vessels, some of which they burned, and others they took with them down the river. The oath of allegiance was administered to some of the inhabitants, and formal possession was taken of the town.

It is very evident that at Pensacola, notwithstanding it was in rebel hands, there were some decisive indications of Union feeling; for on the 30th of March Colonel T. M. Jones, then commanding the rebel force there, issued the following characteristic proclamation:

"For the information of all concerned. There are certain lounging, worthless people, white as well as colored, who frequent Pensacola and vicinity, who have no observable occupation. Their intentions may be honest, but the Colonel commanding does not believe it: and as he has no use for their presence, they are warned to leave or the consequences must rest on their own heads. The gallows is erected in Pensacola, and will be in constant use on and after the 3d of April, 1862. The town is under complete martial law."

A little before midnight on the 9th of May the garrison at Fort Pickens were aroused by an unusual firing of musketry in the direction of the rebel forts. Signal lights were seen blazing upon the shore, and there were other indications of some strange commotion. Suddenly, and almost simultaneously, crackling, roaring flames, in huge billows, burst forth from forts and water-batteries and the light-house, from the Marine Hospital and the Navy-yard, and from Pensacola and the villages of Warrenton and Woolsey, and all other buildings along a line nearly ten miles in extent. It was manifest that the rebels had decided to evacuate the region, and that they had resolved to leave nothing but ashes behind them.

The rebels had carefully arranged their combustibles, which had been prepared in great quantities, and by the light of the conflagration they could be distinctly seen running about, like demons of destruction, applying the torch. The long roll was immediately beat in Fort Pickens, and a tremendous cannonade opened upon the incendiaries, which was kept up incessantly for five hours, and which so disturbed the rebels in their operations that not a little property, which would otherwise have been destroyed, was preserved.

The guns of the rebel forts M'Rae and Barrancas, which had commanded the harbor, were now powerless, and the blockading schooner, Maria J. Wood, steamed into the bay and demanded the unconditional surrender of the place. As the flag of truce landed the officers were met by about one hundred and fifty people, who, with a single exception, manifested great joy in prospect of the restoration of the National authority. The negroes gathered in great numbers, shouting, exuberantly, "Dey is come at last; dey is come at last!"

Captain Jackson, with his flag, proceeded through the grass-grown streets to the house of Mayor Bobee. To the demand for surrender Bobee replied:

"The Confederates have so long held sway here, and usurped the power which rightfully belongs to the municipal authorities, that I do not know really how much authority I have left."

Fortunately the Harriet Lane, with Commodore Porter of the mortar flotilla on board, was that night running down the coast from Mobile. Seeing the whole eastern horizon illumined with the blaze of the immense conflagration, Captain Wainwright steamed directly for Pensacola harbor. The arrival in the morning of this powerful steamer was very opportune. She was immediately employed in transporting troops, with their necessary armament, from Fort Pickens and the Island of Santa Rosa to the main land. About twelve hundred troops, with artillery, siege-guns, ammunition, horses, and camp equipage, were soon on shore, with defenses thrown up around them to guard against any surprise. The Stars and Stripes were raised over the smouldering forts. But scarcely any thing met the eye excepting fire, ashes, and desolation.

There was a magnificent naval hospital at Pensacola, one of the finest structures of the kind in the United States. The Vandals, in their indiscriminating rage, had set that on fire, and it was speedily reduced to smouldering cinders. "It was," writes the correspondent of the Boston Journal, "behind this hospital that Bragg had a heavy mortar battery during the first bombardment; and shielded from the fire of Pickens by the humane folds of the yellow flag, which floated over the hospital, he kept up an incessant fire upon the Federal garrison."

This was the last foothold of any importance which the rebels held in Florida. The whole State thus virtually fell back into the possession of the National arms, though it continued to be the scene of many wild adventures. The necessities of the Confederate Government had become so pressing that the authorities at Richmond had decided to withdraw nearly all their forces from the State, and most of the troops had been sent to Tennessee. Still enough were left behind to keep up a sort of guerrilla warfare, which, with the torch and the halter, might prevent the development of any Union sympathies among the people. As the rebel troops were mainly withdrawn there seemed to be no reason why we should leave regiments there encamped in idleness. Jacksonville was evacuated, and the rebels returned, wreaking sore vengeance upon all who had ventured to express any sympathy for the National authority. The recital of the barbarities they inflicted caused the ear of the nation to tingle.

About three miles above the mouth of the River St. Johns there were some renowned bluffs, which had caught the military eye of the old Spanish adventurers as an impregnable position. The bluffs commanded the river, and in the rear could be only approached through a single ravine, which could be swept by artillery. The narrowness of the channel and the elevation of the bluffs rendered the approach by gun-boats both difficult and dangerous. The rebels seized this Gibraltar, placed upon it a heavy and effective armament of nine guns, two of them Columbiads, and stationed a garrison there, infantry and cavalry, of one thousand two hundred men. Blockade-runners, having ascended the river beyond this point, were safe from any pursuit by our gun-boats.

General Mitchell, then the energetic commander at Port Royal, late in September fitted out an expedition to clear the river of these obstructions. A land-force of 1573 men, consisting of the Forty-seventh Pennsylvania, under Colonel T. H. Good, the Seventh Connecticut, under Colonel Joseph Hawley, and a section of First Connecticut light battery, left Hilton Head in four transports on the afternoon of the 30th of September. Early the next morning they arrived off the bar of St. Johns River. Here they were joined by six gun-boats commanded by Captain Charles Steedman of the United States Navy. The land-force was intrusted to Brigadier-General J. M. Brannon. The fleet immediately crossed the bar and anchored in the mouth of the river opposite a small "timber village" called Mayport, situated on a bluff. About two miles farther up the river they saw the rebel flag, indicating the position of their batteries. Three gun-boats were sent up to draw the fire of the guns, that their number and the weight of their metal might be ascertained.

A few shells, with very accurate aim, were pitched directly into the rebel batteries. The return fire of their guns revealed that which we wished to know and did us no harm. As it seemed evident that the rebels were disposed for a fight, the landing of the troops was at once commenced, under the protection of the gun-boats, which, from the nature of the locality, proved a very tedious and difficult operation. It was their plan to work around into the rear, so as to cut off the retreat of the rebels. The rain was now falling in torrents. But through the discomfort of the storm and the gloom the troops, horses, and artillery were got safely ashore, including three 12-pound howitzers, worked by marines.

As soon as the landing was effected, and the troops were prepared to move for the attack, the gun-boats were again sent forward. As they opened their fire, shelling the batteries, they found, to their great surprise, that the rebels had abandoned every thing and fled. Lieutenapt Snell sent a boat ashore and raised the American flag. The land-forces pressed forward and took possession of the batteries. The position was found to be one of very great strength, the works carefully constructed and heavily armed. Had the rebels displayed any of that courage which they certainly on most occasions evinced, it is not improbable that they might have resisted even a much larger force than that which we had sent against them.

The guns, nine heavy Columbiads, the small-arms, and the ammunition, were removed to the gun-boats, the magazines blown up, and the entire works on the bluff destroyed. Captain Steedman, with a portion of the fleet, steamed directly for Jacksonville, to destroy the rebel boats there, and to intercept the escape of the rebel garrison across the river. A body of infantry soon followed. Jacksonville was found deserted by nearly all its inhabitants excepting a few old men, women, and children. One of the steamers, the Darlington, in charge of Captain Yard, with one hundred men of the Forty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, boldly ran up the river two hundred and thirty miles, and seized a rebel steamer, the Governor Milton. Our gun-boats now retained the entire possession of the river, and the expedition returned to Hilton Head without the loss of a man and crowned with victory.

Apalachicola was now simply guarded by the blockading fleet, there being no Union garrison on shore. It was reported that several miles up the river there was a sloop laden with cotton watching for a dark night to run the blockade. On the morning of the 15th of October two boats were sent from the gun-boats Sagamore and Fort Henry, each armed with a 12-pound howitzer and rifles for the crew and officers. They started before the dawn of day, and, rowing up the river about four miles, discovered the sloop in a small bay on the eastern shore of the stream. But the rebels had detected the enterprise. As the boats approached the sloop they saw a squadron of cavalry riding down the banks. They were thus obliged to move back, out into the river, and to send for reinforcements.

Four boats were promptly forwarded to their aid. As soon as they were all assembled two boats were sent to capture the sloop, while the rest held themselves in readiness to meet any emergency. The rebels, in ambush, threw in upon the advancing boats a volley of bullets, wounding three men. The fire was instantly returned by a shower of canister and shrapnell, sweeping the thicket and speedily scattering the band who, in Indian fashion, were lurking there. The rebel sailors fled from the sloop as the boats' crew boarded it. The victors cut their prize from her moorings, and all the boats towed her down the river.

It was necessary to pass by the wharves in Apalachicola. The rebel guerrillas, who had been driven from their ambush, hastened to the city and secreted themselves behind an embankment and in the store-houses. As our boats came within close musket-range, the men laboriously pulling at their oars, towing the sloop, the rebels again, from their concealment, opened fire, with volley after volley, wounding several, but killing none. Little were they prepared for the retribution which instantly visited them. The howitzers were turned upon their lurking-places. Shells, shrapnell, canister pursued them as with a divine vengeance. Limb was torn from limb, buildings set on fire, houses blown to pieces. Not another gun could be fired at our troops. To pick up the wounded and to extinguish the flames, which threatened the destruction of the city, engrossed all the energies of the foe. Scarcely had the boats returned to the fleet with their prize, having eighty bales of cotton on board, when a flag of truce was sent to the fleet from Apalachicola, imploring that our naval surgeons might be sent to the town to dress the stumps of the unhappy men whose limbs had been blown off by the fragments of our shells. Doctors Stevens, Scofield, and Draper volunteered their services on this mission of mercy to our enemies. The rebels were also informed that were our boats again fired upon from Apalachicola the city should be laid in ashes.

The secessionists in the vicinity of Apalachicola were largely supplying the rebel army with beef packed in salt. To facilitate this operation immense salt-works were erected all along the bays on the Gulf coast of Florida. Our gun-boats swept the coast and laid them nearly all in ruins.

About this time a guerrilla band at Cedar Keys, with savage cunning, enticed a boat on shore from the steamer Somerset, by displaying three white flags from the houses. Just as the boat's crew were landing they were fired upon from the windows of a house, and eight of the men were wounded, some of them very severely. The retributions of war are terrible. The wounded men succeeded in working their way back to the ship. An avenging force was sent to the shore to administer the merited punishment. In a few hours the whole town was in ashes.

Twice the Union forces had now taken Jacksonville. Twice they had abandoned it as not worth holding. Slowly, and with great opposition, the Government had been led to adopt the measure of employing colored troops. The rebels had run large numbers of slaves into the interior of Florida, as a place of security. It was deemed wise to occupy Jacksonville as a base of operations for collecting and arming the negroes. On the 6th of March, 1863, a secret expedition, whose destination was known to but few, left Beaufort, South Carolina. It consisted of the First and Second Regiments of South Carolina Colored Volunteers, under Colonel T. W. Higginson and Colonel James Montgomery. They were conveyed in three transports.

On the 7th the vessels reached Fernandina, and, after a short delay, proceeded to the mouth of the St. Johns, where they dropped anchor on the morning of the 9th. Here a couple of gun-boats joined them, the Norwich and the Uncas. The next day the expedition steamed up the river. Passing the ruined batteries on St. Johns bluff, which the rebels had made no attempt to repair, they ran alongside of the wharf in Jacksonville, and, under protection of the guns of the Uncas, the colored troops, glowing with enthusiasm, eagerly jumped on shore. The rebels had simply a picket established in the town, while a considerable force was encamped three miles distant. The well-disciplined troops immediately formed in marching order, and so suddenly had they arrived and landed that almost the first intimation the inhabitants had of their presence was in witnessing the solid column of black faces marching through their streets.

Colonel Montgomery, at the head of two companies, pushed out into the woods, where his colored soldiers, with bravery which elicited great admiration, attacked a company of rebel cavalry and handsomely routed them. Colonel Higginson, in the mean time, stationed pickets throughout the town, and adopted other precautions against surprise. It was now night, and our troops were in secure possession of the place, with the loss of but one man killed and two wounded.

It was supposed that the National flag was now established permanently here, and the loyal men felt very great relief. This sense of security was increased as, after a few days, the Sixth Connecticut and the Eighth Maine were sent to reinforce the little army. But to the astonishment of all, and the consternation of every loyal man, scarcely had these latter troops debarked ere the inexplicable order came not only for their immediate return, but for the recall of all the colored troops and the abandonment of the place for the third time. Though there was nothing to be done but promptly to obey these orders, the murmurings were loud and deep.

There probably never was an army composed of such fine materials as the Union army in this great conflict. In every regiment there might be found many men of the highest intellectual and religious character. But whenever there is war all the lovers of violence and crime rush to the field. Thus there will be found in every army many men utterly reckless, and who shrink at no crime. Some of these men, notwithstanding the indignation of their comrades and the utmost exertions of their officers, taking advantage of a high wind and the combustible nature of the buildings, set fire to the town. Jacksonville was soon in ruins. The beautiful city, which had been the pride of the State, and for many years the favorite resort for invalids from the North, was wrapped in flames and consumed to ashes. Scarcely a mansion, store-house, or negro cabin was left to tell where Jacksonville once stood. Long lines of magnificent oaks, with their green foliage and graceful drapery of Spanish moss, ornamented the streets. Orange groves perfumed the air with their perpetual blossoms mingling with the golden fruit. The yards and gardens were embellished with shrubbery and flowers blooming in the profusion of tropical luxuriance.

The relentless flames swept over the loveliness of the Eden, and it emerged from the ordeal as if seathed by the curse of God. An eye-witness on board the steam transport Boston writes:

"From this upper-deck the scene presented to the spectator is one of the most fearful magnificence. On every side, from every quarter of the city, dense clouds of black smoke and flames are bursting through the mansions and warehouses. A fresh southerly wind is blowing immense blazing cinders into the heart of the city. The beautiful Spanish moss, drooping so gracefully from the long avenues of the splendid old oaks, has caught fire, and, as far as the eye can reach, through these once pleasant streets nothing but sheets of flame can be seen, running up with the rapidity of lightning to the tops of the trees, and then darting off to the smallest branches. The whole city—mansions, warehouses, trees, shrubbery, and orange groves—all that refined taste and art through many years have made beautiful and attractive, are being lapped up, and by the howling, fiery blast."

Fifty families, most of them professing Union sentiments, with their homes and their furniture in ashes, in the extreme of penury, and debarred of all means of support, were huddled on board the transports, and were conveyed to Beaufort. Most of them had saved nothing but the few clothes they wore. There they stood, fathers, mothers, daughters, torn from their once happy and beautiful homes and plunged into life-long woe, many of them the innocent victims of dreadful war. It is a slight solace to one's agonized feelings to reflect that probably many of these women were among the most determined and malignant instigators of the conflict. It is one of the mysteries of God's providential government that the innocent must suffer with the guilty.

On the 1st of April the fleet, after a fine run of fourteen hours from the mouth of the St. Johns, returned to Beaufort. General Saxton set apart some houses for the temporary accommodation of these war-stricken refugees, and they were fed upon the rations of the commissary department.

The achievements of our blockading squadron have never been suitably commemorated. And yet they performed many of the most arduous and daring exploits of the war, and contributed far more than is generally supposed to the glorious final result. It was one great object of the National Government to render it as difficult as possible for the rebels to feed their armies. Vast herds of cattle roamed over the prairies of Florida. These were killed, packed in salt, and sent in great abundance, by the internal railroads, to the several encampments. There were innumerable bays and inlets penetrating the Gulf coast of Florida, along whose silent and secluded shores salt-works were reared. The destruction of these works cut off those supplies of meat which were essential to the existence of an army.

About one hundred miles east of Pensacola there was an immense body of water jutting in from the Gulf, called St. Andrews Bay. The shores of this inland sea spread out through uncounted leagues in every conceivable irregularity of outline. Here there was a gloomy forest and there a frowning bluff. At one point the open prairie spread far away until it was lost in the distant horizon, and again the encroaching hillocks, crowned with dark evergreens and hoary, moss-draped oaks, obstructed the view. From time immemorial the wigwam of the Indian had dotted these shores, and his fragile canoe had glanced over these waves. The Indian had now disappeared. The country generally retained its pristine wildness, and naught but the cry of the water-fowl was heard to disturb the silence of its lonely waters.

Not far within the entrance of this majestic bay there was the little town of St. Andrews, an exceedingly convenient resort for blockade-runners. There was a small blockading force guarding the coast there, under the command of Acting-Master William R. Browne. Learning that there were some pretty extensive salt-works in operation far up this bay, in regions where they could not be reached by our gun-boats, and being fully convinced that in their wilderness seclusion they would not be protected by any military force, Mr. Browne fitted out a single boat's crew of bold men, and sent them on an exploring adventure up the bay under the command of Acting-Ensign James J. Russel. It was the 2d of December, a very delightful season of the year in that sunny region.

They rowed along, in a westerly direction, about twenty miles, through a varied scene of wildness, desolation, and beauty, and then landing, marched through the wilderness country five miles until they reached a large sheet of salt-water, called Lake Ocala. Here they came suddenly upon Kent's salt-works. There were thirteen huge tanks or kettles in full blast, each holding two hundred gallons. It seemed as though they had fallen upon some realm of Pluto, as they saw the immense fires blazing, negroes running to and fro feeding them with the resinous fuel, and the air filled with smoke and vapor. They were producing one hundred and thirty gallons of salt daily. Our boat's crew, who certainly deserve the title of intrepid, broke the boilers to pieces, utterly demolished the works, and threw into the lake all the salt which they had accumulated. Two large flat-boats and six ox-carts were destroyed, and seventeen prisoners taken and paroled.

The success of this expedition incited to other similar movements. It so chanced that the stern-wheel steamer Bloomer, under Acting-Ensign Edwin Cressy, arrived. The steamer was of such light draught that she could run almost any where over the shallow waters of the bay. Master Browne put three officers and forty-eight men on board, and sent them to the extreme western extremity of the bay, to a place called West Bay, where they found extensive Government salt-works, which were producing four hundred bushels daily. Here they destroyed twenty-seven buildings, two hundred and twenty-two boilers and kettles, five thousand bushels of salt, and store-houses containing three months' provisions. The estimated value of the property destroyed was half a million of dollars.

This little stern-wheeler, which a sailor said "could run wherever there was a light dew," now steamed down the shore of the bay, penetrating all its secluded inlets, and destroyed a hundred and ninety-eight private salt-making establishments. Seven hundred and sixty boilers and kettles were broken to pieces, and an immense amount of salt thrown into the lake. There was also committed to the flames two hundred buildings, twenty-seven wagons, and five large flat-boats. The entire damage to the enemy was deemed not less than three millions of dollars. Such is war! "War," says Napoleon, "is the science of barbarians, the science of destruction."

By some strange instinct, in these far-away regions, the slaves, with universal acclaim, received the Union soldiers as their deliverers. No frowns of their masters could repress their delight. With joy, which at times passed all bounds, they availed themselves of the opportunity of escaping from a bondage which their souls loathed. These ever-true friends to the Union cause proved of great service in pointing out the location of salt-works, and the places where kettles had been hastily buried for concealment. Thirty-one of these contrabands accompanied the steamer back.

While these movements were in operation, Acting-Master Browne, learning from deserters that the town of St. Andrews had been for ten months occupied by a rebel military force, steamed up in the bark Restless to within a hundred yards of the town. Seeing a body of soldiers he shelled them, and drove them speedily into the woods. Then, selecting some of the weathermost houses for a target, he soon set them in flames by his shells, and the conflagration rapidly spreading, in a few hours thirty-two houses were reduced to ashes.

A few days after these events a steamer was discovered, on the 20th of December, at the mouth of the Suwannee River, apparently at anchor or aground. This was a considerable stream flowing into the Gulf, about two hundred miles, following the coast line, east from Apalachicola. Though there were but five feet of water on the bar, the stream above presented a depth of fifteen feet for a distance of nearly sixty miles. The blockade schooner Fox, under command of Acting-Master George Ashbury, made the discovery. She immediately beat up toward her, until, when within three-quarters of a mile of the rebel steamer, the schooner ran aground. Fire was then opened upon the rebel craft from a howitzer which drove all the crew ashore. Before escaping they scuttled the vessel. A boat's crew took possession of her. Finding that she could not be removed, and night coming on, the torch was applied. Through the long hours of darkness the gloom of those black forests and lone waters was dispelled by the crackling of flames and the brilliance of the great conflagration.

Four days after this, on the 24th of December, the Fox discovered a vessel trying to run into the Suwannee River. Chase was immediately made, and after the run of two hours the persuasive influence of a few shells induced the schooner to heave to. She proved to be a British blockade-runner from Havana, loaded with lead and salt, and was seized as a prize.

Salt is one of the necessities of life. The rebel armies could not exist without it. They immediately made efforts to repair and defend their ruined works. Early in February, 1864, the rebels had put up at West Bay, upon the site of the ruins which we had left there in December, greatly enlarged works, with a guard of fifty to protect them. There were twenty-six sheet-iron boilers, each one of which held eight hundred and eighty-one gallons, and nineteen kettles averaging two hundred gallons. These boilers and kettles had cost nearly one hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars, and the works covered a space of half a square mile. They had been in operation but ten days when Lieutenant W. R. Browne fitted out a cutter, manned with thirteen men under Acting-Ensign James J. Russel, and sent them up the Gulf coast twenty miles. Here they were to land and march inland seven miles, until they should strike the works on West Bay, thus attacking them in the rear. At the same time Acting-Ensign Henry Edson, with a second cutter, containing ten men, proceeded by the inside passage along the shores of St. Andrews Bay, to attack them in front.

This was, to say the least, a very daring movement—twenty-three men setting out to attack fifty on their own ground. Fortune favored the enterprise. The two parties arrived nearly simultaneously. The rebel guard, surprised by the double attack, and unconscious of the feeble numbers of their assailants, probably supposing that a whole regiment was about to dash upon them, broke and fled in terror. The boilers and kettles were broken to pieces, the chimneys and furnaces torn down, six hundred bushels of salt thrown into the bay, and a general destruction so complete effected as to render the works utterly useless. The two parties returned from their prosperous excursion without any loss.

St. Andrews Inlet enters the bay near the centre, dividing it into two bodies of water, the East and West Bay. Lieutenant Browne now, on the 17th of February, fitted out an expedition to cruise along to the east. A cutter with eleven men was under the charge of Ensign Henry Edson. Master's-Mate F. Grant took the gig with seven men. The boats left the Restless at 8 o'clock in the evening. As they cruised along these solitary bays, creeks, and inlets they destroyed sixteen independent salt-works, some of them being the most extensive the rebel Government had ever erected in Florida. Destruction, to a generous heart, must be a painful duty. But it is ennobled and rendered almost joyous by the conviction that comparatively trivial ruin may rescue a great nation from overthrow.

There were now scarcely any rebel troops left in Florida. The indications were quite decisive that, could the Union men be sure of protection, the whole State might easily be brought back to its allegiance to the National Government. Early in February, 1864, General Gilmore was in command at Hilton Head. With the approval of the War Department he fitted out an expedition to take possession of Florida. Twenty steamers and eight schooners conveyed a force of about six thousand men, consisting of infantry, artillery, and cavalry, under command of General T. Seymour. The fleet arrived off the mouth of the St. Johns about ten o'clock on the morning of the 7th. They were entering a clime of sunshine and flowers in all the beauty of its spring adornment, and every heart beat in unison with the bird-songs which filled the air.

Leaving a couple of gun-boats to guard the mouth of the river, the remainder of the fleet steamed up, with the sloops in tow, to the piers of desolate, blackened, ruined Jacksonville. A squad of rebel infantry, hid behind some trees, fired into one of the steamers, wounding one man. Several companies of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts (colored) sprang ashore, and, on the double-quick, gave chase to the foe, who speedily disappeared in the forest. Pursuing them two miles, they came proudly back, bringing with them five prisoners.

The troops, with all the vast material of war which even so small an army requires, were speedily landed. The next day, Monday, the 8th, at three o'clock in the afternoon, they commenced their march into the interior. They proceeded but about three miles that night, and bivouacked. The next morning, Tuesday, the 9th, with a body of cavalry and artillery in advance, they pressed on, directly west, following the line of the Florida Central Railroad, toward a wretched little hamlet called Baldwin, eighteen miles from Jacksonville. The country was uninviting, almost uninhabited. There was not a hill to cheer the eye, but only a vast plain, with occasional swamps, all covered with a scattered growth of resinous pines. There were here and there depressions where the rain had settled in pools of water, and some dismal swamps.

Colonel Henry, with a body of cavalry and artillery, had pushed on during the night, reconnoitring in advance. The night was so intensely dark that some of the way the riders could not see the heads of their horses. Still they pressed merrily forward, unwisely despising their foe. They had proceeded but a few miles when they came upon the camp-fire of one of the advance rebel pickets. The few rebels there fled precipitately back to their reserve post. Eagerly our advance urged their horses onward until they came to a body of about one hundred and fifty of the enemy, gathered, evidently in some agitation, around their fires at Camp Finnigan. They were hastily eating their breakfast. Their horses were in harness and the wagons partly loaded, ready for a start. It was dark, and the rebels had no knowledge of our approach, though our horses were within a few rods of their camp.

After a careful reconnoissance the Fortieth Massachusetts mounted infantry was formed in line of battle, with Captain Elder's flying artillery just in their rear. Suddenly two buglers blew their loudest blasts, and the cavalry battalion dashed into the very heart of the hostile camp. The foe dispersed like a covey of partridges when the hunter's dog leaps into their midst. In an instant nearly every rebel disappeared in the gloom of night and of the forest. Four guns and the whole camp equipage fell into the hands of the successful Union troops, whose confidence in their own power and in the impotence of the rebels, already too strong, was thus greatly increased.

Colonel Henry remained at Camp Finnigan until four o'clock in the morning, baiting his horses, while the men amused themselves in examining the trunks, valises, and other treasures which had fallen into their hands. Again, before the dawn of day, the troops were mounted and on the road. At seven o'clock the next morning they dashed into Baldwin, eighteen miles from Jacksonville, which they found to be a southern village of fifteen buildings. No foe was found there. In the dépôt they captured stores to the amount of about half a million of dollars. This was deemed an important strategic point, as here the railroad from Fernandina to Cedar Keys crosses the Florida Central. In the afternoon General Gilmore and General Seymour and his Staff came up from Jacksonville.

At nine o'clock the next morning, Wednesday, the 10th, the little army was again upon the move, still following westward the line of the Central Railroad. The march of a couple of hours brought them to Barber's Station. Just beyond they came to a small stream called the South Fork of the St. Mary's River. Here, on the opposite shore, the enemy, at a plank bridge over what is called Big Creek, having destroyed the bridge, made a slight show of resistance. But our horsemen dashed gallantly through the stream and put the foe to flight. A few were killed and several wounded on both sides. One wounded rebel, as he was sinking away in death, said, sadly, that he had been forced into the service, and that he had done all he could to prevent the war. We secured about fifty horses, with a considerable amount of small-arms. They found here a wealthy Southern planter, who was reputed to be the richest man in the State. He was said to be the proprietor of twenty-five thousand head of cattle. And yet, with characteristic Southern comfortlessness, he lived in a miserable shanty which would not satisfy the ambition of the humblest Northern day-laborer.

After a short rest at Barber's they pressed on to Sanderson, which was forty miles from Jacksonville. Here they arrived about six o'clock in the evening. Sanderson consists of a railway station a little larger than Baldwin. The rebels had left precipitately fifteen minutes before our troops arrived, and had applied the torch to three buildings containing a large amount of commissary stores. The night was illumined by the great conflagration. At two o'clock the next morning, Thursday, the 11th, the column was again in motion for Lake City, some twenty miles farther west, still following the line of the railroad. At eleven o'clock in the morning they were within a few miles of the city, not having encountered any foe. Here the advance found the enemy in some strength, advantageously posted in the forest. They therefore fell slowly back until the main body could come up.

In the afternoon it began to rain, and a dismal night came on, cold and wet and dark. The men and the horses were jaded out by their long march. Their provisions were also far in their rear. Upon the rain-soaked sods the men bivouacked in the extreme of discomfort. Thus far the expedition had been triumphantly successful. The enemy had not been able to make any stand against us. We had destroyed rebel governmental property to the amount of a million and a half of dollars.

In the mean time for days past the rebels had been hurrying down from their large army in the vicinity of Savannah and Charleston well-armed bands, variously estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand men, to fall stealthily upon our unsuspecting column and destroy it utterly.

They selected their position within a few miles of Lake City, near a railroad station called Olustee. There was a swamp in front of them, earth-works on their left, and a slight elevation covered with forests on the right. They had also chosen the spot where our troops must stand. As the Union troops passed along a narrow neck of land between two swamps they were compelled to deploy to form in line of battle, with the swamps in their rear. They were there exposed to a murderous fire from the well-posted ranks of the foe, and to the unerring aim of sharp-shooters, who in large numbers had climbed into the forest trees. In attempting a retreat the swamps would almost inevitably throw them into dire confusion.

Our leaders, unfortunately, seem to have been inspired on this occasion with the spirit of the prayer, "Thank God we have none of that sneaking virtue called prudence!" With blind bravery they marched into the jaws of destruction. Many of the guns and muskets were unloaded. No foe was to be seen; no signs of camps any where; no sounds but the tramp of the army and the murmur of the breeze through the pines. The Seventh Connecticut was in the advance. As they passed between the swamps and emerged into the open fields beyond a terrific concentric fire swept their ranks from the almost invisible foe, marshaled in a curved line a mile in length around them. The Seventh New Hampshire, which had already ennobled itself by many brilliant exploits, rushed to the rescue of their comrades. Hamilton's battery came thundering forward, Elder upon the right, Langdon on the left. The Eighth United States (colored), Colonel Charles W. Fribley, came gallantly at the double-quick into the caldron of death. Our whole force was soon engaged. Never did men fight more desperately. But they were outnumbered three to one. The white man and the black man fought side by side, patriot brothers equal in heroism. The crimson flood from their veins which blended on the sod showed that God had made of "one blood" both races.

For four hours, from two o'clock till six, the battle raged, the Union troops receiving three bullets for every one they could return. Rebel sharpshooters in the trees could take deliberate aim and strike down their man at every shot. The slaughter was dreadful. More than a thousand of our troops were either killed or wounded. Many of our horses were shot. Our ammunition was expended. We had met with a terrible disaster, and retreat became inevitable. It was an hour of agony. Guns had to be abandoned, for the horses which drew them were shot. Our wounded we had to leave upon the field, writhing in torture, for we had no means for removing them. General Seymour did every thing which bravery could do to extricate his men from the ambuscade into which he had led them. But it must be admitted that on the bloody day of Olustee the Union troops were not only outnumbered but outgeneraled.

The heroic Seventh Connecticut occupied the honorable post of rear-guard, holding the foe in check as our shattered columns fell back. Retiring rapidly but in good order, these exhausted, war-worn men, many of them severely wounded, toiled along all night, and passing Barber's Station reached Baldwin. The rebels followed our retreating columns cautiously. At Baldwin a large amount of military stores, which we had accumulated there, were committed to the flames. The wounded men who had painfully toiled along to this place were here placed in the cars and sent to Jacksonville. At twelve o'clock at night the troops reached Jacksonville, and the next day most of them re-embarked and returned to Hilton Head. Sad as was this disaster, troops never fought more bravely than did our white and colored troops on the fatal field of Olustee.*

After this there was no more serious fighting in Florida. Garrisons occupied Jacksonville and other points on the St. Johns River, while a small force of rebels remained in the interior. But there was now a concentration of all the armies on both sides for the final tremendous struggle around the walls of Richmond. Such a struggle was never witnessed before. It arrested the attention of the whole nation and of the civilized world. The capture of Richmond and the surrender of Lee's army crushed the heart of the rebellion. The more embittered of the foes of the Union fled from the land which they had crimsoned with blood. The loyal men of Florida now dared to proclaim their loyalty. The unthinking crowd, who drift with the popular current, joined the Unionists in welcoming with acclaim the return of the National flag. But Florida came back from her prodigal wandering emaciate and in rags. Her crime was great, her punishment severe. The National Government, with kindest yearnings for every member of the great household of States, received the returning wanderer with open arms, exclaiming, "My son was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found."

MANASQUAN.

I WAS seated on the bench of the piazza which runs round the house. A pleasant summer murmur filled the air. The shrill busy hum of insects, the soft sighings of the southwest wind, and for bass the roar of the surf on the beach completed the harmony. I was doing nothing but thinking, thinking and pitying in my heart those who were compelled to live in the busy, noisy, dusty city.

"Beatus ille qui procul negotiis,
Ut prisca gens mortalium,
Paterna rura bobus exercet suis,
Solutus omni fenore."

Horace, Epod., Car. ii.

I had just repeated to myself, as I drew in a fresh respiration of the clover-scented air and gave out a tobacco-perfumed one in return. Not that I have any paternal acres whereon to exercise my cattle. No, all my earthly possessions are in a very small compass. "Chateaux en Espagne"—castles in the air, are the extent of my dominions. And I can expand or compress them at pleasure. I was, however, so busy when a little incident started such an agreeable train of inquiry and meditation in my mind, that if you have as much pleasure in reading it as I have in writing it, I will make no more apology for the deed. It is nothing, I know; I have just given a retrospective glance at the wet lines above my pen, and am quite ashamed at all this preamble about a bee—a big black bumble-bee. There, I did not mean that as a specimen of alliteration. I was seated on the piazza, an old decaying one round a farm-house in New Jersey, at Point Pleasant, rightly so named.

Settling myself down for an after-breakfast smoke, and dismissing as much of the machinery of thought as showed signs of motion from my brains, I lit my pipe, blew a long cone of smoke out into the still summer air, and looked up at the calm blue space above my head, in which the swallows were skating with swift and graceful turns. When, presently, I could not help noticing a large, black-headed bee which seemed annoyed and highly indignant at my sitting in that particular spot. Angrily it hummed and droned about my head, and then finding I would not move it disappeared suddenly under my seat. I then heard a scratching and scraping like a mouse at a short distance. At my feet, on looking down, I saw a small heap of fine saw-dust mixed with a yellowish-looking powder-pollen. The bee was a carpenter, and at work where I was seated. I had noticed a little round hole as I sat down, but then thought nothing of it. Dreamily I wondered what my friend was doing. I shifted a little unconsciously on my seat, when, ugh! a smart dig behind made me spring up off it.

* This defeat has elicited much angry comment. The above record is as impartial an account as the writer can give from the official reports and dispatches of Generals Gilmore and Seymour, and from the correspondence of several who participated in the scenes. Quite a collection of these papers may be found in the Rebellion Record, vol. viii.

The little animal had strong me. As first I was angry and felt inclined to kill it. Then I reflected as I thought of Wordsworth and his ad-vice:

"Never to mix our pleasure with our pain
With sorrow to the measure thing that men."

and turned my attention to his gait on land. It came out and flew away, but presently returned and poised itself in stationary flight above my head. I could see its wings, at least not well, for they flapped with such rapidity as to show like a small clear-edged disk or hole around the body which they supported. This was kept perfectly still. It moved no more, any way, than the head of a great rusty nail which entered my ear.

The equilibrium of these little scraps and notes of moving nature is so perfect as that of the great globe itself: they are chips of the old block. The even spin round, and sweep upon its pole in perfect rest, the very opposite of Whimsy. So this last belauding itself there, and floating an equinox of me in equilibrium, was intensely busy, busied with full-armed builder nerve in the summer stillness. Presently it swung itself out of the station and made a tour. To principles of dynamics, will this mighty globe ever thus take a cruise into space? Is this long succession of ages merely but the proving of an instant to us? A thousand years are with the Lord as one day. Will ever the planets return and climb over one another's backs like larks, and be lived in some new arrangement of the "Eternities"? Thus I thought, or rather, for the observer stationary here, while the small moment of thinking material I had left in my brain. After several more and expectations of his poised scrutiny my little friend decided that I was a harmless ghost, even if not inanimate, for I had not as usual as visited under his inspection. He made up his mind, suddenly aligned on the edge of my seat, and without knocking or breaking its door, tucked his wings flat to his side, and walked into the little round hole, as clear-edged and circular as if it had been made with a small sharp contrivance. He walked deep into it, and wholly disappeared. It was exactly his size. He was gone so long that I began to grow quite uneasy. There was no other hole near: he must be there still. How could I express my anxiety? His I know. Slipping down I blew a long thin line of tobacco-smoke into the hole and waited for an answer. He came out in about half a minute in person (I heard him growling and bawling angrily down the hollow passage), kind-foremost, and highly humored. Of course, my recovered friend had no idea that I had over-looked him thus. I was leaning back against the frame in the old attitude, but almost betrayed myself by an apology when I saw how angry and alarmed my little gentleman was. He backed out of his hole backward—which attitude, by-the-way, does not add to the effect of a respectful gesture—turned sharply round the moment he had drawn his ears clear of the doorway, and gave such a glance of reproval at things in general that I checked a remark which might have been construed into a dangerous confession.

"Now what was that bee about?"

I intended to try and find out, and had just settled myself for the purpose when I was suddenly and unexpectedly interrupted.

"Oh, head of Godham, what are you about peeping and prying into that rascal's hole, and the fish are come down to the sea, and every man and boy in the place is out after them!"

"Grandmother, where is my squid and line?" I asked, as excited now as the bee had been a few moments before.

"In the back kitchen, I reckon," was the answer.

To rush there and catch the line off a nail, seize my lost and start, was the affair of a moment.

Down I ran along the banks of the Mississippi until I came to its inlet. There, on coming to the beach, I found an excited, eager crowd of some thirty or forty boys and men running up and down it, and waving every now and then to throw their line into the rolling surf, as yet, however, without success.

I stood on a sand-bank at the mouth of the Mississippi River and watched. Presently there was a loud shout from the opposite bank, and I saw them coming. There was a strange sort of boiling appearance in the water, and then a whole host of small fish, nose-barkers, flung themselves wildly on the sandy beach, flopped about shivering, gasped hysterically, and then, after a few more fruitless leaps, lay still, choked by the hot air and burning out. The men and boys were meanwhile wringing as fast as they could their spindles, and sending them, some of the best showers, fifty yards into the surf. No wonder did the squid beach and disappear beneath the water that they ran up the sand-hills, and lo! a large blue-fish came leaping and tumbling out of the sea.

We on our side could only stand and look on. There was no boat to put us across, and we had to stand and see them hauling out the fish as fast as they could leave the squid. I felt like swimming, but I did not, as I feared plenty of the old fishermen give vent to their injured feelings in terms worse than simply sufficient for all. Hays, hays, hays! and back old every time a fish—large ones too, some ten pounds' weight over there—and not a sign of our year on. It became almost maddening. All in vain I tucked up and finally pulled off my pantaloons in attempt to wade across. A laugh of mocking derision from the other side was the best of the attempt (for swim I could not) as I turned despairingly back.

"Won't you come over and help us now?" heartily greeted by a man on the opposite side.

Well for him a swift and rapid stream inter-posed, or I should have decidedly struck my squid into one of the angular parts of his person, if I had not brained him on the spot. I sat down sad and well-nigh despairing, and counted—yes, actually counted—twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty fish, in as many throws, to the lot of that man! How I began to hate him for his invariable success! Mockingly, at seeing me so forlorn, he hove, and tauntingly he hauled each one of his finny prey, and then held it up to the intense disgust of all us on the wrong side.

As I sat I saw Nemesis drawing near to that man with slow, sure, and stealthy step. Saw, and rejoiced greatly thereat. Quietly the flowing tide swept in and neared every minute that bad man's boat. There, her nose lifted a little with that last wave. Now it moves a little, a very little; and then a sudden slide of the sloping sand and the scow is afloat! Nor man nor boy on our side spoke or moved, as, with bated breath, we watched her drift off into the stream, and, borne on the wings of a propitious breeze, gradually draw toward us.

I looked at my abomination—that man—fearing lest he too should see it. No, he was far too busily intent upon his squid.

Nearer and nearer it came—across the channel now—now in shoal water on our side! Three or four of us make a dash at it, while a loud, victorious hurrah bursts from my lips as, line in hand, I seize the boat's side and scramble in: the others quickly follow, and a few vigorous strokes with the oars, which are luckily in it, carry us to the other side. Each one for himself, in vain the others called to us to send the boat again across. We all prepared to make up for lost time. I looked at my line—looked, and again felt like swearing; it was all in a tangle and snarl. Patiently I unrolled, untwisted, unknotted, and, without one single word for nearly twenty minutes, tried to unravel that horrid line. Didn't I think swearing, however! At length I got it cleared, and then—why then the fish had gone—all gone, and there they were hard at work on the very side we had just come from.

I looked reproachfully at my line: I appealed mutely and beseechingly to the man with the boat.

"Come along, old fellow," said he, "I'll give you a start across agen." I liked him forthwith. Again we crossed, and this time I was all ready. All ready, with the exception of never having thrown a squid before. I tried, however, and hurling it three or four times round my head, I threw. It pulled up short. I found I had hitched myself with the hook in some unknown posterior region. Fortunately it was only through the pantaloons, and my friend quickly cut it out there and then, and still more quickly retired from my immediate vicinity as I undauntedly again attempted to send the squid flying to the place where I wished it to go. Once, twice, thrice I threw, and each time fell short. The skin had taken its departure off my forefinger with the efforts of my futile attempts. A little lad some ten years old is my next neighbor, and he catches at every throw. Shame gives me fresh skill, and again I send the hook abroad—Evoe! Io triumphe! I feel a check, and the line very nearly escapes me. Proudly over my shoulder I place it. Up the beach I run and feel as if I was dragging a hundred-weight behind me. On I rush, shouting in the triumphant excess of my joy, and my first fish is caught—caught, but still unhooked. I sat down and smoked a pipe—a libation, an incense to the gods, to Neptune in especial, for my success. Then came the unhooking process. I placed my bare foot shudderingly on the cold-blooded, slippery beast—a sharp snap of the jaws very near my great toe made me as quickly remove it. After some little manoeuvring I at length got my thumb and finger up its gills and cruelly and unremorsefully wrenched out the hook. Again and again, after wrapping my finger with a piece of my pocket-handkerchief, I threw and each time caught a fish. I got four, and the little lad, my neighbor, and my landlord's son, had six. Ten in all. I think of home a mile away, and the ten fish to be carried there under a burning June's sun. A shout startles me, and I hear my name called. Come here—here quick! Lloyd has got a squid through his foot. I look, and the little lad is on his back; and another lad over the hill, out of sight of the sea, thinks he has got a fish, and hauls away with all his might at the poor lad's foot. There a wave comes up and covers him, and he rolls on toward the sea, borne away by the undertow. O God! how nearly he was gone, for the men have stopped the other boy and the line is slackened. Almost sick with fear I rush to the place and pick up the lad. A moment and my rejoicing is changed to grief and sorrow. I look at the foot, dreading the operation I know will have to be performed. To my great relief and joy it has only gone through the outer side, and no muscle or vein will interfere with the cutting it out. I take out my penknife and ask the men to cut while I hold the lad. They all refuse. Those big, strong, sun-browned men, who venture out every week to sea, holding their lives in their hands and fearing not the winds or storm, can not cut a hook out of a little child's foot but turn sick away. Half angrily I ask them to hold him while I do it myself. The lad, a fisherman's son, neither winces nor cries during the operation. I at first was going to file off the hook, for I had a small file in my pocket. "You'll spoil the squid!" was the lad's quick answer; "cut it out!" And cut it out I did. Taking my handkerchief I tore it into strips and bound it up. I then started for a farm-house I saw two or three fields off, and borrowing there a wheel-barrow, returned to the spot. Piling thereon my fish I put the boy on the top and started once more homeward. The sand was loose and deep, the wheel-barrow, an old one, would not bear the weight, so taking the lad on my back and resuming once more the barrow and fish I toiled my weary way home, where I duly arrived heated and tired, and more than satisfied with my experience of blue-fishing.

After dinner I resumed my inspection of my friend the bee; I went to pay it a visit. I found it at home, but not to be seen. I poked a piece of straw up the hole—an indignant buzzing followed; a decided refusal to come out and see me. What was he about? First I believe it was not a he but a she. The bee was laying an egg—at least I suppose so. There are solitary bees which behave thus. Sometimes in the chink of a wall, sometimes in soft wood these little creatures will deposit a few eggs in cells like thimbles, one fitting into another, for each baby bee must have a nursery all to itself. I am not going, however, to give a long article on insects or their homes—the editor would not let me if I wished; for is not the Rev. J. G. Wood's book on such matters even now being published by the Harpers? and he is a much abler entomologist and naturalist than I am. I am only the grub of one—I may possibly emerge full-grown at last—so I won't now follow this purpose out. I have ever so many scribbled notes about insects I have found and seen in Australia and New Zealand, Africa, and here in America; they shall, however, all go into my waste-basket for the present.

THE LITTLE BLACK DOGS OF BERKSHIRE.

I AM at Mount Washington—not among the White Hills of New Hampshire, where they build their hotels in the crevices and gorges, far below clouds and cool breezes, but in Berkshire, where our Mount Washington has its verdant bosom dotted with neat white farm-houses, raised high in pure air almost to its summit.

Said summit claims to be one of the highest in the old Bay State, on the map bearing the honored name of Everett, and marked as 2624 feet high by the exact measurement of Professor Hitchcock. In this vicinity its round and rocky face is named the "Dome." The farm-house where our party abide is on the elevated slope which, with varied undulations, rises toward the Dome, commanding a fine view of the ranges of hills and mountains around. A short walk brings us to the summit, where, on one side, the blue Catskill seem almost in stone-throw reach, while the valley, through which constantly glides the smoke of the Harlem Railroad, lies close below. On the other side spreads out the valley of the Housatonic, with its wooded scenery, white villages, and spires.

why they are attracted to me as they usually are. I have seen a strange dog come into a room full of company, and inquiringly examine the whole circle, and then make a "bee line," as the hunters have it, with his nose to my hand, which was duly saluted in dog fashion—a fashion which would be far more acceptable could the dogs be induced to use pocket-handkerchiefs. I read somewhere in Charlotte Brontë's stories that this attention from dogs was the sure index of a kind and benevolent disposition, at least in the dog's view of the case. Having gained this reputation among these Canine-ites, it becomes me to sustain it only by dwelling on their good qualities.

As to the number of these little black dogs I would not risk my credit for veracity. But if I were now standing before a justice of the peace, with right hand upraised, I should swear (no, being nine-tenths of me a Quaker, I should reverently affirm) that in and about this same house where I dwell there are not less than five little—very little—black terrier dogs.

The favorite among them with all the family is Miss Jenny's Prince—so affectionate and so chivalrous in his demonstrative courtesies that even that mirror of chivalry, the Black Prince of historic fame, must be cast into the shade. When first presented to his present lady-love by her departing brother, loud wailings ensued toward evening in the brother's chamber, and there was found this young Black Prince sitting by an old shoe of his departed master, his nose up in the air and piteous moans and cries issuing from his bereaved bosom. No food, no caresses could entice from the sole remains of his beloved master, and so by them he mourned and wailed till "kind nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," came to his relief.

Then, after his mistress had enthroned herself in his chivalrous heart, her departure brought

DOGMATISM.

On my arrival at my destined quarters I was startled and amused with the singular salutation with which I was greeted. It was a volley from a squadron of little black dogs, ludicrously small and ridiculously fierce and uproarious. Behind were their owners, so earnest in outcries to quiet this ill-mannered demonstration that, what with the barking of dogs, and rushing out of owners, and calls, invitations, upbraidings, and general huryscerry, I was quite bewildered. Here I am, parasol in hand, and a troop of little black terriers taking aim at my feet. On the platform stands my baggage, while from the windows in front of me are peering out my friends within, mischievously merry at the hubbub and my ill-concealed dismay.

When at last seated in the parlor and restored to conscious intelligence I seemed to be surrounded by a company of ladies, each tending a little black dog with all those melodious, tender, melting tones with which pet children and pet lap-dogs are regaled, to wit: "Sprite," the young doctor's dog; "Nelly," the doctor's wife's dog; "Prince," the doctor's sister's dog; "Juno," the New York lady's dog; "Fido," the young girl's dog. At every meal most of these names are repeated in the pet language that runs thus: "Poor itty doggie! was he hungry? So he was! Here, itty darling, take some icy cream! He sude have some cakey, so he sude!"

I am not fond of dogs, and I wonder often on similar agonies of grief. Stationed on her bed, with an old glove of hers before him, he howled and moaned, would take no food, and was pertinaciously stationary and miserable till her return. Alas! how few of us, hapless humans, have friends that would thus refuse food, howl, and wail over our old shoes till our return!

Young Maggie is a special favorite with our canine squadron, and when she issues out on a pedestrian trip to the Dome, she usually starts off with such a retinue as this, every dog's ear up and every dog's tail waving with delight. But suddenly is heard the shrill whistle of the Doctor forbidding departure, nay, ordering immediate attendance in his autocratic or rather dogocratic dominion. Such is the awful reverence and devotion secured by whip and voice that not a dog dares disobey. Down go ears and tails, and the procession moves back, leaving poor Maggie "alone in her glory."

My attempts to sustain my character for benevolence with the dogs cost me dear on one memorable night. It was on the occasion of Tableaux Vivants in our farm-house parlor, drawing all the visitors in the neighborhood. I was honored with a "reserved seat" in the front row, while two rows were behind. On my right sat a lady holding dog Dido. On my left was a lady holding Nelly. Near her a lady holding Sprite, while Prince and Fido were around generally. After attending to the performances very respectfully for a time, the dog portion of the audience became restless and seemed bent on changing their seats. Dido desired to visit a lady on the back seat and then to return to the front, and trusting to my benevolence, concluded to make her way back and forth over my shoulders. This set the fashion, and ere long it seemed to me there was a sort of procession back and forth somewhat in this style. Being under bonds for good behavior I recurred to the child song of early days, "Let dogs delight," and so I magnanimously determined not to interrupt their delight even at the expense of my best "Sabbaday" frock.

I have heard of a contrivance in mechanics called an "endless screw," which turns and returns in an endless sort of unintelligible way. In my extremity I grew bewildered and seemed to myself such a sort of screw, made up of little black dogs turning up and down and over and under and every other way. I grew desperate, and ventured on sundry indications of distress, whereupon the dogs kindly retreated to their several mistresses, and I regained lost composure without any serious loss of character. But the dog-tracks on my "Sabba-day" frock remain to this day!

A genuine terrier is a perfect incarnation of self-complacent activity and self-satisfaction at his own achievements, whatever they may be. A huge wagon, a team of stout horses, and a burly mountaineer driver pass our door. Out rushes Sprite, who imagines himself the chief protector of our domains. He barks and raves as if he designed to demolish and exterminate horses, wagon, and driver; and, when all are out of sight, returns trembling in every nerve with self-gratulation, sinks by you on his haunches, licks his chops, and looks up with such triumphant satisfaction as if he were saying, "I've done the job—and that old chap will never venture here again!" There is another peculiarity in some of the terrier race that brings to memory my father's pet—old Trip—who shall be introduced to illustrate.

Poor Trip! he was the homeliest wretch that ever wore dog-skin—so grotesquely homely that one could not but pity as well as laugh. When our young people were boasting each of the "pure breed" of their respective favorites, the youngest of all, with innocent complacency, claimed that his dog was "pure mongrel." Trip was of this breed. His square cut body was sustained by four thick, short legs, reminding one of a small school-bench. Some previous owner had cut off both ears and tail; which latter appendage surmounted his back like a blunt peg, giving a peculiarly ludicrous air to his demonstrations of joy at our arrival as he vainly tried to wag his little stump like other dogs. His chief peculiarity was an extreme sensibility to noise, especially to musical sounds. To amuse his friends, his master, when Trip was asleep near by, would jar a single string of his violin. Then Trip would, in his sleep, emit a comical sigh. A louder string would draw forth a grunt. A still louder would educe a decided groan. A louder still would cause a howl and set him on his feet, and a final sweep with the bow would send him yelping out of the room to the great merriment of spectators.

Now Trip was on the carpet in those stormy days when the theological world was in bitter conflict as to how Adam's sin had affected our race. Trip's master was a leading heresiarch of the New School party. Near by was the New School chapel, and nearly facing it was the little Old School church, where no New School minister could show his face in the pulpit. A boarder in our family ventured into this Orthodox fold, and Trip concluded to accompany him to judge for himself as to these mooted doctrines. Well known as the New School Doctor's dog, a general smile appeared as Trip deliberately trotted up the aisle and stationed himself on his haunches directly in front of the minister, just as he commenced the sermon. He listened quietly a while, and hearing nothing very much amiss composed himself to sleep with nose on his paws. Toward the close of the sermon the minister waxed animated, when a deep-drawn sigh from Trip indicated that he was disturbed by such theology as that. A still more animated passage drew forth a deep groan, and finally Trip started off with a moan and howl as if it was more than any New School dog could possibly endure. He trotted home head down, and knowing all about the effect of Adam's sin—at least as much as any of them. No doubt he was more than ever convinced that his master's view of the case was the only right one.

This same sensibility to noise made no little merriment one evening among the dogs at our tea-table. A dark thunder-cloud had surrounded us with solemn gloom, and as the muttering thunder began, the dogs showed their disapproval of commencing solemnities by suppressed growls. Suddenly a sharp flash was followed by a tremendous discharge of aerial artillery. Whereupon Sprite and his squadron rushed out into the yard, and setting their noses toward the bellowing cloud, they barked and yelped and howled till, seemingly satisfied that they had thoroughly done up the job, they returned quite self-complacent, and apparently perfectly confident that no thunder-cloud ever would reappear here again, at least while they guarded the premises.

We have grand good times in this hot weather up on these cool mountains. We walk through deep gorges and climb the Dome to watch the setting sun and gorgeous sunset clouds. We gaze on white thunder-caps and the ever-varying cloud shadows that glide over the mountains. We ride to Inishnah, where traveled ladies say equals Switzerland in all but snow-clad summits. We gather strawberries, raspberries, and blueberries, that line our path in all directions. We rejoice over the farm-house abundance of milk, cream, fresh butter, and the nicest of bread and cakes. We dress as we please, and live an easy outdoor life. In the cool of the day we play croquet, and in the evening we sit on the piazzas by moonlight and listen to young voices and a fine guitar that discourse sweet music.

But all earthly pleasures have their alloy, and the honest historian is obliged to chronicle some of these, or fail in the prime virtue of truthfulness. Listen, then, to some young maidens in the chit-chat of their chambers:

"Look," says the bonneted Beauty, "is not bad! What shall we do with this tobacco smoke all over the house? Last night poor Mrs. G—— was up till one o'clock — so sick and weary? It was sultry and hot so that we could not shut the windows, and there was not a place in the house where she could escape the fumes, for some one was smoking half the night. Those young fellows ought to be admonished."

"They have been," said overgrown Sooty "I spoke to the landlord, and he told them that smoking around the house, and especially in the piazzas, sent the smoke into all the windows and troubled the ladies. The youths were very sorry—would not do it any more; smoked in the greenhouse at three days, one after another; some were even taken and now, from agreeing to abstain, we are perfumed with tobacco in parlor, chambers, halls, and passages."

"It was just so at Saratoga last year," said earnest Mary. "Mother suffers dreadfully from the fumes of tobacco, and I tried to get a rule enforced by the landlord that the smoking should be confined to the gentlemen's side of the piazzas. But there was no use in trying. The smoking was kept up night and day all around the house, in the halls and in the chambers, and so mother had to leave. And last winter, when we moved into the city on purpose for her to ride daily in the horse cars, the men and boys would smoke at both ends outside, so that it poured in at doors and windows, and there was no stopping it. So poor mother had to give up riding or pay enormous prices, which we could ill afford. And when we journey the smokers in the smoking car fill hair, mouth, and clothes with the vile odor, and then come and sit in front of us, so we have no escape but to put heads out of the window. And then the conductor comes and tells us we shall have our towns crowded out. Something ought to be done to stop such abuses."

"I don't see," says Jolly Jack, "there is no use in trying. The smoke will smoke, say and do all you can. I have seen it tried thoroughly at Uncle Smith's, and one warned that there is no help for it, and we would try to well exhaust and make the best of it. Uncle Smith once tried and practiced, and was told and corrected, till he drove all the young men from the premises. You know how fond aunt is of her cousins' children, especially those that are the worst smokers. She grieved greatly over their departure, and Uncle knew that so much he cannot be comfortably to see her disturbed. So he drove in his horse and helped her to wait them back, though he knows how sometimes she is so nervous. But he submits in such a civil way as keeps me in a constant giggle."

CHIPPING THUNDER.

"Why," said Bessie, "they do not come and smoke in her parlor when they know how it troubles her, do they?"

"No, but they smoke at home till they are drenched, and then they smoke all the way coming; so that as soon as they enter the room it is instantly filled with putrid tobacco-smoke and their still more fetid breaths."

"Yes," said Julia, "their breath is the worst of it, and I have to contrive all manner of devices to keep out of range. When uncle sees any of them coming he instantly begins his comic performances, slips windows down at top, opens doors, and if it is winter, brings the stove almost to white heat, meantime keeping us in a gale of merriment. Then when they enter he is so cordial, and so jolly, and so abundant in welcomes, that the poor fellows imagine themselves special favorites. Then he is constantly slipping in remarks with a double sense, and making droll quotations that we understand one way and the youths another. Oh, it is better than the best comedy to hear him. One day he declared, as he saw some of them coming, that the animal, carrying such a perfume that even its name can not be spoken in refined society, was a rose and a pink in comparison with the approaching company. One time when he called out this objectionable name my aunt remonstrated, 'Well, well,' said he, 'I won't say the whole word; but I can say s and k with a dash between, for this is allowed in the best bred prints.' So afterward he would talk of the 's—k' even before the unconscious youths, and in such a droll way that aunt is amazed and half vexed while I enjoy the fun."

"Yes," says another, "I have some of the same experience at Aunt Hannah's. She is very sensitive to tobacco, and yet she is so fond of her nephews that she conceals her dislike of their habits. So when I am there we take turns, each sitting smiling and apparently delighted with our sweet-scented visitors till flesh begins to fail, when, making some plausible excuse, one goes out for fresh air and the other takes her turn. And when they are out of hearing we set open doors and windows to air the house and have a good laugh."

"Yes," says conscientious Clara, "that is the worst of it. We are almost forced to play hypocrite by false pretenses. The other day I called on kind Mrs. L—. Her son is just from the army, and 'dear Dick' must have and do every thing his heart desires. And so he smokes all over the house. They were sitting in worse than Egyptian fog. The youth had the grace to stop as we passed the ordinary compliments, holding the smoking cigar in his fingers. I sat smiling in my agonies till I thought a crisis was coming, and then rushed into a shut-up parlor with a sudden enthusiasm about a picture. It was 'dear Dick's favorite,' and so he and mother follow and stand so close that the smoking cigar is under my nose. Suddenly bethinking himself, dear Dick inquires if tobacco is disagreeable? Now if I say Yes, the good mother and son are convicted of bad manners. To say No is a falsehood; and so one must hunt up some subterfuge to escape the dilemma."

"I tell you how I manage in such cases," says Julia. "Though the dead smoke in hair and clothes and the still worse breath are loathsome, I really like the fresh perfume of a good cigar. So when I find myself in this dilemma, I say 'I like the perfume of a good cigar,' and so make my escape."

"But," says honest Nelly, "you practice an injurious deception. You make the impression that you are satisfied with what you detest, and what is also really wrong. One reason the young men are so free and easy in thus violating the rules of good-breeding is, that they are deceived by such methods."

"Well," said Clara, "I can get along tolerably with the smoking, but the chewing is perfectly hideous; and I do not see how any gentleman could practice it, after journeying in our railroad cars—such sights of mouths, all stained and twisted with the cud—the constrained and nauseous spitting, and the slippery puddles of saliva! And I have, many a time, found my dress and hose all stained before I perceived what was under my feet. And, again and again, I have had a nice traveling dress actually spit on by some of the clownish fellows that frequent our dépôts. I could endure a smoker, at least till his breath became intolerable, but I do not understand how any woman could marry a man that chews."

"You seem to think, Clara, that gentlemen chew just like the clowns you meet in the cars. I assure you there is a gentlemanly way of using tobacco. My brother uses it some; but I do not suppose any one but the family know it. His breath is always sweet except when he has tobacco in his mouth."

"Well," said Clara, "I would encourage him in this decent way of doing a vulgar thing, if you can not persuade him, as I should try to do, to give it up altogether, as both an ungentlemanly and sinful practice."

"Yes," said another, "and I believe it is more unhealthful than smoking."

"No, it is not," said Julia; "for Uncle Smith, while he was fighting, and scolding, and arguing, used to read the opinions of physicians to us, and they say smoking, by its action on the brain, through the nostrils as well as through the lungs, is far more injurious than any other form of tobacco."

Here timid Anna, who has been searching her port-folio, finds a paper, and after some hesitation begins:

"Oh, girls! I feel so sad and so conscience-smitten every time I think about this. Father says the young boys of our country are fast going to ruin by this dreadful practice, and that we young ladies ought to use our influence to save the poor fellows. Some of them our own brothers. He gave me this paper and told me to read it, as addressed by him to the young men who visit us, and to get other young ladies to do so too. But I have not had courage to do anything about it. I want to read it to you and see what you think we ought to do."

So a circle was formed, and Anna read as follows:

"Every physician knows that the agreeable sensations that tempt to tobacco are caused by nicotine, which is a rank poison, as much so as prussic acid or arsenic. When smoked this poison passes to the brain through the nostrils, and to the blood as it passes through the lungs. When chewed the nicotine passes into the blood through the mouth and stomach. In both cases the brain and whole nervous system are thrown into an abnormal excitement to expel the poison, and it is this excitement that causes the agreeable sensations. Nicotine is a medicinal agent like arsenic, mercury, and other poisons, which in disease sometimes is a remedy. But tobacco has no element that nourishes the body as do food and drink. On the contrary, every nerve and fibre rejects it as a mortal enemy. The excitement thus caused is invariably followed by a diminution of nervous power in exact proportion to the preceding stimulation. Some nerves are much more sensitive than others to this agent, and after repeated doses they become debilitated, and crave an increase of stimulation to relieve the fainting system. And the more is taken the more the aching nerves demand increasing doses.

"Persons of certain temperaments can bear large and continuous portions of such poisons as opium, hashesh, and tobacco apparently uninjured. Others speedily become victims to very small doses. The phlegmatic German can take doses that would kill the excitable Frenchman or American. The following extracts from standard medical authors sustain these statements:

"Dr. John C. Warren, the celebrated physician of Boston, writes thus:

"The lining membrane of the lungs has a wonderfully absorbent action, by which they soak in the air destined to vivify the blood. If this air is impregnated with the fumes of tobacco, even in a weak degree, the noxious fluid is entangled in the minute spongy air-cells, and has time to exert its influence on the blood, not in vivifying but in vitiating it. The blood, having imbibed the narcotic principle, circulates it through the whole system, and produces a febrile action in most individuals—especially those of a delicate habit."

Here one listener exclaimed: "Now we see how it is we poor women are made to suffer. Most of us are of delicate habit—at least we have the credit of it—and the more delicate we are the more we are injured by inhaling tobacco-smoke. The Bible says, 'We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.' I think those who use tobacco read this reversed (if read at all): We that are weak ought to bear the infirmities of the strong, and let them please themselves."

Anna continues thus:

"Dr. Richardson, a leading British medical writer, in an article read to the British Medical Association at Bath, said:

"Smoking unquestionably is very injurious to the animal functions. The blood is made too fluid, the biliary secretion is arrested, and the digestion is constantly deranged. On the heart the effect is very marked. The great effect of tobacco is to arrest all the functional processes on which growth and development depend. To growing youth smoking is especially deleterious."

Here another listener remarks: "That is the reason, I suppose, that Cousin Joe and Cousin Will both have dyspepsia and constant headaches. They of course will not believe it, or, if they do, it will make no difference."

Says another: "Dr. B——, of the H—— Asylum, told father that heart-diseases among young men, especially in schools and colleges, were becoming more and more prevalent from the habit of smoking."

Says a third: "I wonder if Cousin George is so short and stunted from his smoking—Dr. Richardson says the chief effect of tobacco is to arrest growth."

Says a fourth: "How many of the students in college have sallow skins! I suppose smoking is the cause, for this doctor says that it affects the biliary system."

Anna proceeds again:

"Sir John Forbes (the Queen of England's late medical adviser) said of the following remarks of Dr. Copeland, 'Every medical man knows this is all true:'

"Smoking weakens the digestive and assimilating functions, impairs the due elaboration of the chyle and blood, and prevents a healthy nutrition of the several structures of the body. Hence results low stature, a pallid and sallow hue of the skin, unhealthy blood, and weakened bodily powers. Smoking generates thirst and vital depression, and, to remove these, stimulating liquor is resorted to. Thus these two debasing habits shorten the life of the individual and injure or ruin his offspring. Smoking tobacco weakens the nervous powers, favors a dreamy, imaginative, and imbecile state, produces indolence, and sinks its votary into maudlin inactivity and selfish enjoyment of his vice."

Here a listener remarks: "So it seems that smoking tends not only to make men of small size, but to transmit this blessing to their children. I think we are in a fair way to become a nation of pigmies."

"It seems too," says another, "that the mind is diminished as well as the body. I know two or three young fellows that were very bright at school that are turning out lazy, stupid drones, spending half their time in sleeping or smoking. Poor Cousin Will is one!"

Anna reads again:

"Dr. Jolly read an article on this subject to the French Academy at Paris, in which he attributes the increase of insanity in France and other countries to the excessive use of tobacco. He says that debility of the brain and spinal cord is the consequence of this practice, and such debility leads to insanity."

Here another listener exclaims: "Yes, indeed, it must be so, for Dr. B——, of the Lunatic Asylum, told father the other day that he was constantly receiving cases of young men led to insanity by tobacco, and that they were among the most difficult cases to cure. How dreadful to think so many young boys are getting into this fatal practice!"

Next Anna reads the following:

"Henry Ward Beecher, in one of his printed sermons, says:

"I do not deny that there are many temperaments that use tobacco all their lives with little inconvenience to themselves (though not to others). But we are a nervous people. Every thing in our society tends to develop brain and nerve unduly. Among such a people smoking is apt to lead to thirst and drinking. The cigar and the cup are well acquainted with each other. The use of tobacco always tends to waste the nerve force and the brain force, and you do not know but you are the one in five that will be prematurely poisoned and destroyed. Not one single element of health does it give you, and the pleasure you derive from its use is, in the main, illusive pleasure. And such is the effect of it as a poison, on many constitutions, that the struggle to break away is next only to the struggle of breaking away from the cup. And it has led many and many a youth to the cup. On grounds of simple common-sense I ask, is it well to spend your means to keep a habit that incommodes others, annoys those about you, will probably injure your health, and possibly injure your morals? The young often acquire this habit because they feel that it will be a distinction. No—unfortunately, smoking is so common that it is not a distinction. If you wish to have a distinction refrain from smoking. That will make you remarkable."

This last extract was followed by exclamations—"Good!" "Excellent!" "First-rate!" "I wish all ministers would preach so!" with various other commendations. "But," says one, "this asking ministers to stop using tobacco and to preach against it, the grand difficulty is that, when conscientious people do what is wrong, they contrive, somehow, to make it seem right. I was talking with my minister a while ago about it, and he says his physician advised him to smoke a cigar every day after dinner to aid weak digestion."

"Yes," says another, "and you may be sure that physician is a slave to tobacco. I wonder if he would advise us young ladies to take a cigar after dinner daily. I am sure women have weak nerves, and suffer from indigestion as much as men. I should like to ask that doctor a few questions as to women's smoking. If it is such a delightful thing and good for the health, why should we be denied the enjoyment? I put this question to a famous General the other day. 'Oh,' said he, 'we want ladies to be neat and refined in every thing.' 'Indeed,' said I, 'and we wish gentlemen to be neat and refined. Why should they become filthy and vulgar any more than women?'"

"No, no; they all know better," said Julia, "they know it is wrong. None of them would advise their young sons to use tobacco. I know several gentlemen who have relinquished the practice lest their sons should be led to imitate. One of the most noted physicians said to me, 'I gave it up for the sake of my boys.'"

"The fact is," said Nelly, "men who are sensible and conscientious and yet continue this guilty practice, are as truly slaves, and often more miserable slaves, than the race that many smokers have been fighting to deliver."

Anna then says, "The worst is yet to come, and yet there is some consolation in it too." She reads thus:

"In Boston there is an institution expressly designed for persons who have ruined health by the use of such stimulants as opium, tobacco, hasheesh, and alcohol. It bears the name of the 'Washington Home,' and is conducted by Dr. Albert Day, 887 Washington Street. In his last Annual Report Dr. Day speaks of a species of insanity frequently induced by the use of tobacco as well as alcoholic drinks. The name given to this kind of insanity is Oino-mania.

"Dr. Carpenter, a leading medical writer of Great Britain, indorses the following statement from Dr. Hutchinson of the Glasgow Lunatic Asylum. In speaking of disease caused by the use of stimulants, he says:

"The worst and most common result is the chronic form of Oino-mania. This is by far the most incurable form of the malady. The patient is incessantly under the most overwhelming desire for stimulants, and is perfectly incapable of self-control. While the paroxysm is on him he is regardless of his health, his life, and all that can make life dear. He will sacrifice comfort and reputation, withstand the claims of affection, consign his family to misery and disgrace, and deny himself the common necessities of life to gratify this insane propensity. This is the fearful state portrayed [and experienced] by Charles Lamb. The only chance of cure or alleviation is from attention to the health and total abstinence [from the destroying stimulants]."

"Dr. Day, in this Report, says:

"A mistaken idea prevails that the victim becomes and continues so because he has no desire and makes no effort to reform. No error can be more complete. To shake off the shackles of this slavery is the dream by day and night of the unfortunate sufferer; and how to accomplish it is the question he eagerly asks, and for whose answer he waits with the most intense desire. Most touching instances occur of heroic self-denial in persons abandoned as hopeless by their dearest friends, and thought to be indifferent to their own reform."

"One case is narrated in this Report of a man without money or friends who had heard of this Washington Home. Having no means of transportation, he walked forty miles, traveling much of the way in the night, with feeble health, and battling with the phantoms of delirium. He reached the Home, was cured, and is now a healthy, happy man."

During the reading of this part two of the listeners were in tears, and at its close one had rushed out of the room in an agony of weeping. A long silence followed, and then one of the circle exclaimed, "How dreadful! when so many of our little brothers are beginning to smoke!"

"Yes," said another; "and how few know what distress comes into families in this way. That is what sent poor Mary out in such distress. Her oldest brother, whom she almost worshiped, I do believe was one who had this Oino-mania; for he was affected exactly as the doctor describes. He was a noble fellow, and as true and honorable in his words as in all his ordinary actions. But when he first went into the army he learned to smoke, and after two or three years "seemed impossible for him to break off. He would give it up for a few weeks, and then it seemed as if he was as crazy as any maniac till he began to smoke again. And so it went on till he began to drink, and that ended his life. And now his young brother Jimmy has begun to smoke, and his mother and sisters have just found it out, and they are in dreadful state of excitement. And Jimmy says that almost all the boys at school smoke, and some of them are beginning to drink too, and their parents do not even suspect it. The boys think smoking and drinking is the way to become gentlemen, which, you know, is their chief aim. Oh, what will become of us if things go on in this way?"

Says Julia: "I believe a great part of habitual smokers are the victims of this dreadful Oino-mania.

"Then," said Nelly, "they ought to go to Dr. Day and be cured. In New York State there is, at Binghamton, an institution to cure inebriates, and a law has been passed by which an intemperate man, on complaint of his family, can be tried by a jury, and if proved to be a drunkard, he may be taken by force and confined in this institution till he is cured. Such a law and such institutions ought to be in every State, and the victims of tobacco, too, ought to be shut up there till they are cured. I think this Oino-mania is far worse than the other kinds of mania, because its victims are suffered to go at large and tempt young men and boys into such dangers."

"Well, well," says one, "if all smokers and chewers of tobacco were sent to hospitals there would be few left to keep the world moving."

"What can we do, girls?" says Clara. "Our brothers, most of them, are in this dreadful habit; but it does no good to talk, they only either laugh at us or go off in a pet."

"I tell you what we can do," said another: "let us ask our ministers to preach as Mr. Beecher did."

"I can not do that," said a third, "for our rector smokes, and so does his assistant, and so does the bishop. No minister who smokes can be asked to preach against it as a vice and sin. And so long as our governors, judges, clergymen, warriors, and most honored citizens set the example the young boys will follow it. I do not see as we can do any thing but mourn."

At last one of the circle exclaims, "Let us ask some of the lady writers in Harper's Magazine and the Atlantic to prepare a piece that we can give our brothers and friends to read."

This proposal met with an unanimous approval, and this article comes as the result. The preceding is a true exhibition of facts with only a change of names, place, and time in certain portions.

Having introduced some of the darker shades in our sojourn at Mount Washington a few of the lighter will form our finis.

At first all the gentlemen around us were smokers. But ere long two arrived whose fair complexion, pure breath, and fine voices showed that tobacco had never debased either mind or manhood. By one a fine guitar was deftly touched and mingled with a cultivated, manly voice. The other and his wife were well-trained amateur singers. Among our young ladies were unusually sweet-toned, cultivated voices. Ere long a youth came from college who, to please his mother, had resisted all the tobacco temptations which few there do resist, and he also added another to our choir. So by the soft moonlight, in cool piazzas, we passed many a charming hour. To complete our enjoyment some of the dogs and all the smokers went off together in a style which we all hope is emblematic of our future at Mount Washington and all over our land.

VALE DOGS AND TOBACCO.

AMONG RELATIONS.

AS well as if it were yesterday I can recall that summer evening. I had just brought in the clothes from the grass-plot, and was sprinkling and folding them for the next day's ironing. The flickering blaze of a little wood-fire, occupying but a tithe of the immense old-fashioned fire-place, lighted up with cheerful gleams a spacious, orderly New England kitchen. It was in the days when those who had cooking-stoves reserved them for winter use, discreetly considering that, when a fire was required only a part of the day, and even then at several different times, thrift and comfort were both on the side of the fire-place.

We were expecting Uncle Holcroft to spend the night with us. It was then a ride of two long days from Boston; he would not come till late, and the kettle, suspended from the crane, was kept boiling that we might get his tea ready at a moment's notice. Mother was in the sitting-room with Aunt Brewer, whose husband was gone to the far-away Ohio country, and whose little girl was asleep up stairs. Rose and Alice, my two sisters, were asleep also. They had tried hard to keep awake for Uncle Holcroft; but after school they went down the lane for swamp pinks and young checkerberry leaves, and came back so tired that they were easily persuaded to eat their bread and milk and go to bed.

It was a pleasant night, though starless, and windows and doors were wide open. Just as I had finished my work a great dor-beetle came whirling in against the flame of my candle and extinguished it. Then I sat down on the door-step and watched the little fiery streaks traced by the fire-flies on the inky black air. Now and then there was a rustling in the maple near the door, or a faint chirp, as if a bird were trying to sing in his sleep. I heard the shrill, continuous sound of myriads of crickets in the meadow, the fall of water at the mill-dam in the Ashuelot, half a mile away, the piping of frogs in the swamp, and, nearest of all but least distinct of all, the voices of mother and Aunt Brewer chatting in the sitting-room. From the garden came the spicy odor of the pinks, which were now a mass of blossom each side of the long walk. I never recognize that odor without a glamour coming over me, without fancying for a moment that I sit on the kitchen door-step, and hear the home-voices and the pleasant sounds of the summer night.

Presently some one came in at the back gate. I knew the step, and rose to make way for Polly Watts, the tailoress.

"All alone in the dark!" said Polly; "and where's Mary Deeth?"

I said she had gone to Swanzey to see her sister.

"And what's the fire burning for?"

I told her.

"Well," rejoined she, "I don't one mite begrudge him his ride such a night as this. It's pitch dark; all I could do to find the gate.

Where's your mother? Mrs. Wilson is expecting company from down below next week, and she wants me to stay and help her turn a carpet to-morrow, and I thought maybe your mother'd let me off."

I told her she would find mother in the sitting-room, and I followed her there; for Polly always knew every thing that happened in the village, and was not chary of her knowledge.

She would not sit down, but stood leaning over the back of a chair, like old Mr. Wells in a prayer-meeting. She was tall and thin, and abhorred long dresses; the one she wore that evening was even shorter than usual. She was never particular in the arrangement of drapery, and now the point of her shawl hung over her elbow. She wore a kind of bonnet called a "calash," made in the shape of a chaise-top, brown in color, some of the rattans broken, and with the angles thus made it was a fantastic head-piece. Her eyes were black and keen, and never hidden by the large, round spectacles which seemed always on the point of slipping from her nose. Polly was repairer-general to all the old coats, jackets, trowsers, and carpets in town. Also she cut all the children's hair. She usually spent the night where she had been working during the day, and whenever she changed quarters carried with her goose and shears. Her ordinary remuneration was a quarter of a dollar for a day's labor; but as she was of an observing turn, and conscientious too, it often happened that she made a deduction of five or eight cents from her regular price, alleging that, as she had not worked steadily, she preferred not to receive full pay. She also made it a point never to break an engagement; and, moreover, I think she would have disobliged any one else rather than mother, for she had once been nursed through a severe illness at our house, and had ever after felt at liberty to seek a home there whenever Saturday night found her where she doubted her acceptableness as a Sunday guest.

"I didn't bring my goose," said Polly, "for I told Mrs. Wilson if you'd give way to any body you'd give way to her. She asked me if I wa'n't afraid to go round alone so; 'No,' says I, 'if any one carries me off in the night, they'll be glad to bring me back in the morning. I sha'n't meet any body that looks worse than myself,' says I. What shall I say to Mrs. Wilson?"

"That it will be just as convenient if you come here next week," mother answered. "How is old Mr. Miller getting along?"

"It beats all how he does hang on," said Polly; "he brightened up this morning and had a talk with the minister. I hope Mr. Barnet wasn't mealy-mouthed. Deacon Wilder was in to see him last week, and he said if he knew he shouldn't get well he didn't know but he'd give a hundred dollars to the missionaries. The Deacon told him he'd better do it, whether or no. But he said if he got well he should want to fence in his three-acre lot, and should find a use for all he'd got, and more too."

"Which doctor has he?"

"He wouldn't send for any. He said he never had run up a doctor's bill, and never would. But last week the old lady got frightened about him; so she came over to Dr. Adams and told him how set her husband was, and asked the Doctor to come over in a friendly way without making any charge; and so he did. Perhaps if I had ten or fifteen thousand dollars I should stick tight to it, just like old Mr. Miller. But there's a flash of lightning. There'll be a thunder-shower. I must hurry along. Good-night."

And presently Aunt Brewer said good-night, too, and went up stairs to her little Katy. In a few minutes father came.

"Your uncle will not be here till Wednesday night," said father. "Mr. Haskell met him in Boston, and brought word that he would be detained."

I went into the kitchen to take care of the fire. When I came back father gave me a letter.

"And I came near forgetting it altogether," said he. "It is from Hanover; from your sister Graham, I think," turning to mother.

I have the letter still. The ink is faded, the paper discolored and broken in the folds, but it is still legible, and it reads thus:

"DEAR NIECE.—I expect the pleasure of a visit from my cousin, Miss Louisa Rhodes, daughter of Captain Timothy Rhodes, of Salem. Your father will remember him. Miss Rhodes will spend a few weeks here, and I shall be very happy if you will visit us at the same time. I think it will be pleasant for you both, particularly as our Commencement is near at hand, and there is usually a good deal of company in town at that time. I hope you will not disappoint us, and the sooner you may favor us with your company the better we shall like it. If you should come in the stage it would bring you directly to our door. Your uncle joins me in love to your father and mother, yourself and the children. Your affectionate aunt,

"JANET GRAHAM."

I read the letter and then offered it to mother; and she told me to read it aloud.

A little silence ensued, and then father said, "Well, what about it?"—and mother said we had better consider before deciding, and that it was past bedtime now. But I felt sure from the tone of her voice that she was disposed to think favorably of the project. So we all said good-night and went to our beds.

Going to Hanover for Commencement week was a great event in those days. I had often heard the Sumner girls, the Whitneys, and the Bells talk it over. The Sumners came down from Claremont every year to visit at our house, and then mother always gave a little party for them; which I, of course, enjoyed as much as any one. But when they were invited in return, I did not share in the invitation. In fact, I had never in my life been asked to a "grown-up party" when Aunt Graham's letter came.

I could hardly believe it all true; and was sorry, after I had put out my light, that I did not give the letter another reading. My regret did not keep me awake though, for I fell asleep in the midst of it, and never awoke again till broad daylight.

When I went down stairs breakfast was almost ready. Mary Deeth had started from Swanzy at four o'clock in the morning, and after a walk of three miles had gone zealously to ironing. She frequently took this walk for the pleasure of spending the evening with her sister in Swanzy.

Mother and Aunt Brewer had already been discussing the proposed visit. Aunt Brewer approved it emphatically.

"She is just the right age to be improved by it now," said she. "She will see more people there in the course of a fortnight than she would in two years here. It happens so fortunately, too, that she can ride up to Claremont with her Uncle Holcroft. Probably one of the boys would take her up to Hanover."

Mother said that if I went—and I was sure she would not say even so much unless she meant me to go—it was very well I had a new bonnet this summer.

The truth is, that ever since I could remember we had been obliged to consider what was possible rather than what was pretty and becoming. Things were mending a little now, or it would have been heartless of me to think of going at all.

"I think I must buy her a new white gown," said mother. "She has outgrown hers so much that I scarcely thought it would do at home. Her other gowns will do very well with the skirts let down."

"I have thought about that," said Aunt Brewer. "I haven't worn my dotted Swiss for two years, and it is a pity it should lie by so long. There is plenty of it, and a piece over for a cape. Margaret shall have it, and I'll make it myself. I'll make the cape the new shape, which Mrs. Bowditch sent me from Boston; and you shall give her some of your best thread lace to trim it."

I confess I thought myself this was going on pretty fast. Mother's lace was her treasure; relics of the time before I was born, when money was plentier than of late. But she looked pleased, and went up stairs, soon returning with a square pasteboard box, which I knew contained her precious possessions.

Just then Mary Deeth brought in the breakfast, and father came from the garden, Rose and Alice following, as usual.

To this day I remember just how that breakfast-table looked; the very pattern of the tablecloth, so white and smooth; the figures on the old-fashioned blue and white china; the shining steel knives and forks; the tall china coffee-pot, and the little, round, black tea-pot for mother, who eschewed coffee; and I can see my mother's pale, patient face, already, like my father's, beginning to look older than it used; Aunt Brewer's, with the loveliness of youth still on it; little Katy Brewer, who wore her absent father's blue eyes and fair hair, instead of her mother's, so brown and soft; and my two sisters, Rose and Alice, with their bright, changing faces; I can see the look of swift surprise at the news that Sister Margaret was going away, to be gone perhaps three or four weeks.

For it was settled, there and then, that I should go. Father said he knew of no way in which ten or even twenty dollars could be better spent.

After breakfast father went to the office, and the children into the garden, till school-time; and Aunt Brewer proposing that the work of arranging my wardrobe should be done in her chamber, where we should be more secure from interruption, we went up there, precious box and all.

But what lovely laces! I did not before know how delicate and pretty they were. They had never been worn in my day.

Aunt Brewer brought forward the dotted Swiss; and indeed it was a beauty; fine and sheer, and spotted all over with tiny snowy flakes.

I believe mother did wince a little at first at Aunt Brewer's choice of laces.

"My dear," said she, "that piece cost I don't know how many dollars a yard; three or four, I am sure. Isn't it a pity to use it for that child? Will she not need it more when she is older?"

"That child," replied Aunt Brewer, "is almost seventeen years old. She is going among the best people in the country. When will she or any one need it more than now? Besides, she knows enough, and will be careful enough, I vouch for her, to use it as she ought. I will sew it on myself, so that the edge shall not be frayed in the least."

"Isn't there one that will do just as well which mother does not value so much?" I asked.

"No, dear," mother answered. "It is only for you girls that I keep it. There is more left for Rose and Alice, when they need it. I give that to you, dear."

"And this other," aunt went on coolly, "is cut already. I must have this for the neck and sleeves."

Mother smiled; I saw she was quite willing.

How busily we worked that day! Once or twice some one came to see mother, and she herself went down the lane to Mrs. Crandall's, to carry some chicken-broth and see how the sick girl was—the poor sick girl, dying of consumption. I remember it struck me with a pang that the next dress made for Lucy Crandall would be a shroud. Perhaps I needed to be sobered by such a thought, for I was a good deal excited with the splendor of the visions that followed one another through my mind.

Before morning the dress was completed, and when I saw it again the next morning it was hanging on the clothes-frame, without spot or blemish.

After breakfast aunt took me up street to Miss Dodge's milliner's shop. There she made me try on bonnet after bonnet. At last she fixed upon one of white chip, low-crowned and wide-rimmed, of the style called in those days "Gipsy," with no trimming but a wreath of delicate white flowers, and the ribbon which, passing over the crown, tied the hat close to the face. This she ordered sent home, and next we went to Mr. Haskell's store.

Mr. Haskell, who was the very pink of courtesy, unfolded his goods, piece after piece, turning them in every possible light, and holding them up against himself, that we might judge of the effect; telling us that Mrs. Captain Dorr particularly admired this, and Miss Barton that, and Mrs. Tewkesbury thought the other charming, till I, who was no veteran in shopping, grew completely bewildered. Aunt Brewer chose a silk which, as she said, was both handsome and good, and we came away.

Miss Shurtliff, the mantua-maker, promised the dress for the next day at noon—a promise which she punctually fulfilled. Aunt Brewer called me into her room to see it and to try it on. How pretty it was! How lovely and soft the shining silken folds! It fitted perfectly, too, and made me look so tall that I hardly knew myself in the glass. And when Aunt Brewer had made me put on, first the new hat, and next a white lace cape which she had sat up the night before to finish, the metamorphosis was complete.

"Now let us go down to your mother," said Aunt Brewer.

Father and mother were in the sitting-room. They actually did not know me for a moment, as I stood near the door. Mother started and exclaimed, and father said to her: "My dear, her face is exactly like yours twenty years ago."

"Well," said Aunt Brewer, "how do you like my presents to Margaret? I know you will think the bonnet a superfluity, but I don't. I only want you to like it for her."

"I do like it extremely," said mother; "but then—"

"Ah, but then!" exclaimed Aunt Brewer, "who taught my Katy to read and spell like a little angel?" and she caught up the child, and, kissing her, bade her spell "Father," which she did in the prettiest way imaginable.

"And besides," aunt continued, "there is no end to my obligations to Margaret. Why, I can go whenever and wherever I like, and feel perfectly sure that Katy is as well cared for as if I had her in my arms. Oh, you must not gainsay me the pleasure of proving that I value kindness."

"I don't," said mother; "only no one ever yet found you without a reason for doing the kindest thing possible."

Here is another of the pictures in my gallery: The afternoon sun shone aslant and quivering in at the west windows, through the white lilac-trees, whose foliage rendered it needless closing the blinds, and made golden flashes on the green carpet. The south windows were open, and looked out on the pleasant garden. Mother was on the chintz-covered sofa, her sewing in her hand, looking up to Aunt Brewer with a pleased look on her sweet, pale face. Father sat with his hand on his open book, his face turned toward us, a ray of sunshine across his gray hair. Aunt Brewer was half standing half sitting on the window-seat, her arm encircling the little one, her dark eyes shining, and her beautiful face flushed with the pleasure of a kind deed.

The latch of the front gate clicked, and I ran up stairs to lay aside my finery.

It was only Miss Dexter come to bring home a book which Aunt Brewer had lent her. Aunt had a brother who kept a book-store in Boston, and who very often sent her a present of a new book. This, I remember, was called "The Antiquary," and it was so interesting that I had sat up all one night to read it.

Miss Dexter was one of our best friends, and I had meant to run over at dusk and tell her of the great good fortune that had happened to me. She had visited Hanover once herself, and could tell me many things that it was pleasant to know beforehand. Rose and Alice were just coming up the walk with their skipping-ropes, and very willingly went over to tell Mrs. Dexter that we had persuaded her daughter to stay till after tea. I went into the kitchen to tell Mary Deeth, who set directly about making wheat "slap-jacks," for she knew that these, with raspberry jam, were Miss Dexter's favorite dish.

After tea we walked in the garden and father filled a basket with vegetables, to go over to Mrs. Dexter; for that lady had found it so troublesome trying to have a garden of her own that this year she had let out her land at the halves, and unluckily it was worse than ever. However, she was not obliged to go without, for any neighbor would have scorned to be niggardly in respect to the products of his garden.

Father went up street after tea, and when he came back he brought me a box containing a little breast-pin, in the shape of a cross, all made of pearls and gold. I had often wished for a breast-pin, but I never expected father to buy me one so costly and beautiful as that.

Uncle Holcroft came just at dark. He seemed glad that I was going with him, and promised to see that I went safely to Hanover. He said it was quite likely that Cousin Helen Holcroft would go there too.

In the morning I was early astir. The sky was clear, only for those long, narrow clouds that dissolve away with the sunshine. Already the tops of West Mountain glowed purple, though to us the sun was still hidden behind Beech-Hill. Mother heard me, and called me into her room to give me some parting counsel, which it is certain that I needed.

We had an early breakfast, and then the chaise was brought up to the door and my trunk was fastened on behind; the precious bandbox, encased in a protecting cover, above it. Mother and Aunt Brewer gave me a loving good-by; father said, "God bless you, my child!" the children clung to me and kissed me, and I kissed every one and sprang into the chaise.

But the very beginning of our journey came near proving disastrous. Just as we were calling back good-bys to those which Rose and Alice were shouting after us from the great gate which they had gone out to close, a tall figure, with flying drapery, came rushing across the street, calling out, "Stop! stop!" Uncle's pony, being young and a stranger, did not recognize Polly Watts, but reared and plunged and finally stood still, quivering all over. Polly went behind the chaise and tossed, through the opening left by the raised curtain, a letter to her nephew in Walpole, which, as she said, we could carry as well as not, thereby saving her the expense of postage. Then, bearing with us her good wishes, we took a fresh start.

Whoever may have had the good fortune to go up the valley of the Connecticut will bear me witness that along the whole route, past green meadow lands, and greener clover fields, now between way-side elms, now along open country, now through miles of woods, up hill and down, Walpole, Bellows Falls, Charlestown, it is all a succession of charming pictures. It is now greatly changed, but it is not the less beautiful.

In Charlestown we stopped for dinner; and as the travel which then passed through the country was in slight proportion to what it is at present, it is not remarkable that ourselves and one other were all the guests who sat down at the dinner-table. This third person was a small man, with sharp eyes and unprepossessing of aspect. I thought him disagreeably inquisitive, for he seemed bent on eliciting from Uncle Holcroft every possible item of intelligence. He even followed us to the door, and glancing back as we drove away I saw him seating himself on a bench, apparently with a view to seeing the last of us.

We reached Claremont at dusk. To my great joy Cousin Helen decided that night on going with me to Hanover, not to visit at Uncle Graham's, but at a friend's in Norwich, which she said was so near that we could meet almost daily.

On Monday Helen's brother took us to Hanover. The afternoon sun was making long shadows as we came into the town. Helen pointed out to me the college buildings, the churches, the professors' houses, and, finally, Uncle Graham's. It was a white house, with a good deal of foliage about it, standing high, and with a long bricked walk from the gate to the door.

A gentleman was going up the walk as we drove to the gate. Hearing us, he turned and retraced his steps.

"It is your Uncle Graham," said Helen. "Good-evening, Dr. Graham, we have brought you a guest."

"What, Margaret? have you brought Margaret?" and as he caught sight of me, "My dear child, I am glad to see you!"

His greeting was spoken with a cordiality which won me at once. He would have persuaded Helen also to come in; but that would disappoint her friend, so my things were taken off the chaise, and uncle led me into the house.

Aunt Graham received me very kindly. She was a tall, stately lady of middle age, and handsomely dressed in a dark, shining silk. I could not remember to have seen her before, though she said she recollected me perfectly. She led me up stairs to a large, pleasant room.

"Don't stop to open your trunk and change your dress, my dear," said she. "Our tea is all ready; we were waiting for the Doctor. There is no one you need mind. Just bathe your face and smooth your hair, you will do nicely."

I obeyed directions while Aunt Graham waited for me, telling me the while of a letter she had that day received from my father, written the morning on which I left; and asking questions about every one at home.

Then she took me down into a brightly-lighted parlor where were Uncle Graham, a young lady, and two young gentlemen. I remember that the ceremony of introduction to strangers, quite more elaborate and particular than at the present day, somewhat intimidated me, but the stir of going out to tea gave me an opportunity of summoning my self-possession. I had heard of Miss Rhodes, that she was an uncommonly fashionable and accomplished young person, and I secretly felt a little dread of her; but her affability set me at ease directly. From the conversation at table I learned that both the young gentlemen, Mr. Chantry and Mr. Fosbrooke, had been in France, and I afterward learned that they had traveled together through various countries in Europe, and were looked upon as quite accomplished and intelligent. They were different as possible in person and manners, yet each handsome and well-bred. Mr. Chantry I thought more distinguished-looking; he was taller, and his face wore an habitually grave expression, which at times gave place to a smile of rare beauty. Mr. Fosbrooke was slight in figure, and quite pale, with jet-black hair and eyes. He was a profuse talker, full of persiflage; and through his polished-courtesy was perceptible a vein of condescension which sometimes assumed the guise of mocking deference and was then a little annoying.

When we went back into the parlor Uncle Graham took me beside him on a sofa, and I answered him no end to questions about our town-folk, whom he seemed to remember as if he had left them but yesterday. And he, in return, told me of incidents which happened in his younger days; in particular of Dr. D., now a staid medical practitioner, held in respect of all men, but in his youth little better than one of the thoughtless. He had been sent to Fitzwilliam to pass a brief rustication under the supervision of the Rev. Mr. Seaton; and the propriety of imitating the excellent traits of that worthy person having been somewhat pointedly enforced upon him, D.'s first measure was to procure and indue a suit of clothing which was a fac-simile of that ordinarily worn by the parson; shovel hat, braided cue, small-clothes, knee-buckles, shoe-buckles, and all; nay, he carried his zeal so far as to don a pair of huge spectacles; so that when he walked abroad in F., emphasizing his steps with a substantial cane, at a little distance it was difficult to decide whether it was pupil or minister who was taking the air. Of course, while thus accoutred, D. was not careful to bring himself into juxtaposition with his reverence. One Saturday afternoon, however, brought about a fatal contretemps. Parson Seaton had at a late hour laid aside his intention of an evening ride to Jaffrey, to exchange pulpits on the morrow with a brother clergyman. Coming from his own door-steps into the street, about to refresh himself with a walk, he squarely encountered his double. The latter, trusting somewhat in his disguise—more in the approaching dusk, hoped to escape recognition, and with a suave wave of the hand, even in this his desperate estate, mischievously borrowed from his prototype, was passing on. But the reverend eyes were too keen. The result was that the suit, obtained at no inconsiderable outlay of skill and pocket-money, was subjected to confiscation, and young D. thenceforth appeared in his own ordinary garb. Moreover, what is more to the purpose, he thereafter seemed to have turned over a new leaf. His escapades grew traditional, and himself in favor with all men.

While Uncle Graham had been recounting this story to me, and not to me only, but also to Mr. Chantry, who had approached us, Aunt Graham had been persuading Miss Rhodes to favor us with some music. To play on the piano-forte was an accomplishment much more rare then than now. But then, as now, a young lady waited to be twice asked before she conferred on others the pleasure of listening to such music as was in her power, and Miss Rhodes was no exception to the rule. So, after duly uttering "Her pretty oath, by yea and nay.

She could not, would not, durst not play,"

she took her seat at the instrument, marshaled thither by Mr. Fosbrooke, who remained beside her to turn over the pages of her music-book.

Miss Rhodes looked very brilliant, sitting there in her handsome green-silk dress, her white shoulders covered with a pretty blonde lace cape, around her neck a gold chain, and a watch at her side. Her hair, which was of a soft brown color, just tinged with red, was braided and brought around the forehead in a way much worn at that time, and to her face very becoming. Then her hands, sparkling with rings, and flitting so easily over the keys, were well-shaped, and scarcely less white than the ivory itself.

She played a variety of pieces, some of which I had heard before, but an entirely new one was a long, difficult composition, called the Battle of Prague, into which was introduced as much as possible of the pomp and circumstance of war, from the stately martial strains which inflame the courage of the soldier to the booming of guns, the clashing of weapons, and even the shrieks of the wounded and dying. At least that is what Miss Rhodes afterward explained to me. I distinctly recollect that Mr. Fosbrooke, who was at that moment reaching forward to turn a leaf, gave a perceptible little jump at one of the bangs of the cannon. I was obliged to raise my handkerchief to my lips, for if I ever in my life beheld fun leap from the eyes of a human being I then saw that exhibition from those of Mr. Chantry. Mr. Fosbrooke sent a sharp glance over our way, but I am sure he saw nothing.

The young gentlemen left together about nine o'clock; and Aunt Graham saying that she liked her girls to go to bed early, we soon said good-night and went up stairs.

While we were brushing our hair Miss Rhodes told me that Mr. Chantry was a ward of Uncle Graham, and was always at home in the house; that Mr. Fosbrooke's father was a Virginian, and had married a French lady who died while her only child, this Mr. Fosbrooke, was only two or three years old. He inherited all his mother's large estate, which was mostly in one of the West India Islands, and would some day go there to live. He too had the freedom of the house because of an old friendship between his father and Uncle Graham. She had learned this, she said, from Aunt Graham. From this, I scarcely know how, she diverged into dress, and was describing to me a new fashion for waist and sleeves, which was the prettiest she had ever seen; and though I tried hard to avoid the impoliteness of falling asleep while she was talking to me, my efforts were futile. I certainly lost a part of the description.

A bell awoke us in the morning. While we were dressing I learned from Miss Rhodes that in about two weeks the Commencement Ball would take place. This, she said, would be a grand affair, since every body of any note who lived in the vicinity would make a point of being present. She had been here twice before on such an occasion, and enjoyed it extremely.

When we went down Uncle Graham was in the breakfast-room.

"Prompt to time, girls!" said Aunt Graham, whom we saw through the open door arranging her collar at a glass in her own room. "That is the kind of guests I like. You deserve praise. Are you always so early a riser, Margaret?"

I said it was not very praiseworthy of me if I were, since there was always so much to be done at home, particularly since mother was not well enough to do much work.

So then uncle made me tell him every thing that I was used to do at home; such as skimming the cream and churning, sweeping and dusting, waxing the furniture, preparing the vegetables for dinner, and making bread and cake, pies and puddings.

Miss Rhodes exclaimed that it must be perfectly awful; that she should be miserable to spend her life so.

No, I told her; there was nothing hard in what I had to do; that it was really pleasant, when you were accustomed to it, to try how skillfully and quickly you could accomplish it.

"But the cooking," said she, "I'm sure I should detest that."

"Why that," said I, "is what I like best of all; for it is agreeable to think you can give your friends pleasure, even if it be in a thing so unimportant as bread and butter."

"But I do not regard such things as unimportant," said Aunt Graham. "I do not by any means think lightly of accomplishments; but they are, after all, only the mint, anise, and cummin, compared with the weightier matters of the law, some of which are surely comprehended in ordering one's house aright. Things are very different now from what they were when I was young."

"But you know," said Miss Rhodes, "that a young lady has now to learn so many different things; more than when you were a girl."

"Yes, dear," said Aunt Graham, "I do know it. But a young lady expects now as much as then to be married and to keep house; you need not blush so, girls; you know that it is true; and since it is true, would it not be wise to insure the possibility of making one's house a pleasant and comfortable home? And nothing is more likely to promote the comfort of a home than knowing how every kind of housework can be best done."

"I should dearly love to know how to play on the piano like Miss Rhodes," I said.

"And I should dearly love to know how to do all those nice things which you can do," said she, good-naturedly.

"Yes," Uncle Graham said, "you should both of you know and practice the whole duty of woman. And now," added he, "I have a ride of five miles before me this pleasant morning; whom can I have for company?"

Miss Rhodes said she wanted to finish her new crape vandyke. I was very glad to go. Aunt charged me to see that Uncle came back in time for dinner.

It was a charming ride, over the dewy hills and through miles of dark shady woods. Uncle asked particularly about father, and I told him of the money which had been lost through Mr. Harvey; of father's being himself obliged to pay it all to the bank; but now all that was settled, and we were getting along very well; this year father had put a new fence around the garden and front-yard and had the blinds painted, which improved the looks of every thing. There seemed to be nothing which Uncle did not care to hear about, from the household downward. So I told him of all; of Mrs. Marsh; the hornless cow, which gave such creamy milk; of the children's poultry-yard, which kept us in eggs and chickens the whole year round; and of Wellington, the horse, which father would not sell, just because he was too old to be of service to any one, and he had been so faithful a servant that it would be a sin if he were not allowed to end his days in peace.

"My dear," said Uncle, "I wish your father had come to me when he was in trouble. I should have been glad to help him."

I told him that we had never had to do with-out things which we needed; only some things which it would have been pleasant to have. Mother said that good had come of it; that we had learned self-denial and thoughtfulness for each other; that, as to the new books, which we missed most of all, it was perhaps no matter, for we read the old ones over and over; and finally, that mother said she hoped we had learned to trust more in God.

"Margaret," said Uncle, "did your mother ever tell you that she once saved me from being a very bad boy?"

"No, Sir," I replied.

"Well, ask her about it when you go home. And now, dear, tell me how much money you have brought with you."

I told him, and that it was plenty; father had offered me more, but I did not need it.

"Don't you know that people can not always have their own way?" said he, smiling, and then he produced a little roll, and told me there was my pocket-money; that I was to spend it just as I pleased, and, if there were not enough, to come for more.

"Do you really mean, Uncle," said I, when I had tried to thank him, "that I may use it exactly as I like?"

"I mean that you are to do with it precisely, in every respect, as you please, dear," he answered.

Some very pleasant visions flitted before me. Mother had once or twice said that she should like a new parlor carpet, and then she could take the old one for the west chamber; and only last week she said it would save trouble if there were another bureau to hold the children's clothes. I knew very well why the carpet and bureau were not forthcoming, and it was pleasant to know that this little package in my hand would help toward such things.

"What is your best gown, Margaret?" asked Uncle.

I told him about Aunt Brewer's presents; and he seemed really pleased, and said Aunt Brewer was every inch a lady.

When we came home I was glad to find Miss Rhodes dressed and just going down stairs. I wanted to be alone a minute. I just turned the key in the door and knelt down and said a thanksgiving. For you see those little gold pieces were not merely round bits of stamped metal, but carpet, bureau, a gown or a shawl for mother, a surtout for father, a bonnet and frock apiece for Rose and Alice—oh! no end of treasures.

After I was dressed I waited a few minutes for the redness to go away from my eyes, and then I went down stairs.

Messrs. Chantry and Fosbrooke came to dinner that day, as, indeed, they usually did. While we were at table, Uncle Graham's black Sam announced that a gentleman at the door wished to speak with Mr. Fosbrooke.

"Why didn't you show him to the library, Sam?" said Uncle.

Sam shut the door carefully, and approaching a step nearer, replied, with a wide smile:

"You see, Sir, I didn't know wherr he otter be left in the liberry alone, Sir."

A smile went round the table; Mr. Fosbrooke colored a little.

"A man about a horse, I presume, Sir," said he to Uncle. "Sam, tell him to come to my room at Evans's at three o'clock."

"A new horse, Fosbrooke?" said Uncle.

"Yes, Sir. You know you proposed to take the other off my hands."

"Yes. Well, be careful."

"I will, Sir." But he looked as if he would have been as well pleased if the horse had not been brought up at table, and Aunt, who perceived his annoyance, began talking of something else.

In the afternoon Miss Rhodes showed me her dresses. I could truly say that I had never before seen so pretty a wardrobe. She liked them to be admired, but said she did not know, after all, if being the family pet as she was when at home, and being sure of every possible gratification for which she expressed a wish, was quite compensation for having no sister. I thought of Rose and Alice, and knew that to me all the luxury in the world would not make good the place of either.

For all that I was not indifferent to beautiful clothing. I have always liked it, and to this day I regard a desire to be handsomely and becomingly dressed as an impulse to be cherished instead of a sin to be uprooted.

Aunt Graham came in just as Miss Rhodes was unfolding a light blue crape, spotted throughout with gold. "This," said she, "you must see in the evening to judge of it fairly. It is the prettiest thing I have, and it is a present from this charming lady;" turning to Aunt and courtesying to the ground.

"Margaret, my dear," said Aunt Graham, "you are younger than I; go down and open the lowest drawer of the bureau in my room, and bring up the parcel you will find lying there."

I went and returned.

"Undo it, dear," said she; "it is your ball-dress. I must have my two girls look as well as the rest."

It was the loveliest white crape, as thin as a cobweb, and with silver flecks all over it, which shimmered in the light just like dew-drops.

"You know," said she, "I could not venture on a color till I saw you. But every one looks well in white; and I do believe that nothing else would have been so pretty for you."

Wasn't it kind of her? and is it any wonder that I began to feel a good deal of interest in that ball? I certainly did look forward to it as something invested with dreamy, mystic beauty; something all made up of flowers and music, fair shapes and graceful motions.

The time went by quite fast enough, however. What with a little sewing, writing twice a week a long letter home, reading new books, which were much plentier here than at our house, I should not have minded if the days had been twice as long. We came to know other young people, and there were drives, and gipsy-parties, and often an evening-party or a concert; and I liked them all.

One evening we were at home alone. The gentlemen had been off on a fishing excursion, and did not return till tea-time; and then Mr. Chantry came by himself. Mr. Fosbrooke was gone to Woodstock. He had heard of a horse which would match the one he had just bought, and had gone to see about it.

"It is the only thing in which Fosbrooke shows himself a boy," said Uncle, "this passion for fast horses. There's this comfort though, he's sure to come out of it all right, after all. I'm not afraid for him."

"No," said Aunt; "only I shall be glad when he does come out of it."

"So shall I. See here, girls; here are some new books."

In those times people had to depend mostly on England for Magazine literature, and indeed for all literature. Uncle had brought two new books, by the author of Waverley, Kenilworth and Peveril of the Peak, besides a quantity of new Magazines. There was much pleasant talk, and Uncle, who dearly loved poetry, made Mr. Chantry read aloud. I had for a long time looked eagerly for the signatures "F. H." and "L. E. L.," but that night I first learned that these letters meant Felicia Hemans and Letitia E. Landon.

Mr. Chantry read the "Sicilian Captive" and "Graves of a Household," and when he had done Uncle said:

"Thank you, Chantry, thank you. I'd rather hear you read than any one else I know of."

I secretly thought just the same. Often afterward I read those pieces, and never without remembering that evening.

The clock struck eleven. None of us dreamed it was so late.

"I should not stay so long," said Mr. Chantry, rising to go, "if it were not so pleasant here. I have had a delightful evening."

"So have I, Chantry," said Uncle.

"And I," "And I," each of us added—I last, and as I spoke I met Mr. Chantry's look, and then for the first time I saw how very beautiful his eyes were when they smiled. He said good-night, and went away.

Such charming weather as we had seemed sent on purpose to add to our pleasure. It had rained in the night, and the next morning the sky was all blue splendor, while every leaf and grass-blade was jeweled with the clinging rain-drops.

"Margaret," said Uncle at breakfast, "I found at the post-office this morning a line from your Cousin Helen, asking me to bring you over to Norwich for the day. I have an engagement this forenoon, but Mr. Chantry has to go there to-day, and I asked him to drive over in the chaise, so that he could take you and bring you back."

I don't know if I was altogether pleased. In the first place, it seemed as if Mr. Chantry could not help taking me, even if he did not like; and, in the next place, I was afraid he would find me dull in so long a drive. I do believe if I could have devised an excuse I should have done so. I spoke about helping Aunt stone the raisins for cake—she was going to have a little party the next evening—but Miss Rhodes volunteered all the aid needed.

"Besides," said Aunt, "I want you to persuade Helen to come over to-morrow morning and stay the rest of the week with us."

"And I promised Chantry," said Uncle, "that you would not keep him waiting. He will be here at nine o'clock. Better start early, it is going to be a warm day."

So there was no help for it.

Mr. Chantry may have conjectured that I felt myself rather forced upon his courtesy, for he managed, in the course of a few minutes, to set me at ease in respect to my first annoyance, and as to the second, it never recurred to me all the way.

I have said what a charming morning it was. Some pine-woods that we passed through, with their cool, green depths, and delicious, resinous odor, suggested something that he had seen abroad; and he had seen so much, and spoke of it so simply and pleasantly, that he made every moment interesting. And presently I grew so much at ease that I could talk too; and he seemed to like as well to hear of the hills and rivers, the birds and wild-flowers around our own home in K—as I of the endless wonders he had seen in the old country.

When we reached the place where Cousin Helen was staying, I exclaimed at sight of the house, it was so picturesque and beautiful. It stood on a hill-side; great, stately trees grew around; not in stiff, artificial rows, but as if grouped in Nature's own sweet waywardness. In front were tall pillars, wound around with woodbine. The sloping lawn was intensely green, and still brilliant with the rain-sparkle. On the right were glimpses of a garden, all in bloom.

"Oh, Mr. Chantry," I cried, "look at those roses! and the lilies! look at those vines, clear over the roof! Did you ever see a place so lovely?"

"I have often seen that," said he, smiling, but with a tremulous, tender smile, such as I had not before seen. "That used to be my home, Miss Eliot. My father and mother lived and died there. I never lived elsewhere till I was fifteen, almost sixteen years old."

I did not wonder that his smile grew tremulous.

We went up the graveled carriage-sweep, and Helen came with her friend to the door to welcome us. Mr. Chantry would not come in, but promised to return in the afternoon for tea.

Cousin Helen led me up stairs to her room. This looked westward, and the view from the windows was superb; a magnificent amphitheatre.

tre of mountains, peak beyond peak, in limitless variety of form, and covered to the summit with greenness. I could not be satisfied with looking.

We went down stairs and sat in a room whose open windows, extending to the ground, looked out on the garden. The air was quite full of fragrance; from a tree near by came the sweet, prolonged notes of a thrush. It was a perfect day—soft, calm, and bright—and we just gave ourselves up to enjoying it.

Altogether that day, as I look back on it through the long years of my life, stands from beginning to end undimmed by a single blemish.

I found that Helen knew Mr. Chantry, and had long known him. His mother had been her school-mate at Mr. Dunham's in Windsor, and one of her dearest friends. They used to exchange visits; and only a few weeks after Helen's return from one of these, a terrible epidemic which ravaged the country, swept away, within a month of each other, the father, mother, and two children, leaving Philip Chantry an orphan and alone. So Helen and he had been friends. All the time of his stay in Europe he used to write to her. She said she would show me his letters when we went back to Claremont.

After dinner we went into the garden. This included a large space behind the house, and among its pleasantest features were the terraced grass-plots, whereon grew thickets of flowering shrubs, many already out of bloom, but many, also, in perfection of florescence. Some of these were new to me, and particularly the beautiful Scotch laburnum and the flame-colored azalea. We went up flights of steps, and at the highest point, under a fragrant fir-balsam, whose brown cones strewed the ground, was a rustic summer-house. From this we could see far up and down the valley of the river; on one side the mountains of New Hampshire, on the other those of Vermont; here and there the white gleam of villages, with their church-spires, and shining ponds—many a one with their frames of green. It was all lovelier than I could have imagined; but over it all was a shade of sadness, for there in the grave-yard, half a mile away, yet plainly to be seen in the afternoon sunshine, stood the white monument which marked the resting-place of the Chantry family—father, mother, and children. Their eyes, folded in the sleep of death, would look nevermore on this exquisite harmony of outline and color—this fair blending of earth and sky and water—this perpetually renewed miracle of the sunset.

"Let us go in," said Helen; "Mr. Chantry may have come." But we were too late; he was just ascending the upper flight of steps.

"I am just in time," said he, seating himself on the steps. "I should have been sorry to miss this."

Already the disk, too resplendent for human vision, met the mountain slope and slowly sank beyond. The western sky became suffused with hues of inexpressible loveliness; rose, purple, and amber all blending in misty softness. We watched in silence. Helen was the first to speak:

"And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire, and them that had gotten the victory stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God."

And in the brief stillness which ensued it would scarcely have seemed to me marvelous if once more, as of old, the angels of God had appeared at eventide.

I endeavored, but in vain, to persuade Helen to go over with us that evening to Hanover. She would only promise to come the next day, and we bade her good-night.

There was a moon not yet full, but so light that one could not tell when day ended and night began. The sky was one such as I have not often seen; as if a single cloud overspreading the whole vault were shattered into fragments, yet these not displaced, and through the rifts you saw the clear intense purple distance, with here and there the burning splendor of a star. I can recall it now as it impressed me then; and still to me it as far surpasses in grandeur a cloudless sky as a life of ceaseless beneficence one of graceful repose.

By the time we reached the village lights shone from the windows. I was just thinking how to express my obligation to Mr. Chantry when he forestalled me by thanking me for rendering, as he said, the ride so pleasant to him.

Cousin Helen came early the next day, and, as she always did, made every one the happier for her presence.

We were careful to be ready for the party in good season; for as soon as lamps were lighted it would be time to expect our guests. We did our best also to look well. Aunt Graham had on her pearl-gray satin, and a new cap with pink ribbons; Cousin Helen was, as she always dressed, in handsome black; Miss Rhodes wore her light green crape; and I my new silk, Aunt Brewer's gift, just the color of a peach-flower. Helen put some roses in my hair, and just as we were ready Aunt Graham surprised us all three with a present of a pretty sandal-wood fan apiece.

How handsome the parlors looked! plenty of light from the wax-candles in the shining silver candle-sticks, and flowers every where; in vases on the open piano, the mantle-shelf, and tables, and suspended in invisible baskets, wherever a point of support was afforded. This last arrangement was Miss Rhodes's own invention, and one on which she piqued herself with good reason, for we all thought the effect very pretty.

It was not a large party, but every one said how pleasant it was. There were the professors with their wives and daughters; a few strangers, and plenty of the collegians. That evening I saw for the first time several whose names came in after-years to be spoken proudly and reverently. But nobody seemed to be thinking then of coming honors; only of enjoying a pleasant evening.

When supper-time came, black Sam and Chloe brought around great waiters loaded with refreshments which the guests took sitting, with napkins spread over their laps. It required no slight skill in legerdemain to preserve the equilibrium of plate, cup and saucer, wine-glass, or whatever it might be, and at the same time appropriate a due share of biscuits, ham, tongue, cake, trifle, jelly, preserves, and the like. Think of my momentary dismay when a gentleman next me, a stranger, let fall his wine-glass. I started involuntarily and drew away my dress; then, ashamed of my impulsive movement, I looked toward him and met the darkest eyes I ever saw smiling at me.

"I assure you," said he, "there was not left a drop of the wine."

What I ought to have said, I suppose, was that it was of no consequence if there were; but what I did say was that I was very glad; and then his whole face smiled. After talking with me a little while, in a way that made me think him very agreeable, he was called away by another gentleman, and when he was gone Helen said he was Mr. Daniel Webster, who was to deliver an oration the next evening.

Presently Miss Rhodes and Mr. Fosbrooke came up, and while we were laughing at some caricatures which Uncle had brought home that day Mr. Chantry approached.

"This is yours, Miss Eliot," said he, giving me a half open moss-rose which had just fallen from my hair.

Mr. Fosbrooke spoke: "Miss Eliot scatters flowers wherever she goes."

Miss Rhodes quoted from Mother Goose a rhyme for Mr. Fosbrooke's speech. It was too ridiculously silly; but the spirit of laughter seized me, and I yielded, as if she had uttered the most exquisite witticism.

Mr. Fosbrooke calmly eyed the Rose. "Will you give me that flower, Miss Eliot?" said he.

"Pardon me," said I, "but I need it so much."

"If you asked me I would give you a whole garden of roses," pursued he.

"But you see," putting it in my hair again, "I could not wear a garden of roses. Miss Rhodes, give Mr. Fosbrooke one of yours;" she had some in her hand.

He took it with a profound bow, the great, wide-open, red rose, and, after inhaling its fragrance with exaggerated expressions of admiration, stuck it in his straight black hair, whence presently it fell and was trodden under foot.

Somebody called Mr. Fosbrooke to decide a point in discussion about the Natural Bridge in Virginia. Miss Rhodes and Helen went to listen, and Mr. Chantry and I were left.

"Miss Eliot," said he, "do not think me presumptuous. I am going to ask you for that rose."

Without a word I gave it to him.

"Thank you," was all he said; but as his eyes met mine they wore a look that I never forgot—never shall forget.

I saw that rose afterward, faded and shriveled, and asked for it back. I did not want it though, and I did not get it.

Mr. Fosbrooke returned presently, and I felt, rather than saw, the glance which he bestowed on us.

"You have lost your rose again, Miss Eliot," he began.

"No matter," said I.

"And yet you needed it so much," said he. "Well, you will want some from my garden yet."

"And then I will remember the kindness of your offer," I replied.

With his mocking bow, he said—"You will do me proud," and walked away.

As it was customary to go early to parties, so people used to go home early; I confess it seemed to me a little too early. Before twelve every guest had departed. The next morning breakfast was an hour later than usual, to allow us ample time for reinvigoration.

Two circumstances occurred which made that day to me a memorable one.

After breakfast I took the second volume of "Kenilworth" and went through the garden into the orchard, which extended quite to the bank of the river. In the shade of an old, wide-spreading apple-tree was a rustic seat, so inclosed by the drooping boughs that the seclusion was perfect, while yet one could see from it the river, and, for a short space in either direction, its banks. I loved always to be near flowing water, and this nook, so sequestered, and green, and cool, had already become my favorite resort. So I seated myself here, and soon grew so absorbed in the fate of poor Amy Robsart as to take no note of time. At length I heard the tinkling of a bell, which warned me that dinner would be ready in half an hour. I shut my book reluctantly, and was looking round on my bower of greenness, thinking it a pity to be forced to leave it, and a greater pity still to leave Amy Robsart, when my attention was arrested by the sound of footsteps on the pebbly edge of the river. A man, who was walking there, approached within a few rods of the place where I was sitting, and there stayed his steps. There was a fence between, but this did not prevent me from seeing him distinctly. The face was partly turned toward me; and in its peculiar repulsiveness I presently recognized the one which had watched Uncle Holoferne and me from the door of the hotel in Charlestown. My first impulse was to hasten away from the evil face toward the house; then I thought the man would be more likely to see me moving than remaining quiet. So I sat still and observed him.

He held in his hand an open pocket-book; and, first looking hastily and searchingly around, as if to make sure that he was unseen, he stooped and gathered from the shore some pebbles, which he put into the pocket-book, and then, its own fastening seeming insufficient, he tied it around with a piece of string. Next, after balancing it a moment in his hands, he tossed it toward the river.

Apparently he was not a very accurate marksman, for his missile encountered the low-hanging branch of a pine-tree and rebounded. I saw exactly where it fell in the recoil—against a boulder, projecting a few inches above the river surface—thence it fell into the water. The man remained motionless an instant, looking toward the spot where it had disappeared, then, turning, retraced his steps and walked hastily away.

But I was not his only spectator. Black Sam, from an adjoining field, crouched in a corner of the fence, where he had sat down to rest after hoeing corn in the sun, assisted also; and while I, at the dinner-table, was telling Uncle all about it, Sam was already raking the river-bed with intent to fish out the pocket-book.

In which intent he succeeded. Then, wiping away as much as possible of the dripping moisture, he brought the pocket-book on a folded newspaper and laid it on a window-seat in the room where we were.

"Guess some mischief goin' on, Sir," said Sam. "Folks don't go round throwing away pocket-books like that for nothin'."

After dinner Uncle examined it; as also Mr. Chantry and Mr. Fosbrooke. Between these two passed a significant glance.

"I recognize an acquaintance, Sir," said Fosbrooke, coolly. "I know that this was in the writing-desk in my room at nine o'clock this morning."

"You are positive?"

"Positive, Sir! Here is my writing in pencil on the enameled tablet."

It was quite plain to see.

"Tell me how the man looked, Margaret," said Uncle.

I told him.

Another significant look between Messrs. Chantry and Fosbrooke.

"The gentleman who sold me Bucephalus," said Fosbrooke, with a smile.

"Well, no time to lose," said Uncle, and the three went out.

I may as well state here that within two hours the gentleman was arrested, with his ill-gotten gains about his person. He did not, however, as in these more lenient days he would be very likely to do, escape trial and conviction; and various others of his misdemeanors coming to light about the same time, he passed the remainder of his days in the strong-hold provided by the State Government.

When it began to grow cool in the afternoon of that day, Aunt Graham wishing a piece of ribbon matched, I volunteered to do the errand for her.

I had succeeded, and turned homeward. Half-way across the street I saw before me a little child—a little, dirty, sun-burnt child. He was playing in the sand, tossing it up by handfuls and laughing gleefully to see it sparkle in the sun. Then I heard the rapid clattering of hoofs, and looking up the street I saw coming fast and frantic a runaway horse. My first impulse was to turn and save myself. But the little child—alone in his helplessness, who did not even turn his head at the sound—surely he would be killed! Oh, if only he might be saved!

I forgot my own danger, and rushing across caught up the child and fell forward with him, and the next instant the maddened animal dashed over the very spot where the little one had been sitting.

The child lifted up his voice, and several persons gathered around us, among them his mother. When she had assured herself that her darling was unhurt, she cried too. Meanwhile I tried to rise, but I could not. A sharp pain went through my ankle, a faint, sickening shiver came over me, and then darkness.

When I saw light again I was on a sofa in Aunt Graham's parlor; Uncle Graham was busied with my ankle in a way which seemed as if it would send me off in another faint. Miss Rhodes was fanning me, and Aunt Graham bathing my face in lavender water.

"What is it all?" I asked. Then I remembered.

"The child is safe—oh, thank God!"

They all looked at me so tenderly, they were so kind! Uncle himself, who had done with my ankle, came and kissed me, and as he did so a tear fell on my cheek.

In a moment it flashed through me; I understood as well as if he said it in words—I was to be lame always; all my life lame.

Oh, how could I endure it? If it were only for myself—but there were father and mother both needing me so much, both already growing old, and mother far from well. I had thought to do so much, to be such a help to them; and now—how sorry they would feel for me! I should be all my life like Sarah Amidon, the lame school-mistress; all my life long; the words kept shaping themselves in my mind—all my life long. I shut my eyes to hold back the tears, but they would come.

"Is the pain so hard to bear, Margaret?" said Uncle: and he spoke so tenderly because he pitied me so much.

"Not the pain, Uncle," said I through my sobs; "not that."

"What then, dear?"

And I told him.

He was silent a moment, I think he could not speak himself. Then:

"If it were God's will, Margaret, don't you think you could endure it? Many have to suffer worse than this, my child. Don't you think you could bear it, dear?"

"I will try, Uncle; I will try."

"Will you, darling? Well, now listen. If you can only be quiet, if you can be cheerful and calm, you will do perfectly well. There is no reason in the world to fear permanent lameness. It is a bad fracture, but the worst pain is probably over. You will have to lie still a good while, but we will try to make your imprisonment as endurable as possible."

Thus I had experienced my fright for nothing! No; not for nothing, because it made me thankful as I had never before been for the commonest blessings.

Now one would have imagined, from the way they all went on with me, that it was one of the pleasantest things in the world to have a lame, helpless girl in the house. Every one was indefatigable in devices to make the time pass swiftly and agreeably.

I must tell you a thing that happened when I had been lying there a week or two, and my ankle was, as Uncle said, doing finely.

A woman came one afternoon, leading a toddling wee thing in pink calico frock, his face shining with cleanliness, and his hair brushed to the top of his head, in one long, rolling curl from forehead to crown. He carried in his arms, hugged close against his little breast, a large book.

"Now speak to the lady; speak pretty; speak, Willie," said the woman.

"Pitty yady," said Willie.

"That's a darling. Go on, Willie; speak to the lady."

"Pitty yady," reiterated Willie. He could get no farther.

"He wants to say, ma'am," said his mother—I had divined who she was—"that he thanks you for saving him from being run over. Oh! and I want to thank you too. If it hadn't been for you, Willie might be lying in his coffin now, buried in the ground; and I should never kiss his dear, sweet, little face again; never hear his pretty, broken words again; never hear him try to say father and mother." And here she fairly broke down; and for little Willie, over his face stole a troubled look and he put up his little red lip to cry.

"Don't he cry, darling," said his mother, forcing herself to smile on him. "Give the book to the lady."

But as Willie, already very red with the exertion, only held it tighter, opening his blue eyes wider and wider, she took the book from him and offered it to me herself.

"We are not poor, and if we were we should want to do this just the same, my husband and I. We did not know what you would like, so we told the man to pick out what would be right, and he said you would be sure to like this. And my husband he's written a line in it to put you in mind of Willie."

I opened the book, and on the fly-leaf was written this:

"For the lady who saved Willie, to put her in mind that his father and mother will always be thankful to her for their child's life."

While I read she whispered to Willie, who presently kneeling at his mother's knee, and folding his little brown hands, said in imperfect childish words: "God bless Willie's father and mother, and Willie. God bless lady, Amen!" And his mother repeated "Amen."

"He prays it every night, ma'am," said she, "and I can't but think it will bring a blessing. And now, Willie, say good-by to the lady; we must go home."

I told her I was sure I should like the book, and I would keep it always; and I kissed little Willie, and then they went away.

So it seemed as if the pain I had had was a little price to pay for the child's life—nay, that it would have been little had it proved as bad as I at first feared.

After the first week I used to lie through the daytime on a sofa in the back parlor, and hold levees, Uncle said, like a French lady. Mr. Chantry and Mr. Fosbrooke used to come as before. They brought me books, and took so much trouble for me that I grew quite friendly with Mr. Fosbrooke.

"I am very glad," said he one day, "that it was not my horse which hurt you, Miss Eliot."

"Why, I never thought it was," said I.

"Didn't you?" said he, smiling. "Well, I thought it was. It was the fast horse that Dr. Graham warned me about."

"Was it, indeed? and how happened it that he was not yours, if you thought he was?"

"The man who sold him to me had stolen him."

"And who was he?" for I guessed who it was.

"You have seen him," said he, smiling. "The same that sank the pocket-book. I did not recover the money paid for him either. Served me right though. I believe my liking for fast horses has come to a perpetual end."

I was glad, for it had troubled Uncle Graham.

One morning Mr. Chantry brought me Froisart's Chronicles. I had heard and read of the book, but had never seen it. I little suspected that he had bought it on purpose to please me, and that he had taken great pains to get it.

"I am going to K—to-morrow, Miss Margaret," said he. "Can I do something for you?"

Of course I was glad to send a letter. He would be back in three days, and I charged him with so many messages that I grew ashamed and retracted. But he said he should remember every one of them, and I do believe he did.

You will think they did not let me suffer from weariness when I affirm my entire forgetfulness of the ball when the night for it came. If I had recollected it in season I should have begged Miss Rhodes to attend it. She said she should not have gone—declared that she had not the slightest wish to go. Yet I knew that she had really looked forward to it as the pleasantest part of her visit. That she so willingly relinquished it proves how truly good-natured she was.

My ankle grew strong, but Uncle still forbade my using it; I must not go home a limper, he said; I must just sit still, like a good child, and read my books.

Mr. Chantry returned the afternoon of the third day. He brought me letters—dear, loving letters, just as precious as gold.

Aunt and Miss Rhodes had an invitation for the evening, and I persuaded them all, now that I was so well, to leave me with the new magazines which had come that day. They were gone, and Chloe had just lighted the candles and set them near me, when there came a knock at the door.

"Shall I tell 'em the folks gone away, Miss Marget?" said Chloe.

"Yes, Chloe."

Still some one entered; and Chloe again brought her turban into the room a moment, and in a stage whisper—

"Nobody but Massa Chantry, Miss Marget."

With which announcement the gentleman entered.

I was glad to see him, but surprised, and presently asked:

"But why are you not at Mrs. Harding's this evening?"

He had taken up a book which, without opening it, he laid down again.

"Because I had something to tell you, Marget."

I listened; as he did not speak I grew troubled. Was it some bad news from home after all?

But from the look that met mine my eyes sank abashed.

"Do you know why I went to K——, Marget?"

"No," I replied.

"Shall I tell you?"

No answer.

"I went to ask your father if I might try to win you, Marget, for my wife. Have I been too daring?"

For a kingdom I could not have spoken; my lips and my voice refused to shape a word.

"Do speak to me, Marget. You must have seen that I loved you."

No, I had not dreamed of it, but I did not say so.

So then he took my hand and held it in a firm, gentle clasp, and he said—I can not tell you what he said, but I, for answer, only let two great, plashing tears drop directly on his hand.

And then I felt myself folded closely in the safe-guard of loving arms, drawn closely to that strong, tender heart which through all the years since never failed me, never once—which bore with all my faults and imperfections as a guardian angel might—nay, has he not been that to me?

It is summer. We live where we have lived mostly since our marriage—in the old Chantry homestead. The walls echo even now with the merriment of children. There is more of it now than usual, for my sister Rose—Rose Fosbrooke—with her four children, is spending the summer with us. They are not going back to Jamaica, for they want their children educated at the North, and Mr. Fosbrooke has bought a home near Boston. Their first three children died in Kingston, and it is no wonder they would no longer risk exposure to that climate.

Loudest of all the noisy group are my two grandchildren, Harry and Jenny MacNeill. Their father answered his country's first summons in the late fearful contest, and our daughter Grace came back to live with us till his return, and now that the war is over he is soon coming home to remain. He has more than once been wounded, but, thank Heaven, he is safe and well. Once, when he was in the act of leading on his soldiers to a charge, a ball passed between his lips and through his cheek. Grace calls that mark her beauty-spot. And he will always be lame. For these things, you know, we are none the less proud of him.

"What is the matter with your leg, Harry? why do you walk so?" said Harry's grandfather this morning, as, from our window, we saw that very young gentleman limping along the gravel-walk.

"Because it is the way my father walks," said Harry.

"Look here, Aunt Lou," called Jenny, dragging after her the skirt of a dress twice as long as herself, "only look here! See what I found in a chest up garret. It used to be grandma's dress when she was a young lady like you. See! low neck and short sleeves; and these little bright things are spangles. I wish I had seen grandma wear it, don't you? It doesn't seem a bit as if she was ever young like you. I suppose she didn't wear her cap and spectacles then. You didn't see her then, did you, Aunt Lou?"

"No, dear."

"But I saw her then," said Mrs. Thayer, the clergyman's wife, who had come in to sit an hour. "We were both young girls then, your grandmother and I, and we were visiting at your great-aunt Graham's; and this dress was made for your grandmother to wear to a ball. It was a very pretty dress too. But your grandmother did not wear it to the ball, for she did not go. A horse ran over her and broke her ankle the week before, so she had to lie still instead of dancing."

Little Jenny's eyes expressed intense interest. She folded her arms on Aunt Thayer's knee and looked up in her face.

"Tell me all about it, please, Aunt Thayer."

"Come over and see me to-morrow, and then I'll tell you a great long story about it. I must go home now to give Uncle Thayer his tea."

So Jenny accompanies Aunt Thayer to the gate, and returns, hopping all the way on one foot, which dextrous feat awakening the emulation of the rest of the flock they all essay it at once. From my window I see them, the merry elves, flitting over the green lawn, and the air is full of their merry shouts and laughter. They have espied me. "Look, Aunt Chantry!" and "Look, look, grandma!" Never mind a downfall—up and at it again! God bless them, every one!

But there is a carriage coming up the drive, and two gentlemen; one is Mr. Fosbrooke, and the other—can it be?—yes—Rose and Grace both go to meet them—it is Harry MacNeill.

MY SISTER MARCIA.

YOU would not think it strange that an October day has an especial charm for me, if you knew all the memories which it recalls. This one, with its hazy brightness, its ripe splendor, is like a waft of enchanted air—it carries me back, by a spell resistless as fate, to two other days—one the darkest, the other the brightest of my whole life.

The dark day was bright enough overhead, I remember. The sky looked deep and grand and infinite. It was full of glory, as the atmosphere was of prismatic haze, through which the distant hills rose purple and soft as if they had been the Delectable Mountains. The apple-tree boughs glowed with apples, scarlet as balls of fire; grapes were ripe on the vines; autumn flowers nodded along the highway; and the oak woods in the distance were touched with flame. It was just such a day as I had loved all my life; but now its splendid brightness was sadder to me than would have been the wildest blast of winter. I felt something, I think, like a deposed queen, wearing her royal robes to grace the triumph of her conqueror. For what would October be to me any more when a stranger's foot had crossed the sill and I should be no longer at Ingleside?

To a person who had a smaller organ of locality my grief might have seemed exaggerated and unreasonable; though even such a one could hardly have thought it a trifle for my father to pass from the comfortable position of a well-to-do farmer, whose crops made him independent, to that of a laborer in other men's fields, housing his family where he could. But there are those who will understand that the poverty was not the hardest to any of us—the bitterest pang was in parting with the old acres which had been ours so long.

I had been busy all day, going about the house, and helping my mother to put things in order, and deciding what we would sell and what keep, to furnish a new refuge for ourselves somewhere. Marcia—she was my older sister—had not been out of her room that day. We called her when dinner was ready, but she answered that she did not want any, and we had not disturbed her any more. I had been willing enough to do all that was required. It helped to pass the time away, and left me the less in which to think. When every thing was done I went out of doors, and sat down in the old arbor, in the midst of the garden, and bowed my head for the waves of trouble to go over me; wishing vaguely, with a girlish despair, that they would strand me on the desolate shore of death.

We had suffered a great misfortune, and yet one for which we could blame no one. It had seemed to come, as the coroners say, by the visitation of God. My father had indorsed a note for James Harris, my sister Marcia's lover. James was young and poor, and there was an excellent opening for him to go into business. He put into it the little money he had himself, and borrowed three thousand dollars, giving for it the note which my father indorsed. If James had lived he would have made money, paid interest and principal, and all would have gone well. But he died suddenly, with no time to arrange his affairs, or even to see Marcia. Before we had heard of his illness the tidings came that he was dead. Then his business was closed up, hurriedly and unwisely, as it almost always is in such cases, and only enough accrued from it to pay one thousand dollars of his debt. The firm from whom he had borrowed the money—a law firm known as Hope and Goodell—of course came down upon my father for the rest. We had no rich friends from whom to seek assistance, and not much time. Without doubt, by making proper effort, the money could have been borrowed, and the farm mortgaged as security; but my father was one of those men who give up easily. He thought trying useless; and so, on the morrow, our home was to be sold. We considered it worth five thousand dollars; but things very seldom bring their full value under the hammer. At any rate, it was going to pass from our hands—this home we had all loved so well—and I felt as if my heart would break, as I sat there alone in the arbor and sobbed out my unreasoning despair.

After a while I got up and went all round the place—a sad pilgrimage. To the old chestnut-tree, to the little pine grove on the hill, to the nook where I had always found the first violets, to grape-vine, and orchard—but I picked no grape, gathered no apple. My heart and my step were heavy. I have a cat-like clinging to places by nature, and this one place had been all the world to me so long. My grandfather had owned it first, and left it when he died to my father. And father and mother had lived there all their married life. We girls had been born there, and we had never been long at a time out of sight of those two red chimneys. And now—where should we go? I think Hagar scarcely felt more desolate when she turned from the familiar tent door and went on toward the desert.

Going into the house I met Marcia, who had come down stairs at last. She was in her deep mourning for James. I believe I had been feeling hard toward her before, as if she were in some wise accountable for the loss that was turning my father and mother out of their life-long shelter. But I was moved with sorrowful compunction when I saw her white, still face, whose pallor her black robes heightened.

"I suppose you will almost hate me, Theo," she said in a hopeless, despairing tone. "I know it seems to you as if I had done it."

My heart melted, and I tried to comfort her. And uttering such words of soothing as I could, a new thought struck me. The sale was not to take place until the next afternoon; and that would give me time to go into town in the morning, and make a personal appeal to Messrs. Hope and Goodell. A wild fancy that I might effect something in my father's behalf took possession of me. If they would only be content to let us keep our home, and pay up the borrowed money, in course of time, by installments! To do that, I thought we could live almost on air—make any sacrifices, no matter how great—surely we could pay up two thousand dollars in a few years. But would they wait?

I talked over the plan with Marcia, and she became as eager about it as I was. It was the first time I had seen a single gleam of light in her face since the news of James's death had blanched the youth and hope out of it. As we sat at the window discussing the matter, we saw father and mother go out together in the sunset. They were not a very demonstrative couple usually, though we knew that their love was deep and true. But now they went hand in hand, clinging to each other the more the sorer trouble pressed them. We could see them going slowly over the same round that I had taken before—lingering a little in each well-known, well-loved spot. I had been thinking it so hard for me to part with Ingleside; but now I felt ashamed that I had thought of myself at all, when I realized how much more bitter it was for them. I looked up at Marcia. Her tears were falling fast, and she was wringing her hands with a passionate gesture.

"Oh, Theo!" she cried, "ever since James died I have longed so to lie down in his low grave beside him; but I never wanted to so much as now. How can I bear it to see them leave their home?" And then she bowed her head on the window-ledge, as if she had forgotten my presence, and wailed out, "Oh, why didn't you take me with you, my love! my love!"

I had not understood my sister hitherto—had not known how intense her quiet-seeming nature was. This trouble, so hard to bear, was revealing us to each other. I tried to comfort her, and talked to her again of my new plan, till she grew feverish in her excitement about it.

"If you could only succeed," she said, "we would pay them off. I would not die till the old home was clear."

After a while father and mother came in, and I talked about it to them. Father smiled pensively. He had a face which those who loved him less than we did might have called weak; but there was a womanish sweetness and tenderness in it—a womanish despondency, too, just then.

"I don't think it will do any good, Theo," he said; "still you may go. It's no harm to try; only I think luck's against us."

Yet I thought the plan cheered him a little—it was something to speculate over, vain as it seemed. I knew he would have just a little glimmer of hope until I should come back with my sentence of yea or nay.

I tried hard to sleep that night—loss of rest always told on me, and I wanted to look my best next day. I was pretty, and I confess I trusted to that as much as any thing in the impression I hoped to make. But my slumbers were troubled. I kept dreaming about going away from Ingleside. I don't know how many times I lived the parting scene over that night, watched my mother's grief, my father's pitiful despair, Marcia's self-reproach for what was not in the least her fault. Once I dreamed that she killed herself; and when the time came to go we found her lying cold and stark, deaf to the voices which called her. From that dream I awoke, shaking with aguish terror. I stole out of bed, and across the passage to her room—for we did not sleep together, as sisters usually do in the country. I was afraid to go to her in the darkness, the impression of my dream was so strong upon me; so I stood in the door and called her name softly—"Marcia."

"Yes, Theo."

"You are awake, it seems. May I come in and stay with you? I am so lonesome, and I dream such miserable things."

"Yes, come. You won't disturb me;" and she made room for me, and I crept in close to her, and lay there till morning. She did not talk to me at all; but though I drowsed a little I had a consciousness all the time that she was awake, alert, suffering.

At last morning came. I looked somewhat pale from my restless night, but I dressed myself for my journey as becomingly as I could, and tried to have faith in myself and the success of my mission.

It was only an hour's car-ride, and then I found my way to the office of Hope and Goodell. It was ten o'clock—I thought I should see them before the busiest part of their day. I knocked on the door where their names were painted, and a lank boy, with light, straight hair, and a quill behind his large, pale ear, opened it. I noticed, with that curiously minute observation which sometimes seems so ludicrous in great crises, how large the cheeks of his pantaloons were; and wondered whether such a fashion was characteristic of lank boys, or of the legal profession. I asked if I could see Mr. Hope or Mr. Goodell. Mr. Goodell was out, he said, but I could see Mr. Hope, if I would wait a few moments. Then he asked my name, and I gave him a card with it written on it—"Miss Theodora Hall of Bylands"—and then I followed him into an ante-room, and sat down to wait. A number of men passed in and out, each one bestowing on me an inquisitive stare; and at last, after perhaps half an hour, I was told that Mr. Hope was at liberty, and the lank youth conducted me into his private office.

Mr. Hope looked at me before he spoke, and I looked at him. I saw in him a canny Scotchman, not handsome or elegant, but with something about him which pleased me at the very first. He had a broad, open forehead, without overmuch ideality, but full of sense and strength; a straight, resolute nose; rather high cheek-bones; clear, light-blue eyes; sandy beard and hair; and lips that knew how to close firmly over their own secrets. I do not think most girls of eighteen would have liked him; but I did, rather. Perhaps he perceived it in my face, for he smiled—a bright, heartsome smile, that for the moment changed his whole expression.

"Mr. Caleb Hall's daughter, I presume?"

"Yes, Sir;" and then I hesitated how to begin my errand.

He perceived my embarrassment, and asked me, very kindly, to sit down and speak to him at my leisure. He had an hour to spare before it would be necessary for him to be in court.

So I began my story—though, after all, I had not much to tell—what we considered the farm worth, the circumstances of my father's indorsing for James Harris, and how sure we were that we could pay it all up, with interest, in a very few years. These were the chief points; though I said a little about what it would be to all of us, and most especially to father and mother, to leave the dear old home. I don't know but my voice trembled; but I kept the tears back; for the cool, penetrating glance which rested on my face warned me effectually to steer clear of sentimentality. When I was through he answered me kindly, though not as I had hoped.

"It seems almost unfair," he said, "in Mr. Goodell's absence, to bring his feelings forward as a reason why I can not do what you wish; but it is the simple truth. I would do it, if it depended on myself alone. But Mr. Goodell wishes the matter settled up. He is averse to lending money, and only consented to it, in this instance, out of personal regard for poor Harris. And now he is determined to close the business. I think there is no way but for the sale to go forward. I do not see, however, why that should oblige your father to leave. Some one might buy it who would let him remain at a reasonable rent."

That was a new thought—still another hope to cling to. I thanked him for it, and went home full of the idea. My mother seized upon it at once, and wondered that no one had thought of it before; but my father derived no comfort from it. Because one scheme had failed he thought all would, and fell back into the depth of his despondency. He said no one would buy the place who did not want to live on it, and there was no chance in the world of our staying there. Marcia did not say any thing; but I think she felt the failure of my mission more keenly than any of us.

We did not eat any dinner—none of us had the heart for it. The moments dragged on, and the time for the sale—half past two—arrived. With the two o'clock train Mr. David Hope had come out, alert to look after his own and his partner's interests. A dozen or more men collected—the auctioneer came; and they all gathered together in front of the house, in the shadow of the great old elms which my father's father had planted. I saw father among them, with the despondent look on his face, the womanish quivering round his white lips. The rest of us were indoors, all three; but the windows were open, and we were close to them, half hidden by the curtains, where we could see and hear every thing.

Mr. Hope made the first bid—three thousand dollars—then a neighbor whose land joined ours, and who had long wanted Ingleside, raised it. Besides those two there were no other bidders. They fought the ground slowly, rising fifty dollars at a time. Marcia watched Mr. Hope, and after one of his bids she said:

"That man will have it any way. I can see it in his eyes. I wonder Job Barker doesn't see it too, and stop bidding against him."

She was right. To oppose David Hope was like opposing fate. When they got up to four thousand neighbor Barker perceived it and stopped—stopped too soon for our interest, for it was only four-fifths the true value of the place. Mr. Hope closed up the business quickly. He arranged to receive his deed the next day. Of course two thousand dollars were to go to the firm—the other two we were to put on interest. As he went out, after making an appointment with father for the next forenoon, he said to me, in a low tone:

"I do not think you will have to leave Ingleside."

I did not repeat his words; only waited, with what patience I could, for the next day's developments.

Mother went with father, as, of course, her signature was also necessary. It was a sad journey for them. As I tied mother's bonnet, and pulled out the bows—for I always did such little things for her—she said, with tears in her eyes:

"I never thought to leave this house, Theo, till I went to one not made with hands. But God knows what is best for us all; and what He sends must be right."

I felt a secret hope, which supported me while they were gone, that I should see a brighter look on the dear faces when they returned. Nor was I disappointed.

"Your Mr. Hope is a good man, Theo," my father said, when he came in. I don't know why he said my Mr. Hope, unless he had a secret suspicion that my representations, when I went to the office, had something to do with the way matters had turned. I questioned him eagerly.

"To begin with, we are to stay at Ingleside. I really think it was with that intention that Mr. Hope purchased it. We are to pay him a rent of two hundred dollars a year; for he said he should be satisfied with five per cent. for his money, and the place kept in good repair. And, better still, we are to have the privilege, any time in ten years, of buying the homestead back at precisely what he paid for it. We have two thousand dollars toward it now, you know, and I think we can earn and save two thousand more in that time—don't you?" and he looked round on his group of listeners for confirmation of his hopes. Then Marcia spoke—her first words during the conversation—

"You won't have to wait ten years, father."

We remembered what she said afterward.

The next day she went to town—the first time she had ever gone off the home place since James died. She kept her object secret, and only said she should be gone but a few hours. I told you I was pretty, but Marcia had a beauty higher than mere prettiness. Our eyes and hair were similar in color—a dark brown, almost black. Our features were not unlike; and yet what was prettiness in me deepened in her into positive beauty. I had never felt it more than when I saw her dressed to go away that morning. I whispered, as I kissed her,

"What a grand creature you are!"

And she, kissing me back, in one of her infrequent moods of tenderness, answered:

"Say a prayer for me while I am gone, child, that beauty, or something better, may help me to accomplish my purpose."

But she did not tell me what that purpose was, and when she came back she was equally incommunicative.

Two days afterward there was a letter for her. She read it, and then she came and sat down with it in her hand on a stool at my father's feet. Before her trouble she had had an imperious way of her own. She used to make poor James Harris feel it sometimes, dearly as she loved him; but she was always gentle to father. That womanly weakness and tenderness of which I have told you, appealed, I think, to her stronger nature, and always softened her to a thoughtful sweetness where he was concerned.

"I am going away from home, father," she said, just touching his hand with a little caress.

"Going away!" we all three cried in chorus.

"Yes; that was what I went to town for. I would not say any thing for fear you should oppose me, and I did not want to go right against your advice. For I knew I must go, in any case. It will be all you can do, father, to pay the rent and take care of the family with what comes off the farm. The interest of the two thousand dollars we have now will help you some; but it must be my business to earn the other two thousand. I went to see if Mr. Hope could advise me—all the rest of you had found him so kind. He has procured me a situation already, and I can go next week."

"What to do?"

That was my question. Mother was looking at her, with a face proud though sad, and father's eyes were full of trouble and uneasiness.

"To work on a sewing-machine. You know it is the one thing I can do well. I talked it all over with Mr. Hope. I am not thoroughly educated enough to teach any thing but small children, and though I might take care of myself at that business, I should never earn enough to clear the farm. I have been used to a sewing-machine for three years, and I can work on one for other people just as well as for ourselves. I can get good wages from the very first; and Mr. Hope thinks that after I get a little acquainted with town ways I can hire a shop and have girls work under me, and take contracts, and so make money very fast, for a woman."

Her face had kindled while she spoke, and her cheeks flushed; she looked more like a queen, or what we fancy a queen ought to be, than a girl whose best prospect was to earn a good deal of money by running a sewing-machine.

I could see that father did not like the idea. He had a little pride about such matters—weak, to be sure, but, as I have told you, he was weak in some things. I believe he was going to remonstrate, if mother had not spoken first, and come out clearly on Marcia's side. Afterward, when my sister had gone up stairs to answer her letter, mother told us that she liked the idea not so much for the money—though, if Marcia should succeed, that would be a thing not to be despised—as for the good it would do Marcia herself. She had been afraid, ever since James died, of her falling into morbid melancholy, and she hoped this business would take her thoughts from the one engrossing subject and restore the healthy tone of her mind. So it was all settled, and the next Monday my sister went away.

You will not care to hear the particulars of her undertaking. She succeeded, of course, for she was one of those persons who seem to command success by right of nature—some royal prerogative born with them. Once in a while she came to see us. She told us that she was doing well and saving money. In a few months we knew that she had a shop of her own, and that she had taken some large contracts from clothing-stores; but she did not go into details. She always spoke of Mr. Hope—told us what a kind friend she found him—how much his influence had helped her, and when once I ventured a joke about his Scotch face, with its high cheek-bones, she resented it with a warmth which made me wonder if James Harris's successor were already elected; and somehow the idea was not pleasant to me.

For ourselves, at home, we got along very well. It is strange how many of the things to which one has been accustomed one finds it easy and possible to do without, under the pressure of necessity. Hitherto we had been in the habit of spending all the income from our farm; and we thought, too, that we had been careful lenders. But we managed now to pay our rent without encroaching on the interest of the two thousand dollars; so we felt that we were gaining a little all the time.

Once in a while Mr. Hope came out to see his place. He would go all over the grounds with father, and talk patiently about rotation of crops, and clover, and timothy, and buckwheat. Father said he understood things wonderfully for a man whose life had been passed in town. It was his Scotch quickness, I suppose. Every time he came, too, he used to chat an hour with mother and me, and he always spoke of Marcia—told what a brave, strong spirit she had, and how nobly she was doing; till, after a while, I got used to the idea that they did care for each other, and by-and-by, when the farm was clear, Mr. Hope might be my brother.

I tried to be glad, but I confess the feelings I had about it were often not generous. I hope I am not meaner or more selfish than the rest of the world, but I could not help asking myself sometimes how it was that two men had loved Marcia and none at all had loved me. If her beauty answered the question, then why had she been made more beautiful than I? What was at fault with the arrangement of things that all the sweet should come to some lives and all the bitter to others? Then I remembered how hard she was working, and felt ashamed of myself. But it did seem as if all her troubles blossomed into blessings. How superior Mr. Hope was to James Harris! Indeed I am not sure that I was not getting to think him superior to every one.

Three years went round in this way, and it came the third anniversary of the day on which the farm had been sold. Marcia had not been home for some time; but she had written to us that she should come on that day. So we meant to make a sort of festival of it. We could afford to now, when, after all, we had not left Ingleside, and things had come out so much better than we had feared. Marcia deserved, too, a generous welcome. Mother and I had worked busily, getting the house into perfect order, making pies and cakes and sweetmeats, and when the day came we were all ready. We hurried through the morning tasks, and I put on a pretty fall dress, with a bright ribbon at my throat, and a bunch of brilliant scarlet leaves in my hair. Then I waited, eagerly enough, for my sister. She had promised to come in the early train, and a little past ten I saw her walking up from the dépôt, leaning on Mr. Hope's arm.

"I think he might have let us have her to ourselves this one day," I said, a little bitterly.

As she drew nearer I noticed that Marcia had left off her deep mourning. She wore black silk, and looked regal in it. I thought that the three years, instead of wearing upon her, had but deepened and enriched her beauty. She had certainly never seemed so peerless as when, having put aside her shawl and bonnet, she came and stood at the sitting-room window, looking out on the brightness of the autumn day. Her tall, slight figure seemed to have acquired new elegance in the midst of tasks that would have warped most women from their natural grace and symmetry. Her face was clear, and a bright color flushed her cheeks. Some secret gladness kindled her eyes and curved her lips. I did not wonder that Mr. Hope looked at her so much; but I thought of poor James Harris, forty rods away in his grave, and tried to believe that it was only for his memory I felt jealous.

"It is just such a day," she said, at last, "as the one before the old farm was sold. Do you remember, Theo, how we looked out of this window together, and saw father and mother making their mournful farewell round? Thank God, and thank you, Mr. Hope, the farewell never came;" and she glanced up at him with that wonderful light in her eyes, and a smile which made her whole face brilliant.

She looked a long time at the well-known, well-loved scene, with the bright October glory resting on it. Then she went up to father, and leaned over him with the old caressing manner.

"Father," she said, "you must own Ingleside again."

"Yes, daughter, if it please God," he answered, gently. He had always been gentle, and these last years had made him more so.

"It has pleased God," she cried, impetuously. "Father, I have succeeded even better than my hopes. I gave myself five years to make two thousand dollars in, and I have accomplished it in three!"

She took out a roll of bills, and handed them to him.

"There it is, father. Now you have only to transfer the bank stock, and Ingleside will be paid for. You must own it again, to-day."

Mr. Hope came forward and smiled—the old heartsome smile which I had noticed that first time I saw him.

"She made me bring the deed," he said. "She hadn't patience to wait twenty-four hours longer—you must own Ingleside again before this sun went down."

Half-bewildered, my father attended, under Mr. Hope's direction, to the details of the business; and when it was all done he sat still, like one in a maze, turning the new deed over in his hand. Marcia went up to him and kissed him, and he took her into his arms.

"God bless you, my child, my own child!" he breathed, fervently—"even as through you He has blessed me beyond my hopes."

"I said I would live till the old place was cleared!"

Marcia spoke triumphantly; and with that glow on her cheeks, that light in her eyes, I thought she looked as if she might live forever.

"You will not go back again to town?" my mother asked her, with fond anxiety.

The question suggested a new fear to my father, and he held Marcia's hand tight, and looked into her face.

"No, child, you won't go back, will you?" he pleaded, searching her face with his eyes. She stooped and kissed him—they had always been so dear to each other.

"No, father, I shall not go back. I have sold my lease and my business, and I shall stay with you. My work is done."

I wondered how long she would stay—how long Mr. Hope would let her stay. Just then he spoke to me.

"Come, Theo, they want Marcia to themselves. I am in the way, and you must take me out of it. They can do without you."

"Yes, every one could do without me," I thought, bitterly; but I went with him nevertheless. We wandered around a little while, and then sat down to rest in the old arbor, in which I had sat and wept out, as I have told you, my girlish despair on that day which I have called the darkest day of my life.

"Theo," he began, with grave gentleness, "I have something to tell you—something I should have told you long ago but for Marcia."

"I know what it is!" I cried, impatiently.

"Do you?" with a smile of quiet amusement. "Suppose you tell me then."

"That I am to have you for my brother. It's all right if Marcia can forget so easily. I couldn't—that's all."

"Couldn't you? Marcia has been very firm of purpose, too, about this money. A year ago I begged her to let me give the deed to your father, and consider the debt canceled. But I could not prevail upon her, though I used all my eloquence. It was then that I told her what I was going to tell you to-day, only you forestalled me. By-the-way, you weren't quite right in your conjecture—that wasn't just what I had to tell you."

"What was it, then?"

"That I loved you, Theo, and want you for my own. I think it began way back that first day when you came to my office. I did not acknowledge it to my own heart then; but I think it was my secret feeling for you which made me buy Ingleside, though I put the matter to myself on different grounds. The charm deepened every time I saw my little lassie, and a year ago I made up my mind that I did not want to do without her any longer. It was then I went to Marcia, and tried to persuade her to come home, so that you could be spared to me; for I would not be selfish enough to ask you to leave your father and mother alone. I found her immovable as granite; but she begged me hard to wait till Ingleside was paid for before I said any thing to unsettle you. Somehow she beguiled a promise out of me, though I think I should not have given it but for my aversion to subjecting you to the unpleasantness of a long engagement. That is, you know, if you could love me well enough to be engaged to me at all. You have not told me that, Theo."

I looked him straight in the eyes—I meant to see his soul through them.

"Are you sure that you love me, David Hope, me and no other?"

"Very sure, Theo."

"And you would rather have me for your wife than Marcia, beautiful and strong and grand as she is?"

"Rather than any one else in the world, little lassie."

Then, somehow, before I knew it, I was in his arms, crying on his shoulder. Joy tears, though; for this was what I meant when I spoke of the brightest day of my life.

We went in together, after a while, to ask my parents for their blessing, and they gave it to us with full hearts.

Mr. Hope did not go back to town that night. It was the first night he had ever passed at Ingleside, but he would come and go henceforth as a son of the house. I sat up with him a little later than the rest, just to hear over again what it was so very sweet to know at last—that he loved me. I began to find out the rare, deep tenderness of this man who claimed me as his own. He suited me exactly. Some girls would have thought, perhaps, that he lacked sentiment. He did not idealize me at all—I told you in the first place that his ideality was small—but he had strong, practical sense, and acute knowledge of human nature. He knew me just as I was—with all my little tempers, and vanities, and follies—and, just as I was, he held me dear; so there would never be any disappointment between us. Our engagement was to be a short one, for he said he had waited long enough for his bride. So he only gave me until Christmas to make my modest preparations.

When at last I left him I lingered a little at Marcia's door, and listened to see if she slept. I wanted to go to her a moment, and rest my heart, burdened with its fullness of joy, in the quiet of her sympathy. But, listening there, I heard her voice, a low, sweet voice always, murmur,

"My work is done. I am ready now, my love, my love!"

It was almost the old words, and it seemed to me like the echo of her cry of passionate longing the day before I saw Mr. Hope first. I knew where her thoughts were, and I would not go in to mock them with my too happy looks.

Next day Mr. Hope went away, and Marcia took me into her room, and made me what she called a wedding present. It was five hundred dollars—the sum for which, after her two thousand were safely earned, she had sold her lease and her business.

"It is for the wedding fineries, Theo, which I shall never want," she said, as she made me take it.

I looked at her, so stately, so young, so beautiful—so much lovelier than I ever was or could be in any eyes save David Hope's—and I uttered my thought, I could not help it.

"Surely you will love again, Marcia. Forgetfulness comes to every one in time; and you are too good and too lovely not to be destined to make some man happy."

"I think my nature is granite, Theo, and impressions do not wear off it very easily; but whether I shall forget, or whether I shall remember, can have nothing to do with my making you a wedding present."

So she forced me to accept her gift; and I had vanity enough—I, at twenty-one, and in love—to take real heart's delight in the pretty things it brought me.

When Christmas came we were married and went away. I had not expected a journey, for I knew what a busy man Mr. Hope was; but he made every thing else give way, and took me to some of the Southern cities first, and then for a glimpse of life at Washington. It was all so gay and strange and brilliant; and I was so happy. I scarcely had time to think about the old friends, the new life was so engrossing. And yet I did notice a vein of sadness in my mother's letters, and I rather wondered that Marcia did not write at all. I believe Mr. Hope thought more about these things than I did, for after a while he grew in a hurry to go home.

We got there one mild evening in February; and the moment our greetings were over the change in Marcia struck me. It was as if the three years—which as they passed had seemed only to touch her with new grace and brightness—had done their whole wearing work in these few weeks of my absence. She looked strangely old and thin. Her lips were colorless, and no flush stained her cheeks. Her motions, too, were slow and languid. When I asked her about it, she told me she had not had time to be tired in three years, so she was taking it out now. She should be rested by-and-by when spring came.

That night, when we were alone, Mr. Hope told me that he thought Marcia would die. I never knew till just that moment how much I loved her—how much I had loved her all my life. The thought of her dying seemed like a great gulf yawning at my feet, ready to swallow up half the happiness of my future. He soothed my passionate sorrow, and tried so tenderly to comfort me that I blessed him for it over and over in my heart. He told me that, much as he wanted me with him in town, he had concluded, since he had seen Marcia, that I ought to remain at Ingleside until there was some change. He would leave me there for the present, he thought, and come out every night. This was what I had been longing, yet afraid to ask him—for I understood him well enough now to know that he made no small sacrifice. We announced our arrangement quietly the next morning, and I could see how glad they all were.

So I spent the days with Marcia, and at night came "My Hope," as I used fondly to call him. It was my most frequent pet name, and I had discovered that my stern-browed Scot liked petting.

As the weeks went on I found that Marcia grew weaker, and I knew that the rest the spring was to bring her would be rest indeed—the rest where "perfect day shall shine, Through peace to light."

There were times when it seemed to me I could not bear it—when I sat dumb with woe, and watched her changed, wasting face, and turned away to meet the sadness in our mother's eyes, or see my father following his darling with long looks of wordless grief and despair. I think she saw it too, for, one night when we were all together, she said, tenderly:

"If you only knew how happy I am, I think you would not grieve for me, any of you. It is God's great mercy which is letting me go home to James. I have hoped for it all along, but I dared not pray for it. I left it to my God, and He is leading me gently."

After that we tried to be cheerful in her presence; and before the gusty April days were over the end came; very suddenly, but peacefully as sleep. I was sitting by her alone, and I saw a change. I started to call some one, and as I went I heard the old, tender, longing cry—a little altered—

"I am coming, my love, my love!"

When I had spoken to my mother, and turned back again to the bed, her lips were still, and I knew she had entered into her rest.

Years have passed since then, and David Hope has made me very happy. The dear father and mother still live at Ingleside, and I go to them in summer with my boys and girls. But I miss Marcia, my one sister, when I stand among the old scenes; and sometimes, on a splendid autumn day such as this, I like to live the dead past over, and recall her image, as she was at her brightest and her loveliest, until I seem to see her once more—a radiant ghost—in the old home she worked so hard to keep.

PICKED UP AT SEA.

I.—AT SEA.

IN the year of our Lord 1830, on the 24th day of January, a vessel, a man-of-war, was cruising leisurely homeward from the West India Islands. Peace then reigned supreme throughout the world—nation no longer lifted up its hand against nation, and all the weapons of war were stilled.

"Two more days, with this breeze, and we shall be off old Hatteras," said the younger of two officers, who were quietly pacing up and down the main-deck during the middle watch.

"I wish," returned the other, "we had been going to put in at the Bermudas. I wanted to see the place, and I have some friends living there that I have not heard of for some time. It is very provoking to be so near the place and not see them."

They both stopped, as if by mutual consent, their pacing up and down, and with their pipes in their mouths leaned over the ship's taffrail and gazed thoughtfully on the deep blue waters of those tropical seas.

"I say, Allix, how would you like to be overboard among those gentry there?" pointing at the same time to two sharks following quietly in the wake of the vessel.

"I had rather be excused a nearer acquaintance," replied he; "what a fiendish look the beasts have! God help those who come any way near them! Oh dear," he continued, with a yawn, "what slow work this cruising is! I wish the Britishers would get up a row with us, to let them see what the Stars and Stripes can still do, and to give us a chance at some of their fat merchantmen hereabouts!"

"What a glorious night! See," said the one whose name was Wilson, "is that a fire out yonder, or only the moon rising?"

The other one looked in the direction pointed out. A long, deep line of lurid light lit up the eastern horizon. While they were still gazing doubtfully, the moon at her full, a large, red-orded ball of light appeared rising out of the sea. Having come to the conclusion that what at first seemed the light of some ship burning out at sea was but the rising moon, they turned and began slowly pacing again the deck.

After the moon had mounted some distance in the sky, and its red light mellowed down to its usual yellow ray, Allix, happening to cast his glance again eastward, still saw, or fancied he saw, the red light flickering and playing in the far-off distance. At length he determined to report the circumstance to the captain, and leaving his comrade of the watch on deck he went down to the captain's cabin.

The captain came immediately on deck with his glass, and, after a short look, determined to steer in that direction and cruise all night. The following morning, after a sharp look-out, they saw a small dark object, with two light-colored specks on it, floating in the water. On lowering a boat and pulling toward it they picked up a portion of a ship's scarred mast with two little girls fastened to it, dark-eyed, and from the few words they could utter evidently of Spanish birth. They looked like twins, and about four years old. And this strange waif, God-borne so mercifully on the waves, so wonderfully preserved from their fury and from the hungry jaws of the sharks, this freight fastened there with the agonizing doubts of a last hope for them, by some poor heart-broken mother, like all mother love, all forgetful of self in her great feeling for them, was all the record of some brave ship whose name and destination might doubtless never be heard. For ah, how many such have left port, all on board rejoicing with hopes of a favorable voyage! They left, and were never more heard of, and hearts sickened as friends waited, and hope lessened as time lengthened, and a horrible uncertainty as to their fate, far more difficult to bear than the most dreadful assurance, have embittered the lives of God only knows how many a soul at home.

II.—IN PORT.

The little girls soon became at home in their new abode, and the pets of the rough old men-of-war's men, who attempted to fashion strange and rude garments for them out of their old shirts and blankets. Lieutenants Allix and Wilson resolved each to adopt one, and on their arrival in port send them to school to be educated. From the way in which they had been found they named the two sisters—for so they concluded them to be—Marina and Perdita, names romantic enough sounding, but still appropriate. These names, of course, very soon became shortened into Mari and Perdi.

And once more the ship sped on its homeward track. Bermudas had let them pass quietly. Three long, tedious weeks the light, baffling, variable winds of the Horse Latitudes made them impatient and irritable. Slowly, but surely, the current of the Gulf Stream bore them onward past fields of floating weed, until at length Old Hatteras was reached, and there, in accordance with the old saying,

"If Bermuda let you pass
Then look out for Hatteras," they encountered a severe gale, which detained them several days, the which having weathered they arrived, in due course of time, off Sandy Hook, and passing up the Lower Bay, under full press of sail, with a favorable but squally breeze, about midnight they passed the Narrows, and shortly after awoke the slumbers of the sleeping city by their cannon booming forth their salute as the ship swung round to her anchorage opposite the Battery.

The next morning Lieutenants Allix and Wilson went on shore, taking with them the two little girls, the sailors on board the ship crowding round to bid them sorrowfully good-by. On arriving at their hotel they made inquiries about a school suitable for their young charges, and having selected one, and spent the rest of the morning in providing the necessary clothes, in the afternoon they took the two little girls to Miss Eyres (their new mistress), who had already been made acquainted with the particulars of their discovery, and there, after a sorrowful and tearful parting, they left them.

"Allix," said Wilson, as they were coming away, "we have been very unexpectedly made fathers, and each got a little one to look after. I wonder where our wives will come from?"

"Goodness knows," was the answer. "Perhaps one or both of us will die unmarried. Time will show."

After remaining in New York for several weeks, their ship was recommissioned, and went off to the Mediterranean for a three years' cruise.

III.—THE THREE PICTURES.

A huge lion, God-hewn out of the solid rock, lying ever with its face turned to that land of mystic lore—the wonderful East—guards the narrow portals of the gate that leads thitherward. The waters of two seas wash evermore its sides. A narrow channel connects the two seas. A long narrow isthmus joins the rock with the main land. Erect it raises its head with huge cannon for its teeth. The lower part of the rock, sloping down to the channel, is thickly covered with houses and fortifications. Almond-trees, with their delicate pink blooms, finding foothold in the crevices of the yellow rock, give a beautiful contrast to the glare of the stone. Large cacti, grotesque in form, with prickly stems and spiny leaves, grow scattered about in groups. An old castle, telling of an age gone by, of a race who no longer there hold sway, frowns in solitary grandeur over a square where are congregated representatives of well-nigh every race on earth, and a very Babel of sounds and languages on every side arises. Such is a very short and imperfect description of perhaps the strongest fort in the world, Gibraltar. It was here, then, in the month of June, 1830, in a narrow, these streets, leading from the Club House square to the barracks and barracks-march, is a large stone building, with overhanging balconies and galleries in the upper part, and a large space below, in which the fumes of wine and tobacco and other smells strangely mingled—in this house, in one of the balconies, smoking their cigars, sat two men. The day was beautifully hot, and the sun's glow on the yellow coat made the heat so intense that the very female found as they sat of heat, seemed only inclined to be still and look, scarce breathing even to fear their tongue to take in any airway as over-cautious by.

"I wonder," said one of the gentlemen, approaching the other of the two and head of the firm, "if we shall ever hear of that ship—it is now more than four months overdue, and in all things it is beyond the sailing from Cuba. I long to God my son and his wife and children are safe. I would willingly forgive her cargo, easily enough it was, for some savings of their lives."

"I should give her up, Sir, as lost," replied the younger, "however painful the thought may be."

"But not yet think how painful to me to all this uncertainty—how it is wasting me out; however it is in my power." And with a sigh, what was half-expressed Mohammedan despair. But how the women sat in silence and smoked.

A signal of fire gun, sweeping along under a dark breeze over the deep-blue waters of the Atlantic; a long, narrow pennant flying out its streamers from the mainmast to the cross, stars and stripes on its broader end. The masts came two or six here and there aloft, waving in the front parts of the rigging, some at masts and boms standing about on the fore-part of the deck, others came and polishing the brass work, and were and men turning a mill of water in their mouths, spouting into dry corners, whenever the officers' backs were turned, the piece. Facing backward and forward from side to side of the vessel, two men in dark-blue uniforms, blue cloth caps with gold bands, and stripes of gold around their jackets' sleeves—each escape in the right hand and under the arm of the man, and in open-glass in the hand of the other, were the captain and first lieutenant of the ship; here and there another officer farther forward pointing up and down the length of the ship; a group of young midshipmen splashing up and down. The silence every now and again broken by a loud, shrill whistle, which came startlingly clear upon the ear. The boats without a week, the ropes all rolled, the network of the gun-cripples all without a gun—and this vessel, thus spreading along at the rate of some nine knots an hour, was the U. S. ship Albatross, bound for the Mediterranean.

"Flaw! how hot it gets," said the captain. "It is almost unbearable! We must leave the sailing up to-morrow. I wish we could command a prison or desert, by way of a little exercise and diversion. Another day or two, the Albatross, will, I hope, bring us to Gibraltar, where I intend stopping a day or two to water and see the place."

In a room nearly furnished, with a wide smoking open, as if having been recently played upon, sat a middle-aged lady, dressed in a plain black silk dress, and busily engaged in examining some woman's handiwork; on the carpet two little girls, very like each other, and dressed exactly alike, playing with a kitten; she neither was sitting guard and looking significantly at, evidently looking on the two things playing with her feelings but to witness of happy growth, and consequently fondly to be treated with love.

Then, close under these three pictures in one frame—separate them not; for they are all but one, however wide apart the three pictures may be now. Will they ever come together? Let Time, the great artist of all, show.

How shall I describe a poor little Maltese, in all the pride of her beauty at the age of eighteen—of so pure a hand as portrait-painting and having such a subject as herself? Let me say, however, and let my reader judge the wrong if I fail, and fancy each one for themselves, their ideal of a half-eyed beauty. She was somewhat tall, and rather inclined to be so, in the full meaning of that French word—the great state of richness which includes the eye, her hair, the tint of Tennyson's Juliet.

"How sweet that smile in the tint of March!" smiled down in long tresses, what unconfined, as her very hair, her head, and well-on in a neck that stretched like a swan's; her eyes of that wonderfully dark, luminous beauty, which only the sunny South produces—"darkest dark the darkest gem;" a small, perfectly classical nose, and full, ripe, somewhat swollen lips, what at once, but what could and with some consideration if sight offended her; her step like a queen—slow, steady, and dignified. Such is an imperfect sketch of Miss Maltese as she returned from her evening party, and was going at a coach to Mrs. Maltese's room.

"Dear, dear," said Mrs. Maltese, as she came in to bid her good-night. "We got very poorly to-night?"

"A little nervous, but no worse," she said. "There were no many there, and the rooms were hot and uncomfortable."

"Who were there; and you tell me, darling?"

"I did not see all; but there were the Dashwoods—Mrs. Dashwood, and her daughter, to over; the Benetons, Agnew, Camerons, and a host of others—among the more curious, a small officer, whom I never saw before, and could not catch his name. He has just returned from a cruise to China and Japan."

"Good-night, dear, I am glad we were," and after kissing her, Mrs. Maltese left the room.

Long after Mrs. Maltese had left the room, Miss Maltese remained lying on the couch, her eyes thoughtfully fixed on the fire. What were her thoughts? It would be hard to say; but that strange, indefinable feeling had come over her, which does come to us at times, of having seen or known some one we casually meet, at some other time, in some other place, and under some other circumstances. What are those strange dualistic experiences? Who can explain them? Moreover, she had a presentiment that, somehow or other, he would be connected with her in some relation, either of hatred or love, good or bad. That instinctive feeling of dislike, or liking, we take whenever we meet any one for the first time with whom our future fate in life will bring us into relationship with. But I am not intending to write of metaphysics. Dita liked the appearance of Captain Wilson, and he was one to win attention. Of a tall, fine, commanding presence; quick, active, and energetic in all his movements; kind, considerate, and affable in all his deportment: in one word, a gentleman, and no bad looking one either.

Captain Wilson had been no less taken with the grand beauty of Dita. He thought her the finest woman he had ever seen, and made inquiries as to who she was. Again and again they met, and the old result took place. They both fell in love—and Dita's was one of those hot natures where to love once is to love forever, with all the intensity of her soul, ready to brave any danger, patient in any trouble save slight, quick to resent any wrong, and keen to feel any coolness, but true withal to the death for the object of its love. For once, in their case, Shakspeare's oft-quoted saying about true love's course seemed about to be falsified. Mr. and Mrs. Mallorie raised no objection to the match, but, on the contrary, seemed pleased. Captain Wilson had no one but himself to please in the matter, and so it was arranged that they should be married in the month of June, on the last Thursday of the month. It was now the end of April, the fresh and blooming spring-time. How is it that spring-time is peculiarly the season of lovers? Is it that the new resurrection of life, the fresh budding of the flowers, quickens in us the affections and budding hopes and fresher desires—a spring bloomage in the garden of the soul? Summer is too hot, autumn is too damp, and winter—why, the long, cozy nights of winter, round the cheerful fire, might do, but others then share them with us.

"I never breathe her lovely name
When wine and mirth go round,
But oh, the gentle moonlight air Knows well its silvery sound," is, I suppose, the feeling of every true lover. Need I tell any such of the long walks that happy spring-time that Dita took, or who was her companion?—need I speak of the moonlight meetings, and all the rest of it? No, dear reader, with me love seems to be far too great, too holy, and too pure a thing for aught of this. I would rather (at least I pray God so) try to look upon it as a blessed intercourse of soul with soul, to see whether they were likely to become, what God intended them to be, helps meet for each other, and I would nightly pray God to make me worthy of her, and she of me.

"And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her."

That is the sweetest love-tale ever written, and told, as all really good things are, in a few plain words.

And so that spring-time passed quickly and pleasantly away with Dita Mallorie and Captain Wilson, and the summer bridal-hour came, flower-crowned, and passed, soul-joined, away. And Captain Wilson and his bride went down South, to a place he had there, to live.

And so Captain Wilson found his wife in the Perdita of the wreck, for Miss Eyres had married Mr. Mallorie, and having no children of their own, kept Perdita, gave her their name, and adopted her as their own.

In a large, handsome-furnished room, hung round with various silken hangings, inwrought with Saracenic patterns and Moorish designs, the jalousies wide open, and the warm sunny breeze, orange perfume laden, almost overpowering the scent of incense which curled in tiny cloudlets through the room, on a large bed of carved ebony, ivory inlaid, lay an old man, his soul slowly ebbing away in each panting gasp, each sobbing sigh; a white-robed priest, with arms crossed on his breast, stood quietly looking on, every now and then addressing a few words of comfort to still the weary moanings of the sufferer; two small boys in white vestments slowly swinging to and fro small silver censers, from which the fumes of perfumed smoke arose.

"My son, my son!" moaned with broken gasps the dying man. "How long thou art in coming! I am dying! I have waited for thee for years! Oh my God, long wearying years, and prayed daily to thee, O Holy Virgin Mother, queen of the sea and those thereon, and thou hast sent him not! Oh my child, my child!" Feebler and feebler grew each panting breath; slower and slower each long-drawn gasp.

A little wine was given him, and for a few moments he seemed to revive.

"Hast thou, father, my will all safe?"

"I have, my son," replied the priest.

He seemed satisfied. A short time he dozed a broken troubled sleep, trying to murmur inarticulate words. The priest stooped to hear but the words American man-of-war—years ago—years ago—ah, God, how many!—told me—the words stopped, one long-drawn sigh, ending in a stifled sob, a short quivering of the muscles of the face, and all was still.

A deep voice broke the stillness, with the words "In Tuas manus O Domine," as the soul of Don José de Ribeiro passed forever to its rest.

Time, the artist, had effaced forever one figure from his picture (or Death, the effacer, had blotted out forever one figure from Time, the artist's picture).

"Nina, darling, thou wilt take cold, the night-dew is falling heavily; come indoors now—art thou not tired?"

"No, mamma, not yet; please let me stay a little longer; look how the fire-flies flash and glow, nature's living diamonds; and see those beautiful large moths how they dart their trunks into the flowers, and then curl them funnily up again! I don't know, mamma, which is most beautiful, the flowers or moths, nature's living flowers!"

"Ah, well, my darling, you must come in now; I can not allow you to stay any longer out."

Thereupon there darted in, through a French sash which opened on to the veranda from the room, a young girl about eighteen years old, with laughing dark eyes and lithe and active motions.

"Oh mamma, mamma mine, it is too bad to leave that glorious scene without for this stupid dark room, where it is too dark to see to do aught, and too light to have the lamp!"

"Play and sing to me, Nina dear."

A full, rich, deep voice rang out the notes of that grand song of Beethoven's, so seldom sung, and yet perhaps the finest song ever written, "In questa tomba," as the last syllable of "riposar" died softly and slowly on her lips.

"Oh, Nina, not that; you forget I can not bear it now!"

"Mamma, darling, I forgot"—and immediately broke into a low refrain on the piano, which gradually grew into one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," with a plaintive under-current of melody throughout; and then, without a moment's warning, dashed off into the old Scotch air, "I canna leave my mammie yet;" jumped up, waltzed round the room, and finished the exhibition by flinging her arms around the lady's neck and kissing her.

"Oh, Nina, Nina! when will you become serious?"

"Never, mamma mine. I can not help it. 'Spec I growed so,' as Topsy said. By-the-way, I wish there was a real live flesh-and-blood Topsy. I would move heaven and earth to get her for my maid: what fun we would have, to be sure?"

"By-the-way, Nina, have you heard from Dita lately?" said Mrs. Allix, Captain Allix's mother, an old lady who had taken Nina home on finishing her education.

"Once since she married Captain Wilson. They are very happy, she says, but I think him a fright, although I have not seen him since a child; but he is old enough to be her father."

Here a colored servant brought in an old-fashioned silver lamp, and closing the sashes and letting down the mosquito curtains prepared the table for tea.

"Oh mamma, let me make it to-night!" said Nina.

"As you choose, my dear, only you will be sure to spoil it."

"Of course I shall," was the answer; "I do it on set purpose to have the fun of seeing you shake your head. There now, if I haven't been and gone and done it, as some one said, I forget who. I have gone and put the tea into the cream ewer instead of the tea-pot. Never mind, mammie, I will put both together into the pot, and we shall have only to sweeten it."

Mrs. Allix very quietly rang a small silver bell, and told the servant who entered to take it out and bring more cream.

"Nina, I wish—"

"Now don't, please. I am so sorry. I will try to do better."

Mrs. Allix yielded with a faint sigh and a fainter smile.

At length the tea was made properly, and after the removal of the things Mrs. Allix asked Nina to bring and read to her a letter she had that day received from her son.

Nina complied.

"Where is it dated from?" she asked.

"From Madeira. Now shall I read it?"

"Yes, my dear, if you please."

"FUNCHAL, MADEIRA, August 31, 1848.

"MY DEAR MOTHER,—Thank God we are thus far on our way home from the Mediterranean. I write this in the sight of green forest-clad hills, dotted with white Quintas, backed up by the conical peaks of Ruivo and Grande. I can see the Mount Church, half hidden in mist, the highest point of white high up the hills, from my state-room window. The perfume of the orange-trees come and fill the room. We have had a many visitors, both English and Portuguese, to see the ship. I was not ashamed to let her be seen. To-day our Consul, Mr. Carter, called, and shortly after his departure his burrqueira came with a case of Bual and Cercial wine. They say he keeps the best on the island. I am keeping it, however, until we get home. I touched at Gibraltar, where a Spanish priest came on board and gave me a sealed packet, which I had to give to Nina or Dita, sent, or rather left for them at the American Consul's office by the order of an old merchant there who had lately died. They must repress, however, their curiosity until my arrival. I saw the old gentleman years ago—by-the-way, shortly after the discovery of Nina and Dita, whose adventures I one day told the old man as I was buying some sherry, and who then seemed very much interested in the narrative, and inquired very particularly into dates and locality. We next touched at Lisbon, a fine enough looking town from the Tagus, but, with the exception of Black Horse Square and the Praças, very filthy and wretched. I went to see the Palace of Necessidades, Cintra, and Mafra. A British squadron was there, but not one frigate of theirs could compare with mine; and the Portuguese evidently thought so too, for they came in vast numbers to see us. I shall be home nearly as soon as my letter, for I shall leave here three days after it. Madeira is a paradise—I mean, of course, the country, for the people are any thing but angels. I hope Nina keeps good."—"Of course she does," said Nina.]—"Tell the little child to mind her lessons, and give her a kiss from me."—"His impudence, indeed!"—"I suppose she has grown since I saw her seven years ago."—"Oh no! not at all! as if I could stand still!"—"Accept, my dearest mother, my kindest and most respectful regards; and with sincere love to you and Nina, believe me very dutifully and affectionately your son,

CHARLES ALLIX."

"Indeed, Captain Allix, I am very much obliged to you," said Nina.

"Hush, Nina, he forgets. Thank God he will be home soon!"

A vessel laboring in a heavy sea, apparently a man-of-war—the sky one mass of flying, driving scud—the wind roaring and shrieking through the rigging like some huge bird of prey screaming in joy at its expected victim—the top-sails half-way down the masts—the top-gallant-sails and jib flying out to leeward, like two white pigeons fleeing affrighted before their angry pursuer the hawk—the main-sails close hauled up, and a storm stay-sail set—the ship pressed down into the water—the rigging all adrift—guns broke loose and rushing from side to side with a fearful crash—the sea breaking over her in torrents—the vivid lightnings flash and the deafening booming of thunder. And still more and yet more the wind rages, and again and yet again the cracking of some portion of the rigging with a sharp noise heard momentarily above the deep, settled roar of wind and sea. Faster and yet faster scud the clouds, until one treads on the other's heels. Crash after crash, and one after the other the masts go by the board. And yet louder and fiercer shrieks the wind, as if drunk with fury, mad with exultation and delight.

Is one more figure, the most gallant one of all, about to be blotted out of the picture? God yet only knows.

Rudderless, mastless, sailless, she lies and rolls in the trough of the sea. Torrent after torrent sweeps her deck, tears her bulwarks as if they were paper, comes down with a blow that makes her whole body quiver and groan in anguish at the pain—and yet she lies buried in the trough of the sea.

Amidst all remains one true to his post. Calm, piercing, clear, above the storm in the lulls of the tempest, is heard his steady, unfaltering voice. The Captain of the ship.

No; she is not yet blotted out of the picture; but paint her there no longer the gallant figure she was—only a rolling, tossing, broken wreck.

"Mother dear, thank God I am safe here in port at last!" said the cheery voice of a bronzed, weather-beaten gentleman, as he lay on a sofa in the room of the house mentioned before. "I thought, however, we were lost—I had well-nigh given up all hope; however, it has pleased God to spare, and, thanks to Him, here I am!"

"I thank Him, Charles," she quietly said; but oh, what fervor lay in those few words!

For ah, what words can paint the mother's fears that dreadful night?

The whole night through she had moaned out "O God, my son, my only child!" and at each roaring blast more fervently she prayed as the more her fears increased. And He who of erst rebuked the raging sea and stilled the angry wind at the prayer of his trembling crew—who listened of old to the poor widow's wailing cry, and brought back to her her child, her only one—so now had He listened to the poor mother's prayer, and rescued from his peril the brave and gallant man. For three days they tossed about a helpless wreck, and were at length picked up by a passing ship which brought them on to New York, from whence he went to Virginia.

"My word, mother, how Nina has grown! She is quite a woman now—how annoyed she must have been with my letter! By-the-by, I kept her packet safe for her; I fastened it in the lining of my vest, fearing to lose it, and well it is I did so."

Here the young lady herself made her appearance, half shy, half impudent, with a wicked light gleaming in her beautiful dark eyes, and a cunning smile wrinkling the corners of her mouth.

"And this beautiful, piquant, fascinating girl is the portion of the stray waif that has fallen to my share. Were I not too old I should feel half inclined to make her mine in very truth; that is, if she were not already engaged, but I doubt not she has already many suitors for her good graces, and a poor, ugly old fellow like me has no chance. I will bide my time, however, and see how she heads her course, and what she steers by before I try to take rudder in my hand."

In truth Nina had already had many suitors, and there seemed to be one she especially favored—the son of a neighboring planter, and one of the oldest families in Virginia. The Captain came himself to this conclusion, and so kept his former thoughts to himself.

Who so proud and thankful as Mrs. Allix in this her son? Nor did the days seem any too slow to Captain Allix himself. Nina daily grew upon his affections; her piquant ways, her lively, changeable humor, kept him constantly amused.

Ah, how happily glided those days away; the Captain amusing and whiling away the evenings with accounts of his adventures and perils by land and sea, at home and abroad. How Nina would listen coyly and slyly, as pretending not to listen, and the Captain try to excite her risible faculties, in the which he nearly always succeeded. And once he noticed her quickly turn her head and wipe away her tears at some account of shipwreck and suffering he was narrating. There was one who had not very much relished the idea of the Captain's arrival and constant intercourse with Nina, and that, of course, was young Randolph. He soon found, or fancied he found, Nina changed toward him; she became at times even petulant at his attentions to her, and at other times seemed just as of old. It was the old tale of the rival lovers, each one deeming the other more favored than himself.

But however much she had changed to Randolph, there was no mistaking the marked difference of her character toward Captain Allix. She was oftentimes positively rude toward him; would be for days together so persistently harsh and uncivil that it pained him exceedingly, and he resolved, for a time at least, to leave home. Mrs. Allix could not understand Nina, she who had hitherto been so uniformly obedient and dutiful, and she frequently remonstrated with her on the subject, but to no other purpose except, perhaps, to make her more rude than before.

"Nina," at length said Captain Allix one day as they were returning home together from a visit where the Captain had stated in Nina's hearing, for the first time, his intention of leaving home, as she had become cooler than even usual—"Nina, I fear I have offended you. If so, I am exceedingly sorry. I should not like us to part but as friends. Will you kindly forgive me if I have wronged you?"

"You have not wronged me," was the cold reply.

"Then why are you so changed as to seem positively to dislike me?"

"I do not dislike you," she said; then, as he caught at the words, "not in the sense you mean."

"But, Nina, hear me. I will for once be plain spoken. It is always best. You once seemed to care for me, and—" Here he stopped. A sudden spasm, which she endeavored in vain to control, passed quickly over her face, while a sudden hopeful idea flashed through his mind. They walked on a little longer in silence.

"Nina," at length he said, softly and quietly, "Must I leave home? It rests with you. Will you share it with me?"

"Yes," she simply replied.

And so Captain Allix found his wife.

Very quietly they walked together homeward. As soon as they entered the house he led her up to his mother, and very gently said: "Mother, here is your daughter Nina—your daughter and my wife."

The mother looked for a few moments from one to the other; and then getting up threw her arms round Nina and kissed her.

"God bless you both, my children!" she faltered, "and make you worthy of each other."

"How could you think," said Nina, "that I could bear to feel that Charles was leaving home on account of me? I could not have staid, and it would have broken my heart to leave. Now 'Where thou lodgest I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.'"

IV.—THE PICTURE FRAMED.

On the broad veranda of a casa are seated an old lady working, or rather seeming to work, for her eyes are too often turned to three little children (two girls and a boy) running about among the flower-beds in vain attempt to capture a butterfly. Two ladies, the one reading a book, the other writing a letter on a small stand. A gentleman lying in a Spanish hammock, which is swung backward and forward by a mulatto boy, who every now and then sweeps away some too intrusive insect with a palmetto fan—the gentleman, meanwhile, lazily smoking a cigar. Trees, flowers, plants, all tell of a tropical clime. Here and there a banana throws out its broad green leaves—the old ones drooping torn and ragged, the young ones whole, erect, and a bright, vivid green—clusters of its fruit hanging almost to the ground. The tall, feathery fern-tree and broad-leaved palm, the dark, glossy leaves and deliciously scented orange-blossoms, the waxy-flowered camellia and night-perfuming datura, are all seated around. In the distance the gleaming sea.

"Nina dear, to whom are you writing?" asks the gentleman.

"Oh! to an old school-fellow, who has asked from me an account of the strange events of our lives."

"And what are you saying?"

"I am telling her how strangely we were saved from death, how afterward cared for and married, and of old Don José de Ribeiro's will—in fact, all I know or remember."

"I wonder if you two girls—I beg your pardon, you two old married women—were his grandchildren, as he thought. However, it matters little so long as the old gentleman thought so. He might have done worse than left us his Cuban estates. Where's Wilson, I wonder?"

"Don't know, Sir. He went out an hour or two ago, and said he should not be back until dinner," replied the mulatto boy.

POSTSCRIPT.—All the incidents of the tale here narrated are of course not true; but the floating spar and the two children found by a man-of-war—the children taken home, adopted, and educated by two of the officers, who afterward each married one—is a simple fact. Three of the four are still living. One of the officers, whom I have called Captain Wilson, died last year.

My picture is now framed—the principal figures painted with the best skill of which I am possessed (their defects I hope will be pardoned), there to remain until Death, the great effacer, shall blot them out, as he will do one day all the figures in this great picture-book of the world—to be all repainted, let us hope, in more lasting and brighter forms and hues, by the hand of Eternity in the garden of heaven.

SISTERS.

I.

"BUT you know," said Elsie, "that a tutor can not marry."

"He can be engaged," returned Clara, "and wait for better times, like other people."

"Every one makes such a talk over Roderick Dexter," continued Elsie. "One would think him the only young man in the place by the way they go on; and I am sure there are half a dozen others that I should fancy quite as soon or sooner. Of course he has a great deal of talent and principle and all that, but he is so awkward! His great hands and feet distress me; there really doesn't seem to be space for them in any room he comes into. So different from Ned Torrington!"

"For shame, Elsie!" exclaimed her sister, indignantly. "How can you compare the two?"

"You are a very fierce champion, Clara. I wonder you don't take him for yourself if you value him so highly."

A bright flush mounted to Clara's brow.

"You forget," she answered, "that he has never given me the opportunity. It is not for my sake that he comes here so often."

Elsie did not see the flush. She stood before the mirror, brushing back her golden hair, and was too well occupied with the reflected image to note the changes of her sister's countenance. And in truth that image was lovely enough to justify her close attention. The delicately-chiseled features, the heaven-blue eyes, the apple-blossom coloring, were mere accessories of its beauty; they were lit up by such a look of innocence, of joyousness, as is seldom seen save in some sweet and happy child.

"No," she said, complacently, in answer to her sister's statement, "I don't suppose it is. But then how am I to blame? You needn't be so savage with me, Clara."

"Was I savage? I am sure I did not mean it. But I certainly think you should be serious about this matter, dear. You should decide on what you mean to do, and not trifle with the young man's happiness."

"Mercy on me! As if the happiness of such a paragon could depend upon a giddy thing like me!"

"Strange as it seems," returned Clara, smiling, "I fear we must admit the fact. Indeed, Elsie, I think you only pretend to doubt it for the pleasure of hearing it reasserted."

"And if I do, what of it? Where's the use of being young and—and of being called pretty if you can't enjoy yourself?"

"Have all the enjoyment that you can, only don't forget the rights of others."

"'Saith the preacher.' Dear Clara, what a solemn thing you are getting to be! Really—don't be vexed—just the least little bit of an old maid!"

"It is as well, perhaps, since I have the charge of such a volatile young maid."

"I don't know why you should feel it such a charge," said Elsie, pouting. "I'm sure I'm old enough to take care of myself." And as for what we were talking of," she continued, while an access of displeasure darkened her lovely features—"I think you are very unreasonable. It is pretty hard if I must make up my mind to take the very first chance that offers, and settle down into a dull married woman before I have seen enough of the world to know what I really fancy."

Clara offered no defense, being well aware from past experience that there was little use in doing so. She went out presently to attend to household matters, while Elsie remained to complete her decorations. It was a long task and performed with anxious care, but the result was satisfactory. By the time it was achieved her brow had cleared. She surveyed with pleasure her shining tresses, the rich flow of her silken robe, the lace that shaded her milk-white throat. She thought, not without interest, of the probable effect of this toilet upon Roderick. Lingerer before the glass she now adjusted a pin, lifted a braid a trifle, or smoothed down a rebellious fold. Seeing it all you would in one breath have exclaimed at her vanity, and, with the next, admitted that it would be strange if so exquisite a creature did not enjoy the spectacle of her own beauty.

In high good-humor at last she went down stairs. Tea was just on the table, her father and brother about to seat themselves.

"Seems to me, Elsie," said the latter, a boy of seventeen, just beginning to be critical in feminine attire—"that you are got up in great style to-night. What's on hand? Any of your beaux going to happen in this evening?"

"No one is coming that I am aware of," replied Elsie with dignity. "Is it so very unusual for me to be respectably dressed?"

"Oh you needn't tell me!" said the acute youth. "That blue silk wasn't put on for nothing. I say, Elsie," he added, viewing her with admiration, "you know what suits you, if you are my sister. Blue is devilish becoming to your style."

"Frederick!" said Mr. Moncrief, reprovingly.

"Beg pardon, father," replied the son, with a deprecating wave of the hand. "I always mean to respect the society of ladies, but a man sometimes forgets himself, you know. Clara, my dear, another cup of your good tea, if you please. These biscuit are capital; made 'em yourself, did you? You are a jewel, and shall keep my house when I have one. But Elsie," returning to the attack, "you mean to finish off Dexter's business for him to-night, I suppose?"

"Fred, you are too absurd," replied his sister, coloring.

"Judging from Mr. Dexter's own appearance," remarked the father, "I should say that any special cares in dress would be a waste of ammunition."

"Don't you believe it," said Fred, admonishingly. "These solemn fellows have eyes in their heads; I know them of old. They go about as if they hadn't a thought for any thing but science; but they manage to pick up the prettiest girls in town for wives—watch them, and see if they don't. About this one, Miss Elsie, I advise you to nail him at once or you may lose the chance. There's a young lady come to stay at Mrs. Barlow's, where he boards; a niece, I believe. I saw her getting out of the stage this afternoon. I tell you she's a stunner! Eyes as black as beads and a figure like Di Vernon!"

Elsie's spirits fell a little at this intelligence, nor did they rally as an hour or two passed by without the familiar ring. She fancied that her father's smile, as he looked up from his newspaper, was significant and satirical. She took her worsteds and crocheted industriously, determined to appear as unconcerned as possible; but her interest flagged, her mind would wander away to Mrs. Barlow's parlor, and imagine the Di Vernon niece usurping Roderick's attention. No doubt she would make a set at him at once!

Elsie could tell from Frederick's description just the sort of person that she was. Very dashing, very forward—these black-eyed girls always were—ready to help along a quiet young man like Roderick. Well, she should never put herself out to court any one; if a man hadn't spirit enough to take his own part she shouldn't assist him. Strange that any one could be so silly, so easily inveigled! Indignation against the niece's arts and Roderick's stupidity were about equally mingled in her mind. In the midst of these uncomfortable musings the door-bell sounded its welcome peal, and Elsie's face brightened as Mr. Torrington came in.

Clara looked with decided disapproval on the scene which ensued. Roderick's defection made the beauty unusually gracious to his rival. She was never lively even in her best spirits; liveliness would have been forced, spasmodic, beside her gentle, subdued gayety; her manner produced an impression of softness, of amiability, far more winning than the sallies of the most vivacious. Ned Torrington felt its charm. He had flirted with Elsie hitherto for the pleasantness of the pastime, but to-night he began to look at the thing more seriously. He wondered if that salary which just kept him along in comfort could by any possibility be made to serve the wants of two, or if there were any way of enlarging it. How the fellows at his boarding-house would stare when he presented such a beauty to them as his wife! But that was a long way off yet, though Elsie's smiles and kindness seemed to say that the dream was not a hopeless one.

At the death of her mother, some eight years previous to the opening of our story, the charge of the family had devolved on Clara Moncrief. Though but a girl of fourteen she devoted herself with persevering energy to its duties, and, as her father had remained a widower, was now long habituated to her position. In all household ways she was expert; domestic comfort she could readily provide; Elsie alone, her pet and trial, perplexed and disconcerted her. The difference of five years in their age hardly gave her authority enough to be respected by her capricious charge. Often docile, Elsie was occasionally deaf to reason and defiant of restraint. Her temper was equally fitful, and Clara sometimes feared that there was really no solid substance in her character to which one might appeal to regulate her conduct. Yet people generally thought her a sweet girl—a little vain, perhaps; but who could wonder at that? Even her father, finding his every comfort cared for, did not bethink him that it was always Clara who attended to his wants. To him Elsie never dared exhibit her caprices, and he esteemed himself a fortunate parent in possessing so lovely and dutiful a child. Frederick sometimes proclaimed that he was the only person who really "saw through" Elsie; every body else was blinded by her beauty and a way she had. Yet even he, severe critic, was not proof against this very "way;" a species of charm that does not consist with beauty or any other gift, but is a mere independent fascination, impossible to describe. Its possessor may be, nay, generally is, of an unequal temper; may provoke you often to the limits of endurance; yet when the season of graciousness returns you bask in it; you enjoy it a great deal more, I am ashamed to say, than the steady amiability which you can rely upon, week in, week out. All who encountered Elsie felt the influence of this charm, and none more deeply, it appeared, than the reserved and quiet Roderick Dexter.

When his visits first became frequent Clara honestly supposed them intended for herself; Elsie was so young, so gay, so different in every respect from the grave, plain suitor. Then, too, he paid her very little attention; his discourse was generally addressed to the elder sister, with whom he was more at ease. Clara liked him; she was quite able to overlook, in remembrance of his real worth, all those deficiencies at which Elsie carped, and to feel honored by his preference. It was not quite a pleasant surprise when circumstances disclosed her mistake; she was mortified, humiliated at the appropriation, even in her own mind, of an interest not designed for her. But a still greater surprise was the fact that Elsie proved by no means indifferent to her conquest. Whether her slight and purposeless character felt its importance enhanced by the homage of this earnest and serious man; whether she found in it something to lean upon and to strengthen; or whether she was simply flattered that the person most universally honored and esteemed among her set preferred her, none could say. Yet it was clearly apparent that, however she might pretend to undervalue him and laugh at his gaucheries, she was proud of his regard and watchful of his attentions.

After Eleanor Barlow's arrival this became more than ever manifest. A young lady under the same roof naturally received a little notice, even from the reserved tutor, and that little was sufficient to make Elsie uneasy. Her regard needed only the stimulus of jealousy to fan it into the brightest flame of which her heart was capable. She was restless, absent, during all her hours at home; even the adornment of her person, her most engrossing care and greatest pleasure, failed to interest her; in company she was only gay if Mr. Dexter were near her and devoted. Even his diffidence drew encouragement from her demeanor; a declaration of his feeling speedily ensued, and poor Ned Torrington was awakened from dreams of Elsie by the news of her approaching marriage. For fortune had been kind to the young tutor; he was appointed to fill a vacant Professorship, and matrimony was justifiable not only in his own eyes but in those of the friends of his betrothed. So the marriage took place with all the éclat possible in a country village, and Roderick Dexter bore home his bride. Elsie expected in her new life nothing less than perfect happiness, though she never troubled herself to analyze the expectation and see what grounds she had for it. She had not been by any means very happy in her maiden home, spite of her beauty, her belle-hood, and entire freedom from care; there had been plenty of hours of dissatisfaction and ennui. But she flattered herself that these were due to circumstances; she had been under so much restraint—Clara was so exacting, so fussy, always wanting her to be influenced by high motives and strict notions of duty. There would be no such trouble with Roderick, who was more than satisfied with her as she was. Life seemed to stretch before her gaze, a sunny scene of love and homage; she did not inquire how she was to merit the love or keep up the homage.

Roderick's hopes had a basis hardly more solid. Rapturous gratitude for the preference of a creature so beautiful, a lover's faith that robbed her in all attributes of womanly perfection; was this the capital to meet the unceasing drafts of married life? But there was an essential difference in the visions of the two; Elsie thought only of the happiness she was to receive, while Roderick was resolved, with all the force of a nature deep and earnest, to brighten the existence of that being so lovely and beloved, who had given herself to his keeping.

II.

It was a bright June morning, flower-odors and the song of birds coming in at the open window. Elsie sat in the great easy-chair leaning her beautiful head languidly against its cushioned back; recent illness had heightened the transparency of her complexion, and the little hands that lay on her lap were white as the folds of her wrapper. On her hair nestled the least suspicion of a cap—a kind of symbol of her new honors—and her gaze rested with complacent interest on the small specimen of humanity which Clara was tending—a six-weeks' infant, that dashed its small fists against its eyes, and contorted its minute visage in a way wonderful to beholders. Elsie had not left her room much as yet; she liked the indulgences of her half-invalid state, and then Mrs. Crowe was so excellent with baby! She had retained the services of that accomplished nurse a second month, a little to her husband's discomfiture. Much as he longed to be with Elsie and their child he could not avoid feeling himself de trop in the sick room when its autocrat was present. It was very dull and lonely below stairs, but he only ventured on brief calls in Mrs. Crowe's domain. This morning he had been admitted, and graciously allowed a short interview with the two objects of his affection; and had borne away in his mind an exquisite picture—a Madonna lovelier than any of Raphael—to brighten the hours of absence. Soon after his departure Clara had arrived, and immediately made herself at home. The severe countenance of the guardian spirit relaxed at sight of her, and the interval of her visit was improved by a trip down stairs, and a little chit-chat in the kitchen.

"Why are you so thoughtful, Elsie?" her sister presently inquired.

"I was wondering where Maggie—our old Maggie, you know, that used to live with us before I was married—could be now."

"She is at her father's, I believe; what put her in your mind?"

"I have been thinking that I wished you could hunt her up for me; she is the very person I need to take care of baby."

"Why, don't you intend to take care of her yourself?" asked Clara, surprised.

Elsie's tranquil brightness clouded over. "I have the charge of that great child!" she exclaimed. "I wonder what you are thinking of, Clara! So delicate as I am, too!"

"But we hope you will gain strength before long, dear. By the time Mrs. Crowe's two months are over you will be quite yourself again. With such a small family Nora has a great deal of time after her work is done, and she will be very willing to help with baby. Then I shall be here, or you at our house, every day, and I can relieve you frequently. If I were you I would make the trial, at any rate. Time enough for Maggie if you find it is too much for you."

"I don't see why," said Elsie, unappeased. "A girl in the kitchen is no reliance at all; she would very likely be busiest just when I most wanted her. And I couldn't depend on you either. It would all be very well when you were here, but how many hours of every day there would be nobody but myself to attend to the child; I should have to do it, no matter how little I felt like it. Now if Maggie were here it would be her business; I need only have the baby when I wanted it. I could see people and go out riding and make calls just as I always did. I had planned it all out so nicely in my own mind, and I don't see why you can't let me have it as I like."

Clara hesitated. "But you don't reflect, dear—how should you, when you never had the charge of any of these things at home—about the additional expense. The wages of a second girl are quite a serious item; and Roderick is a young man with his way yet to make in the world."

"You must think very highly of his regard for me," said Elsie, indignantly, "if you suppose he would begrudge a trifle like that to make me comfortable."

"I don't suppose it," returned Clara, feeling rather hopeless over her task. "I have not a doubt that he would gratify you with the utmost willingness."

"Then," said Elsie, shortly, "if I wish it, and he doesn't object, I don't see what it is to you, Clara."

The older sister flushed—at the tone more than the words. But it was over in a moment. She was used to Elsie's way.

"Certainly it is nothing to me," she answered, "except as it is best for you. It must always be pleasant to keep a reliable nurse if one can afford it. But life is all before you two yet; your expenses are sure to increase, and your means are not as certain to enlarge. If I were you I would try to help Roderick by saving where I could. Don't you think that would be prudent, Elsie?"

"I hate to hear about prudence," was Elsie's reply. "What do I know about such things? Here I am so young yet; only nineteen, and it is too bad to have all these cares put upon me. I should think it was enough to have a house and a baby to look after, let me make it as light as I can. I ought to have a little of the good of life and be enjoying myself now, if ever, and you want to turn me into a regular drudge! keep me tied up at home to a crying child! It isn't Roderick's fault; he never married me to make a slave of me. It is just your doing, Clara; you always were so hard on me." And tears, real tears of vexation, dropped on her pretty morning-dress.

Clara uttered not one word of soothing or of self-defense. She began playing with baby and talking all manner of nonsense to it, as is the privilege of aunts. Elsie's injured feelings presently subsided, her eyes dried, and she was again the picture of radiant beauty and innocence. When Mrs. Crowe returned from her little visit she did not observe that any thing had been amiss.

Clara walked homeward with a heaviness of heart for which she chid herself as disproportionate to the occasion. She did so wish to see the young couple at ease in money-matters. Lavishness they could not hope for, since Anhalt was a poor college and Roderick had only his professorship; but with proper care they might always enjoy comfort and independence. She dreaded the first beginnings of a way of life beyond their means, which would, by-and-by, involve them in embarrassment and anxieties. Yet, as she told herself, there was nothing so serious in Elsie's wanting a little indulgence; she was very young yet; prudence might come in time. She would not admit to herself the chief cause of her trouble, something deeper than any mere thoughtless extravagance. It was the continuance of that old spirit of Elsie's—that settled determination to consult her own comfort, her own convenience, no matter at what cost to every body else.

The young wife meanwhile was dwelling upon her wrongs; when Roderick came in she proceeded to unfold them.

"Clara was here this morning," she said.

"That is pleasant. I hope she cheered you up as much as usual."

"You wouldn't have thought it very pleasant if you had been here. She was dreadfully cross."

"Clara cross! I wish you had sent for me. Such a sight must have been worth looking at."

"Oh, I don't mean that she went into a rage and made a scene; that's never her way. She's too precise and proper for any thing of the sort. But she was just as cross as she could be for all that," continued Elsie, knitting her brows as she recalled the controversy. "What do you think, dear? She says I ought not to have a nurse for baby! that I ought to try to take care of her myself! I told her I knew you would never want me to wear myself out with carrying a great child like that around, and to be tied up day and night and never able to stir out of the house. But she was just as obstinate about it as she could be."

Roderick's first emotion was surprise, for the thought of this very desirable household appendage had never once occurred to him; his next was self-reproach that he should not sooner have remembered Elsie's comfort. He must arrange it in some way or other, though how was not exactly clear. Clara, had she understood their affairs more intimately, would have been grieved to find that the pecuniary troubles had already begun. Not overwhelming as yet, for it was but the second year of marriage—only causing a little management and anxiety.

"Yes, dear, you must certainly have a nurse," he responded, with as much cheerfulness as if it were the simplest thing in the world. "I can't have my pet over-tired and losing her bloom."

"How good you are!" she said, stroking his brown cheek with her satin-soft hand. "No one was ever half as kind to me as you are, Roderick!"

The heart of the strong man swelled with tenderness as the lovely eyes turned upon him at these words. He covered the caressing hand with kisses, and thought himself the happiest of husbands.

After all, it would be easy enough to manage; he would do without the microscope he had been wanting so long, and the necessary funds would be forthcoming. True, he had felt the need of the instrument a hundred times in his investigations, and had promised himself that this summer he would surely make the purchase; but perhaps it was an extravagance after all. At any rate he must do as well as he could without it.

Clara at her next visit was not at all surprised to hear the triumphant announcement that "Maggie" was to come next week.

III.

Some years went by, bringing changes to the quiet town. The completion of a new railroad, and the establishment of the station a quarter of a mile away, opened for Anhalt an easier communication with the outside world, without in the least impairing its rural beauty. The three gray colleges and the chapel rose state-ly as ever on their smooth-turfed green, but their studious silence was often invaded by parties from abroad. Gay equipages whirled along the shaded streets; bright colors glanced adown the leafy vistas. The soul of the Professor of Astronomy was vexed within him at intrusions on his sacred calm and weak questions concerning that wondrous tube with which he swept the heavens. In time Anhalt became a favorite resort for citizens escaping from the summer heats. There was a pleasant blending in its warm-weather society of the brilliancies of fashion and the seriousness of intellectual culture. In this society Elsie shone conspicuous. Her charms grew brighter with each succeeding year, and were now famous far beyond the narrow limits of her native town. "The beautiful Mrs. Dexter" was among the attractions of the place, and the one which strangers were most eager to behold.

"How delighted Elsie was with that set of cameos!" said her brother Frederick, now a rising man of business, to Clara, during one of his visits to their early home. "It's a shame they were not diamonds instead!"

"Cameos are much more suitable," observed Clara. "Diamonds would be quite wasted here."

"Of course—here. But this isn't the place for Elsie. I never appreciated her till I went from home. I knew, to be sure, that she was a great deal prettier than any of the girls about us, but I never dreamed that she had not plenty of equals, and superiors too, in larger places. New York, for instance, I supposed was full of beauties. But I can tell you, Clara, women of that sort are rare. I don't believe there are three such on Manhattan Island. And then to see her so taken up with a set of stone cameos! Not but they're a nice thing of the kind. They were chosen by a lady friend of mine who isn't apt to show bad taste."

"I dare say you are right," said Clara. "She is greatly admired and prettier than ever, I think. What then?"

"Nothing, except that it is a thousand pities she married as she did."

"You should not say so, Fred. Roderick is the kindest of husbands; he does every thing he can for Elsie—indulges her far more than he can afford."

"Exactly. That's just the trouble—he can afford so little. And how old he looks beside her!"

"He has many cares," said Clara, with a sigh.

"I haven't a word against Dexter," continued Fred, magnanimously. "He's a fine, honorable fellow. But what did that plain, grave sort of man want with such a wife? Why couldn't he have kept to his studies, and let Elsie alone? They are utterly unsuited. Some women would be proud of his learning and the name he is getting among scientific people; but what does she care for that?"

"Very little, I presume," returned Clara; "but that is hardly his fault."

"I don't say it is any body's fault. It is just one of those marriages that ought never to have taken place. She was a great deal too young; she ought to have waited till she had seen the world—or, rather, till the world had seen her—and she might have chosen whom she would. Elsie was made for fortune and splendor; she should be in the midst of them, and dazzling every one that saw her. And, instead, just look at her!—buried in this little country town, and glad of one new dress in a season!"

Clara shook her head. "I can't believe your views correct," she answered. "Her husband is a man of principle and talent, and devoted to her. She ought to be considered fortunate. I could wish myself that their means were larger. None of the salaries are very ample, though they are all that the college can afford to pay, and Elsie does not understand how to make money go as far as some women would."

"You see she isn't calculated for that sort of thing. She ought to have no harder task in life than to be beautiful. That's her rôle, and she can perform it better than almost any one else."

"I don't agree with you," said Clara, obdurately. "There is a great deal too much of that sort of talk nowadays. It may be very pleasant to have women beautiful, ideal creatures, unsoiled by any taint of earthly cares, and there are states of society, no doubt, where it is practicable to keep them so—where there are great fortunes and skillful service. But it doesn't consist with the 'genius of our institutions' now, at any rate. The work is here to be done in every family, and we had better 'deify' it, as some accuse us of doing, than neglect it or turn it off on incapable assistants."

Fred thought this was all very well for Clara, poor dear. The domesticities were in her line, and it was not wonderful that she exalted them. She could hardly be expected to sympathize with the claims and immunities of beauty, though she had a pleasant face and a tidy little figure of her own.

"And don't," she continued, earnestly, "hint any thing of the kind to Elsie."

"That I consider her wasted on the desert air? Perhaps I had better not. I believe that we didn't in the old times think her quite blind to her own attractions."

"No one could expect that," returned Clara, smiling. "But she has admiration enough, and I should be sorry if you said a word that could make her discontented."

Clara was far from cheerful at heart; though she would not blame Elsie to their brother, and indeed seldom confided to any one the anxieties which the wayward beauty caused her. To one faithful as she in the performance of every duty it was hard to excuse Elsie's shortcomings; yet the affection, almost motherly, which she bore the charge so early committed to her made her ready to extenuate whenever that were possible. The younger sister leaned on her for every thing. It was Aunt Clara who cared for the children in every stage of their development, who hushed their disputes, made their garments, taught them their letters. It was Clara who was indispensable in every household crisis, supplemented every deficiency. It was mortifying to her just pride that this should be so; that the very people who exalted Elsie's beauty could not but know that she was a careless housekeeper, an inattentive mother. She was disappointed, grieved to see the young wife fall so far short of that womanly excellence she had hoped for. Yet all this, spite of the added cares it brought herself, was but little in comparison with Elsie's great failing. For that, indeed, it was hard to exercise her wonted charity. When she suspected that Roderick was undervalued, that his comfort was neglected, she could with difficulty restrain her indignation. If she had known all! But Elsie was wise in her way; far too discreet to betray to her sister all the domestic secrets. She had long felt herself a martyr to untoward circumstance; long ago awakened to the fact that her prospects had been blighted by unfortunate marriage. Quite unable to appreciate her husband's real worth, she was more keenly alive than ever to his lack of polish, his plainness of person. And there was Mr. Torrington, a rich man now, and single all these years for love of her. Some one had laughingly hinted this reason for his bachelorhood, and it was ever after one of her articles of faith. She might have been living in a house in the Avenue, and had every thing she wanted, instead of being buried in the country, and poor as poverty itself! Fate had been vindictive indeed, and she wasted many a regret on the irrevocable step so rashly taken. Perhaps she did not consciously determine to indemnify herself as far as possible for her imagined losses, but her course would have justified the suspicion. She put from her every care, seized eagerly on every indulgence within her reach, and considered herself the victim of a lot immeasurably inferior to her deserts.

As for the husband, his bright visions had faded years before. The lover's angel had long since disappeared, leaving in her stead a petulant, exacting woman, who had neither mind nor heart enough to understand him or her duty. Not that Roderick Dexter often saw the truth in quite so clear a light; life would have been a little too dreary had he done so. Can you guess what kept up something of the early glamour about his wife? No matter how negligent in other things, she was always careful of her own attire. Breakfast might be ever so ill-cooked or poorly served, she might not even come down to it at all, preferring a cup of coffee and a novel in her own room, but if she came she was always a picture of tasteful neatness. No matter how soiled the table-cloth, her morning dress was beautifully fresh; however rough the children's hair, her own was smooth and lustrous. An impression of personal elegance and refinement was indissolubly connected with her image in the husband's mind; it never quite lost its charm through all the discomforts, the unamiableness, the neglect he had experienced. (And herein lies a hint for those good wives who sometimes forget, in their zeal for the family welfare, the claims of their own adorning.) There were occasional bright days, oases in his desert, when the children sat down to table freshly washed and brushed, when a comfortable meal was served, and Elsie beamed sweetly on him, passed the jelly, and called him "dear." On the strength of such meat he could go many days. When it failed the man's large heart came to the aid of his endurance. He fulfilled, without remembering it, the apostolic injunction that the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak. At such times he thought with tender pity of Elsie, and wished more than ever that he could bestow upon her all the gauds she longed for.

No forbearance, however, could keep off troubles of another kind. His own persistent shabbiness could not counterbalance Elsie's expenditure, while the wasteful housekeeping was beyond his control. His salary utterly failed to meet expenses; there were "accommodations" at the bank—fatal accommodations, renewed, transferred, and only met in part at last by the sacrifice of needful comfort and relaxation. He was silent about these things. Clara might conjecture, but she knew nothing; Elsie, of course, could not be expected to concern herself with such matters.

If only he could always have been blind! But there were moments, rare indeed, when the truth came home to him; sudden revealings of the wreck that had been, the desolation that remained. These were times that admitted no sympathy, and were best put out of sight and forgotten as soon as might be.

Who could wonder if the man grew old and care-worn, or that his eyes took on that sad and patient look with which the world is familiar in another rugged, kindly face?

IV.

"It's a shame!" exclaimed Fred. "Such a pittance to a man of your talent!" He had been discussing with his brother-in-law the affairs of the institution.

"It is all that the funds will admit," returned the Professor.

"Have higher prices, then; make the thing self-sustaining. A college isn't an alms-house; education isn't dispensed in charity."

Mr. Dexter smiled. "Your simile is not a bad one," he said. "The colleges of America have always been in part a charity. The design was, in their very foundation, to furnish knowledge to whomsoever desired it at a rate below the actual cost. Hence they have always been obliged to appeal from time to time to public generosity. The older and more important institutions are now, through the munificence of their Alumni. Yale can do what she likes; her graduates are so numerous and so liberal that she has only to ask and receive. I presume that the same may be the case with Harvard, and perhaps some others. But the younger and less influential ones, like ours, are still poor and struggling. We need many things besides increase of salary; improved apparatus, additions to the cabinet, etc. Even should some fortunate graduate endow us with a few thousands, I fear they would all be appropriated before the Faculty were thought of."

Fred reflected. Such a state of things was entirely opposed to all his notions, and he sought the remedy. "Sir," he presently announced, "you must send for Cadmus."

"And who is he, pray?" asked Clara.

"I'll tell you, my dear. He is the most successful mendicant in the United States. It's a perfect treat to hear him on any of his 'objects' if only you've left your pocket-book at home; if not, you'll rue it. Yes, Cadmus is your man. How much do you want? Fifty—a hundred—thousand? He'll get it for you. Just guarantee him 20 per cent. on his collections, and he'll begin to haul in the money, hand over hand."

The suggestion, made half in jest, commended itself more and more to Fred the longer he contemplated it. He mentioned it in a quiet way to one or two of the Trustees; it was favorably received—the subject was discussed and the matter ended in the engagement of the all-compelling orator, with instructions to raise the sum needful to the pecuniary ease of Anhalt. Mr. Cadmus looked into the case a little, possessed himself of statistics sufficient to rouse his professional enthusiasm, and departed on his important embassy. Clara took tea with her sister on the day of his departure, and the project was talked over in all its bearings.

"I confess I don't like our Alma Mater in her new character of mendicant," observed Mr. Dexter.

"Do you have any hope that the attempt will be successful?" asked Clara.

"Of course it will," said Elsie. "Just think of all Fred told us. Have you any commissions for me, Clara? I am going to Solmes to-morrow with Mary Saroni. I haven't a great deal of shopping, and can run about for you as much as you like."

Clara was sorry to hear of this excursion; a trip to Solmes generally resulted in some pretty but extravagant purchase. However, she was somewhat comforted by the announcement that the projected shopping was of small amount. And so Elsie meant it should be. She was to buy some table-linen, greatly needed, and a few common articles for the children; nothing for herself. She had her outfit already; indeed, her conscience, lethargic as it was, had given her some twinges about that last bonnet and veil. She set off, strong in virtuous intentions.

But Mary Saroni was buying linen, beautifully fine, and linen was always a temptation to Elsie. Then the Valenciennes trimmings were so pretty and so cheap, she really must have a few yards. Mrs. Saroni bought a lovely set of point, and Elsie was unable to resist the charm of one small collar. She was not good at arithmetic, and was greatly surprised to find that these trifles had emptied her purse. The circumstance disconcerted her at first, but she speedily reassured herself. Really the table-cloths and napkins were not so bad; they could very well last a while longer. As for the children, she must hunt up some old things of her own and make over for them when she had time. Her chagrin was speedily forgotten amidst the glories of the silk counter at which Mrs. Saroni was already seated. For a time she looked on without a thought of purchasing; but presently the proprietor, who was himself attending to their wants, unfolded a new attraction.

"Look at this, Mrs. Dexter," he said. "Just your color. The loveliest shade of sea-green. I thought of you the moment I saw it. It came into my mind like a flash. 'Mrs. Dexter will take a dress from that piece.' It isn't every lady, you know, that can wear sea-green."

"Now which should you say for me?" inquired Mrs. Saroni, in a perplexed tone. "This watered pink, or the plain? The watered is the prettiest shade, but I think it is a little thin. The plain is very nice and heavy, but then I am afraid the color is too deep. I really don't know which to choose." And painful indecision was apparent in her countenance.

"I don't know," said Elsie, "I believe I should prefer the plain." What could her friend possibly do with another evening dress, with so many as she had already? If it had been herself now! It was pretty hard that Mary Saroni, homely as she was, could buy every thing she set her eyes upon, while she, who would do credit to dress, was obliged to economize so cruelly. She looked longingly at the green silk, thinking how well it would show, even with no richer accompaniment than her old Honiton berthe. But then it was useless to long.

"It is very pretty," she said, "but I can't take it to-day, Mr. Kinney. I really haven't money enough with me."

Not of the slightest consequence, Mr. Kinney protested; he would send the bill with the silk. Oh, she must have it—it was just the thing for her. Green made some people pale; a great many fine complexions, even, couldn't stand it, but it would become her beautifully. This was the last pattern; Mrs. Devereux had taken a dress from it, and Miss Sylvester, about whose wedding every one was making such a talk. There was a quarter over the number of yards; he would throw in the quarter, and call it even yards. Yes, rather than she shouldn't have it he would throw off sixpence on every yard. Could any one do better than that? She couldn't get it in New York for that price, and as for Solmes, she couldn't find such a silk in the city. The merchants didn't keep them; their class of custom didn't warrant such a stock. Where should he send the parcel?

Elsie yielded, and the beautiful, glistening fabric was her own. She felt really frightened when the bill was made out, but, seeing how tranquilly Mrs. Saroni went on making her purchases, which were a great deal larger, consoled herself. Yet there was a weight on her mind, till she suddenly remembered Mr. Cadmus and his mission. It was wonderful the relief this recollection gave her. When money would soon be so plentiful why need she fret about a little thing like this? Still she did not feel quite comfortable the next morning when Clara came over. In vain did she say to herself that she wasn't spending Clara's money—it was none of her business. She found it very awkward to get out her packages and expatiate upon their contents. She was very glad that her sister said nothing, though she knew by her grave face what she was thinking.

Clara made no comment because it was not her custom, unless she saw some hope of doing good. The fresh expenditure grieved but hardly astonished her. She solaced herself by casting about in her own mind for some means of supplying the children's wants, since their mother had brought them nothing. In the midst of her planning Roderick came in.

"Elsie," he said, "will you have dinner half an hour earlier than usual to-day? And if you can put a few of my things into a valise it will save me time. I have just seen in the papers a notice of the sale of Mr. Brashear's cabinet, and I want to take the through express and be in New York in the morning."

His wife was not feeling quite amiably. Had they been alone some difficulties might have been raised; but Clara was a restraint. She responded, in no very cordial tone, that she would have things ready, and the busy Professor was away again.

"It's very thoughtless of Roderick to ask me to pack for him," she said, "when he must know how tired I am with all that shopping."

Clara shut her lips tightly for a moment. "Don't get up," she said, when the stress of feeling was over; "I will attend to the packing." As she left the room Elsie sank back on her couch, saying to herself that Clara was in a dreadful humor this morning. She didn't scold, but how she looked! And how ill-natured it was of her not to praise the new silk! And she would not even say the linen was cheap. One would naturally suppose a sister would take some interest in your appearance. There was Mr. Kinney, who could remember her tastes and what would please her in all the hurry of his purchases; but Clara! Well, it was always her way. But she knew what the reason was. It was pretty hard—Elsie's usual form of self-condolence—to have a person coming into your house in this style, and feeling she had a right to criticise every cent of your expenditure.

Clara appeared in the doorway. "I must have misunderstood you," she said. "There is nothing in the drawer I went to but a few old things past wearing."

Elsie colored. "You are a great deal too particular," she answered. "Roderick's clothes are there, at any rate. They are all he has, and it is too late to do any thing about them now."

Clara vanished, and returned almost immediately with a scant array of ragged linen and socks darned and worn to the last degree.

"Is it possible," she exclaimed, indignantly, "that your husband has no better things than these! Oh how could you neglect him so? You never saw any thing like this at home. Father and Frederick had always abundance, and of the nicest quality."

"Because they were so fussy and would have them," said Elsie. "Handsome linen costs a great deal. I'm sure you're always preaching to me about economy, and now when I try to save a little—"

"Save from your husband's necessities for your own indulgence! Oh, Elsie!"

"Roderick doesn't care about dress; you know yourself he doesn't."

"Dress!" said Clara, contemptuously. "I suppose he would like the few things he has to be whole, at least. There is no excuse for you, Elsie. You ought to be overcome with shame at such a sight as this, instead of trying to justify yourself."

The injured sister began to cry. Clara went energetically at work, trimming away ragged edges, sewing on buttons, and repairing, as far as time allowed, the waste places before her. The valise was locked just as Bridget announced that dinner was ready.

"I sha'n't go down," said Elsie, sulkily.

"You had better," Clara remonstrated. "You will feel stronger if you take a little food."

"You haven't left me much appetite for that," said Elsie, with a fresh burst of sorrow. There was no time for argument, and Clara went down. To Roderick's inquiries she answered that Elsie was not very well; she would take her dinner later. Her presence at table was always irregular, and the husband felt no anxiety. He finished his meal, rushed up stairs for a hasty good-by, and was gone.

Elsie, left alone, began to feel dull, and presently rather hungry. The longer she waited the fainter grew the demands of grief, the keener those of appetite. She yielded. Bathing her eyes and smoothing her hair, she sought the dining-room, where some fragments of the meal yet remained. Clara had seated herself by the window, and was making an apron for one of the children.

"I believe you were right, after all," said Elsie. "I shall feel better for eating something."

The elder sister perceived that peace was to ensue without farther explanation. Better so, she acknowledged. In the first warmth of her indignation she had resolved on an earnest appeal to Elsie's better feelings at some early date; but she saw already the uselessness of such a thing. She wondered, indeed, how she could have been betrayed into this morning's expression of displeasure.

With most people such expression would have had some effect; at least a transient reserve would have resulted from it. Not so with Elsie. The storm was over and her sky was clear. She was neither penitent nor proposing to amend. No salutary shame caused her any embarrassment. She came out in her sunniest, most engaging mood. Clara could not but enjoy its charm, however her judgment condemned its possessor.

Elsie must be herself to the end of the chapter. It was too late to hope for any change.

All that the elder sister could achieve was to watch, as hitherto, the opportunity of remedying her deficiencies.

V.

Mr. Dexter returned from his journey pale and haggard; it was nothing, he said; the weather was damp, he had taken cold. But the cold did not wear away with time.

"How badly Roderick looks!" observed Clara one morning, as he left the house.

"Doesn't he?" returned Elsie. "Some people are interesting when they are out of sorts, but it isn't the case with him. He's no beauty at any time, poor fellow! and sickness doesn't improve him."

"You misunderstand," said Clara, gravely; "I mean that his health is suffering. I fear that we have not paid enough attention to him; he is always so quiet and uncomplaining."

"Oh, pray don't get any such notion into your head!" exclaimed Elsie. "There's nothing in the world the matter with him but a cold that will pass over if you only let it alone. Don't talk to him about it, or we shall have him fussing around with medicines from morning till night. If there's any thing that makes me nervous it's a vial and a tea-spoon forever on the mantle-piece."

Clara did not feel bound to respect the delicacy of this nervous system. There was little use in endeavoring to arouse the tender fears of the wife, but a word of caution to Roderick himself might be of more avail. She came in again that evening with intent to speak it.

"Is it you?" said Elsie, looking up from her worsteds. "You are just in time to show me about this hood. I could do it well enough in plain knitting, but star-stitch puzzles me. It won't shape nicely."

Clara examined the difficulty and gave the requisite aid.

"I want to speak to Roderick," she said after a time. "He is at home, I suppose?"

"Oh yes, he's at home; not that I have much good of it. He's in his own room, working away at his lectures. I hope, Clara, you'll be warned by my experience, and never marry one of these scientific people that are so taken up with their calling that they have no leisure left to attend to their wives." At another time Clara might have wondered at this new phase of feeling; certainly Elsie did not often give her husband the opportunity of being her companion in a quiet evening at home. Just now she was too busy with other thoughts.

"I will go up stairs then," she said.

"Very well—only don't be long. I shall come round to my widening in a few minutes."

As Clara passed through the hall the sound of a cough met her ear; how hollow it seemed! Grave apprehensions crowded on her. What if this were the token of that dread disease which works so slowly, so insidiously, yet so remorseless in its hold? She felt herself guilty in having been so slow to take alarm.

Her tap at the door was answered by Mr. Dexter, in hat and over-coat. "You were going out?" she asked.

"No—it is rather chilly, that is all."

"You are here without a fire this cold evening?" said Clara, dismayed. "Oh how imprudent! Do you know that I came up on purpose to urge you to be careful of your health? These things should be taken in time. Promise me to see Dr. Kimberly to-morrow, and now come down stairs, where there is a bright fire burning. This damp air is very unsafe for you; you must not try it again."

"I believe you are right," he answered. "But I have always been so little in the habit of thinking of my own health." He did not say that a fire was a luxury he felt unable to allow himself, and for which the hat and over-coat were nightly substituted.

"I know," returned Clara, "you and all of us have been too heedless of it. I intend to make up for that now; I shall give you no peace till you are quite restored. Can't you come down at once?"

"In a very few minutes."

Clara went back to the parlor, but she could not enter with much zeal into the worsted question. A sense of painful foreboding hung over her.

"Elsie," she said, more to relieve her own feelings than with hope of doing any good, "do watch Roderick a little. Men don't know how to take care of their health, and indeed I do not like the sound of that cough."

"Nonsense!" replied her sister. "You have been too busy to-day, and are tired and fanciful. How does this Solferino become me? I notice it makes some people very yellow." She adjusted the half-finished hood upon her head, and Clara looked at the beautiful face, wondering if any touch of natural care or sorrow would ever dim its brilliancy.

"Not a single compliment!" observed Elsie. "Here comes some one that will do better. Look, Roderick, this is the new color. Does it make me very fallow? If so, I sha'n't wear it." And she smiled up in his face, gayly defying him to do any thing but admire.

"It is very pretty, dear," he answered, laying his large hand caressingly on her hair. "All colors become you, I think."

"That is just a man's idea! But I'll do you the justice to say you are not so far wrong, after all. Pink, and crimson, and green, and blue, I am quite respectable in all of them. But orange"—shaking her head—"you don't think I could bear orange do you, dear?"

"If any one could," he said, smiling.

"You dear old Bruin! how gallant you are this evening!" she exclaimed, in high good-humor. "Take that rocking-chair and draw close to the hearth; I'll get your slippers, too. Clara has been trying to make me nervous about you, but she shall not succeed. Low spirits are so bad; I think it's every body's duty to keep up and be cheerful for the sake of other people."

This idea was not so exclusively Elsie's own property as she imagined it; her husband had long been putting it in practice. He was cheerful this evening accordingly, but there was a something in his manner that saddened the observant sister. A wistfulness, a tenderness she did not like to think of nor to conjecture its cause.

Dr. Kimberley was consulted the next day, and various precautions were adopted. Elsie grew used to the vials on the mantle-piece; they ceased to make her nervous. Gradually it became an admitted fact that Roderick was out of health, though he still attended to his customary duties. He talked with Clara about remedies and symptoms; dull themes, which did not interest his wife. Neither of them assumed that there was any danger in the case; there was this difficulty to be met, that risk to be avoided. And they began to awaken, as people always do, to the wonderful advantages of change of air.

"I wish it were not so late," said Clara, anxiously. "A little trip somewhere would do you so much good. You have been overworked; you need relaxation. A pleasant journey would be better than medicine."

"Yes," he answered, "if it were practicable. But the season is too far advanced. I had promised myself a run in the Adirondacks last summer, but—" he checked himself.

"But what?" she asked after a pause.

"Some unforeseen circumstances prevented it."

Clara remembered with a pang the sea-green silk. Elsie had worn it once or twice, and was charming in it. She did not know that it had cost her husband all his summer-pleasure; but would she have cared if she had known?

By-and-by Mr. Dexter was missing, a day at a time, from his post. People looked grave when they spoke of him; it was easy to see, they said, how he was going. What a loss to the college and the place! And what a sad thing for his children and that beautiful young wife!

The beautiful young wife, however, was not easily saddened. She had always some good reason for any increase of weakness or suffering in the patient; he had taken cold, there was a change in the weather, the wind was east. There was no danger that Elsie's comfort would be disturbed by any undue anxiety.

There came a day, at last, when her eyes were opened to the truth, when incredulity failed her, and she acknowledged the probability that Roderick was going; that he was to leave her forever. It was a shock. She cried; she felt very gloomy and miserable for several hours. But she was too philosophic to be wretched long. It was very dreadful, to be sure, but it did no good to be dismal about it. It could not help Roderick, and only made every body else unhappy. She recovered her equanimity, and the quiet progress of disease aided her in maintaining it.

It is sad to see a beloved object torn from anxious, clinging hearts; to note the dread deepening into certainty, to view the final anguish of separation. It is sadder yet where there is no suffering to contemplate, where those hearts are calm which should be wrung with grief, where the approach of that loss which ought to be so terrible is watched with clear, untroubled eyes. Roderick knew something of this, and felt its pang, yet it had its consolations too. He had grown so used to caring for Elsie, to sparing her pain, that there was a sort of comfort in thinking she would not suffer as bitterly as some women did. For himself, submission was not difficult; life still held interests and duties, but its charm was gone. If only he were leaving Elsie and the children better provided for! He racked his mind for every expedient that could aid them, and the result was still lamentably small. But Mr. Monerick had something; Fred was liberal and prosperous. And Mr. Cadmus was succeeding beyond all expectation in his efforts; perhaps the college would remember his own long services and do something for those he left behind.

"Clara," he said one day, when they had been talking of those details which Elsie would not comprehend nor remember, "you will watch over her, will you not? You will see to her and the poor children?"

"Certainly," she answered, not trusting herself to say more.

"Thank you;" and he smiled gratefully. "Though I do not know why I asked. You always have done it. I know what you have been to us. It was not a thing to be much talked of, but I understood it all."

Clara had her reward in these words.

And by-and-by this anxiety passed away. He had done his best, and since the Great Taskmaster called him in the midst of his unfinished labors, that too must be right. There was no doubt of His power to provide for the widow and the fatherless.

He was far gone now. The activities, the cares of life were a forgotten dream. The flicker of sunshine on the wall, the glimpse of blue sky through his window, were all he knew of that great and restless world in which he used to have his part. His chief pleasure seemed to be Elsie's presence; Clara was thankful that her sister was willing to bestow it. She brought some pretty work and sat by him, chatting, in her way, of little, everyday occurrences. The eyes, so large and bright in the wasted face, followed her every movement; he liked to hold in his thin fingers the beautiful white hand; he smiled with pleasure if she spoke a kind word or arranged a pillow. Till at last one day it all ended; he quietly fell asleep.

The usual honors were paid to his memory. The Faculty passed resolutions of condolence, as did the two or three scientific bodies of which he was a member. There was a great crowd at the funeral, and people said again, "What a loss to the college and the place!" We know how readily the world consoles itself for such losses; the great round of business and pleasure can not stop for a single death; it whirls on. Long before the fair white monument, with its Latin epitaph, rose in the college burying-ground there was a new professor in Mr. Dexter's place; a busy, self-asserting man, bent on making himself and his influence conspicuous. Elsie was with her brother in New York; the children played just as merrily under their grandfather's trees as they had done in their own home; every one, save Clara, had accepted Roderick's death as one of those accomplished facts about which nothing more is to be said or done.

Elsie was lovely in her weeds; more winning, perhaps, than in all her girlish brightness. It was natural that she should be consoled; no one could expect that a woman so beautiful, and still so young, should consider life ended for her by a single sad event. After a year or two of decorous widowhood she fulfilled her own and Fred's ambition, and reigned supreme over a country-seat and a house on the Avenue. Once a year or so, perhaps, she remembered Roderick, and thought, "Poor fellow, how fond he used to be of me!"

The children were rather in the way of her new cares and pleasures; it was decided that a country education would be best for them. Where was education so thorough as at Anhalt, what care so natural as Aunt Clara's? To her they came, with her they remained, making only brief visits to their mother's splendors. They heard from her loving histories of their father's early days, of his learning, his worth, the esteem in which men held him. The grassy mound in the cemetery was to them an object of sacred awe and interest; the tall obelisk and the Latin inscription were their greatest pride. "Mamma" was a being far removed from their sphere; but Clara and the father stood side by side in their childish reverence and affection.

THE OLD BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKSELLING is a different thing in these days from what it was in the last century, as may be gathered from a comparison of the "Shadows of the Old Booksellers," lately produced by Charles Knight, with the substantial publishers of the present day. The term "printers" originally included most of the persons who had connection with book-making or bookselling. Thus, book-printers, dealers in old books, publishers of new books, printers of journals, book-auctioneers, and even print-sellers came to be included in the company of "stationers, who wrote and sold all sorts of books in use," before the introduction of printing.

There was reason for this comprehensive designation, since the earliest printers had to do every thing for themselves; to construct their types, presses, and all the appliances of their art; and to publish and sell their books after they had manufactured them.

"For some years after the invention of printing," says William Caxton, "many of the ingenious, learned, and enterprising men who devoted themselves to the art were ruined, because they could not sell cheaply unless they printed a considerable number of a book, and there were not readers enough to take off the stock thus accumulated." But time and the increase of knowledge produced by books remedied this evil, and made bookmaking and bookselling not only a philanthropic but a profitable work.

The early method of approaching the public was for the author to invite subscriptions to his work, and receive the full price for each copy, and from his receipts he paid the printer's bill. Pope made a fortune by his subscription books; but Johnson decried the system as undignified, declaring that "he that asks subscription soon finds that he has enemies—all who do not encourage defame him."

After the subscription plan was abandoned authors began to bring their manuscripts to the publishers and get what they could for them; but jealousies soon began to disturb the relations between the author and the bookseller, so that Campbell praised the first Napoleon for shooting a bookseller, and Coleridge thus satirized "the trade" in his "Devil's Walk:"

"He went into a rich bookseller's shop—
Quoth he, 'We are both of one college,
For I myself sate, like a cormorant, once,
Fast by the tree of knowledge.'"

These jealousies are happily abated now; and while the publisher is able to gather from the demand for literature an ample reward for his enterprise, the popular author has no reason to be dissatisfied with his gains.

But we are to deal in this article more particularly with the Old Booksellers of the last century, not the men who procured copyrights, employed printers, and sold books at wholesale, bearing their names on the title-pages; there was no such class among these old time publishers of knowledge. They had printing-offices, kept shops, dealt in stationery as well as books, and some were also binders and owners of newspapers. Some of them were writers as well as publishers, and possessed literary ability as well as mercantile sagacity; such a one was Elmsley, the friend and companion of Gibbon, of whom it could not have been said,

"He guards the treasures that he can't enjoy;"

but others there were, like Osborne, whom Johnson knocked down with a folio, saying, "Lie there thou lump of lead!"—whose maxim was, that a bookseller should know nothing of books beyond their title-pages.

Prominent among those who were embraced in the title bookseller was Thomas Guy, who has been more celebrated as the founder of the hospital which bears his name than for any thing else, unless it may be his successful operations in seamen's tickets and the stocks of the South Sea Company. England being engaged in an expensive war with France, the seamen of the royal navy for many years received tickets for their pay instead of money, which their necessities compelled them to dispose of at a great discount. Mr. Guy "discovered the sweets of this traffic, and hastened to profit by it," says Maitland; but it is far more likely that his great fortune was due rather to the sale of Bibles, and to the shrewd investments of the results of his business.

He lived in a time when theology was the exciting topic, and yet when Bibles were poorly printed and dear. A cheap and well-printed Bible could not be had in England; for the right to print them was granted to one family, who had exercised it since the time of Elizabeth. Guy had Bibles in better type and on finer paper, manufactured in Holland and imported into England. He trusted that the Dutch compositors would not print as was printed in the Bible of 1653, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God," nor leave out the word "not" in the seventh commandment, for which the printers of an edition of the Bible in the reign of Charles I. were heavily fined; and his Bible adventure was successful, until it proved detrimental to the public revenue, though profitable to Guy, and seizures, prosecutions, and embarrassments obliged him to cease his importations.

Mr. Guy had discovered, however, that a cheap Bible was eagerly sought for; and, after great exertions, he induced the University of Oxford, which had the right to print Bibles and Prayer-Books, to assign their privilege of printing the Bible to him. He set about printing Bibles in London, and made a fortune by furnishing what had not been seen before—a cheap and excellent copy of the Scriptures.

In his early years the young bookseller was obliged to exercise the most scrupulous frugality; he was his own servant, and often ate his dinner, brought from a cook-shop, upon his own counter. In the scanty notices of his career, it is said by a modern chronicler that he had "no other table-cloth than an old newspaper." This writer must have forgotten that the newspapers of that period were hardly larger than a dish, and would have afforded but slight protection to Guy's counter. One anecdote given by some of his biographers, as an example of his penurious habits, Mr. Knight regards as an example of his decision of character. A law had been passed that every occupant of a house should pave a sidewalk, six feet in width, in front of his door, upon pain of paying five shillings for every week the same shall be omitted after due notice given. It is in connection with this law that Mr. Knight calls up Guy's "shadow," under the one gleam of romance which lighted for a moment his solitary pursuit of the great purpose of his life. He thus pictures him:

"Customers, wholesale and retail, have found their way to the new warehouse for the sale of the privileged Oxford Bibles. Mr. Baskett, now the king's printer, has a powerful rival. To evade the royal patent it will not be necessary for Thomas Guy to print his pocket-bible with foot-notes, which might be cut off when the volume was bound. He sits among his stores, musing, with more assurance than Alnaschar of his visions being realized, of the wealth that will flow in from his adroit treaty with the syndics of the Oxford Press. He will not demand the Lord Mayor's daughter in marriage, nor spurn her from him when she has accepted him as her lord. The passion for accumulation has got some possession of him; but if he should become rich, which he is firmly resolved to be, he will not waste his means in extravagant display, or the dissipation of some young men of the city, who ape the vices and follies of the courtiers. What if he should be able to do something toward the support of the hospital in Southwark, which seems to have fallen more and more into decay and neglect since his boyish time, when he has seen many a wretched creature carried within its gates. With a strength of will rarely equalled in real life he resolves to be rich, and to do some good with his riches. But Thomas Guy, in coming to this resolution, has an arduous struggle with natural feelings. He is lonely. He has indulged himself with the cost of a female servant, who cooks his frugal meal, and keeps his Holland shirt tidy. But he wants the solace of a household friend. He goes little into society. He dines rarely in his Company's hall. The city dames, according to his observation, are too ambitious of finery. He has once or twice conversed during the banquet at Guildhall with the daughter of a rich stationer, and has found her deplorably ignorant of the commodities in which her father deals. Gradually he begins to think that his own maid-servant is quite as attractive as a citizen's daughter; born of honest parents, religiously disposed, and skilled in cookery and other useful arts. What if this neat-handed Phillis should become his wife! He is sure that he can compel her to regulate his affairs with due economy. She has never wasted money or victuals while in his service. She has professed that implicit obedience to his will which he requires. He at last makes his proposal, and it is accepted graciously. But there is one danger which the handmaiden has not foreseen. She has not apprehended the possibility of giving dire offense by the slightest manifestation of her own opinion in opposition to that of her master. He has been very cross for several days. He has been fined once for neglecting to pave the footway in front of his shop. He delays to incur an expense which he thinks ought to fall upon the pavement commissioners. But he must yield. The paviors go to work. He watches them narrowly. He has a ground-plan of his own premises, the boundary of which is not very well defined in the frontage. He gives the most minute directions as to the exact point where his portion of the flat or broad stoneway within the posts should begin and end. The workmen find that a very awkward space is left unpaved. They carry their remonstrances to the incautious maiden within doors, during the absence of her master. She little knows what she is doing when she says, 'Do as you wish. Tell him I bade you, and I am sure he will not be angry.' The poor girl must accept her destiny to remain unmarried to the thriving bookseller. The romance of Thomas Guy's life is over. He girds up his loins for a struggle, for a 'plum.' But if I see his shadow aright, there is a soft place in his heart where the memory of that ill-used woman will long abide."

During the half century that followed this transitory dream of domestic happiness Guy accumulated riches with the steady purpose of dedicating them to charitable uses. He paid £500 to avoid the office of sheriff, and avoided all office except a seat in the House of Commons. He bought South Sea stock at £50, and wisely began to sell out his 100,000 shares when they had advanced to £300, disposing of his last shares for £600 each. He applied this money in erecting, furnishing, and endowing the hospital which bears his name, and had the satisfaction of knowing that his gains had been worthily applied, when he saw this work of mercy completed and endowed, at a cost of more than £240,000, before his death.

Another specimen of the ancient bookseller is given in the life of John Dunton, whose moral and intellectual peculiarities were such as to procure for him the name of a "lunatick" among his contemporaries. Warburton calls him an "auction bookseller and an abusive scribbler;" and Disraeli writes this scathing notice: "A crack-brain scribbling bookseller, who boasted he had a thousand projects, fancied he had methodized six hundred, and was ruined by the fifty he executed;" and yet his history has more in it that is entertaining than that of multitudes less odd and more successful. From his "Life and Errors," written by himself, in solitude, and doubtless in misery, we get an insight into much of the literary history of the times, and also come "to know the inside of the man."

Dunton's father was a clergyman of ability, and desired that his son should follow his profession; but the "unsettled mercurial humor" of the son prevented him from transmitting "the priesthood to his own posterity." So the boy was apprenticed to a London bookseller, and before that apprenticeship was ended the father died, leaving to his son many pious counsels and a goodly portion. He celebrated his manhood by inviting a hundred apprentices to a funeral ceremony in memory of the departed apprenticeship, and was soon a bookseller on his own account, occupying "half a shop, a warehouse, and a fashionable chamber." Among the counsels of his father was some excellent advice in respect to the choice of a wife, and also an exhortation to keep his landed property and borrow money for his publishing speculations. Dunton's first venture was a work by the Rev. Thomas Doolittle, and his mode of getting a stock of books without using money, and being as a beginner without credit, was primitive. He says, "This book fully answered my end; for, exchanging it through the whole trade, it furnished my shop with all books salable at that time." The hackney authors, who abridged books, seem to have given great offense to him, for he declares, "These gormandizers will eat you the very life out of a copy so soon as ever it appears; for as the times go, original and abridgment are almost reckoned as necessary as man and wife, 'so that I am really afraid a bookseller and a good conscience will shortly grow some strange thing in the earth.'" Dunton failed to follow his father's prudent advice about choosing a wife with deliberation, for he fell in love at church with the daughter of an eminent preacher among the non-conformists, and by his marriage became the brother-in-law of Samuel Wesley, whose son was the famous John Wesley, the founder of Methodism. His courtship was conducted with poetical and religious fervor; his mistress was entitled "lovely Iris" instead of plain Elizabeth; but she proved a prudent and diligent helpmeet—"managed all my affairs for me, and left me entirely to my own rambling and scribbling humors."

Trade being dull in England owing to the defeat of Monmouth, Dunton sailed for America, to collect in Boston five hundred pounds that was owed him there. By the first return vessel he sent to "Iris" sixty letters! He was away nearly a year trafficking without much profit; for he says of the inhabitants of Boston, "he that trades with them may get promises enough, but their payments come late."

After this unproductive voyage his affairs were not flourishing, though he boasts that of six hundred books which he published during his career he had only to repent of seven. The only decided success which he achieved, however, was the publication of a small periodical called the Athenian Mercury, devoted to literature, which brought its author a temporary fame, so that poems in honor of his paper were written by the chief wits of the age, and articles were furnished for it by many writers of note. The death of a cousin, also, at this time replenished his funds, and he was considered a thriving man. It was probably about this time that he wrote as follows: "A bookseller, if he is a man of any capacity and observation, can tell best what to go upon, and what has the best prospect of success;" but poor Dunton must have lacked or lost both capacity and observation, since his last publication has this lugubrious title, "Dying Groans from the Fleet Prison, or last Shift for Life:" an appeal for aid to King George the First. A few of his eccentric characters are worthy of passing notice. Of Mr. Richard Crouch he says: "He has melted down the best of our English histories into twelve-penny books which are filled with wonders, varieties, and curiosities." Mr. Miller "had the largest collection of stitched books of any man in the world, and could furnish the clergy at a dead lift with a printed sermon on any text or occasion." Mrs. Tacy Sourles, an eminent Quaker, "is both a printer as well as a bookseller, and the daughter of one, and understands her trade very well, being a good compositor herself."

The book-auctioneers of the time are also illustrated by Dunton. The following will serve for a specimen:

"The famous Mr. Edward Millington was originally a bookseller, which he left off, being better cut out for an auctioneer. He had a quick wit and a wonderful fluency of speech. There was usually as much comedy in his 'once, twice, thrice!' as can be met with in a modern play. 'Where,' said Millington, 'is your generous flame for learning?

Who but a sot or a blockhead would have money in his pocket and starve his brains?"

Dr. Cane, once bidding too leisurely for a book, Millington called out to him, "Is this your 'Primitive Christianity?'" alluding to a book the doctor had published with this title.

Dunton was at one time a book-auctioneer, and remarks, complacently, of an auction tour that he made in Ireland, that it was said of him "that he had done more service to learning by his three auctions than any one single man that had come into Ireland these hundred years."

Jacob Tonson, another of the fraternity of booksellers, was the son of a barber, who exclaimed, on the occasion of a visit to Mr. Scot, the librarian, "Ah Jacob, if I hadn't a noble profession for you to follow, I should like to see you a bookseller." Jacob had an aversion to the business carried on "under the pole," and became a bookseller. He was immortalized in the "Dunciad" as "left-legged Jacob," and is thus described by Rowe:

"While in your early days of reputation,
You for blue garters had not such a passion,
While yet you did not live, as now your trade is,
To drink with noble lords, and toast their ladies,
Thou, Jacob Tonson, were, to my conceiving,
The cheerfulest, best, honest fellow living."

He was Dryden's bookseller, and was on an excellent footing with the author. He gave him fifty guineas for 1446 lines of a translation of Ovid, though protesting that he had expected 1518 lines for forty guineas; but says, "If you don't think fit to add something more I must submit." Tonson's villa at Barn Elms became famous as the place where the Kit-Cat-Club used to hold their meetings.

Ward, a third-class writer, says that this club was "founded by an amphibious mortal, chief merchant to the Muses."

Jacob proposed to a number of young writers a weekly meeting, where he would provide the feast, and at which the productions of these juveniles should be read, and demanded in return that he should have the refusal of the articles read. This was readily agreed to, and the cook's name being Christopher, for brevity called "Kft," and his sign being the "Cat and Fiddle," the club derived its name from the combination, and was henceforth known as the Kit-Cat-Club." Many of the members became famous.

Among these was Sir Godfrey Kneller, state painter to five sovereigns, who was equally discreet in his politics and his religion, for he began life as a Tory and a Papist, went on happily through the Revolution, and ended his days as the boon companion of some of the staunchest Protestants of the Kit-Cat family at Barn Elms. He was inordinately vain, an example of which is given in the vision which he related to Pope. He dreamed that he was dead. When encountering St. Peter, the Apostle very civilly asked his name. "I said it was Kneller. I had no sooner said so than St. Luke, who was standing close by, turned toward me and said, with a great deal of sweetness, 'What, the famous Sir Godfrey Kneller from England?' 'The very same, Sir,' said I, 'at your service.'"

Pope thus describes Charles Dartineuf, another member of the club, in his first satire:

"Each mortal has his pleasure, none deny Scarsdale his bottle, Darty his ham-pie."

Swift characterizes him as "the man who knows every thing, and every body knows, and where a knot of rabble are going on a holiday, and where they were last." Darty wrote a paper in "The Tatler" on the use of wine, in which Addison is supposed to be pointed at:

"I have the good fortune to be acquainted with a gentleman who has an inexhaustible source of wit to entertain the curious, the grave, the humorous, and the frolic. He can transform himself into different shapes, and adapt himself to every company; yet in a coffee-house, or in the ordinary course of affairs, appears rather dull than sprightly. You can seldom get him to a tavern; but when once he is arrived to his pint, and begins to look about and like his company, you admire a thousand things in him which before lay buried. Then you discover the brightness of his mind and the strength of his judgment, accompanied with the most graceful mirth."

Old Jacob Tonson did not like Addison. He often said of him, "One day or other you'll see that man a bishop! I'm sure he looks that way; and indeed I ever thought him a priest in his heart." Tonson was certainly the prince of booksellers, in his intimacy with the great men of his own times, but the greater men of the past had more to do with making his fortune and fame. He identified himself with Milton by making his "Paradise Lost" popular; he threw open Shakspeare to the reading public, and his services to literature were worthy of the reward which he received.

Perhaps none of the old booksellers has been transmitted to posterity with an obloquy more keen and deserved than Edmund Curll, who is thus described by the satirists: "Curll was in person very tall and thin; an ungainly, awkward, white-faced man. His eyes were a light gray—large, projecting, goggle, and purblind. He was splay-footed and baker-kneed." "He was a debauchee to the last degree," writes Thomas Amory, "and so injurious to society, that by filling his translations with wretched notes, forged letters, and bad pictures, he raised the price of a four-shilling book to ten; his translators lay three in a bed at the Pewter Platter Inn, in Holborn, and he and they were ever at work to deceive the public." He likewise printed the most grossly immoral books; and as to drink, though too mean to spend money for it, he would drink himself blind at another's cost. He was prosecuted in 1727 for his scandalous publication, and lost his ears as the penalty. Pope had an awkward controversialist in Curll. His impudence was at once his spear and shield. One instance is enough of his manner of attack and defense:

"I have engraven a new plate of Mr. Pope's head from Mr. Jervas's painting; and likewise intend to hang him up in effigy for a sign to all spectators of his falsehood and my own veracity, which I will always maintain under the Scot's motto, 'Nemo me impune lacessit.'"

Pope paid Curll off in the "Dunciad" for all his abuse. This publication produced a great excitement. On the day the book was first vended a crowd of authors besieged the shop; entreaties, advices, threats of law and battery, nay, cries of treason, were all employed to hinder the coming out of "The Dunciad." On the other side the booksellers and hawkers made as great an effort to procure it. The authors could do nothing against the public; it was like stopping a torrent with the finger, so out it came.

The "Dunces," as they were called, held weekly clubs to devise hostilities against the author. One wrote to a great Minister that Mr. Pope was the greatest enemy the Government had; another bought Pope's image in clay in order to execute him in effigy. Some false editions of the book, having an owl in their frontispiece, were put forth; the true one to distinguish it, fixed in its stead an ass laden with authors. Hence arose a great contest among the booksellers, some recommending the Owl, and others the Ass edition.

But all the booksellers were not as scurrilous as Curll and Lintott, who were low and quarrelsome fellows. There were men in this busy age of letters who were worthy dealers in literary wares. One of these was the great-nephew of old Jacob Tonson. His eulogium by Steevens, in his advertisement to the edition of Shakspeare which he published in 1773, is a model for those who desire to regard a publisher as something better than a literary cormorant:

"To suppose that a person employed in an extensive trade lived in a state of indifference to loss and gain would be to conceive a character incredible and romantic; but it may be justly said of Mr. Tonson that he had enlarged his mind beyond solicitude about petty losses, and refined it from the desire of unreasonable profit. He was willing to admit those with whom he contracted to the just advantage of their own labors; and had never learned to consider the author as an under-agent to the bookseller. The wealth which he inherited, or acquired, he enjoyed like a man conscious of the dignity of a profession subservient to learning. His domestic life was elegant, and his charity was liberal. His manners were soft, and his conversation was delicate; nor is, perhaps, any quality in him more to be censured than that reserve which confined his acquaintance to a small number, and made his example less useful, as it was less extensive. He was the last commercial name of a family which will be long remembered; and if Horace thought it not improper to convey the Sosii to posterity; if rhetoric suffered no dishonor from Quintilian's dedication to Trypho; let it not be thought that we disgrace Shakspeare by appending to his works the name of Tonson."

Samuel Richardson is a name that will never be forgotten so long as lovers of fiction exist. Though his novels are marred by the loose morality of the age in which he wrote, they are almost unrivaled as productions of genius and fancy. In the first year of the reign of James

II., 1685, an ingenious artisan—a joiner, who was a good draughtsman, and understood architecture—hastily left his business in London, and took up his abode somewhere in Derbyshire. The execution of the Duke of Monmouth had terrified this humble man, whose name was Richardson; for he had received favors from the unhappy son of Charles II., and also from the Earl of Shaftesbury. He was suspected in that awful time; and, had he not found a secure hiding-place, would probably have been one of the sufferers whom Chief-Justice Jeffreys sent to the gallows, or to a life of field-labor in America. In 1689 Samuel Richardson was born. Though concealment from political motives was no longer necessary as regarded his father, he has carefully forborne to mention the precise place in Derbyshire where he first saw the light, and where he passed his childhood.

The boy displayed a talent for letter-writing from his earliest youth; and when scarcely eleven years old got into trouble for writing spontaneously an epistle, full of Scripture texts, to a widow of fifty, who pretended to a zeal for religion, and was a constant frequenter of church ordinances, but who was continually fomenting quarrels among all her acquaintances by backbiting and scandal.

He was a great favorite with the ladies during his whole life, and this favoritism he employed to the best advantage by studying female character in its various presentations. In 1706 he was bound apprentice to Mr. John Wilde, who is described by Dunton as having "a very noble printing-house in Aldersgate Street." Of this apprenticeship, Richardson says:

"I served a diligent seven years to it; to a master who grudged every hour to me that tended not to his profit; even of those times of leisure and diversion which the refractoriness of my fellow-apprentices obliged him to allow them, and were usually allowed by other masters to their apprentices. I stole from the hours of rest and relaxation my reading times for improvement of my mind. I took care that even my candle was of my own purchasing, that I might not, in the most trifling instance, make my master a sufferer." That hard task-master called the lad "the pillar of his house."

For six or seven years after the expiration of his apprenticeship Richardson continued at his trade, as a compositor, a reader, and part of the time as an overseer. By his frugal habits he was at length freed from his apprenticeship, and became a master printer, in a small way, in a court in Fleet Street. He compiled Indexes, and wrote Prefaces and Dedications. Thus he pursued his way till 1740, when, as he writes:

"Two booksellers, my particular friends, entreated me to write for them a little volume of Letters, in a common style, on such subjects as might be of use to those country readers who were unable to compose for themselves. 'Will it be any harm,' said I, 'in a piece you want to be written so low, if we should instruct them how they should think and act in common cases, as well as indite?' They were the more urgent with me to begin the little volume for this hint. I set about it; and, in the progress of it, wrote two or three letters to instruct handsome girls who were obliged to go out to service, as we phrase it, how to avoid the snares that might be laid against their virtue. And hence sprung 'Pamela.'"

The light literature of the time of George II. was either excessively dull or grossly licentious. Richardson avoided dullness, and professed to inculcate moral lessons. His story was "Pamela; or, Virtue Rewarded." It succeeded. "Pamela" was recommended from the pulpit. One critic wrote, that, "if all other books were to be burned, this book, next to the Bible, ought to be preserved." Another said, "He would bring up his son to be virtuous by giving him 'Pamela' as soon as he could read."

Mrs. Barbauld truly remarked that a novel "written on the side of virtue was considered a new experiment." Its success is due to the fact that the virtue inculcated was not too refined or disinterested to be above the comprehension of the worldly-minded or the uneducated.

Nevertheless, there is so much of truth and nature in the conduct of the story that we may have perfect confidence in the anecdote told by Sir John Herschel, of the blacksmith of a village who read "Pamela" to his neighbors collected round his anvil. When the hero and heroine were brought together to live long and happily, according to the most approved rules, the congregation were so delighted as to raise a great shout, and procuring the church keys, actually set the parish bells ringing. This was a just tribute to the genius of the author, but perhaps as much so to the very intelligible sort of poetical justice which was the moral of the purity of the daughter of Gaffer and Gammer Andrews.

His next work, "Clarissa," in which he displays the greatest genius, was published in 1747. At the present day we can safely pronounce the praises heaped upon this book as extravagant. Yet some of them are worthy of mention. Thus:

"Martin Sherlock believed that the greatest effort of genius that perhaps was ever made was forming the plan of 'Clarissa Harlowe.' Rousseau, in a letter to D'Alembert, holds that nothing was ever written equal to or approaching it in any language. Diderot is somewhat more moderate in his commendations, but quite strong enough to represent the enthusiasm of Frenchmen for the divine Richardson. Mrs. Barbauld says she 'well remembers a Frenchman who paid a visit to Hampstead for the sole purpose of finding out the house in the Flask-walk where Clarissa lodged, and was surprised at the ignorance or indifference of the inhabitants on that subject. The Flask-walk was to him as much classic ground as the rocks of Meillerie to the admirers of Rousseau.' Dr. Edward Young, who looks upon Richardson as an instrument of Providence, gives perhaps the most extraordinary proof of his enthusiasm that was ever manifested from author to bookseller: 'Suppose in the title-page of the Night Thoughts you should say, Published by the Author of Clarissa?'"

Richardson was greatly elated by his success, and after the publication of "Sir Charles Grandison," which is a positively stupid attempt to give an idea of a good man, his exhibitions of vanity were ridiculous. Boswell tells a story of a punishment which his self-complacency received on the authority of Mrs. Lenox:

"At a dinner given by Richardson, a gentleman recently returned from Paris mentioned that he had seen 'Clarissa' lying on the king's brother's table. Part of the company being engaged in talking, Richardson affected not to attend to what was especially meant for him. But when he thought that a moment of silence was a favorable opportunity for all hearing, he turned to the polite traveler, with—'I think, Sir, you were saying somewhat about —' 'A mere trifle, Sir, not worth repeating.' Richardson did not speak ten words more the whole day, says Boswell, and maliciously adds that Doctor Johnson was present, and appeared much to enjoy his mortification."

Richardson was a very nervous and irritable man, and this quality Mr. Knight has very happily illustrated. He represents him as engaged upon a most florid epistle of Miss Selby, in Sir Charles Grandison:

"'Sir Charles, with a joy that lighted up a more charming flush than usual upon his face, his lively soul looking out of his fine eyes, yet with an air as modest as respectful, did credit to our sex before the applauding multitude by bending his knee to his sweet bride and saluting her.'—There is a horrible outcry in a somewhat distant room of the printing-office. Mr. Richardson exclaims, 'Oh! my nerves, my nerves!'—and rings his bell. The attendant errand-boy enters. 'What is that dreadful din about? Go and see.' Mr. Richardson in vain attempts to proceed with a little speech of Grandison to his Harriet, now no more Byron. The inspiration is gone. 'Please, Sir,' says the errand-boy, 'they were a-cobbing [a barbarous method of castigation] Wall-eyed Tom.' 'A horrid custom!' Mr. Toovey, the chief of the office, has now returned, and bows low to his employer as he enters the sacred room. 'Mr. Toovey, have I not said that there shall be no more cobbing in my office?' 'It can't be put down, Sir, provided there has been a regular Chapel to judge the delinquent.' 'And what offense, Mr. Toovey, had this howling victim committed?' 'He was sent to the Barley Mow for a gallon of porter, and was seen drinking out of the can, and then filling it up from the pump in Bride Lane.' 'Still, I say, chapel or no chapel, there shall be no cobbing here.' 'Well, Sir, as you please; but it is an ancient institution, as time-honored as the flogging-block at Westminster.' 'But, Mr. Toovey, have I not also said that no beer shall be brought into this office before noon?' 'As you please, Sir. But the pressmen had been working all night upon "Moore's Almanack," and wanted a little refreshment.' 'And why all night?' 'The Treasurer would have it so. He wants ten thousand perfect a week before publishing day. He wants to send them off by wagon, for the fast coaches, which go to York in three days, are too expensive.' 'I thought,' murmurs Mr. Richardson, 'that evil would come of the wicked spread of sham prognostications.' 'Sham,' cries Mr. Toovey; 'the pot calls the kettle—' 'Don't be vulgar, Sir. You have been reading Dr. Swift, the grossest of writers; worse than Fielding; a libelous fellow, though he did wear a cassock, who tried to bring the genuine almanacks into disrepute, when he told that dreadful falsehood about the death of honest old Partridge. An enemy, Sir, to King George and the Company, and I have no patience with him.—Wit, indeed!"

The Rev. Philip Skelton, an Irish clergyman of eccentric manners but of great benevolence, was one of Richardson's employers. On the 17th of March the candid printer writes to him:

"By the beginning of May you expect copies of perfect books. Upward of sixty close sheets to be done in so few weeks. Dear Sir, what an expectation!" The impatient author replies, "I care not how my work looks; expedition and correctness are all I desire." His complaints of delay fret the busy printer. "What did I not do to serve you to the utmost of my power? I parted with three pieces of work; I put out to several printers the new edition of my 'Grandison'; took in help to the first edition of the seventh volume; I refused Dr. Leland's last piece. But yet with all this, let me tell you, my dear friend, that two such large volumes as yours could not possibly be finished so soon as you expected, from the time they came into my hands, by any one printer."

Richardson died in 1761, at the age of seventy-two. By his will he left a mourning ring to each of his many friends, male and female. He adds to these bequests, with great naïveté:

"Had I given rings to all the ladies who have honored me with their correspondence, and whom I sincerely venerate for their amiable qualities, it would, even in this last solemn act, appear like ostentation."

We close these sketches of the old booksellers with a brief notice of the famous publishers, Cadell and Strahan.

In 1776 Hume wrote to Mr. William Strahan: "There will no books of reputation now be printed in London but through your hands and Mr. Cadell's." Strahan was a poor boy from Scotland, who had worked his way to opulence as a printer, and had obtained a share of the patent as the King's printer, and was extensively associated with Cadell in the purchase of copyrights. It was their good fortune to have their names upon the title-pages of most of the great works of their day, and to have the ephemeral fame of the bookseller preserved amidst many revolutions of literary fashion in the durable lustre of Gibbon, Robertson, Adam Smith, and Blackstone.

There is little opportunity to season with the salt of anecdote the dry details of the commerce of literature as represented by this house, but we gather some details of interest respecting the famous work of Gibbon and his relations with his publishers. Hume made the remark, quoted above, upon receiving a presentation copy of the first volume of Gibbon's History, and he has told us a little of the circumstances of its publication. He was then in Parliament. He says:

"The volume of my History, which had been somewhat delayed by the novelty and tumult of a first session, was now ready for the press. After the perilous adventure had been declined by my friend Mr. Elmsley, I agreed upon easy terms with Mr. Thomas Cadell, a respectable bookseller, and Mr. William Strahan, an eminent printer; and they undertook the care and risk of the publication, which derived more credit from the name of the shop than from that of the author. The last revisal of the proofs was submitted to my vigilance; and many blemishes of style, which had been invisible in the manuscript, were discovered and corrected in the printed sheet. So moderate were our hopes that the original impression had been stinted to five hundred, till the number was doubled by the prophetic taste of Mr. Strahan. . . . I am at a loss how to describe the success of the work without betraying the vanity of the writer. The first impression was exhausted in a few days; a second and third edition were scarcely adequate to the demand; and the bookseller's property was twice invaded by the pirates of Dublin. My book was on every table, and almost on every toilet; the historian was crowned by the taste of fashion of the day; nor was the general voice disturbed by the barking of any profane critic. The favor of mankind is most freely bestowed on a new acquaintance of any original merit; and the mutual surprise of the public and their favorite is productive of those warm sensibilities which at a second meeting can no longer be re-kindled. If I listened to the music of praise, I was more seriously satisfied with the approbation of my judges. The candor of Dr. Robertson embraced his disciple. A letter from Mr. Hume overpaid the labor of ten years; but I have never presumed to accept a place in the triumvirate of British historians."

Ninety years have established Gibbon as far the greatest of that triumvirate. The writer of "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" had no cause to be dissatisfied with the dealings of his publishers. A thousand copies were printed of the first edition. Of the second he writes: "The fifteen hundred copies are moving off with decent speed, and the obliging Cadell begins to mutter something of a third edition for next year." The second volume had not then appeared. There is a document extant, presented by the publishers to the author:

"State of the Account of Mr. Gibbon's 'Roman Empire,' Third Edition. 1st Vol. No. 1909. April 3rd, 1777.

There is certainly food for reflection and opportunity for comparison between the relative receipts of authors and publishers then and now in this schedule. The book was finished in 1788 by the publication of the fourth quarto volume. Of this event Gibbon writes:

"The impression of the fourth volume had consumed three months. Our common interest required that we should move with a quicker pace; and Mr. Strahan fulfilled his engagement—which few printers could sustain—of delivering every week three thousand copies of nine sheets. The day of publication was however delayed, that it might coincide with the fifty-first anniversary of my own birthday; the double festival was celebrated by a cheerful literary dinner at Mr. Cadell's house; and I seemed to blush while they read an elegant compliment from Mr. Hayley."

Gibbon does not mention who were the guests. Strahan had died in 1785. Garrick thought Strahan "an obtuse man," but Johnson asserted the printer's claim to a discriminating judgment even in the matter of an epigram. The author and the printer were near neighbors. The King's Printing Office was close to Johnson's House in Gough Square. Boswell has a pleasing anecdote arising out of this propinquity:

"Mr. Strahan had taken a poor boy from the country as an apprentice, upon Johnson's recommendation. Johnson having inquired after him, said, 'Mr. Strahan, let me have five guineas on account, and I'll give this boy one. Nay, if a man recommends a boy, and does nothing for him, it is sad work. Call him down.' I followed him into the court-yard behind Mr. Strahan's house, and there I had a proof of what I heard him profess, that he talked alike to all. 'Some people tell you that they let themselves down to the capacity of their hearers. I never do that: I speak uniformly in as intelligible a manner as I can.' 'Well, my boy, how do you go on?' 'Pretty well, Sir; but they are afraid I ain't strong enough for some parts of the business.' JOHNSON. 'Why, I shall be sorry for it; for when you consider with how little mental power and corporeal labor a printer can get a guinea a week, it is a very desirable occupation for you. Do you hear? Take all the pains you can; and if this does not do we must think of some other way of life for you. There's a guinea.'"

THE DIARY OF A PRECIOUS FOOL.

February 14, 1865.—Dear me, how dull and rainy it is for St. Valentine's Day! No sign of clearing, no hope of any one coming to call—if it were only New-Year's Day instead! I had twenty visitors last New Year, and He was one of them—nonsense, I mean that Mr. Thistle brought me the loveliest bouquet of white japonicas and purple hyacinths; but I'd far rather have the bunch of bloodroots He gathered for me last spring: somehow a clover-leaf from His hand is more precious than—there it is again; I don't see what possesses me to be always recurring to Him, when I want to put him altogether out of my view—no; do I, though? when I know that I ought not allow my mind to dwell upon him an instant, when Aunt Sophia has told me over and over again how much better parti Mr. Thistle would be, if one could only make up one's mind to be called Mrs. Thistle; it certainly would require a great deal of courage, but I must try. Aunt Sophia says I must, and she is law and gospel, for she might turn me out of house and home any hour if I didn't trim my sails to catch her trade-winds.

Oh, if Alick only had Mr. Thistle's check-book, and Mr. Thistle had a wife! There it is again; I don't believe I shall ever marry; besides, I'm becoming as mercenary as Bella Wilfer. I wish Mr. Thistle was in—no, not the Red Sea, nor Purgatory, that I know of, because he is an amusement at least, and I dare say I shall be worried into marrying him at last; but I do wish he was in love with Julia, and then there would be an end of temptation and all that.

Well, I suppose not even Mr. Thistle will venture out to-day, even he would be an agreeable variation of Aunt Sophia's commonplaces and Julia's sals, and as for any one else—bark! There's the bell now; it may be Valentines or invitations—however, I'll just open my door and look over the balusters a second.

I confess that Aunt Sophia is the most provoking of mortals; I feel like giving her just such a shake and box on the ear as she used to administer to me before I put on long dresses, when I only muddled my puddies and wore out my shoes, and now that I wear out her patience daily with my obstinacy and frivolity, as she says, she merely whips me over other people's shoulders, and makes me shake in my shoes at times. But this is not to the point; when I reached the balusters the caller had vanished, and only Aunt Sophia was visible, ascending the staircase.

"Was that any one for me?" I asked.

"For you, child! Why, how is this? I sent word that you were taking a nap."

"How could you, Aunt Sophia, when you know that I never take naps in the daytime?"

"Dear no, not as a usual thing; but you complained at breakfast of not having slept well, and I advised you to lie down, and fairly presumed that you had obeyed."

"But you might have sent Bessy up; it is too bad not to see friends who call in such weather."

She turned about at her door and favored me with such a sardonic glance.

"I didn't suppose you were so particular about seeing Mr. Thistle," said she.

"Mr. Thistle?" I cried, dropping my ire like a red-hot coal. "Was it he?"

But she closed her door without replying, and coming back into my own room to look out at the window, who should I see but Alick Treburne just turning the opposite corner, with the wind turning his umbrella inside out, at the same time. And if it had been Mr. Thistle I know very well that she would have awakened me, even had I fallen into the long last sleep, if possible. However, my only wonder is, that she doesn't forbid Alick the house, seeing that he is so in her way. I am sure she is capable of it, if it would serve her purpose.

February 19.—Duller than a dungeon. Julia reading Buckle aloud, and Aunt Sophia dozing off and starting up every little while to say,

"Ah, that's fine!" "That's just my view of it!" "How wide awake he is!" which is a great deal more than can be said of herself. I can't endure to hear one read aloud—at least only one; when Alick reads "Pippa Passes," it is just like an adagio of Beethoven's. Besides, I promised him to practice the accompaniment to "County Guy," so that we might sing it together; but the piano is locked and the key in Aunt Sophia's pocket, and not till we have droned through twenty-five pages of Civilization—oh dear, if Julia hasn't finished her portion already, and, willy-nilly, I must "buckle to!"

February 21.—Some one said to me recently, "How fortunate it is that you have such a jewel of an aunt!" I didn't tell her that it was paste. "And what a dear girl Julia is!" nor that she cost me many a pang.

A bouquet was left at the door before breakfast this morning, for Miss Marx; of course Bessy put it into my plate; when I came down I placed it in a vase of water, and in order to be generous allowed it to remain on the table. By-and-by the "dear girl comes in, pulls out a rose for her bosom, snaps a leaf on her forehead, and eats her breakfast. I feel delicate about taking it away till every one has finished, so I glance at the Daily and look out at the window, and presently the "dear girl" pushes back her chair, seizes the bouquet, and strikes for the parlor.

"What are you going to do?" I ask, in consternation.

"Analyze some of my flowers."

"Your flowers!"

"Yes, my flowers, if you please."

"They belong to me, if you please."

"Mamma, to whom was this bouquet sent?"

"To Miss Marx."

"Am I not Miss Marx?"

"Certainly, my love."

"Then by strict logic isn't it mine?"

"Without a doubt."

"Oh, a Daniel come to judgment!" I can't help saying. "And in the mean while, who am I?"

"You are a young person who is impertinent to her benefactor, and who has lost her temper."

"And her bouquet, it seems."

Altogether, it was so ridiculous that I could have laughed if I hadn't been too angry.

But the end was yet to come. Toward luncheon Mr. Thistle appeared; he is one of those people who never make a present without making comments about it at some other time: I've known quantities of such. "Those gloves fitted you to a T; they were a size too large for my hand, but they are of the very best quality; Smith and Company imported them direct;" or, "I am glad you found that veil serviceable—they are worn considerably."

Hardly had Mr. Thistle entered before the flowers fixed his eye.

"Ah, so you received your bouquet this morning? I was afraid there might be some delay, there were so many orders for the ball to-morrow; I selected them myself, and I wish to call your attention to a singular orchid, an air-plant," and he bent in search of it, but Julia was beforehand with him; she had analyzed it.

"Did you send me a bouquet, Mr. Thistle?" I asked. "Thank you; but that is Julia's."

I never saw two people in greater perplexity, and I never enjoyed any thing more—only a few things—I was just malicious enough for that.

"There has been some mistake," said Aunt Sophia, pushing it across the table to me; "it was left here this morning for Miss Marx, and I presumed Mr. Trehurne had sent it for Julia."

That was just her disagreeable way for leaving Mr. Thistle to infer that Alick admires Julia. Of course I didn't care a bit about the flowers when I found they weren't from Alick, though they were sweet and rare enough to be liked for themselves; but I might have known he couldn't afford to throw away his money on orchids and passion-flowers.

February 22.—Well, I shall not go to the ball to-night. Only last week Hugh Mason put his foot through my best muslin dress, in the German, and I spilled wine on my ribbons. To be sure, I darned the rent with number ninety, and so nicely that Alick said it was the prettiest embroidery he had seen; but Aunt Sophia calls it a "perfect fright, although it cost nine shillings more than Julia's, and was made up a month later."

I wish I had been born a sewing-girl, up five flights, living on porridge and potatoes, and thanking no one for my gowns and gewgaws. If I only had some knack at something! I might teach if I knew any thing; Mr. Thistle says I can sing—Julia calls it squealing—and Alick says I have an eye for colors; however, all that doesn't make me independent, nor send me to the ball. The hairdresser has just arrived to friz Julia's hair. Dear, dear, how melancholy it is to stay at home for a little tear in your dress!"

February 23.—If I haven't received a broadside this morning! I am "a worthless scapegrace," "a person of unheard-of improprieties," and "underhand measures." Probably I shall never hear the end of it; for after Aunt Sophia and Julia had been gone, perhaps an hour, and I had put up at "The Way-side Inn," with "Vanity Fair" in reserve, and my feet on the fender, a coach rattled up the avenue like a Fury, and presently Alick Trehurne was shown in.

"You're not at the ball," said he.

"You didn't see me there, did you?"

"You're not going?"

"It certainly looks like that."

"Then I shall stay here."

"I sha'n't object; only you're losing the music and the partners, and keeping the coach waiting."

"Let the coach go to grass."

"The horses, you mean."

"Come now, I want to know why you're not going? You promised me the first gallop; I'm not disposed to release you; and Mr. Thistle has you down for who knows how many redowa, polka, and what not. There's a hall decorated like a garden, an orchestra that lends wings to your feet, and here am I in a new suit, ready to sing 'Heigh-ho! to the best dancing-hall in the city,' and there we are."

"Why don't you sing it then?"

"You haven't pitched it."

"What's the time?"

"Double-quick."

"It's all very good fun, Alick, but I can't go, you see."

"That is just what I can't see."

"Then know that I have nothing to wear."

"Deplorable! Where's the embroidered muslin?"

"Aunt Sophia says the darn will show."

"Aunt Sophia isn't equal to the exigencies of life; bring it on, we will look as fine as a fiddle before midnight."

So I brought it down; I didn't need much urging; and he directed me how to trim it with flowers and leaves off my own plants—thanks to Mrs. Cordis, who gave them to me before she went to sea with the Captain. Alick said he saw a muslin dress, at the Prince of Wales' ball in Montreal, trimmed in the same manner—a narrow festooning of myrtle-leaves running around the skirt, about quarter of a yard from the bottom, like a vine, and dropping at intervals a spray of crimson fuschias; so there we sat, Alick planning like a milliner and I executing like a machine, and the laughter and frolic we had over it, fancying him making his fortune in this line, and I charging him with being eager for my presence at the ball, merely as a dancing advertisement. But by-and-by it was all finished, and I had it on in a jiffy, and came down to meet Alick, and no one would ever have suspected that there were several dreadful darns under those beautiful clusters of fuschia-bells—never in the world; it was perfectly lovely, and off we went to the ball like Cinderella. All the girls were ecstatic over my attire, and Aunt Sophia's amazement and efforts to conceal it were too ludicrous; but directly after supper she gathered up her wits, called her carriage, and carried Julia off without saying a word to me! Alick took me home later, in fear and trembling, but every one was in bed, and the house dark as a pocket, except for a blue glimmer of gas in the back drawing-room.

"You are pale as any ghost," said Alick, turning up the gas.

"You don't know what it is to live under the thumb of an ogre." He turned his shining eyes upon me; I thought he was going to say something, but he did not speak.

"I wish I was an opera dancer, living on pirouettes," I continued.

He looked so serious upon that that I asked what he was thinking about.

"I was thinking," said he, "that I knew a charm against discontent."

"Shall I cross your palm?"

"You haven't any silver."

"Won't the charm work then?"

"Try it."

"A charm against discontent? I don't know any but change of fortune."

"Believe in whatever place you are that is the one you were intended to fill, for which you are best fitted. That is all."

"So you would not seek good fortune?"

"What is the need? If it belongs to you it will find you out, never fear. If it is not yours all the search in the world would not bring it to light."

"Then if I'm sold into slavery I must not run away because some one will grant me my freedom in course of time."

"Are you in danger of that? You're not to attempt some rash measure to improve your condition, and stick fast in the swamps with starvation before you and the hound behind, but wait for the proclamation. To put it, à la Professor Blot, you're not to jump out of the frying-pan into the fire."

Then I knew he was thinking of Mr. Thistle.

"Oh well, if I'm a beggar I'm not going to work, because presently the Rothschilds will send a check."

"I didn't say so: whatsoever your hands find to do, do it with all your might, and blossom into success as the rose blossoms by natural impulsion, instead of grappling fortune by the throat and crying, 'Stand and deliver!' like a highwayman."

After which homily we parted. But Aunt Sophia never meant to let me off so cannily, and this morning she came down upon me like "the wolf on the fold," the wehr-wolf, so that my feelings are positively black and blue. I was received with the assurance that I made a precious fool of myself last night, and that every one present was struck dumb with my figurative attire; it struck me that it might be convenient to keep it for a home dress if it would effect such happy results. I said nothing till she came to the ogre part, for plainly some one had listened; then I merely inquired, "Eaves-droppers?" Upon which Aunt Sophia swept across the room like a simoon, seized me by the shoulders, and gave me such a shaking that my head rings this minute; then she dismissed me to my room, not to appear until I had acquired a more Christian spirit, and Julia giggled. Oh, if I might never go down to break her bitter bread again! If I were only a girl of genius and ideas, knew what to do for a living, and how to do it; but I am only a precious fool, as Aunt Sophia is so kind as to inform me every week of my life, who doesn't know her own mind ten minutes at a time, for no sooner do I resolve to accept Mr. Thistle, and have done with all this, but some glance, some word, some nameless grace of Alick's carries all before it. Why will not some one lift me out of this dilemma, decide for, whether to marry the persistent Thistle and have "A coach for to ride in,

A house for to bide in,
And flunkies to tend me wherever I go;"

or to endure this tempest-in-a-tea-pot life until—

March 2.—Mr. Thistle came yesterday to take us to a matinée, but I escaped, thanks to a fine headache; only the funniest thing happened; shortly after they were gone Alick rang—I can always tell his ring—and before I had reached the drawing-room my headache had disappeared. Of course I accused him of being an enchanter.

"I wish I was," said he.

"What would you do first?"

"Induce the Calif of Bagdad to send you a fortune in a jewel."

"Go on."

"And a lover not quite a beggar."

"Go on, Sir."

"And a heart to give him."

"Go on, Mr. Trehurne."

"The good genius never grants but three wishes at a summons; now I will vanish, only put on your bonnet, and we will go together into genii-land."

And as the pain in my head had quite gone, I thought there was no harm in going too. So we went off to his studio, where he showed me some rare engravings and three oil paintings of great value, one of them a veritable Old Master—a smiling face which seemed to say, "I could weep, but I have no tears."

"You will look like that when your heart is broken," said Alick.

"I don't ever mean to have my heart broken," said I.

"Then perhaps you mean to break some one else's."

"But whose are they?" I asked, thinking, certainly, that they were there on exhibition.

"They are mine," he returned; "a legacy from my great-uncle Deyfer, who died last January."

"Oh, Alick, how very kind of him! But wasn't he wealthy?"

"He had some property," turning to adjust a light.

"And why couldn't he have left you some money?"

"He left me what he thought would please me;" and what a tender light shone from his eyes as he told me of this uncle, who had rescued him from uncongenial pursuits, given him masters, and sent him abroad, and had now bequeathed him these gems of art!

"Are they not much better than fine houses and horses—than bank-stock or bullion?"

I was forced to confess that they suited him better. But we hung over them so long, finding something to praise and enjoy in every stroke; some effect hitherto unheeded; some touch which pointed the whole, that before we were aware it was already past dinner-time, though I had intended to be at home before Aunt Sophia: so we dined together at Montana's on birds, grapes, and Muscatel wine. I am afraid it was a great extravagance of Alick's, but he said that he was as rich as Croesus just then. Some nabob must have bought his last picture.

When we reached home they were all there, Julia singing "Robin Adair," and Mr. Thistle looking melancholy.

"Indeed," said Aunt Sophia, "we didn't know but you were kidnapped."

"My head ceased aching, and I thought the air would do me good," I replied.

"Humbug," said the sententious Julia; and as for Mr. Thistle, he didn't speak to me the whole evening, and I never saw him appear to better advantage.

March 10.—I heard Aunt Sophia tell the servants this morning that whenever Mr. Trehurne called the ladies were not at home. It is very true. I am not at home; I am in Bedlam!

March 12.—Yesterday Alick called twice; no one was at home. But they got their "come-upance," as the cook says to the chimney when it smokes. This morning Julia and I went shopping, and not two squares off we encountered Alick. "Well met," said he; "I didn't know but you had taken French leave. I stopped twice at Mrs. Marx's yesterday, and you were all in the vocative." "Yesterday," said I, appearing to consider—"yesterday, why I never left the house all day; neither did Julia."

Julia colored up to the roots of her hair.

"Are you certain it was yesterday?" quoth she.

"Oh yes, indeed," he answered her. "One of those little hand-screens, such as you admired so rapturously, came into my possession lately, and I brought it up for you. After all you might not have cared for it; it came from over the sea, and belonged to a century dead and buried."

"Oh, thank you, indeed I should!" said Julia, who dotes on antiquities, if they're fashionable.

"Don't thank me, please. Not being able to find you, I carried it into a store in order to replace the tassels and ribbons by which it hung when not in use, and being so thoughtless as to lay it down while I took out my purse, some one made love to it. The store was brimming with customers; it was in vain to seek it."

We told Aunt Sophia on our return, and she looked daggers.

March 15.—Alick called. We were all at home, thanks to the hand-screen. Mr. Thistle sent a box of French bon-bons; to sweeten my regard, Julia thinks.

March 30.—Aunt Sophia says these are my halcyon days. Alas! Alick is out of town.

April 9.—Dismal and showery. I should think the robin's nest in that rowan-tree opposite my window must be filled with water; whenever the weather brightens a little the mate commences to gush out with a trill sounding for all the world like:

"Rain, rain, go away;
Come again another day."

On such days one needs a little love. Tried to read the "Dead Secret," but it made me nervous; began a waltz of Strauss's, it made me melancholy; attempted singing, and Aunt Sophia commanded silence. "How happy the life of a bird must be!"

April 10.—Mr. Thistle says it has set in for a three-days' storm. I was afraid he had set in for a three-hours' stay. A letter from Alick made a rent in the clouds.

April 17.—April smiles, and Spring asserts herself.

"Only my love's away!

I'd as lief the blue were gray."

I didn't know it was possible to miss him so. What if he should never return? What if I should miss him forever? Could I live? Torturing thought!

June 8.—Alick and June came in together; enough for one day, but not all. I am engaged to Alick! It seems to me that all my life long this month will wear an aureole! I have asked him to keep it private for the present, because Aunt Sophia would make every thing so uncomfortable; but I fancy that already she suspects something. Nothing escapes her. I can not look out at the window but she wishes to know who I expect, nor smile to myself—and, prithee, what so natural—but she would pry into the motive, nor write a note but she wonders if my correspondence has increased. By-the-way, I was writing to poor Mrs. Cordis, who has come home without the Captain. I couldn't make up my mind to go and see her to-day, my happiness would contrast so sadly with her widow's weeds; and how could I repress it? be other than I am? Did I once believe I could forget him? that I could go through life without him? How vain a thought! He is to me what perfume is to the flower; without him I am incomplete.

July 20.—Not a word for my diary since the 8th of June! That speaks for itself; it requires no commentary. The days have hurried like a delightful dream; the days that had used to be so long and lagging, so full of taunts and tears; not that Aunt Sophia has forgotten her cunning, not by any means that. Will joy last? Can bliss endure this side heaven?

August 31.—My happiness goes out with the summer-tide. It was a blossom too fragile to survive the touch of early frosts; and yet—and yet Alick is true; he has not forsaken me. Great Heavens, it is I who have forsaken him! Yes, here we must languish, each at our opposite pole of agony, never to approach nearer!

Did I boast one day that time had borrowed wings for my sake? Oh, it was a delirious boast! I would it had dallied on its way instead; then, perhaps, heaven-on-earth might still be possible for a little while.

How I hate to recall that day, not a week since, when, going into the drawing-room gay and light-hearted, Aunt Sophia questioned me:

"Does a gentleman address a lady to whom he is not engaged as 'My dearest love'?"

"I should think not," I returned.

"Then are you engaged to Trehurne?"

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Rather, what does this mean?" she cried, unfolding a note intended for me—for Alick was away—but which had fallen into Julia's hands through mistake.

"It means," said I, boldly, "that honor is not among your virtues," for I was angry then.

"Listen," she resumed; "we will see what is among yours. Last January Alick Trehurne's great-uncle died, leaving him a fortune."

"I never heard of it."

"No, and for a good reason. You have noticed, perhaps, that his expenses have increased of late; that he has been lavish of gifts and gold—of course I mean currency, we will say gold for the sake of the alliteration. His coat had used to be a trifle shabby, white along the seams and all that, you know; his hat sometimes went begging for a little nap; he has even dined here with a patch on his boot. Now you must allow that all this is changed; what is there to account for it? Certainly not his success in Art, though that is considerable; and then, besides, I have it from the executors of the will, of whom my step-brother was one!"

I am ashamed to confess that already I was more than pleased. I saw speedy deliverance from this donjon-keep, my home. Perhaps my face told tales, for she smiled fiendishly, and continued:

"But the story is only half told—there is a sequel, an appendix, a what-you-will. This uncle was an eccentric fellow, it seems—a person of whims and opinions; he had made his money dollar by dollar, he knew what a slave one is without it—so he affixed a condition to his generous bequest;" and she paused, maliciously, to enjoy my curiosity.

"It was an odd condition; if I had money to leave I would leave it unhampered or not at all. However, it seems like an interposition of Fate to save you from the demoralizing effects of wealth. This fortune that places Trehurne at ease, free to follow the dictates of genius, he forfeits upon the day in which he weds a dowless bride. That is all. Marry him, my child, and ruin him, cramp his energies, fetter his aspirations, doom him to perpetual servitude."

I do not know what I replied to her, if any thing, only to my faithful diary can I trust the hurt I have received; that henceforth I must be a stranger to Alick; that I must see him no more; that if I were to indulge myself in one last interview he would break down all my resolves and I should be his ruin. Ruin! I did not comprehend the word before. I have used it often without reflection. Last night he came, but I did not see him. I hid myself. I could not endure to send him a false message. I hid myself, when I was aching to go down and speak to him once more, to look at him. But I have written him. I have said, "I love you, but I leave you;" and I have sealed it, and in so doing I have sealed my fate: I have put a great barrier between myself and happiness. Now all that remains for me is to bid this place adieu, where I have suffered and enjoyed so much. Its familiar aspect would pierce me to the heart daily, make my wounds bleed every hour; besides, it would be dangerous for Alick. I must remove myself far from him that he may go on to fortune and fame unhampered and unharmed; and years hence, when he has quite forgotten me, I may perhaps clear myself in his eyes. And to what might not this hateful dependence sting me? Oh, let me go now while I have strength!

My preparations are soon made. I shall take only the letters he has written me, my diary, and a few clothes in a valise. I do not wish to be cumbered. I have some money in my purse that must last till I earn more. If any thing could interest me I should be curious about this new life that I go to lead; but instead, I feel like a suicide.

Ah, when we might have been so happy!

It seems to me that I hear some one singing—

"Never any more, while I live,
Can I hope to see his face,
As before."

I will close my window, it might make me to waver; we have sung it together so much.

In half an hour the night-train will take me up. The clocks are striking eleven. I have opened my door and listened—the house is silent as a tomb but closer than a furnace. I did not know the night was half so sultry. As for me, I am cold and trembling.

Good-by, Alick. If I loved you less I could not say it. Good-by, alas!

April 20, 1866.—When I turn back to the date last recorded here, I seem to have grown older by centuries instead of months; Fate shifted the scenes so unexpectedly, showed me the sharp edges of the abyss, made so to grate upon my ears the gates of despair, that, whenever one season recurs to me, one hour that comprehended eternity, I lose sanity, I experience an anguish too terrible to remember.

On the disastrous night, when, heart-sick and trembling with an uncertain dread, I crept out under the free heavens alone, the night-train was just signaling approach, while its trail of gray smoke floated slowly across the sky like shapes of genii, bringing dreams to slumbering mortals. I recollect turning back to gaze once more at the home I had left before passing out of sight. There it stood, white and massive, nothing stirring about it but the scented summer wind, and perhaps a fire-fly flashing across a pane; or stay, was it indeed a dim light visible in one of the lower rooms? I had awakened some one; the rustle of my skirts had betrayed me. I was already missed—they were making haste to pursue? Alas! how all things hinge on egotism when grief points it. Oh, had I delayed a little, forgotten my role an instant, been shaken by irresolution and turned back; but I was bent upon sacrifice, and so the victim was not myself but another! Was self-will punished? Was it that, choosing the wrong clew in the tangled skein, fresh troubles ensued?

The train paused a moment and then went thundering on with me—on and on till it seemed as if steam were a myth, and only the eager impulses of my own heart urged me forward on this impetuous flight.

Across what miles of desolate, perfumed fields we sped, like a bitter thought! Through what rare woodland solitudes, along the brink of what profound chasms, above what angry currents, the echoes of our signals threading off into infinite space, the notes of a grand, descending scale capable of perfect melody! All my thoughts were tumult, all my plans vapor. I tried to think of Alick, as if I had never known him too well—as one I might have loved had fortune pleased. I tried to sketch out some chart of my future existence; but every thing appeared to fly by me, like the trees and hedges of the country-side. I could catch at no salient point; I, and every thing about me, seemed floating, formless—more of cloud than of earth; more of dream than reality.

It grew toward a damp, cloudy morning. The passengers we took up had not fairly given in to the fact of daybreak, but wore expressions of settled despondency, as if they had caught the infection from myself. I remember some one saying, "There must have been a great fire somewhere last night by the red glare in the north."

"Aurora, my dear fellow! don't engage in incendiarism, pray," was the ready reply; and, except for these two remarks, none of the various comments which travelers lavish attached themselves to my memory, and before I reached the metropolis I could not have told whether I had dreamed or heard even these. What was it to me? I had nothing to lose by fire or flood. I had already lost. The wrecked need fear no thief.

What a roar rung out from the city, deepening as we swung into the dark and crowded dépôt! What a mist of faces every where! How cold it was—how dreary—and yet but yesterday it had been summer-time!

Oh, remorseless gulf between yesterday and to-day! can no love overleap you?

I expected to obtain copying from a lawyer, who I knew had transacted business for my father, and I directed my steps toward his office; but he was engaged, would see me later, so I returned to my lodgings to rest a little. I must have slept some hours, for when I next found my way into the thoroughfares the news-boys were crying the evening papers. Other noises confused me. I could only catch a broken sentence here and there: "Great fire in —!" "Heroic conduct of a young —!" "Lady buried in the ruins!" How dreadful! I thought, and stopped to listen. Just then a boy passed at my elbow: "Have a paper, Miss? Great fire! Rowan Square destroyed!"

Rowan Square! I could scarcely wait to wrench it from his hand before my eyes caught at words that thrilled the blood to my finger-tips, and sent it soaring in blinding flashes to my brain. To the latest day I live I think I shall ever remember that paragraph.

"The fire in Rowan Square broke out between twelve and one o'clock, in the house occupied by Mrs. Marx and family, all of whom escaped, with the exception of a niece who slept in the wing, and is supposed to have perished. Mr. Trehurne, in attempting to rescue this unfortunate young lady from the burning building, fell with a portion of it and received such injuries that his life is despaired of."

Mr. Trehurne—that was Alick.

I read no further; all the world grew black as night, and turned on one relentless pivot; Alick was dying! Then it could no longer harm him if I returned to him. Return! Not a moment's delay. Oh, why had I ever left him! Had I feared poverty and the loss of ease for him! Oh, fool and blind, when poverty is the pedestal of genius, and idleness the disease of great souls!

I remember the miles and miles of solitary country across which we seemed to creep, whose sweet breath fevered me—whose wide loneliness afflicted me like a grave, long green and sunken; I remember passengers who talked among themselves of the late frightful fire at —, and passed on to the politics of the day, the rise in gold, the thermometer, and other matters. It meant little to them, only an incident of the hour, an item already stale, while to me it meant, perhaps, an empty life. I remember the startled gaze and shrinking of people in the streets, as if a ghost had passed by. I remember all these things vaguely, as if I had been told them, or suffered them in some abnormal state, for I understood nothing clearly till I saw Him.

My God! was that scarred and crippled form Alick's? That pained and writhing frame? That seared brow? That wandering brain?

And this for me!

When I think of it tears drown my sight and choke my speech—the tears that would not flow when doubt darkened my horizon. When I think of it I become dearer to myself. I am the free purchase of a devoted heart, of sufferings unutterable, of beauty defaced, of strength defied—perhaps of a career sacrificed.

Ah, if I had been worth the price!

Through what leaden days I struggled with terror! through what inexorable nights! What black despair encompassed me, like a legion of threatening phantoms! what bitter regrets swept me like the whirlwind! for in his delirium he was always seeking me, always making the perilous ascent; groping for me with his poor, faithful hands, calling me in such wild, appealing tones.

The doctors feared the shock of my presence for him, but I—I knew better. When he called, I answered; that soothed him, and he fell asleep with his swathed hand grasping my own, and woke refreshed. He had found me. The assurance that I was not lost beneath that blackened pile reached, somehow, his enfeebled perceptions, struck out a spark of sweet intelligence, till slowly his brain swung back into the old ruts of reason, but not in a day nor a week.

Oh, that glad morning when he awoke and, smiling, said:

"I have been oppressed with such a hateful nightmare, love!" And I hid my face in the pillow and could not reply, and the doctors came and declared I had saved him, and the world suddenly grew light and jocund.

It was worth while to have endured something in order to arrive at such a break of day—a morning flushed with the radiance of hope. Hope! They who pass a lifetime in an atmosphere of repose, tortured by no pursuing fears, afflicted by no treacherous uncertainties, do not know the word. It is a delightful prism, captivating by a thousand beautiful illusions, but which the ignorant mistake for a bit of broken glass; and, indeed, if these sojourners in a perpetual calm held Aladdin's Lamp itself, they would need to think twice before rubbing it. Hope is the solace of aching souls, the palace of the mendicant, the life-boat of the shipwrecked, the asylum of the wretched.

Alick's wounds healed slowly; for weeks he was feebler than a child, the merest echo of himself; he who had been so strong, whose matchless health spoke in each trifling movement, in the flashing eye, the glowing cheek, the buoyant tread, the imperious tone—but he will never walk again unaided. Here he lies slumbering beside me—a face paler than nun's behind a grate; his brows bound with a burning band—a coronet time will hardly efface; his hand clutching the crutch he never dreamed of needing. To-day he was wheeled into the garden, because spring is in earnest, and though he said nothing, I knew that he longed to look at the world outside. There we watched the robins build, singing at their work, while the grass seemed to grow under our feet.

May 1.—We are still at Mrs. Cordis's. Dear soul, she had Alick brought here at the beginning, because she loved us; and here she says I shall stay till I go to Mrs. Trehurne's.

Mrs. Trehurne. How strangely it looks! I told Alick that I "didn't believe there was no such person," and he said she would arrive the first day in June, and "would she be contented with such a broken reed as himself?" and, "Oh, Alick," I answered him, "she will be the happiest woman in all the land, only—"

"Only what?"

"She will be your ruin."

"Ah, I expect that; but how in particular?"

"Oh, Alick! why do you ask? I have not a penny. Marry me, and lose your fortune."

"My fortune! What do you know about it, little witch? I had intended to keep it secret for a wedding present. I wanted to be certain that no circumstance of fortune could alienate you, that you were my own in spite of poverty, and—must I confess it?—in spite of Mr. Thistle.”

“But this does not prevent you from ruin, my Lord of Burleigh.”

“Ruin! I don’t understand you.”

“It is not like you to mislead me, Alick, about this thing. Aunt Sophia had it on good authority that your uncle’s property was conditional upon your marrying an heiress, or something of the sort.”

“And that was the lucky ticket-of-leave which preserved you from the flames. Thank Aunt Sophia for one fib, if no more. She has an unaccountable manner of perverting the letter and spirit of things. My copy of the will reads just the other way. Marry an heiress and I am lost. If you will be obliging enough to marry me it will be a capital speculation.”

“But it will disappoint Aunt Sophia,” said I.

“And perhaps Mr. Thistle,” said he.

May 12.—Aunt Sophia called this morning with Julia; she has lost considerably by the fire—I wonder if she thinks I set it. She did not invite me to return to her home, but asked Mrs. Cordis if it was true that I meant to make such a precious fool of myself as to marry Trehurne.

“It’s the money, depend upon it,” was her flattering conclusion; “but then she always was a little silly, you know.”

Mrs. Cordis treated my affectionate relative to a piece of her mind—a generous piece, no doubt.

The first of June is my wedding-day.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROPERLY regarded, the advertising columns of a newspaper are among the most important, for no man really becomes acquainted even with the news of the day until he has thoroughly perused the advertisements. They are the pulse of commerce and universal activity. They contain not only rare specimens of human idiosyncrasies, but afford a general view of life in every possible phase. They aid the arts and sciences; they minister to love; they speak of change; sometimes they excite a smile, sometimes a tear. To the sick man they promise health; to the poor man they offer wealth; the pleasure-seeker is posted in amusements; the book-buyer learns the title and price of the last new work; the house-hunter reads of a desirable and eligible tenement for “a family without children;” the traveler of the best means of conveyance; the unemployed of employment; in fine, every imaginable want is supposititiously supplied by the advertising department of a daily newspaper.

Different theories may be held on the art and science of advertising. This paper, however, will neither advocate old ones nor advance any thing new. Its design is rather to illustrate history by some of the curiosities of advertising, and to show how many secrets of social and commercial life are locked up in a column of advertisements which by some people is never read.

It would be gratifying to the curious to be made acquainted with the real origin of newspaper advertisements. We believe it to be wrapped in obscurity, so numerous are the versions that have been given. The latest we have seen is by an Englishman, who has been overhauling the back files of the English newspapers preserved in the British Museum and elsewhere. He claims to have discovered that the earliest advertisement published in the English language was the offer of a reward for the recovery of a “piebald nag,” inserted in The Moderate (a London newspaper), March 27, 1649, about two months after the execution of Charles I. The same writer professes to give the origin of quack medicine proclamations. To one Mrs. Claudia Faber belongs the questionable honor of commencing it. She advertised an article called “Aurem Potabile”—doubtless some exhilarating cordial—in the London Gazette of 1682, and the court beauties of the “Merry Monarch’s” reign patronized the philter.

About the same time, also, the art of newspaper puffing seems to have been introduced. The origin of the word puff as applied to a newspaper article is French. In France, at one time, the head-dress most in vogue was called a pouff. It consisted of the hair raised as high as possible over horse-hair cushions, and then ornamented with objects indicative of the tastes and history of the wearer. For instance, the Duchesse d’Orleans, on her first appearance at Court, after the birth of a son and heir, had on her pouff a representation in gold and enamel, most beautifully executed, of a nursery; there was the cradle and the baby, the nurse, and a whole host of playthings. Madame d’Egmont, the Duc de Richelieu’s daughter, after her father had taken Port Mahon, wore on her pouff a little diamond fortress, with sentinels keeping guard—the sentinels, by means of mechanism, being made to walk up and down. This advertisement—the pouff—is the origin of the present word “puff” applied to the inflations of newspapers. Puffing commenced early, even before the word was thus used. In the reign of James II. a journal told the people that “about forty miles from London is a schoolmaster who has had such success with boys as there are almost forty ministers and schoolmasters that were his scholars.” Not very good grammar this, but in other respects very much like the announcements one sometimes sees, that certain Members of Congress, and men learned in law and divinity, will vouch for the excellence of some collegiate school, they or their sons “having been educated at that institution.” By-the-way, the schoolmaster who had such success with boys in the seventeenth century had a helpmate who deserves mention. “His wife,” says the penny-a-liner, “teaches girls lace-making, plain work, raising paste, sauces, and cookery to the degree of exactness.”

A few specimens of antique advertising may show that, while we have improved in orthography and punctuation, we have made scarcely any advance in the true art of advertising. The following proves that Isaac Punchard was "a man-of-all-work." His advertisement appeared in a paper published in Aylesham, County of Norfolk, England, in 1680, and read thus, verbatim et literatim:

By his Majesty's letters patent, Beards taken off and Registered by ISAAC PUNCHARD, Barber, Petrewig maker, Surgeon, Parish Clerk, Schoolmaster, Blacksmith & Man Midwife. I shaves for a penne, cuts hare for two pence, and oyld and Powdird in the bargane, young Ladies gently educated, lamps lited by the year or quarter, young Gentlemen also taut their Grammer language in the neatest manner & great keer takin of their marrels & Spelen. Also Salme Singing and Horce shewing by the reel makir, likewise maks & Mends all sorts of butes & shews, teaches the Ho boy and Jews harp, cuts corns, bledes & Blisters on the lowest terms. Cowtillions and other dances taut at hoim and abroad, also deals holesale & retail in Perfumery in all its branches, sells all sorts of Stashinary ware, together with blackin ball, Red herins, Gingerbread, Coles, Scrubbin brushes, treycle, mousetraps, & all other sweetmeats, Likewise God-father's cordial, red rutes, Tattoes, Sasnges, Black Puddins, and other Garden stuff.

N.B. Also Likewise, beware of Counterfeets for such is abroad.

Travelers between New York and Philadelphia will be not a little edified by the following, which appeared in Bradford's Philadelphia Mercury, March, 1732-3:

THIS is to give Notice unto Gentlemen, Merchants, Tradesmen, Travelers, and others that Solomon Smith and James Moore of Burlington keepeth two Stage Wagons, intending to go from Burlington to Amboy, and back from Amboy to Burlington again. Once every week or oft'er if that business presents. They have also a very good storehouse, very commodious for the storing of any sort of Merchants' Goods free from any charges, where good care will be taken of all sorts of Good.

One of the earliest poetical advertisements with which we have met appeared in the Philadelphia Gazette in 1746. Here it is:

Two handsome chairs
With very good geers,
With horses or without,
To carry friends about.

Likewise saddle horses, if gentlemen please,
To carry them handsomely, much at their ease.
Is to be hired by Abram Carpenter, cooper,
Well known as a very good cask-hooper.

Shows were "rayther skeere" in the olden times, and caterers had to make the most out of little. The copy of an advertisement which appeared in the New York Gazette, or Weekly Postboy, of November 22, 1756, will give the reader an idea of the show business in former days. Jonas Spœk must have been the Barnum of his day. Here is the curiosity:

TO BE SEEN, at the sign of the Golden Apple, at Peck's Slip, price sixpence, children four coppers, a large snake-skin, 21 feet long, and four feet one inch wide. It was killed by some of Gen. Braddock's men by firing six balls into him, close by the Allegheny Mountains, supposed to be coming down to feed on dead men. When it was killed, there was found in its belly a child, supposed to be four years old, together with a live dog! It had a horn on its tail seven inches long, and it ran as fast as a horse. All gentlemen and ladies desirous to see it may apply to the subscriber at Peck's Slip. JONAS SPœK.

There appear to have been women, even in the last century, who were able to take care of themselves and maintain their "rights;" that is, if we may judge from an advertisement which appeared in the Philadelphia Chronicle, February 8, 1760:

ANTHONY REDMAN, my inhuman husband, having advertised me to the world in the most odious light, justice to my character obliges me to take this method to deny his accusation, and to assure the public that his charges against me are without the least foundation in truth; and proceed, as I imagine, from the ill advice of his pretended friends, added to the wild chimeras of his own stupidly jealous and infatuated noddle. CATHERINE REDMAN.

By the advertisement which follows we are reminded of the fact that the first paper manufactory in Massachusetts was established at Milton by Captain John Boies. Previous to its establishment all paper was imported from England. The proprietor advertises in the Boston Gazette, March 9, 1767, as follows:

THE BELL CART will go through Boston before the end of next month, to collect rags for the paper mill at Milton, when all people that will encourage the paper manufactory may dispose of them. The best price will be given.

Then follow the names of various parties by whom the rags will be taken in, the advertisement closing with a poetical effusion:

"Rags are as beauties, which concealed lie,
But when in paper, how it charms the eye:
Pray, save rags, new beauties to discover,
For paper truly every one's a lover:
By the pen and press such knowledge is display'd,
As wouldn't exist, if paper was not made.
Wisdom of things, mysterious, divine,
Illustriously doth on paper shine."

One of the oddest advertisements of olden time, and apt to stir American patriotism, we gather, almost as a matter of course, from an Irish paper, the Londonderry Journal, of April 30, 1783:

WHEREAS, on February, the 14th, 1783, it pleased kind Providence to confer on Mathew Neely, of Barnally, Parish of Tanlaghtinglan, and County of Londonderry, a man child whose appearance is promising and amiable, and hopes the Being who caused him to exist will grant him grace. Also, in consideration and in remembrance of the many heroic deeds done by that universally renowned patriot, General Washington, the said Mathew Neely hath done himself the honor of calling the said man child by the name of George Washington Neely, he being the first child known or so called in this kingdom by the name of Washington, that brilliant western star.

The members of the dentistry "persuasion" may not be a little surprised to be informed of a fact concerning one of the pioneers in their profession. In the year 1784 an advertisement was published, wherein Dr. Le Mayeur, dentist, proposed to the citizens of Philadelphia to transplant teeth; stating therein, that he had successfully transplanted one hundred and twenty-three teeth in the preceding six months. At the same time, he offered two guineas for every tooth from "persons disposed to sell their front teeth, or any of them!" He was very successful in his operations, and realized a considerable fortune. This anecdote reminds us of an advertisement which appeared a few years ago in the Courrier de Sonne et Loire, of which the following is a translation. It is peculiarly French:

MONSIEUR AND MADAME CUILTER, Mechanical Dentists, inform the public that they are about to quit Chalons for their country house, and those patrons who intend according them their confidence will find in their new Eden of flowers every thing to satisfy their tastes. The apprehension usually raised by the sight of the instruments will disappear as by enchantment beneath the carpet of verdure of their delightful oasis.

The great social nuisance of "servant-galism" is not really of modern date, but troubled some of our ancestors; and by them, as by us, recourse was had to the press to correct some features of the evil. Here, for example, is an advertisement which appeared in the Providence (Rhode Island) Gazette of 1796:

FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.—Was mislaid, or taken away by mistake (soon after the formation of the Abolition Society), from the servant-girls of this town, all inclination to do any kind of work, and left in lieu thereof an impudent appearance, a strong and continued thirst for high wages, a gossiping disposition for every kind of amusement, a leering and hankering after persons of the other sex, a desire of finery and fashion, a never-ceasing trot after new places more advantageous for stealing, with a number of contingent accomplishments that do not suit the wearers. Now, if any person or persons will restore to the owners that degree of honesty and industry which has been for some time missing, he or they shall receive the above reward of Five Hundred Dollars, besides the warmest blessings of many abused householders.

The same paper, of November 19, same year, publishes the advertisement of a painstaking, industrious, and rhyming shoemaker. It is a fair contribution to the curiosities of newspaper literature:

It may be wise to advertise,
The work is now in hand,
He makes a heel, neat and genteel
As any in the land.
Court, block and stick, made quick and sleek
None equal in the State.
All those that view, may say 'tis true,
What I do here relate.
But to be short, another sort
Of heels, are called spring,
By John Smith made, this is his trade:
He served and learned at Lynn.
Truly 'tis said, these heels are made Within old Providence,
Sold by wholesale, or at retail,
One dozen for twelve pence.
The purchaser need go no further,
Only inquire of Bene Thurber,
And he can show you where to stop,
Because he lives close to my shop.
A bunch of grapes is Thurber's sign,
A shoe and boot is made on mine.
My shop doth stand in Bowen's Lane
And Jonathan Cady is my name.

The next week some brother poetaster addressed the following distich to the rhyming cobbler:

"TO MR. JONATHAN CADY.

"Make an end to your rhymes, close accounts with the past,
And take to your heels, and you'll speed well at last."

The Providence Gazette also published, in the form of an advertisement, a droll specimen of Yankee wit. The writer certainly deserved "a good run of custom:"

To be sold by Nicholas Branch, at his Refectory, west end of the bridge in Providence, SOLID ARGUMENTS, consisting of bread, butter, cheese, hams, eggs, salmon, neats' tongue, oysters, etc., ready cooked. AGITATIONS.—Cider, vinegar, salt, pickles, sweet-oil, etc. GRIEVANCES.—Pepper-sauce, mustard, black pepper, cayenne, etc. PUNISHMENTS.—Wine, brandy, gin, spirits, porter, etc. SUPERFLUITIES.—Snuff, tobacco, and segars. N.B. Any of the above articles to be exchanged for NECESSARIES, viz.—French crowns, Spanish dollars, pistareens, cents, mills, or bank-bills. Credit given for PAYMENTS—30, 60, and 90 seconds, or as long as a man can hold his breath.

RUDIMENTS GRATIS, viz.—Those indebted for Arguments must not be Agitated, nor think it a Grievance if they should meet Punishment for calling for such Superfluties, and supposing it not Necessary to make immediate Payment.

No one can read the "Personals" of the city daily without seeing into much of the romance of everyday life. They are the very cream of the curiosities of advertising. While other classes deal with the outer movements of trade, business, and social needs, this deals only with the secret springs of individual action. Other advertisements are addressed to the entire community, but a personal one is generally intended but for the eye of one individual, and is, therefore, framed so as to be intelligible only to that one. It is the mystery thus given to them which constitutes a peculiar charm. He who does not know the key to the mystery is apt to surround it in his own mind with highly-colored attributes; and when he undertakes to sketch outlines, not only for one, but sometimes for a dozen of these romances in a day, he certainly has to give a wide scope to his imagination. From grave to gay, from serious to frivolous, from solemn to ridiculous, they lead the mind through a fantastic realm of thought. A similar record of the internal daily life of Thebes, of Athens, or of Rome, hundreds of years ago, would be worth more than the serious writings of historians in giving us a life-like impression of the manners of the day. But neither Egyptian, Greek, nor Roman civilization reached so far as to produce a newspaper, and consequently the romance of personal advertisements was unknown to it. In fact, they may be regarded as an American institution. Many that we find in our own papers are inserted by courtesans, fortune-tellers, and the "baser sort" generally. Such are not worth repeating, and should never be allowed insertion in any journal claiming respectability, or that is read by our wives and daughters. Others, however, are of a more innocent kind, but so mysterious as to excite speculation.

Those of the matrimonial character are, of course, prominent, and show the difficulty that some men, and even women, have in securing "partners for life." Here is an instance of a delicate way of advertising for a husband, which, considering that it is from a young lady, comes most remarkably to the point without any feminine circumlocution:

WANTED.—By a young Lady, aged nineteen, of pleasing countenance, good figure, agreeable manners, general information and varied accomplishments, who has studied every thing, from the creation to crochet, a situation in the family of a gentleman. She will take the head of the table, manage his household, scold his servants, nurse his babies (when they arrive), check his tradesmen's bills, accompany him to the theatre, cut the leaves of his new book, sew on his buttons, warm his slippers, and generally make his life happy. Apply in the first place, by letter, to Louisa Caroline, Linden Grove, —, and afterward to Papa, upon the premises. Wedding-Ring, No. 4, Small.

The following, of the same gender, is equally as explicit:

A HIGHLY RESPECTABLE WIDOW, A LITTLE OVER THIRTY, unincumbered, and possessing her own pin-money, is of a kind and affectionate disposition, and capable of making a home happy, would like to correspond with a widower older than herself (has no objection to a family), with a view to matrimony. Can give good references and reasons for this mode of making her wishes known. Will receive letters for one week. Address, etc., etc.

The "highly respectable widow," for the benefit of the coming husband, is "unincumbered," but graciously says in advance that she "has no objection to a family." She is, however, particular that the future husband should be "a widower older than herself," fancying, perhaps, that "old birds are caught with chaff," or rather, maybe, that widowers of experience make the most pliant husbands, if perchance they have gone through a hard mill. Nevertheless, those disposed to reply to such an advertisement should remember Sam Weller's immortal advice, "Beware of the vidders!"

Here is another, which is really tantalizing:

MATRIMONIAL.—A young Lady, aged eighteen, of good appearance, now visiting in the country, wishes to correspond with a gentleman between the ages of twenty and thirty with a view to matrimony. Money no object, as the advertiser possesses ample means to support them handsomely through life. Please address Miss S—, — Street, New York.

Sweet "eighteen," "money no object," "ample means to support them handsomely through life." Great inducements! and, doubtless, a great humbug. But still, it may be that Miss S— is "honest." Nevertheless, we can not help questioning the "good appearance" of the advertiser.

Very young men are also guilty of advertising for matrimonial companions. A promising young gentleman thus advertised in the New York Dispatch:

I AM TWENTY-THREE YEARS OF AGE, five feet eleven inches and a half in height, a figure and face said to be the model of symmetry and beauty—a gentleman by birth and inheritance (there was never a mechanic in my family), educated in a European University, an accomplished musician, a thorough linguist—and utterly incapable of earning a living. I should like to marry into a wealthy family, which, wanting the prestige of birth, would be elevated by an alliance with me. I could make myself generally useful in such a family by teaching the younger members manners, and accustoming the elder to the easy carriage and grace of well-bred people. There are many wealthy families who have boxes at the opera, who, under my direction, would speedily learn to look as aristocratic and important as they try to persuade themselves that they are. Such a family, after a few lessons from me, would pass for well-bred people—in a crowd—and I should make them understand the opera, which now they do not.

Few can doubt the eligibility of this candidate for the marriage noose. But he is in a bad fix, and honestly says that he wants a wife to take care of him. And, really, his brilliant and substantial accomplishments should recommend him to some of the new families of Murray Hill, who would find such a son-in-law a rare acquisition.

The next, quoted from the New York Herald, is modest with all the virtue of innocence:

WANTED.—A situation as son-in-law in a respectable family. Blood and breeding no object, being already supplied; capital essential. No objection to going a short distance into the country.

Another young man is hunting after a handsome income:

MATRIMONIAL.—WANTED.—A Wife, possessing intelligence and a moderate allowance of beauty, by a young man of twenty-five, passably good-looking, and enjoying a handsome income. Any young lady of property, matrimonially inclined, may find a correspondent of like inclination by addressing Harry —, Williamsburg Post-office, New York.

The gem of matrimonial advertising, however, is the following. The writer is evidently a coward; but still, under certain circumstances, displays a remarkable degree of common sense:

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, on the point of getting married, is desirous of meeting a man of experience who will dissuade him from such a step. Address, etc.

Experience "after marriage" produces also some curious features in the advertising columns. For example, a man out West thus posts his truant wife:

On the 6th of July, on the night of Monday, eloped from her husband, the wife of John Grundy. His grief for her absence each day growing deeper, should any man find her he begs him to—keep her.

Another husband is disconsolate, and calls upon an absent wife to return to his "bed and board;" and in any event of non-compliance, to send the next best thing—the key of the cupboard:

JANE.—Your absence will ruin all. Think of your husband—your parents—your children. Return—return—all may be well—happy. At any rate, inclose the key of the cupboard where the gin is.

In the columns of the Albany Times we find the following advertisement, which we copy verbatim, free from charge:

$3 REWARD.—The above reward will be paid to whoever will cause the return to me of my wife Mary. She is of middle size, light complexioned, freckles on face, short hair, trimmed behind, and wears beau-catchers. Is about 15 years of age, and of a loving disposition, and had on three rattan hoops. WM. SNOW, Corner of Lodge and Maiden.

A repentant husband, of Conway, N. H., thus exposes his weakness to the gaze of the public:

WHEREAS I, DANIEL CLAY, through misrepresentation, was induced to post my wife Rhoda in the papers, now beg leave to inform the public that I have taken her to wife, after settling all our domestic broils in an amicable manner; so that every thing, as usual, goes on like clock-work.

On the other hand, although not so commonly, we have women advertising for truant husbands. In these, however, there is but little variety. Yet now and then the reader may meet with one of an emphatic character, as, for instance, when a woman thus closes her advertisement: "Daniel may be known by a scar on his nose—where I scratched him."

Here is a whole romance contained in four little lines. What pictures of life in a great city they open up to the mind's eye! They lead the mind to imagine a weak, and it may be an erring woman, contending against evils and outrages that menaced her very existence, helped out of trouble by some Good Samaritan, and resolving to obey that injunction that may have been long sounding in her ear, "Go, and sin no more!"

MR. C., of 182 B. W.—Spring Street was a good place for me on the 18th—evening. You have saved my life and little money. God bless you and help you out of your trouble. I left town forever. MARIE B.

Every day we find just such bits of romance lurking among the "Personals." Listen to this wail of affection from a faithful woman's heart:

ALONZO.—Received. I implore you to suffer me to come to you. Your society (even in poverty) I should prefer to all the world besides. Pray give me hope of seeing you soon. I am truly miserable. Write to same address. ELIZA A.

As an offset, we often find fugitive friends or relatives implored to return to their deserted homes. Here are two such, addressed to the same person on different days:

M. I. S.—Dolly, we are very anxious about you. Write, or return home. All will be forgiven. W. R. S.

M. I. S.—Dolly, why don't you come home? Have you not any sympathy for me? If you could appreciate my love for you, you would never desert your home and friends. We are only mortal, and liable to err. If you will return, your word shall be law. Take pity on me, do, for Heaven's sake! W. R. S.

The following is evidently from a coxcomb who has been carrying on a correspondence with some romantic unknown:

TRUTHFUL's letters all received. She is earnestly requested to throw aside the impenetrable veil of secrecy which now envelops her, and grant an interview. Charles has loved sincerely, earnestly, devotedly; but believed his fragrance was wasted on the desert air. Should the object of his affections prove to be the fair unknown, happiness may yet be in store for both. When they meet Charles will describe his palace by the lake of Como, which, with himself, his ten thousand a year, his shooting box on the Mississippi, and all his other jewels, shall be hers.

To close these "personals" of a special character, see what loose ideas of American etiquette and English grammar break out in the following announcement:

If the young lady who bowed to a gentleman in a window on Broadway, near Broome Street, who had on a blue dress and black silk mantilla, will address a note to O. H., Broadway Post Office, and state how an introduction can be obtained, she will confer a great favor.

What on earth could a gentleman in a blue dress and black silk mantilla have been doing in a window on Broadway? and why should a young lady who had never been introduced bow to him, unless she took him for a lay figure intended to represent a Chinese mandarin? We confess that our ingenuity is entirely at fault here, and that we can not venture upon even a probable solution of this advertising riddle. We therefore leave it among the unsolved mysteries.

That the Irish are in America we find ludicrous evidence even among advertisements. The following appeared during last year in one of the New York dailies:

NOTICE.—If the gentleman who keeps a store in Cedar Street with a red head, will return the umbrella he borrowed from a lady with an ivory handle, he will hear of something to his advantage.

Another, in the same paper, setting forth the many conveniences and advantages to be derived from metal window-sashes, among other particulars enumerates as follows: "Those sashes will last forever; and afterward, if the owner has no use for them, they might be sold for old iron."

The above can only be matched by an announcement contained in a transatlantic newspaper:

MISSING from Killarney, JANE O'FOGARTY, she had in her arms two babies and a Guernsey cow, all black, with red hair and tortoise-shell combs behind her ears, and large spots all down her back, which squints awfully.

Here is another which is "confusion worse confounded," but is certainly a bona fide advertisement:

THIS is to certify that I, DANIEL O'FLANAGAN, am not the person who was tarred and feathered by the liberty mob on Tuesday last; and I am ready to give twenty guineas to any one that will bet me fifty that I am the other man who goes by my name.

Witness my hand, this 30th of July, 1865.

DAN. O'FLANAGAN.

Among "Personals" in the London Times, a few years ago, the following challenge appeared from one of the "softer sex:"

I, ELIZABETH WILKINSON, of Clerkenwell, having had some words with Hannah Hyfield, and requiring satisfaction, do invite her to meet me on the stage, and box me for three guineas, each woman holding half-a-crown in each hand, and the first woman that drops the money, to lose the battle. She shall have rare sport.

This evoked an answer on the next day, couched in the following language:

I, HANNAH HYFIELD, of Newgate Market, hearing of the resoluteness of Elizabeth Wilkinson, will not fail, God willing, to give her more blows than words. Desiring home-blows, and from her no favor, she may expect a good thumping.

The London Times, by-the-way, is not very far behind the New York press in the singularity of many of its advertisements. As an example of the peculiar things found in its columns, take the announcement of the wants of a pious and affluent elderly lady, who, desirous of having the services of a domestic like-minded with herself, appeals to the public for "a groom to take charge of two carriage-horses of a serious turn of mind." So, also, the simple-hearted inn-keeper, who advertises his "limited charges and civility;" and the description given by a distracted family of a runaway member, who consider that they are affording valuable means for his identification, by saying, "Age not precisely known, but looks older than he is."

Only a few weeks ago, the "Thunderer," under its "Wants" advertised for "a nurse in a small gentleman's family." The size of the gentleman might, probably, be esteemed a matter worthy of mention, as female servants nowadays, even in Old England, are growing dainty. The nuisance in this country, so long endured without complaint, has at length grown to such proportions that the press, with its ten thousand tongues, has condescended to come to the aid of the persecuted housekeeper. And even the advertising column is sometimes used to contain a piece of wholesome satire hitting at the domestic evil. The New Haven Palladium lately published the following:

WANTED TO HIRE.—A lady, having a pleasant home, no incumbrances but a husband and one child, wishes to place herself at the disposal of some servant who can come well recommended from her last place. She would prefer one who would be willing to remain within doors at least five minutes after the work is finished. She would also stipulate for the privilege of going to church herself once each Sunday, having been compelled to refuse the last applicant, who was not willing to allow her but half a day once a fortnight. Wages satisfactory, if under $10 a week.

She is deeply conscious of the utter inability of ladies in general to comply with the present demands of servants, but she hopes by strict attention to please in all respects. The best of references can be given; also, a good recommendation from one who has now left her to the fate of many housekeepers. Please apply before 6 A.M.

While on the subject of servants, among the many curiosities with which the advertising columns of the London Times are daily studded, we do not remember to have ever met with so splendid an effort as the following, which appeared recently:

DO YOU WANT A SERVANT?—Necessity prompts the question. The advertiser offers his services to any lady or gentleman, company, or others, in want of a truly faithful, confidential servant in any capacity not menial, where a practical knowledge of human nature in various parts of the world would be available. Could undertake any affair of small or great importance, where talent, inviolable secrecy, or good address would be necessary. Has moved in the best and worst societies without being contaminated by either; has never been a servant, but begs to recommend himself as one who knows his place; is moral, temperate, middle-aged. No objection to any part of the world. Could advise any capitalist wishing to increase his income and have the control of his own money. Could act as secretary or valet to any lady or gentleman. Can give advice or hold his tongue, sing, dance, play, fence, box, preach a sermon, tell a story, be grave or gay, ridiculous or sublime, or do any thing, from the curling of a peruke to the storming of a citadel, but never to excel his master.

The public, it is feared, have too much reason to complain that it is too frequently the case that advertisements give an uncertain sound. Newspaper columns are open to the honest and the dishonest alike, so that even the high-toned, moral, or religious character of the journal publishing a certain advertisement affords no guarantee to the public that respondents may not be swindled. In this connection it is not necessary to refer to lotteries, gift enterprises, etc. Such concerns are being generally correctly estimated, and it is only by advertising on an extensive scale that they can now meet with any degree of success by now and then catching a flat. But people in search of employment, and others disposed (for the purpose of inquiry or speculation) to the purchase of undesignated trinkets for ornamentation, or articles "useful to every housekeeper," have a right to complain of the many deceptive advertisements contained in the daily and weekly press by which the public are not only gulled but cheated. For instance, seventy-five cents is sent by some person to a firm in —, which advertises "Lincoln Watches," and receives in return a small quantity of very poor ointment, "warranted to cure certain cutaneous diseases as surely as a watch keeps time," packed in a piece of tin soldered together in the shape of a watch; another sends one dollar to — for a "Patent time-keeper, warranted never to get out of order," and receives in return a common card, on which is printed a wood-cut representing the face of a sun-dial, which, with an accompanying shawl-pin, is worth nearly one cent. These are but two out of two thousand instances of dishonest advertising flooding the press weekly, and are of a class which is bringing advertising into disrepute, and daily proving the necessity of some kind of censorship to insure the public against misrepresentation and fraud.

Occasionally, however, we may find in an advertisement honesty intensified. Here, for instance, is one from the Pall Mall (London) Gazette:

DOG.—Required a kind master for an excellent black retriever dog. Owner parts with him on no other account than his savage tendencies. Address P. A. P., Post-office, Clinton.

The second is from the same paper:

A COUNTRY CLERGYMAN would feel most thankful to any benevolent lady that would kindly take into her service a strong motherless girl of sixteen, whom he is anxious to get from home, but whom he can not recommend for honesty and truthfulness. Address, etc., etc.

Coming near home, an advertisement of cheap shoes and fancy articles, in an Eastern paper, says: "N.B. Ladies who wish cheap shoes will do well to call soon, as they will not last long." We give the advertiser the benefit of the double entendre.

The following was lately contained in a Western paper:

WHEREAS, at particular times, I may importune my friends and others to let me have liquor, which is hurtful to me and detrimental to society: This is, therefore, to forbid any persons selling me liquor, or letting me have any on any account or pretense; for if they do I will positively prosecute them, notwithstanding any promise I may make to the contrary at the time they may let me have it. JOHN HOLMES.

It is evident that John wrote the above when he was sober and repentant, and meant to be honest and faithful to himself and to others.

For being similarly addicted to the foible alluded to, "Polly Lines" advertises her better-half:

NOTICE.—Whereas Benjamin F. Lines has become so addicted to the use of the "critter" as to render himself an unfit companion for any civilized person, and whereas my property was, under his administration, "passing away," I found just cause and provocation (not, indeed, "to leave his bed and board"), but to take my own bed and board and seek out a place of quiet. If he will pay debts of his own contracting, I have no wish to pay any of his contracting after this date.

POLLY LINES.

SEYMOUR, September 23, 1861.

Poor Polly! "Pretty Polly!"

Western papers seldom fail to afford amusement, even aside from their columns of facetiae. The printers sometimes use even the advertising department to point a joke. One of them, whose office is a mile from any other building, and who hangs his sign on the limb of a tree, advertises for an apprentice, and closes by saying, "A boy from the country would be preferred."

Another advertises:

BOY WANTED.—A smart, active boy, who can read and write, and is not disposed to divide the gross receipts of the establishment with the proprietors, will find employment by application at the Dispatch Office.

The Culpepper Observer advertises for an editor in the following terms:

WANTED.—At this office, an EDITOR who can please every body; also, a FOREMAN who can so arrange the paper as to allow every man's advertisement to head the column.

By the following it will be plainly seen that in some part of Ohio "the schoolmaster is abroad," while punctuation is nowhere:

NOTICE TO TRESPASSERS.—Notice is hear By Given that now pursen is pur Mitted to take the N of Ene Kind out of Mi Woods Mi hogs Must Live Look one.

Here is another, which for its morality (or, rather, for the want of it) is really atrocious:

TO RENT.—A house on Melville Avenue, located immediately alongside of a fine plum orchard, from which an abundant supply of the most delicious fruit may be stolen during the season. Rent low, and the greater part taken in plums.

The proprietor of a building site in Wisconsin advertises his land for sale in the following poetic style:

THE TOWN OF POGGTS, and surrounding country, is the most beautiful which Nature ever made. The scenery is celestial—divine; also, two wagons to sell, and a yoke of steers.

A Yankee (certainly "irrepressible") advertises that he will repair clocks, lecture on Phrenology, milk kicking cows, and go clamming at high tide. During his leisure he will have no objection to edit a newspaper in the bargain.

But a Mississippi paper in some respects takes the palm for audacity, when its own editor and proprietor advertises a sow for sale, saying that it is "sold for no fault, except that, having been raised by a Methodist preacher, she has acquired too great a partiality for spring chickens to be agreeable to the present owner."

"Catch" advertisements have latterly come into common use—very much, occasionally, to the disgust of the serious trader. These are generally placed among "Notices" in city journals, or in the columns of reading matter of the country weeklies. Many of them are exceedingly ingenious, and display no small degree of talent in their compilation and adaptation. One or two examples are here set in type:

When Anaxagoras was told of the death of his son, he only said, "I knew he was mortal." So, when we see a splendid pair of ladies' slippers, we say, "I know they came from Crispin Puffer's."

A short chapter on Noses ends with an advertisement of a clothing store:

NOSEOLOGY.—Some genius, who has devoted much thought and attention to the subject, classes noses as follows: 1. The Roman Nose; 2. The Grecian Nose; 3. The Cogitative, or Wide-nostriled Nose; 4. The Crooked Nose; 5. The Snub Nose; 6. The Turn-up Nose, or Celestial. Now it must be confessed that the prejudice goes very strongly in favor of wearing a nose; and that every one who a thing or two knows never fails to procure his Sunday clothes at— etc., etc., etc.

Poetical [?] advertisements are of such a character, almost invariably, as to fail to merit reproduction. One may frequently meet with half a column of the trash, which, however, is seldom read. Such as the following may be effective, but only from their brevity. Dewey, for instance, a grocer in Burlington, Vermont, rhymes away on teas and other potables funnily and punnily:

Black, Green, Souchong, and Oolong,
Chocolate, Cocoa, and so along,
These are the drinks that go along
At Dewey's.

Under the heading "Wives Wanted" a certain manufacturer advertises a new kind of soap:

I want the wives my plan to try,
And save the steam and bubble
That now attend the washing day,
Also, the toil and trouble.
Twice ten thousand noble dames
Pronounce it quite a treasure,
And all unite with heart and voice
To praise it without measure.

When you want the best soap, call for, etc., etc.

The following dunning advertisement is quoted as one of the best of the class. It comes from the West, and has the pure Western flavor. Had it only appeared lately, the advertiser might have had the benefit of the wide-and-widely extended circulation of this article. It is only to be regretted that the writer published his advertisement too soon:

NOTICE.—Persons indebted to the Tascaloosa Book Store are respectfully solicited to pay their last year's account forthwith. It is of no use to honey; payments must be made at least once a year, or I shall run down at the heel. Every body says, How well that man Woodruff is going on in the world! when the fact is, I have not positively spare change enough to buy myself a shirt or a pair of breeches. My wife is now actually engaged in turning an old pair wrong side out, and trying to make a new shirt out of two old ones. She declares that in Virginia, where she was raised, they never do such things; and that it is, moreover, a downright vulgar piece of business altogether. Come, come, pay up, friends! Keep peace in the family, and enable me to wear my breeches right side out. You can hardly imagine how much it will oblige, dear Sirs, the public's most obedient, most obliged, and most humble servant.

The annexed advertisement is reprinted for the benefit of that much-abused class—boarding-house keepers. It may justly be supposed to emanate from a confirmed and crusty bachelor:

BOARD AND REPOSE WANTED.—In some sensible family, uninfested with cats, poodle dogs, canary-birds, juvenile jewsharps, mimicking old maids, scheming widows, feminine "hopefuls" with match-making mammas, or other nuisances. Hot dinner required on Sunday. Terms not to exceed $50 per month. Address, Comfort-Seeker, —Madison Square, N. Y.

The Boston Traveler lately contained, in the form of an advertisement, a fair hint at the unseemly, inconvenient, and ridiculous custom of young men and hobbledoys who every Sunday annoy the public by impudently obstructing the passages in front of the churches—an evil which unfortunately exists in many other villages besides Boston, Massachusetts:

A CARD.—The Donkey Club of this city would respectfully inform the public that they have made arrangements for an extensive demonstration, on the sidewalk opposite Winter Street Church, at the close of divine service on Sunday, the 4th instant. MOUSTACHE, Corresponding Secretary and Chairman of the Street Lounging Committee.

Advertising stratagems are sufficiently numerous to merit almost a sheet of examples. One of the most curious, "whereby hangs a tale," belongs to England, and deserves a place in Harper's Monthly, the receptacle of all things literary worth preserving. The story is that, some few years ago, a hatter in London speculated in the purchase of the entire stock of a bankrupt brother tradesman; but, soon after his purchase, he found that he had overstocked himself. He was on the point of reluctantly dismissing some of his "hands" when a sharp-witted friend came to the rescue. By his advice a hand-bill, announcing the cheapness of the hatter's wares, was prepared and distributed exactly as had been already done for some time, except in one particular item. The bill was headed, "Who's your Atter?" and throughout its contents the goods were invariably mentioned as "ats:" "Youth's Silk Ats"—"Best Beaver Ats"—"Ladies Riding Ats"—and so forth. The remainder of the advertisement was in unexceptionable English. The result perfectly justified the inventor's anticipations. These bills were sought after as typographical curiosities. Men shouted with laughter at the ludicrous effect of what many considered ignorance on the part of the printer or of the writer. They carried these bills in their pockets and merrily showed them to their friends. One or two elderly gentlemen, previously perfect strangers, came to the shop, bought "ats," and expostulated gravely with the "atter" upon the solecism. Young fellows purchased gossamers for the fun of the thing, begged for hand-bills, and held jocular conversations with the shopkeeper. The shop became known, and the proprietor frequently smiles as he hears the street-boys calling out the established phrase of "Who's your Atter?" the origin of which, but for the publication of this curious little episode in advertising, might, possibly in a few short years, have been lost forever to the antiquarian. To this day the pronunciation of the now popular inquiry is that of the original hand-bill.

The examples given will show that the art of advertising, if not one of the fine arts is certainly one of the most useful. In fact, it has become almost necessary both to buyer and seller. There are those, however, who have endeavored to make it in reality a fine art. Packwood, some fifty years ago, led the way in England of liberal and systematic advertising, by impressing his razor-strop indelibly on the mind of every bearded member of the kingdom. Like other great potentates, he boasted a laureate in his pay, and every one remembers the reply made to the individuals so curious to know who drew up his advertisements: "La! Sir! we keeps a poet."

But by universal consent, the world has accorded to the late George Robins the palm in the fine style of commercial puffing. His advertisements were really artistically written. Like Martin, he had the power of investing every landscape and building that he touched with an importance and majesty not attainable by meaner hands. He did, perhaps, go beyond the yielding line of even poetical license, when he described one portion of a paradise he was about to subject to public competition as adorned, among other charms, with "a hanging wood," which the astonished purchaser found out meant nothing more nor less than an old gallows. But then he redeemed slight manœuvres of this kind by touches which displayed a native and overflowing genius for puffing. On one occasion he had made the beauties of an estate so enchanting that he found it necessary to blur his description by a fault or two, lest it should prove too bright and good "for human nature's daily food." "But there are two drawbacks to this property," sighed out this apostle of the mart, "the litter of the rose leaves and the noise of the nightingales." Certainly the rhetoric of exquisite puffing could no further go.

We can not refrain from giving a part of one of his advertisements, which were always of considerable length, sometimes occupying an entire column of the Times. The following extract refers to the sale of Fort Abbey in Dorsetshire. After the usual introduction, Mr. Robins went on to say:

And in the description that necessarily must follow, Mr. Robins, without the slightest affectation, proclaims that he approaches the task with fear and trembling. The only saving clause by which he can well seek to soften the reproaches of an enlightened and deeply-read community is alone to be found in the liberty the composer will take with authors so highly-gifted, that he must indeed be a bold man who will not yield assent to his researches. Dugdale is no mean authority, and with this and a few introductory facts, the herculean task must be approached. The Fort Abbey Demesnes are to be traced back to a very distant day, and it has ever since maintained its proud superiority over every other monastery in England. It is a splendidly grand and unique building, altogether realizing Lord Byron's glowing description of Norman Abbey:

"An old, old monastery once, and now
Still elder mansion, of a rich and rare
Mix'd Gothic, such as artists all allow

Its classic front extends to near 300 feet. The order of architecture is in the Tudor style, and may be dated about the time of Henry VIII.; but to describe it as it deserves is felt to be far beyond the reach of the limited capacity of the composer, and even much wiser heads would be puzzled in the attempt to do it justice—it is indeed the great Leviathan of the West. Its fame has been held in the highest veneration from generation to generation, and it is now avowed to have no successful rival amidst the vast variety of monasteries to be found throughout the country. The first impression on beholding this ancient pile the writer feels can never be obliterated from his memory; his mind on the instant seemed to be subdued into a most devout and religious state, one of absolute wonder, mixed up with boundless admiration; it was a joyous spectacle, but Mr. Robins can not too earnestly invoke all those who possess a soul congenial with objects of antiquity to go to the abbey, and then judge for themselves; they will, with one accord, proclaim how absolutely impossible it is to convey in suitable terms the panegyric which would be awarded to it. The county in which the abbey is placed will not yield to any other. The reader needs not to be reminded that, in days of yore, the taste of the monks in the selection of their lands was never questioned, and amidst all the good things of this world, they were remarkable for the accuracy of their judgment. In selecting the best of every thing, even the fat of the land was not accounted too good for their refined taste. This princely property is all freehold of inheritance, surrounded by lawns and pleasure-grounds, with graveled walks between rows of unbragous trees of great size and stateliness, intercepted with ornamental waters, cascades, and waterfalls sparkling with foam, and here and there a statue to diversify the scene. The park, which is one of great beauty, is stocked with deer, whose venison has obtained the highest celebrity for its fatness and fine flavor, while the soft, undulating foliage of its magnificent and time-honored trees is perpetually deluding the eye into a belief that it was of boundless extent, and imparting just such an air of tempered wildness as would gratify the lover of scenery, without offense to those who are inclined to look rather for the evidences of the superintending hand of care and cultivation. Indeed, every thing seems to increase the charms of a spot so rich in nature's beauties. Of the ornamental waters in front of the abbey we find it thus recorded:

"Before the mansion lay a lucid lake,
Broad as transparent, deep and freshly fed
By a river, which its softened way did take
In currents through the calmer waters spread.

The river Aze, so renowned by the disciples of Izaak Walton for its piscatory pleasures and delicious trout, winds in serpentine beauty through the fair demesne,

"Lost for a space through thickets veering,
But brossier when again appearing."

It was here that

"The branching stag swept down with all his herd,
To quaff a brook which murmured like a bird."

It may still be asked, "What more can mortals now desire?" The sporting qualities extend to every thing a gentleman's heart can contemplate. By-the-way, the monks' celebrated walk is in high preservation, and to omit a panegyric upon the ancient tapestry that adorns the state rooms would approach sacrilege. It really and truly may be accounted the wonder and admiration of the world. It fearlessly challenges a rival; and the writer is exceedingly desirous that the reader should not for one moment charge this description of being too vivid. He may rest assured here is no flight of fancy, but a veritable and unassuming report. This description, it is perceived, has already extended beyond the limits prescribed, and therefore (with lament) the writer ends this very imperfect recital, merely observing that the terms used by the foundress of the abbey when she tendered to the holy fathers her manor of Thorncombe, in exchange for the barren lands of Brightley, stating it to be "well wooded and fertile," are trebly appropriate in the present day.

We are hereby reminded of a difficulty into which Mr. Robins got a few years since on account of bestowing such lavish praise upon some estate which he was engaged to sell. A gentleman in France, seeing the advertisement, was attracted to England to be present at the sale. But lo, and behold! when he came, he found that the picture of truth had been so entirely overdrawn as to render it altogether a piece of deception. Instead of the picturesque and sublime, the whole thing was simply ridiculous. The Frenchman immediately brought an action for damages against George Robins and gained his suit by recovering his expenses—our auctioneer becoming thus, for once, a loser by his special genius.

We will now "conquer a close" by "improving the whole subject" and adding words of advice:

I. To MERCHANTS. — (1.) Advertise. (2.) Advertise liberally. (3.) Advertise courageously.

II. To THE PEOPLE AT LARGE. — (1.) Read the Advertisements. (2.) Study them, and verily they shall be for your profit.

LOOKING UNDER THE BED.

IT is the habit of many persons to take a look under the bed before retiring for the night. Mrs. Evergreen, my beloved wife, indulges, if indulgence it can be called, in this peculiar practice. I do not object to it in the least so long as she does not enforce the performance upon myself; but when, as is sometimes the case, she forgets it until she has put out the light and ensconced herself under the comforter, then it is hard that I, who am not troubled with nervous apprehensiveness, should have to get out in the cold and do it for her. I have often remarked to Mrs. Evergreen, when I have seen her prying under the bed, that it was a silly habit, and that the sooner she gave it up the better. To this gentle admonition my better-half invariably rejoins:

"La, Evergreen! what harm does it do? It's a kind of satisfaction to know that nobody's under there, and then I don't think of such a horrible thing after I'm in bed."

"I think, my dear, you might just as well pursue your investigations further and look into the bureau drawers and the clothes-basket."

"Evergreen," she will rejoin, "don't mention the idea, or I shall certainly do so. Come to think of it, a man could very easily get into the clothes-basket!"

"Certainly he could, my dear, quite as easily as Falstaff. You should certainly include the clothes-basket, and by-the-by, there's the chimney; why not look up that as well?"

"Now, Evergreen, you're laughing at me. But I can't leave off the habit, and I never will. It's a comfort for me to know that there's nothing wrong about it, and I don't see why you should deprive me of it."

So under the bed goes the candle, and, no signs of humanity being discovered, Mrs. Evergreen is able to repose in peace. But, as already observed, this precautionary act is sometimes forgotten, and I am myself obliged to rise, light the lamp, and report. I've done it rather more frequently of late than is agreeable, and have intimated as much to Mrs. E. She says:

"Very well, Evergreen, I'll do it myself."

But this procedure is almost as bad, for she invariably lets the cold in on me both in getting out and getting in. If it were not for increasing this mental idiosyncrasy on the part of Mrs. Evergreen, by giving her some good reason to apprehend danger, I should relate to her what I am about to lay before the reader. In this narration, therefore, I ask the public most particularly to bear in mind that Mrs. Evergreen is of a sensitive nature, rather apprehensive and slightly superstitious, and that what I have to say must under no circumstances be imparted to that lady. If for two-and-twenty years (that is the period of our wedded life, and happy years have they been)—if, I say, I have for this long period refrained from imparting the matter to the beloved sharer of my joys and partaker of my sorrows, surely the public (which, as we know, always does keep a secret) will keep mine.

All young men, I suppose, have love-affairs before they eventually fix their affections on the one who is to bless their lot in life. I know that I had, and I don't regret it. Regret it? far from it. Mrs. Evergreen is not present, and therefore I have no hesitation in saying that if I had my life to live over again I'd like to go through with the same sentimental experience, particularly if it was to be succeeded by again leading to the hymeneal altar the present Mrs. Evergreen.

I was not bad-looking when I was in my twenties. I think I may go further, and confidently say that "Gus Evergreen" was a decided favorite among the girls of Oakville, and I really believed that I could have had any of them "for the asking." As I before remarked, Mrs. Evergreen is not present, and I indulge my thoughts somewhat more freely than would otherwise be the case. I don't think that I cared particularly for any of the Oakville girls, however, and I might have kept my heart whole to this day if it had not been for the circumstance which I am about to relate.

Fred Evans, who had been my chum at school, came to make me a visit at Oakville for "a day or two," as he said, when he came; but he made it a week or two easily enough after I'd taken him about a little among the "young ladies." When that time had expired Fred said he really must go, as he didn't know what his father and mother would think of his long absence; but it ended in his relieving their anxiety by a letter and sending for his trunks. I knew how the matter was perfectly well, and that Belle Bronson had bewitched him out of his five senses. Fred tried to put it on to the "country air and the quiet which was benefiting his health, etc.," but it was no use trying to deceive me, and I told him so. Then he owned up frankly, and I promised to help him all I could, if he required any help in the prosecution of his suit. I never thought Belle a flirt, or that she would willingly distress any human being; but she had a way of looking in one's eyes as if to captivate them, for her mere personal amusement. At any rate she had a larger share of beaux than the other girls, but all their attentions came to nothing. I feared it might be so with Fred Evans, and warned him accordingly; but Fred said he'd "have her if he tried all his life;" that "without her life was naught to him;" that "she was the only living being who had ever awakened a real emotion in his breast," etc., etc. After that I said no more, but closely observed the lovers, and soon came to the conclusion that Fred was by no means disagreeable to her. Things went on in this way without any definite result until Fred received a sudden summons home on account of his mother's illness. When he came back to renew his visit he insisted upon staying at the Oakville Hotel rather than wear out his welcome at our house, and finding remonstrance unavailing, there he went. The landlord (honest old Downsburry—I wonder if he yet lives) gave Fred, at my suggestion, his best bedroom, "No. 20"—I am particular in mentioning the number. "He shall have No. 20," said Downsburry. "Any friend of yours, Master Augustus, shall have the best I have to give as long's I'm landlord." It was a pleasant room, looking out on the distant hills and the beautiful winding branch of the Blackwater; but what cared Fred for scenery? he was in the hands of the blind god, and could not see even as far as his nose, except in the direction of Belle's cottage. I used to go over to Fred's room and smoke my cigar, while he, poor wretch, expatiated on his sufferings, doubts, and solitudes. Did she love him? that was the question which disturbed every moment of his existence, and to which, with the closest reasoning, he could not bring himself a satisfactory reply. Sometimes he thought a word or a sign settled the point beyond a doubt in his favor; at others he fancied he read a coolness and indifference in her eyes. In this condition of uncertainty he dared not press the question lest a hasty step might bring him to grief.

At Fred's earnest solicitation I promised to sound Belle as to her sentiments, if a favorable opportunity presented itself, or at any rate to let her know, in an indirect way, that Fred was languishing in distress on her account, and thus give her no excuse for unnecessarily prolonging his misery. It so happened, however, that my services were not called into requisition. Belle Bronson, because of the sudden arrival at her house of some country cousins, was obliged to give up her room—her mother's cottage being a small one—and to occupy for a single night a room at the hotel. We would cheerfully have offered her guests accommodation at our house, but we were in the same predicament. An agricultural fair in the village had brought many strangers into the place, and our own guests were so numerous that I had given up my room to two of them, and had intended asking Fred Evans to let me pass the night with him.

For this purpose I went to the hotel at a late hour, and proceeded at once to Fred's room, but to my surprise found no one there. I did not even notice that his trunk was gone, or suspect the fact, which afterward became apparent, that "to oblige some lady guests for this night only," as the landlord expressed it, Fred had consented to give up "No. 20" and occupy a small room in the rear of the building. The gas being turned up I took a book to await his return, and hearing at last what appeared to be steps approaching the room, and supposing it to be Fred, in a momentary impulse to play a joke upon him I slipped under the bed, a large and high one, intending to imitate a cat (of which animal I knew he had a detestation) so soon as he entered the room. The door opened, and I was on the point of indulging in my ventriloquial faculty by giving a long-drawn mieuw, when from my hiding-place I beheld Belle Bronson take quiet possession of the apartment!

My astonishment was so great, and the sense of mortification so intense, that I did not, as I should have done, make myself immediately known to her. Thus the opportunity for discovery and explanation was lost. I dared not move a hair, but hoped sincerely that some excuse might take her out of the room for a moment, and so facilitate my escape. She, however, locked the door, removed the key, and, as I knew by the sound, prepared to retire. Finally she knelt down beside the bed, and clasping her hands and bowing her head (so fearfully near to mine that I could hear the soft words in my very ear), she offered up her evening prayer in a manner so full of feeling, and with such sweet accents of womanly tenderness and devotion, that I felt as if she was an angel bending over the vilest of mortals. That prayer went to my heart; but one portion of it went through it and held it captive. Never shall I forget my feelings of surprise and my deep emotion when I heard her utter these words: "Bless my dear mother, sisters, and friends; bless all around me, and, O God! bless him I love, Augustus Evergreen, and shower down thy mercies over him. Amen."—"Ah, Augustus," said my divinity to herself, as she arose from her devotional attitude, "if you but knew that I named your very name in my prayers, you would be less indifferent to me!"

If I breathed short before, after this my breath seemed to desert me entirely, and I verily thought that the beating of my heart would betray me. Belle, pure as an angel to me then, and white as a snow-flake, proceeded to turn off the gas and to get into bed. I felt her soft pressure over my head, and shrunk closer and closer to the hard floor upon which I was extended. What thoughts rushed through my brain! Above me lay a young and unsophisticated girl wholly unconscious that the one she loved lay so closely to her, and who had for the first time been made aware of her interest in him, by hearing words which she supposed went only to Heaven! I knew then that the night must pass away, and the morning come, and that Belle must first leave the apartment before I could venture to change even my position.

Belle had lain perfectly motionless for several minutes and was, I flattered myself, losing herself in sleep, when suddenly she exclaimed to herself, "There—I haven't looked under the bed!" A horror ran through me; all is lost; what should I do? Belle rose and I heard her feeling for the matches. She struck one and was moving toward the gas-light, when the lucifer went out, leaving all darkness again. Blessed relief; but how brief! Again I heard her feeling for the matches and try to light one after another, as they failed to ignite; then an "Oh dear, there are no more!" escaped from her lips. "Safe! safe!" whispered my soul to me, and I thanked God in silence for my deliverance. Belle groped back to the bed, but did not immediately get in; she stooped and lifted the curtains which hung around the bottom and cautiously passed her arm under and around as far as it could reach. I almost felt her fingers graze my face as I held myself fearfully and silently back against the wall, too far, just too far for her reach. Apparently satisfied that no danger was near her, she lay down in the bed again and I counted her respirations till she was lost in slumber.

As for myself, sleep was utterly out of the question. I never was so wide-awake in my life. How I lay upon that hard carpet and thought the night out!—thought of her, and her love for me; thought of myself, and my love for her. Yes, I was convinced from that moment that the hand of destiny was in it, and that a benign and all-wise Providence had seen fit in this extraordinary way to open my eyes to the path of happiness and peace.

With the morning light fresh fears came upon me lest my unconscious room-mate might yet peer beneath the bed for robbers before she left the room; but my fears were groundless. She rose and dressed expeditiously, for she was to join her cousins at an early breakfast, and she had overslept herself. When at last she took the key, unlocked the door, and departed, I lost no time in slipping out of my shameful place of concealment and escaping from the hotel. On the stairs I met Fred coming out of his room, who exclaimed:

"Why, what's the matter with you, old fellow! You look like the last days of an ill-spent life. And your coat, too—why, it's all over feathers and dust. Where have you been?"

"Why, I slept—slept out last night; that's all. Our house is full, and so I had to find quarters elsewhere. I'm just going home to dress."

"I should say so, decidedly. I see it all, old fellow! You've been on a lark, and had to put up in the watch-house; come now, own up and tell us all about it."

"No lark at all, Fred; nothing of the kind, I assure you."

"Well, if not a lark what kind of a bird was it? From the looks of the feathers I should say it was a goose."

"You're the goose, Fred. But, seriously, I've a word to say to you of a most important nature. Be a man, Fred, and make up your mind to hear something excessively disagreeable. It must be told you sooner or later, and I may as well tell it now."

"Good Heavens, Gus! how earnest you look at me; you don't mean to say that—that any thing has happened to Belle Bronson?"

"Don't mention her name again, Fred, or think of her any more, for she'll never be any thing to you. I have it from one who knows all about it, that she has long been attached to somebody else, and that somebody else means to marry her. There's no mistake about it; so bear up and try your luck elsewhere."

But Fred Evans was not to be discouraged by mere hearsay. That very day he went to see Belle, determined to know his fate from her own lips. Soon after he left Oakville and I did not see him again for several years, when, meeting him in town one day, I insisted on bringing him home with me and presenting him to his old flame, Belle Bronson—the present Mrs. Evergreen.

"Ah, Fred!" said he, after dinner, when my wife and the little Evergreens had left us to ourselves—"Ah, Fred, you served me a shabby trick when you allowed me to lose my heart to the girl you were all along intending to marry yourself—a very shabby trick, one of which I never suspected you!"

So I had to tell him (in strict confidence, of course, as I tell you reader) all about the bedroom affair at the Oakville Hotel, and the love that grew out of it.

THE SWEETEST DAYS.

THE clouds in many a windy rack
Are sailing east and west,
And sober suns are bringing back
The days I love the best.

The poet, as he will, may go
To Summer's golden prime,
And set the roses in a row
Along his fragrant rhyme;

But as for me, I sing the praise
Of fading flowers and trees,
For to my mind the sweetest days
Of all the year are these:

When stubbly hills and hazy skies
Proclaim the harvest done,
And Labor wipes his brow, and lies
A-dreaming in the sun:

And idly hangs the spider on
Her broken silver stair,
And ghosts of thistles, dead and gone,
Slide slow along the air.

Where all is still, unless perhaps
The cricket makes ado,
Or when the dry-billed heron snaps
Some little reed in two;

Or school-boy tramples through the burs
His tangled path to keep,
Or ripe mast, rustling downward, stirs
The shadows from their sleep.

Ay, he that wills it so may praise
The lilies and the bees;
But as for me, the sweetest days
Of all the year are these.

My darling, in the woodland glen
One hour with me apart,
And let us walk and talk as when
I gave you all my heart.

Ah! wrap you with your veil so thin,
And let us wander slow
To that delicious bower, wherein
We courted long ago.

Where dying violets scent the air,
And faint the ground-stars burn;

And where I gave my heart, and where
You gave your heart in turn.

We had a quarrel—do you mind?
About the daisies' eyes;
Whether they closed because the wind
Was singing lullabies.

And you said Yes, and I said No,
And you got vexed and cried;
At that I gave it up, and lo!
You took the other side.

And you said No, and I said Yes;
The bosoms of the flowers
Were sensitive no whit the less,
Nor tender less than ours.

And you, as I remember yet,
Said that might well be true,
If you against them only set
My tenderness for you!

And I said—being sorely stung
That you my love should slight—
A woman always had a tongue
To make the wrong seem right!

So then your brows you darkly bent,
And killed me with a frown;
And I grew softly penitent,
And to my knees went down;

And where that willow of the glen
Shut out the insolent light,
I took you in my arms, and then
I kissed you just for spite!

Ay, just for very spite, I said,
But when your sweet cheek grew
So painfully and proudly red,
I said it was for true.

And brushing from your face the tear,
You gave me back my kiss,
Nor have we quarreled once, my dear,
From that glad day to this.

Therefore I leave who will to praise
The lilies and the bees,
For, love of mine, the sweetest days
Of all the year are these.

OLD TIMES AND NEW.

WHO among us, having attained manhood or womanhood, does not sometimes indulge in the regretful pleasure of retrospection? Who is there so happy in the present that old times, old friends, old memories furnish not the greater part of his holiday musings? Pope's often-quoted line—is pertinent only to forward-looking youth; after middle age past blessings occupy a larger share of our attention than the events of the apathetic present or the illusions of the promissory future. Popular slang, in its adolescence, petted the phrase, "There's a good time coming!" but we are not all Micawbers; and you and I, dear Paterfamilias, learned long ago that Time in the Future is an arch trickster—a hoary black-leg—who stakes in the Game of Life against our very heart's-blood only his promises to pay—notes of hand which no one will discount now, and which, when they arrive at maturity, are sure to be protested—the only result of our investigations concerning the affairs of the insolvent valetudinarian being the conventional plea of "no effects." The Future is to us a fundless speculator; the Present a commercial bankrupt; but we have still our investment with the Past at compound interest, yielding us a steady income of kindly reminiscences.

Perhaps our preference for things of yore may arise in part from causes within ourselves. First impressions are more vivid than the hackneyed repetitions of after-life. We sip our sparkling "Carte d'or" to-day with critical fastidiousness, but with less enjoyment than our undiscriminating palates found in the spurious, cloying Heidsieck of our boyhood. The beauty of last season's blooming ball-room debutantes pales before our recollection of the belles of our time. It may be that in some respects we deserve the supercilious sneer with which our new-fledged supplanters quote at us, "Laudatores temporis acti;" but let us comfort ourselves, O respectable contemporary! in the conservative conviction that alterations are not always improvements; let us thank God that, with regard to many dear old customs, though the times have changed, we have not changed with them! However beneficial "modern improvements" may be in the matters of domestic architecture, gas, water-works, and abstract science, the continual remodeling of our social institutions has resulted, possibly in a higher external polish, but certainly in deterioration of the original fabric.

Are there such parents nowadays as those of our childhood? I think not. Mothers there are in plenty, Heaven be praised! who fondly love their little ones, and who would willingly fulfill their maternal duties if they only knew how; but the delectable system of modern education which has fostered them is vastly different from that which gave our mothers fewer ornamental accomplishments, perhaps, but more practical knowledge of woman's mission. They can "execute" miraculous "fantasies" upon "eight octave" grand pianos (modern monstrosities of indiscriminable bass and unattainable treble). They can glibly run over the list of the most approved "modistes" here or abroad. They can display sylphide grace and prodigious endurance in the "German Cotillion." But, with the best intentions in the world, they can not efficiently supervise their nurseries and store-rooms. When Canal Street was the uppermost boundary of our good city of Manhattan, dames of the highest fashion were deeply versed in household lore—had penetrated all the occult mysteries of culinary alchemy—possessed vast knowledge concerning remedies for infantile ailments, and could and did find time to direct in person the operations of their domestics; to embody in palatable palpability sundry prized recipes for cake and confectionery; to administer chastisement to refractory inmates of the nursery; to do all that should or could be done in a well-ordered, cheerful home, and yet to keep up outside social intercourse. Now the exigencies of an interminable visiting list and a constantly-to-be-replenished wardrobe leave but little leisure for housewifery; and if a modern matron see her children twice a day, and be able to tell her husband what there is for dinner, it is about as much as can be expected of her.

And we ourselves, male reader! are we to our wives, our sons, and daughters, what our fathers were to theirs? or do our business affairs monopolize our days, and our clubs absorb our nights, until home and family have become mere empty words, which touch no pleasurable chord within us? Do you remember when the busiest merchants came home to dinner at three o'clock, and, save perhaps on "mail nights" (less frequent then than in these days of steam), spent their afternoon and evenings in the happy circle around the crackling wood-fire?—when there were but two theatres, one gambling-hell, and no club in Gotham?—when bar-rooms were but few and far between, and, in their stead, great bins of centennarian Madeira furnished private cellars? We have liquid conveniences now on every block, and "the Tiger" claims his jungles on every hand; but are we the better in morals or pockets? Clubs and theatres abound in our thoroughfares, but are our real enjoyments enhanced thereby? Hot-air furnaces and anthracite coal have banished wood-fires; but what we have gained in warmth we have lost in cheerfulness. Our incomes are larger than those of our progenitors, to be sure; but all the wealth for which we toil so hard can not purchase for us a tithe of their genuine comfort—can not compensate us for the estrangement from family ties entailed upon its pursuit. Solomon's apophthegm of the dinner of herbs and the stalled ox will thrust its antithesis upon us some day when we have become millionaires and confirmed dyspeptics; when our sons are irreclaimable rakes and gamblers, and our daughters shining lights of "fast" watering-place clothes, conscience will whisper a few early hints concerning the natural guardianship of youth.

By nature's usual rule of compensation, as parental care diminishes some other influence should intervene to protect infancy and childhood, but, alas! such is not the case. Where is the nurse of our earlier days?—the manly old soul whose kindly but strict discipline preserved order among her half dozen noisy, every subjects; who held us enthralled for hours together with marvellous recitals of fables; who modelled our habitations and our morals with equal assiduity; whose unyielding grasp subdued our struggles when, supine in her broad lap, nauseous doses gurgled down our protesting throats. What has become of her Bess, her silver spectacles, her sunny cap, her dear old self? She has passed away, and in her place modern Fashion allows to each child a separate attendant in the person of a slatternly, semi-idiotic Irishwoman, whose chief characteristics are over ignorance of the care of children combined with general negligence, mendacity, and a misplaced attachment for tawdry finery; whose numerous retinue of "cousins" encumber our kitchens, devour our wines, drink our wines, and smoke our cigars; whom you may see at any time absorbed in amatory colloquy with some loutish compatriot on the benches of our parks, while her luckless charge sits wretched on the damp grass to the serious detriment of its health and clothing; whose religious fervor and "evenings out" place her mistress at most inconvenient times in the position of a subordinate mortal.

But if the nurses of this degenerate era are deserving of reprobation, what shall we say of the other members of our "kitchen cabinets?" Of a verity, if all the outcry about "down-trodden Celts" and "Saxon oppressors" were true, the wrongs of Erin would be amply redressed—ay, and a heavy balance accredited to the other side by the exactions of our Hibernian domestic tyrants! John Leech, in his "Flunkeyania" and "Servantgalism," has portrayed minor phases of the insolence of servitude; but transatlantic pictures sink into utter insignificance compared with the utter, abject enslavement of our New York households under Irish despotism. Time was when no fictitious gloss of varnish shone upon the mahogany of our fathers, but wax and sturdy "elbow grease" were applied each day until the table's surface mirrored the well-washed glass pendants of the chandelier above; when the brass mountings of the grates and fire-irons must be burnished into dazzling brightness; when oil-lamps were to be trimmed and filled, and water, whether for potation or ablution, to be scooped from the pump at the gutter; and all these and other multifarious duties were performed by two, or at most three, servants for a large family. Under the new régime we are assailed by each and every applicant for exorbitant wages, with a formal, continued question somewhat in this fashion:—"How many of you in the family? Have you gas and stationary table, and hot and cold water? I'll not do the nurse's washing. I have every other Sunday morning, on Sunday or Wednesday evening every week. Do you keep a girl to wash up the kitchen things after me? Is the kitchen light on any? Do you have only dinner on Sundays, because I likes to have me afterwards to myself?" These new-fangled "domestics" are required for half the work performed in former times by one, and, bad as they are, Masterhouse has learned by sad experience that each change makes matters worse, and is afraid to find fault or demand for their exactions, in dread of their conventional—Very well, and now, then, if ye please ye'll suit yourself with another girl or I'll have white me another's up." In good work, if "Ireland for the Irish" imply the re-assignment of all be-hoped iconoclasts from our intelligentsia offices back to their own verdant isle, the Fenian cause has no more sincere well-wishers than the present writer.

THE CENTRAL PARK OF NEW YORK.*

THE CENTRAL PARK of New York is the most thoroughly National Institution in the land. The Report of the Board in whom is intrusted its charge to the management shows that during the year ending with December 31, 1861, there were more than seven and a half millions of visits made to the Park. This number represents quite a new individual element. Not a few persons, like the writer of this, went several times, and were so often counted. Very many were more than once, and large numbers only a single time. Few persons now come to New York for business or pleasure who do not visit the Park. In the absence of all positive data at this point we judge that a million separate individuals visited the Park during the year 1861. Of these we suppose about one-half were residents of the metropolis and its immediate environs; the other half came from other parts of the country, and from abroad.

Before proceeding upon the many interesting

* First Annual Report of the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park, for the Year ending with December 31, 1861.

* The pedestrians and equestrians are counted individually; the vehicles are counted, and an average of three persons is allowed to each. The following is the exact number of visits to the Park, as then made:

Federations, individually counted	1,125,000
Equestrians, individually counted	94,000
Vehicles, 3 allowed, three persons to each	1,275,000
Total made to Park	2,594,000

But we think the estimate of three persons to a vehicle is too low. We should give the average at fifty feet. On the other hand, as we shall have occasion to refer, about 400,000 vehicles passed over the Park at its lower extremity, went through and beyond it, and again re-entrained, and so were counted twice. Many persons also come into the Park outside of the regular entrance. The incidental errors on one side will about balance those on the other, so that we may safely say that during the year 1861 there were between seven and eight millions—better eight than seven—visits to the Central Park.

points involved in the Report of the Board of Commissioners we must say a few words concerning the Board itself. Charges of corruption or incompetency have been brought against almost every other body of men having in trust the municipal affairs of the city of New York. Not a few of these charges are proved or provable; many—we wish we could say the majority—are, we trust, unfounded. But from first to last the administration of the Central Park Commissioners has been not only pure, but unsuspected, and to them has been confided the charge of laying out and controlling the streets above the Park, and constructing the grand Boulevard which will form its appropriate adjunct. The present Board consists of Charles H. Russell, J. F. Butterworth, Waldo Hutchins, Thomas C. Fields, Andrew H. Green, Henry G. Stebbins, R. M. Blatchford, M. H. Grinnell. Few residents of the metropolis need be told how much private worth and public spirit are embodied in these eight names. Mr. Green, as Treasurer and Comptroller, is the executive officer of the Board; and in ascribing to him the chief credit of the admirable manner in which the affairs of the Park have been managed, we no more detract from the merits of his associates and subordinates than, in ascribing to Grant the merit of conducting the closing campaign of the war, we undervalue the services of Sherman and Thomas, of Sheridan and Meade, or of the thousands and hundreds of thousands, from General to Private, who, each in his sphere, performed the duty laid upon him.

We think we perceive in the honest and capable administration of the Park promise of the inauguration of something like it in other departments of our municipal affairs. Thus, when people pass from the filthy streets around into the well-kept roads within the Park, and learn from actual statistics how much less good management costs than bad, they may imagine that the system of capacity and honesty is capable of being somewhat extended. It may occur to them, for example, that the proper business of the Street Department is not so much to provide sinecures for politicians, or to secure votes for "our party," whatever that may be, as to put and keep the streets in good order. If "evil communications corrupt good manners," good communications should amend evil manners. Who knows but that some day we may even come to have an honest Common Council?

To one who looks upon the map of the city as it now exists the name "Central Park" will seem a misnomer; a generation ago it would have been an absurdity; a generation hence it will have become exact truth. Manhattan Island is a tongue of land thrust southward toward the Atlantic; or rather into the deep bay which opens into the ocean by the strait throat known as "the Narrows." The island is $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, coming to a point at its southern extremity, and increasing irregularly northward, having usually a breadth of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, occasionally contracting to half that distance. On the west it is bounded by the Hudson, here called the "North River," a name given by the early explorers to distinguish it from the Delaware or "South River;" on the east by the "East River," which is no river at all, but an arm of the sea opening into Long Island Sound, and thence into the broad Atlantic. The lower end of the island, for about five miles, originally consisted of a succession of low sand-hills, swamps, ponds, and creeks. But the hills have been leveled, the swamps, ponds, and creeks filled up, and now the whole presents the aspect of an ascending plane sloping off on either side to the rivers, and entirely covered by buildings and streets. At the lower edge of the Park, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the "Battery," the general elevation is about 80 feet above high-water mark. A little below this, however, ridges of bare solid rock begin to crop out; these, within the Park, in the space of a mile reach the utmost height of 135 feet, then within another mile and a half the land sinks down again almost to water-level, at the upper end of the Park. Then again it rises sharply into the picturesque ridge known as Washington Heights, whence it slopes down again to water-level at Harlem River, the upper portion of which, known as "Spuyten Duyvel Creek," is merely a passage through which a small portion of the waters of the Hudson make their way through a narrow gorge into the Harlem River, itself an offset of the East River. Flurries of wind are apt to sweep through this narrow gorge, to the detriment of small craft plying on the Hudson. According to the voracious Diedrich Knickerbocker, one of the old Dutch worthies—if we remember rightly it was Anthony Van Corlear—baffled by these gusts, swore that he would pass the point, Spuyt den Duyvel—"in spite of the Devil." Another legend says that this gorge was held by the Dutch settlers to be the abode of a "Spitting Devil," who blew wind-flaws from his big mouth. Between these two possible etymologies one may find a satisfactory explanation of the present appellation of the northern boundary of the Island of Manhattan.

The lower part of the island is laid out with no special regard for regularity; the streets, running in every conceivable direction, being mainly named in honor of some notable person or family of the olden time. As we go up town the endeavor for regularity becomes more and more decided. At Fourteenth Street, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles from the Battery, the regular system fairly ousts the old one. Above this line, and partially a little below, all the streets running lengthwise are known as "Avenues," numbered from First to Twelfth, with several shorter ones, rendered necessary by the conformation of the island. These Avenues run parallel, in straight lines for miles. The streets which cross them are numbered from First Street upward, Fourteenth Street being the lowest which completely crosses the breadth of the island. This rectangular arrangement continues to One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Street, nearly ten miles from the Battery; beyond which it is assumed that the plan of the streets will conform to the irregular surface of the ground. For many years this extreme upper portion of the island will constitute a suburb of the metropolis.

The Central Park is bounded on the south by Fifty-ninth Street; on the north by One Hundred and Tenth Street; on the east by Fifth Avenue; on the west by Eighth Avenue. Its lower end is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the Battery; its upper end $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Spuyten Duyvel Creek. It lies almost exactly midway between the East and North rivers, and thus occupies nearly the geographical centre of the island. Its form is a rectangle, the longer sides being nearly $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (13,506 feet); the shorter sides something more than half a mile (2718 feet). It covers 867 acres, of which the New Croton Reservoir occupies 107 acres, the Old Reservoir 35 acres; ornamental waters take up 44 acres, the principal being the Lake 20 acres, Harlem Lake 13 acres, the Pond 5 acres; in all, 151 acres of water. Of the 711 acres of land, 115 are occupied by roads and walks, 24 by rock, 324 are laid out in trees, shrubbery, and lawns. There are 25 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles of walks, $9\frac{1}{2}$ of carriage road, $5\frac{1}{2}$ of bridle road; or 40 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles of roads and paths. There are 43 bridges and archways of various forms and materials, wood, brick, stone, and iron.

With the exception of the exterior wall, now in progress, and the eighteen gateways—four at each end, and five on each side—the work of the construction of the Park is essentially completed. When this was begun, nine years ago, a more forbidding, and, except for its proximity to a great city, a more worthless piece of ground, could hardly be found than the greater part of that now covered by the lower half of the Park. What are now ornamental waters were filthy mud-holes and swamps; the remainder was mainly bare rock and tangled brushwood. The few inhabitable spots were squatted upon by rag-pickers, bone-gatherers, and pig-keepers, whose extinct shanties still find their counterparts in many places hard by. By what laborious draining and blasting, digging down and filling up, this unsightly patch of ground has been transformed into the Ramble, the Mall, the lakes and lawns, the paths and drives, can be appreciated only by one who has from year to year watched the progress of the work. Nature had indeed done more for the upper half of the ground; but throughout the guiding principle has been kept in view, to preserve every beauty and remove every defect which Nature had left. With what skill and taste this has been done becomes more and more apparent from year to year, almost from week to week, as the growth of trees and shrubbery harmonizes the work of Art with that of Nature. Four years ago the design of the Park was criticised, and justly if one saw it only as it then was, as an artificial collection of bridges and bare winding roads. We who now see it in a good measure as it existed in the mind of the architects, and note how the purely artificial has assumed its appropriate place in the natural, will not be disposed to repeat the criticism.

All told, the Park has, up to January 1, 1866, cost the city a little more than nine and three-quarter millions of dollars; five millions for the ground itself, and four and three-quarter millions for construction.* Never, even in a mere pecuniary point of view, was money more profitably expended. The interest paid on the bonds issued to defray this cost amounts to $231,400; the maintenance of the Park cost last year $221,166; the entire annual expense of the Park is therefore $852,566; say, in round numbers, eight hundred thousand dollars. The assessed value of the property of the three wards which immediately surround the Park was, in 1856, $26,460,000; in 1865, $31,000,000; an increase of $4,600,000. The taxes paid to the city upon this increased valuation amount to $1,034,000. It is true that a part of this increased valuation would have occurred had the Park not been established; but, on the other hand, the Park has greatly increased the value of property not lying within these three wards. It is quite safe to say, that the city received last year one million of dollars in taxes which it would not have received had the Park not been established. That is, the city during the last year paid out eight hundred thousand dollars on account of the Park, and received from it, in the way of increased taxes, a full million. Thus, the direct income to the city, as a corporation, derived from the Park exceeded its expenditures on account of it by two hundred thousand dollars.

We dare not attempt to estimate the present actual value of the Park as a property; the sum, that is, for which it might now be sold in open market. But it is safe to say that, should the city so choose, it could within a year sell enough land within the Park to pay every dollar of the debt incurred on account of it, and that this would hardly be missed. Thus: out of 125 feet from the lower end, fronting upon Fifty-ninth Street. This would make about 100 "lots" of 25×130 feet, each one of which would be worth to-day \$40,000—four million dollars in all. Yet this piece of ground would be less than $\frac{1}{100}$ th part of the Park. Of course no such sale should or will be made; but the actual value of the Park, or any part of it, is not diminished from the fact that it is worth more to keep than to sell.

A series of tables in this Report furnishes some curious statistics as to the visitors to the Park. Four persons come in carriages for three who come on foot. There is one equestrian for every thirty-four pedestrians. The average number of visitors for every day, fair and foul, is a little more than 20,000. The largest number was on the 4th of July, when there were 75,000 pedestrians; on that day there were probably not less than 120,000 visitors. The smallest number was the stormy 21st of November, when there were but 74 pedestrians; but about 100 sleighs ventured out, so that there were about 400 people in the Park. The largest number of pedestrians in any one month was in January, when there were 658,000. The greater part of these were attracted by the skating, the ball being up almost every day. In January, 1863, there were but two days skating, and only 51,000 pedestrians entered. The largest number of visitors on foot, in carriages, and on horseback, was in August, when there were 950,000. Then come July, 914,000; January, 891,000; September, 890,000. The smallest number in any month was December, 282,000; in this month the carriage people outnumbered the foot folks more than three to one. More than one-third of the pedestrians come on Sundays, the Sunday average being nearly four times that of any week-day except Saturday. The Sunday attendance of carriages and equestrians is considerably above the week-day average. The entire number of Sunday visitors of all classes is about twice the week-day average.

No account is kept of visitors between 11 at night and 5 in the morning. Hardly a person enters between these hours. From 5 to 6, during nine months of the year, from October till June, only two pedestrians appeared; during the other three months 2000 pedestrians, 500 equestrians, and 5000 people in carriages came. From 6 to 7 the equestrians come out to the number of 10,000, almost as many as during any other hour of the day. They keep up this number till 9, when there is a sudden falling off of half or two-thirds, which lasts until 3, when they again begin to appear in force, reaching 13,000 between 4 and 5. The horsemen thus are men of business, mainly engaged from 9 till 3.

The pedestrians, during the year, increase from hour to hour, thus: From 6 to 7, 10,000; 7 to 8, 22,000; 8 to 9, 41,000; 9 to 10, 79,000; 10 to 11, 113,000; 11 to 12, 140,000; 12 to 1, 165,000; 1 to 2, 267,000; 2 to 3, 479,000; 3 to 4, 586,000. Here it reaches its maximum, and begins to decrease thus: From 4 to 5, 501,000; 5 to 6, 290,000; 6 to 7, 135,000; 7 to 8, 107,000; 8 to 9, 60,000; 9 to 10, 16,000; 10 to 11, 3000. The largest number during a single hour in any month was 112,000, between 2 and 3, in January.

The rush of vehicles comes on later. They increase thus: From 5 to 6, 2000; 6 to 7, 12,000; 7 to 8, 22,000; 8 to 9, 30,000; 9 to 10, 38,000. Up to this hour there have been more carriages than pedestrians in the Park; and thus three or four times as many persons have entered in vehicles than on foot. From 10 to 11, 43,000; 11 to 12, 38,000; 1 to 2, 56,000; 2 to 3, 120,000; 3 to 4, 212,000. The next two hours are the great driving time: From 4 to 5, 301,000; 5 to 6, 305,000. Then the carriages fall off rapidly: From 6 to 7, 171,000; 7 to 8, 90,000; 8 to 9, 25,000; 9 to 10, 7000; 10 to 11, 2000.

The points at which visitors enter the Park present some curious considerations.

Of the pedestrians two and a quarter millions

—two-thirds of the whole—go in by the four entrances on Fifty-ninth Street, at the lower end of the Park. By the Fifth Avenue entrance 368,000 go in; as there is no railroad in this avenue these may all be assumed to have come on foot from various distances. By the Sixth Avenue entrance 761,000 go in; by the Seventh Avenue, 450,000; by the Eighth Avenue, 671,000. It may be safely assumed that two-thirds of these come to and go from the Park by the railroads in these avenues. Moreover, 237,000 enter at various points on the Eighth Avenue; most of these come up by that railroad. And nearly 650,000 come in by the entrances on Fifth Avenue; most of these have come up by the Second and Third Avenue railroads. Putting these probable railroad passengers together, we think that not less than a million and a half of passengers are brought to and carried from the Park by these railroads. Hardly 50,000 pedestrians enter the Park at its upper end, on One Hundred and Tenth Street.

The Fifth Avenue is the favorite approach to the Park for vehicles and equestrians. More than one-half of these (716,000 carriages and 56,000 equestrians) passed through the entrance on Fifty-ninth Street and Fifth Avenue. In all, not less than two and a half millions of visits were made through this one entrance. One notable fact deserves mention and explanation. The main upper entrance at present is at the Sixth Avenue, on One Hundred and Tenth Street. Through this only 2300 equestrians and 36,000 pedestrians passed, while there were 450,000 vehicles, conveying fully a million and a half of individuals. In this neighborhood, but beyond the limits of the Park, are several rather noted hostleries. It is quite common for those who ride through the Park to pass out here, stop for "refreshments" at these hostleries, and then re-enter the Park on their homeward way. Those also who rejoice in fast "teams," which they wish to drive at greater speed than the decorous rate to which they are necessarily restricted in the Park, take a "spin" on the smooth roads in the upper part of the island, and, returning, enter the Park by this gate. Probably 300,000 vehicles, conveying a million of persons, re-entered here, and so are counted twice in the record of visitors. A noteworthy fact in regard to the entrances here is that they are slightly affected by the season. In no one month were there less than 16,000, in only two were there less than 30,000, and in only two more than 50,000.

We have thus far spoken of the value of the Park to the city of New York as a corporation. It brought last year into the treasury of the city a quarter more than it cost for interest upon capital invested and for current expenses. This profit will increase from year to year, for the annual expenditures have nearly reached their ultimate maximum, while the value of the surrounding property, and consequently of its taxation—that is, the revenue derived by the city therefrom—must go on increasing from year to year. Who will dare now to say what the taxable value of the property immediately around the Park will be ten years hence? We believe that the assessed value in 1866 exceeds that of 1865 by several millions.

While the City of New York, as a corporate body, has gained thus greatly by the establishment of the Park, individual citizens have profited still more largely. Let us suppose that of the increased valuation of $34,000,000 within ten years of the property immediately around the Park one-half has been owing to direct expenditures by the owners in the way of building and the like, and to the natural advance which would have happened independent of the Park, and there still remains $17,000,000 of increased value arising wholly from the establishment of the Park.* This is not a mere hypothetical increase of value—as when a speculative stock which last year sold at 50 per cent. is now quoted at 100 per cent., the real worth, based upon the ratio of receipts to expenditures, being unchanged—but a substantial increase of value. The actual worth of a plot of land or a building is as truly increased by the Park being brought to it as the actual worth of a bushel of corn is increased by its being brought from the prairies of Illinois to a storehouse in New York.

The business directly arising from the establishment of the Park spreads so widely in every direction as to be beyond the reach of direct analysis. Let us look at two branches, for which the Tables to which we have referred furnish materials for an approximate estimate. We may assume that of the nearly a million and a half of vehicles which entered the Park a million were hired. Three dollars for each trip would be a low estimate. Here, then, is a business of $3,000,000 created wholly by the Park, and which without it would have had no existence. Ultimately the profits of this great business are shared in small portions by many thousands of persons all over the country. They go first to the owners of the vehicles, through them to the drivers, the stable-men, the mechanics who build the carriages and construct the harnesses, the breeders who raise the horses, and the farmers who produce the hay and grain upon which they are fed; and so on through every ramification of industrial life.

Again, the four city railroads which approach the Park conveyed fully a million and a half of passengers each way, receiving by way of fares not less than $200,000, two-thirds of which sum must be considered as net profit; for it happens that the tide of travel to and from the Park sets in at just the hours when there is a lull in the ordinary business transit. Two-thirds of the visitors go up between the hours of 12 and 5, and come down between 4 and 7. Now the Companies would, in any case, be obliged to have their cars down town late in the afternoon to meet the current of up-town travel, they are obliged to run no extra cars, and make no extra trips to bring down the returning Park visitors. The extraordinary value of the Eighth and Sixth Avenue lines, and, in a measure, of the Third, is to be attributed directly to the Park.

But great as is this pecuniary advantage to the city and to individuals, it is the least of the benefits arising from the Park. Every thing is useful just in proportion as it in some way adds to human enjoyment. A good dinner, a convenient house, elegant furniture, fine clothing, ornaments, a swift horse, or a fast yacht, are useful in this respect, and no other. So pictures, statuary, and music are useful. In fact, the common distinction between the useful and the ornamental is really baseless. The Park is useful, because it adds to human enjoyment. But the amount of enjoyment derived from any thing is not unfrequently wholly incapable of being expressed in dollars and cents. If we could somehow find out just how much each of the eight million visitors to the Park would give rather than not have the Park open to them, we could approximate a little toward its value. Even this would be only an approximation, for not unfrequently people derive more benefit than they dream of from enjoyments for which there is no monetary measure. No man can say, for example, how much the health of the city is owing to the Park.

Its civilizing and humanizing influence is something wholly incalculable. The visitors belong to every class and grade of society, and yet every one seems there to be on his good behavior. For ourselves, in hundreds of visits, we have never seen a single instance of misconduct. There were, indeed, during the year 115 arrests; but of these 63—almost three-fifths—were simply for fast driving: the temptation of a fast horse and smooth roads was too great for the virtue of threescore and three persons, and, in consequence, 61 of them found themselves mulcted in a fine of ten dollars or less each. There were 45 cases of "disorderly conduct" and "other offenses." These could not have been very aggravated, for we find that just that number were discharged by the magistrate "with reprimand or otherwise." One poor fellow was sent to the Alms-house; so that his offense, whatever it was, could not have amounted to a crime. Thus of the 115 arrests 107 were for offenses wholly venial. There remain eight cases. Six were for assault and battery; these offenders, and one other, were "temporarily committed." There was one thief, and he was "bound over for trial." So that out of eight million visitors, there were but eight—one in a million—charged with offenses of sufficient gravity to be fairly considered crimes. When a few other places show a like favorable record, we shall be prepared to believe that we have got far into the Millennium without knowing it.

Not the least evidence of the civilizing influences of the Park is to be found in the fact that they have fairly mastered the national propensity to whittling. Every male American beyond the age of five is presumed to be the owner of a knife; and few of us but have felt the force of the impulse to try its edge upon any thing entable. The juvenile George Washington yielded to the temptation to apply his hatchet to his father's favorite cherry-tree. Now, in all our walks through the Park, we have never seen a case where any one has whittled a seat, or carved his name upon a tree or railing; or even where an enthusiastic damsel has penciled the initials of her name and the date immortalized by her visit. Even the temptation to break a shrub or pluck a flower has been valorously resisted and finally overcome. In 1863 there were nine cases of such offenses; in 1864, one; in 1865, none.

* This is merely the "assessed" value. The actual value is fully twice this amount, probably much more.

In managing the Park the Commissioners have kept steadily in view the one object of making it a pleasure-ground; admitting nothing which would interfere with this; prohibiting nothing which would conduce to it. Stretching for almost three miles between the two great bounding rivers, it was a necessity that provision should be made for transit across it of business traffic. This is attained by the construction of three "transverse roads," designed for traffic. These are so arranged that whenever it is necessary that a drive or walk should cross them, it is carried over by bridges. There can never be any choking up of the passage by one line of vehicles crossing another. The Commissioners have wisely resisted the importunities urged upon them to set apart a portion of the Park for a military parade-ground, and other portions for cricket and the "national game" of base-ball. A slight exception has been made by granting a ball ground for the students of the public schools and the "Free Academy." This, we think, should be rescinded. Space could by no possibility be given to all the ball-clubs who would like to play there; and as the claims of all are equal, we think that none should be allowed.

The rules and regulations for visitors are of the briefest. Apart from the general one of orderly behavior, which holds every where, they may be summed up in ten words; "Do not pluck leaves or flowers," and "Keep off the grass." The latter regulation is modified on Saturdays, and a few holidays, by setting apart certain portions of the sward, designated by placards as "commons," upon which persons may go. Any one who has seen the glee with which men, women, and children, whose feet except upon such occasions touch only graveled roads or stone pavements, repose or play upon the soft velvet sward, will see how much the actual enjoyment of the Park is enhanced by this permission. So wholly free from abuse has been the exercise of this privilege that we suggest a further extension of it. Let a considerably larger space be set apart to be used from time to time as "commons." Half the space now appropriated for Saturdays would be amply sufficient for any day; but let there be every day some part or parts thus made common, and designated as at present for that purpose. Of course the same parts would not be so used on two successive days, probably not twice in the same week, or perhaps fortnight. Visitors would in a half hour find out any day where these places were, and the keepers could inform those who inquired whereabouts were the "commons" for the day. The proper officers of the Board would, of course, have the absolute control of this; and if at any time the state of the soil rendered it inexpedient, no "commons" would be designated for the time. This, we think, would never happen at times when any one would wish to go upon the sward. On special holidays, like the 4th of July, when an unusual influx of visitors would come, a larger space than usual, and at various points, might be thus opened. The certainty that upon any day there would be access to the green-sward would form a great attraction to the Park, especially for those to whom of all others it is for the well-being of the community that the place should be rendered attractive. Let the toil-worn artisan, his weary wife, and pining children, be assured that on any bright summer or autumn day they would find sward and shade open to them, and their welcome faces would be yet more frequent in the Park. We think that the number of seats scattered about the walks should be largely increased. Two thousand stools or camp-chairs, so light that visitors could themselves shift them into the shady side of the walk in summer, or the sunny side in spring or autumn, would not be too many.

The Park will become more and more attractive year by year. The Commissioners have followed the wise counsel of the Laird of Dumbiedikes: "When ye hae naething else to do ye may aye be sticking in a tree; it'll be growing when ye are sleeping." Besides the tens of thousands of trees and shrubs transplanted within the limits of the grounds a beginning has been made toward placing a continuous double line of elms along the exterior walks; these, in the course of time, will form a shaded avenue thirty feet broad around the whole Park. Public-spirited citizens will be continually presenting works of art; not a few of these have already been presented. Every such acquisition, whether of tree or statue, fountain or vase, will be an inheritance for generations. By wisely applying the principles of hydraulics to the natural drainage, fountains and jets d'eau can be constructed at many points without making any demands upon the Croton Works. The present zoological collection and museum are merely intimations of what is to be. We trust that before many years shall have passed there will be institutions of this kind here established which shall rival the most famous in the capitals of Europe.

The planning of the Park has been conducted with such admirable taste and skill that it is only after mature consideration we venture to condemn so important a feature as the proposed boundary wall. This, as may be seen from the small portion already constructed, is to be a solid wall of rough-hammered stone, surmounted by a pent-house coping, about four feet high, and only broken at intervals of half a mile by gateways. This formal boundary is utterly out of harmony with every other part and portion of the design. Nothing can ever prevent it from giving to the exterior line of the Park the aspect of a prison rather than that of a pleasure. It will shut off the view into the Park from those without, and the view out of the Park from those within. This defect will become glaringly apparent a few years hence, when the shaded avenue all around is completed. Then we shall have a double line of forest trees bounded on one side by the street, on the other by a heavy, unornamented stone-wall. The gateways will not break this unpleasant monotony, for they will stand so far apart that even the tops of no two of them along the sides can be taken in at a glance.

Unless there be some special reason to the contrary, connected with the police and maintenance of the Park, there should, in our judgment, be no exterior wall or fence. Had it been possible to have given a varied outline, it would have been far better; but as we are shut up to the rectangular outline it should be made as graceful as may be. To our mind the double avenue of elms is the appropriate boundary of the Park. But if a stricter line is for any reason necessary, we would have a low iron fence of graceful design, and so open as to present the least possible obstruction to the view from within outward, or from without inward.

The present condition of the streets and avenues around the Park is simply disgraceful. With the exception of the half mile on Fifty-ninth Street, not one of those which immediately touch it, and few of those which approach it, are decently passable. For this the Board of Commissioners is nowise responsible. The control of these streets is in the hands of the Street Department. The ground over which pass the Eighth Avenue, and most of the streets leading to the Park from the west, is so broken and rocky that a long time must necessarily elapse before they can be properly regulated. But there is no possible excuse for the condition of the Fifth Avenue, where it bounds the Park. The grade is fixed, and it would require but little time or expense to place it in a passable condition. For years this avenue will not in any case be used as a means of transit for heavy vehicles. Were it now built up continuously, it would be used mainly as a drive. To fit it for this purpose it need not be paved, or even macadamized. A well-constructed earth-road would answer all present requirements better than any other. This avenue is so intimately connected with the Park that it is to be regretted that its management was not placed in the hands of the Commissioners as well as that of the Sixth and Seventh avenues above the Park. It is not now too late to do this. Let it be done, and we venture to say that the work involved in the trust would be well and speedily accomplished.

DAS MEERMÄDCHEN.

Oh spring is blithe and summer gay,
The autumn golden and winter gray.

But the seasons come and the seasons go,
All alike to me in their ebb and flow,

Since the day I rode by the cheating sea
And one of its maidens had speech with me.

Her skin was whiter than words can speak,
The blush of the sea-shell lit her cheek:

Her lips had ripened in coral caves,
Her eyes were blue as the deeper waves;

And her fair yellow hair floated far and free
In curls of amber upon the sea.

"Knight, gallant knight, a boon I pray:
Give me to ride thy charger-gray."

"Oh, ships for the sea but steeds for the shore, I'll give thee a boat with a golden oar!"

"Nay, gallant knight, no charm has the sea;
I would dwell on the green earth ever with thee."

For her speech was fair as her face was fair;
Had she asked my soul it was hers, I swear.

And I led her as light as sea-birds flit
Where my steed stood champing his golden bit.

The stirrups of silver were wrought in Spain,
My hand into hers put the silken rein.

And that is the last, though the stars are old,
I saw of my steed with its housings of gold.

Was ever such folly in all the world wide,
But who would have thought a mermaid could ride?

Or a maiden of earth, of air, or the wave,
Should fly from her love with the wings he gave?

Faithless and loveless I walk by the shore,
Never a maiden has speech with me more.

But this brings not back my charger gray,
Nor the false, false love who rode him away.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THERE is an entertaining book which describes in detail the progresses of various English monarchs through their realms in other days; and in Scott's "Kenilworth" there is a brilliant picture of an episode in a progress of Queen Elizabeth. There is a great deal of medieval splendor described, which was not very splendid; there are faithful and prolonged accounts of the allegories and masques to which yawning royalty was obliged to listen in patient submission, and there is the true story of the stupid adulation at full length to which our respectable and honorable ancestors condescended to prostitute themselves. Yet if at the Kenilworth revels some daring wight of a poet had proposed to display a historic vision or prophecy for the delectation of her sublime and sacred Majesty, and had then raised the curtain upon the spectacle which this country contemplated at the beginning of the autumn, he would have been laughed at as a foolish fellow and admonished to observe the decencies of probability in his inventions.

For there is a difference between a progress of Elizabeth Tudor and of Andrew Johnson, and no better measure of the advance of real civilization and of the identity of human nature could be found than a comparison of the two. To the vulgar the queen looked doubtless the goddess which she tried to appear. The old divinity still hedged the king, and the immense pageant, the genuflexion, the exaggeration, and clumsy conceit, all had a solemn significance which is to us incredible. It was supposed to be necessary to impress naughty human nature with the overpowering grandeur of authority. But it was precisely in the ages when the Beadle carried the biggest pole, and of the most elaborately swelled and splendid head, that the sense of authority was weakest and the law most infirm. If the Earl of Leicester had not been a lover and a favorite of Elizabeth he knew that he could be her rival. He was brother-in-law of Guildford Dudley and kinsman of the Duke of Northumberland. He had more retainers than Elizabeth had soldiers. Peace was a truce either of force or of fear among the great lords of whom the sovereign was only the greatest. The people in our sense, as a political power, did not exist. Their spirit muttered in Elizabeth's Parliaments, but it did not thunder until her second successor was in her seat.

But the tour of the President from Washington to Chicago and St. Louis, and thence back across the country to Louisville and Cincinnati and home again, by the common conveyance, without a guard, stopping at public houses, and differing from the tour of any other person in the country only by the greater interest that attended it, reveals the utterly new time and new spirit upon which we have entered. The interest which invests the President is, of course, partly personal, for there is always a great popular desire to see any man of whom much has been said, whether in praise or censure; but the chief interest to the people is to see the man whom they have chosen to represent their own power and authority; and the true sublimity of the spectacle is that they respect in him that authority which springs solely from themselves; which he holds under conditions which they prescribe, and yet an authority which resides in no one citizen nor in any part of the mass of citizens, but only in the whole body.

A dignity so derived is inexpressible. No Pope elected by a few cardinals; no King calling the might of an ancestor divine right; no traditional and unquestioned descent of magisterial authority compares in essential dignity for a moment with that of the intelligent grant of an intelligent majority of an intelligent people; a dignity which needs no guard because it is in no peculiar danger, being exposed to malevolence only as every man must be. Louis Napoleon professes to reign by the virtually unanimous suffrages of the French people. But he does not drive out nor ride with his son but a swarm of detectives, carefully concealed, line the way and watch narrowly for dangers. But Abraham Lincoln came and went upon all his daily duties in the midst of a tremendous civil war, and although he was in the midst of political opponents as well as friends, when he fell it was as if by a blow of private hate from which no man is secure, and foes vied with friends in hearty detestation of the criminal and the crime.

If the holder of so great a dignity forgets or despises it, he still can not evade it. The Pope may be a vicious sinner, but to the heart of faith he is still the vicegerent of God. The President may angrily quarrel with a crowd, may publicly renounce in words and acts all respect for his dignity, but the people can not and do not, without renouncing respect for themselves. It is, indeed, purely impersonal. It has none of that quality of loyalty to a family which, of necessity, soon ceases to regard them as merely representative, and honors them as separate and superior—a confusion which makes at once the poetry and the folly of Toryism. As it is a dignity independent of himself the holder may become ridiculous while the office remains unimpaired in public respect and regard. Respect will be offered to the office long after regard for the incumbent has ceased; for it must never be forgotten that it is not the man, whether worthy or unworthy, to whom the honor attaches—it is to the authority and will of the people. If the man be loved also, it is because of his private virtues, which would secure the same regard in his private circle, and which are known in the officer only because of his conspicuous position.

The late progress of the President has served chiefly to show how well the American people understand themselves. In a very few places there were disturbances which every thoughtful and patriotic man sincerely regretted. For the first and final test of a truly free civilization is the perfect protection instinctively afforded to every expression of opinion every where. As long as there is any part of this country in which any sentiments whatever may not be expressed, not only without disturbance but without fear of it, so long that part is still barbarous. There is no proper conception of a free government until this is fully understood. And every man can see that if in any part of the land there be customs or laws which will not be discussed, they are the very things that ought not to be tolerated. When the surgeon passes his hand over the body he knows that the spot upon which pressure makes the patient wince is the sore spot and the seat of the disease. Those people who did not wish to hear the President certainly had no right to prevent others from hearing him. It is a truth so plain that it ought not to require repetition. But it is surely pleasant to reflect that whatever the ludicrous or painful incidents of a Presidential progress may be, the respect of the people for the august office remains unimpaired.

PUBLIC affairs at home are sufficiently engrossing, but it is impossible not to look with interest upon those of other countries across the sea. The war in Europe is for the present over, but in England the great Reform excitement, which shook the country to the verge of civil war, is beginning anew, with more than its old majesty. Even with us there are not often popular meetings of such enormous numbers as those in England; and the late great assembly at Birmingham, the centre of the popular movements and the constituency of John Bright, was one of the most imposing ever known. This was strictly in accordance with the local traditions, for Birmingham was the scene of the Reform meeting of the 7th May, 1832, which was supposed to be the largest ever held in Great Britain up to that time. The number present was estimated at 150,000. The platform was erected at the foot of a huge hill, so that the voices of the speakers were readily heard to the edges of the vast throng. When the hour for the meeting had arrived a bugle-call rang through the air, and was followed by profound silence, and after a few introductory words from the chairman a hundred thousand voices sang the Union Hymn; and then following one of the speakers, who bade them, in the face of heaven and the God of Justice and Mercy, to repeat his words, the assembly, with bared heads, slowly uttered the vow: "With unbroken faith, through every peril and privation, we here devote ourselves and our children to our country's cause." Against such a spirit it was folly to struggle, and the House of Peers reluctantly assented to the bill.

This great contest has been, as we said, renewed, and on the 27th of August of this year a meeting, greater by a hundred thousand persons, was held at Birmingham. "A quarter of a million of people came," says an eye-witness, "people who can't vote, but only think—people who pay taxes, but who have no political rights which the privileged classes have hitherto felt bound to respect." The particular attraction was the meeting in the Town Hall in the evening, at which an address was to be presented to John Bright and Mr. Scholefield, his fellow-member of Parliament for Birmingham. The hall was full—that is to say, six thousand persons were wedged into it—a larger number, we suppose, than could stand in any room in this country. The Birmingham Hall is one of the most famous in the world. It is 145 feet long by 65 feet broad and 65 high. Its decorations are very brilliant, and the organ is not surpassed by any other. In this bright theatre the eager crowd gathered in the evening to see and hear the one Englishman whom of all Englishmen Americans would most gladly hear and see.

When John Bright came forward the audience rose in a body. "The cheering was as continuous as Niagara, and was caught up and rolled back into the hall in great waves of sound by the 20,000 outside." This acclamation lasted for six minutes by the watch, during which Mr. Bright stood quietly gazing at the roaring multitude, but without making a sign. He is a strongly-built man of about five feet ten inches in height, with straight, thick, gray hair, and broad brow overhanging prominent eyes, with tightly-closed lips, and the lower half of the face too long for symmetry. His eyes alone tenderly replied to the ardor of the immense salutation. When the thunder of applause died away he began to speak very slowly and deliberately, with notes before him, to which he seldom recurred. Yet one who knows him well says that his habit is to prepare long before and thoroughly to elaborate any important speech like that of this occasion. The American to whose published letter in the Tribune we are indebted for this personal description of the orator was most impressed by his power—the mental and moral force of the man. Yet the tone of his speech was most moderate, making the invective and sarcasm only the more effective. The drollery was not less fine; and although the orator's voice was almost gone during the last half-hour, the art with which the disability was made to serve his purpose was consummate. Gathering himself at the very close he said: "The address which has been presented to me referred to the time of 1832. I remember the time well. My young heart was then stirred with the trumpet-blast that sounded from your midst. There was no part of this kingdom where your voice was not heard. Let it sound again!" And the cry of the multitude rang through the hall and far out into the night, as if literally to arouse the kingdom.

John Bright is the living leader of the English people. No man of equal power and popularity ever spoke directly for and to them so persuasively as he. There have been champions of the nobility, champions of the House of Commons, but no orator of the great multitude of the population before John Bright; and the tone of the speech of Mr. Lowe, in Parliament, which Mr. Bright quoted at Birmingham, inevitably reminds the reader of Macaulay's remark that the next struggle in England would be between the House of Commons and the people. "I ask," cried Mr. Lowe, "if you want venality, ignorance, drunkenness, and the means of intimidation—if you want impulsive, unreflecting, and violent people, where will you go to look for them—to the top or to the bottom?" And speaking of those who paid a rent between seven and ten pounds, he added: "It would be a good thing if they were disfranchised altogether." John Bright's reply to this was simply a defiance in the name of the English workmen. He said that the accession of Lord Derby to office was a declaration of war against them, and the workmen thundered in reply that they accepted it.

In his Letters from England Louis Blanc describes Mr. Bright in a few vigorous touches which will be new to our readers, and will leave upon their minds a most vivid portrait of this remarkable leader. "A sonorous voice, flashing eyes, a flow of words that gushes forth like a torrent, and the ardor of an indomitable conviction—this is what constitutes the talents of Mr. Bright. He is aggressive, vehement, intrepid—intrepid to a fault. Looking at the air with which he attacks the aristocracy, in the classic land of aristocracy, one feels that he is one of those great wrestlers who require great obstacles and great adversaries. Looking at the air with which he braves public opinion, in a country where the despotism of public opinion forms the counterpoise to liberty, one feels that he believes himself capable of mastering the people while in the very act of arming them against himself. In the midst of the patriotic enthusiasm excited by the battles of the Alma and Inkermann he was to be heard thundering against the Crimean War, and calling it a blood-stained folly. At the height of the irritation produced by the affair of the Trent he was to be heard extolling the Republic of the United States, proposing it to the world as a model, and rushing forward with a sort of savage pride to affront the reproach of not having an English heart. At once austere and violent, Mr. Bright is half a Quaker, half a tribune. Beneath every one of the figures employed by his eloquence, always substantial though always animated, passion is heard growling. Statistics are brandished by him as a club would be by a muscular arm. When he recommends peace at any price he does so in words which seem to sound the charge. In Rome he would have been the man of the Forum; in England he is before all the man of the Hustings. But for that very reason he is ill at ease in the House of Commons, where a portion of his strength sometimes abandons him, and the atmosphere of which is evidently unsuited to his stormy eloquence."

On the other hand, the observer at Birmingham of whom we have spoken says: "To judge him rightly, and to give him full credit, one ought to hear Mr. Bright in the House of Commons, where he speaks to an audience not friendly, but critical and hostile, disliking equally the speaker and his cause, and feeling or affecting a contempt for any talent not nurtured in its classical schools. That John Bright commands the attention and compels the admiration, delighted against its own will of such a House, is probably the best evidence of his marvelous powers as an orator."

If any passenger in the streets of New York could be supposed to have time enough to stop and read the ballads which are strung along the railing of St. Paul's in Vesey Street, or sometimes along the Park railing, or on a smaller scale and a shorter line, in a few other public places, he would find a curious mixture of the sheerest sentimentality, broad farce, and indecency, although to the credit of the town the last is the least frequent element. There is always some allusion to the chief current topics of the time. The heroes of the hour are duly honored. The jokes and slang of the newspapers, the theatres, and the street, are all reflected upon these little sheets, and the songs which are every where suddenly sung, and which come from nobody knows where, and the words of which are generally unknown to the singers of the melody, are very sure to be found tranquilly flapping in the gusts upon these iron railings.

Despite the steady and generous influx of Germans we remain still an unmusical people, so that there are no places in which you are sure to hear the songs of the day. The music cellars and concert saloons upon Broadway and elsewhere are of another kind than the retreats in London of which Thackeray is so fond of telling, and to which young Clive Newcome repairs in the ingenious hope of seeing the world. The London cider-cellars offer a very coarse refreshment, but it is very characteristic. There the searcher after truth may study the people in the songs they love to hear; and he will probably hear nothing worse than those which the gay circles of Paris assemble to hear Thérèse sing. Indeed, the songs of the cellar in London are by no means uniformly or even generally offensive on the score of morality. There are enough of such, but they are not the staple. The most popular are songs of a certain kind of sentimental and even moral commonplace, with plentiful nonsense and coarse comedy which is not in the least comical. Much of the humor is in the local method and allusion which are meaningless to a stranger. But a writer in a late number of All the Year Round, who speaks of the decline and fall of the popular song, and who is appalled that Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic" should have given place to "Coster-monger Joe," seems to us to confuse facts. The naval songs of Campbell are succeeded by Tennyson's Charge at Balaklava; and "My Pretty Jane" and the "Rose of Allandale" by "Annie Laurie," while "Coster-monger Joe," like our negro minstrelsy, is a new thing under the sun.

Besides, more than half of the popularity of a song is in the melody, and the words are taken as they come. The difference of popularity, for instance, between "Jim Crow" and any comparatively unknown negro song is due chiefly to the fact that "Jim Crow" was one of the earliest of the kind, and by far the most striking in tune. So with Mr. Foster's song, "Old Folks at Home," and others, the melody was sung, played, and ground until we expected to hear the calves low it and the cocks crow it, but the words were known to very few. Then there is often a vague but recognizable humor in the broad farce of many of the songs which justifies their popularity. It seems that the "German Band" was an immensely popular song in London. It described the woes of the husband of Susannah, who fell in love with the player of the flageolet in a German band, who ultimately "went for a sojer" in America and was shot. But there is something comical in such lines as these:

"The French took one in G, and the flageolet in G.
And the rest of them all lost of time;
But amid this awful row there was someone
One who won the heart of Susannah,
Who stood laughing at the windies, while the German flageolet
Winked at her in a most peevish manner."

This is simply the humor of folly and high spirits, but it is not altogether contemptible. The song of the Six Magnificent Bricks undoubtedly requires the melody to explain its popularity. It is merely jolly nonsense; but there is something genuinely comical in the picture of hundreds of people attentively listening to it and pealing out the chorus:

"Myself and some friends came thinking there would be no harm
Went for a walk, a row, walking arm in arm.
The night it was dark, the streets were very calm
When we went out for a spree;
Said Jonas, now what do I tell you, my boys,
Hurrah, hurrah!
Louder, for that isn't half a noise,
Hurrah, hurrah!
Then we struck up the bag-pipes once again
To let the people see
That we, the magnificent bricks,
Had made up our minds for a spree.
Fal de loodle, fal de ral doodleum,
Argh! argh! there's Sal and Methusalem,
Argh! argh! they're gone to Jerusalem,
Doodleum, doodleum day."

Such things are certainly very trivial and foolish when we gravely read them. But there is a freemasonry of youth which explains and justifies this nonsense and all other. The man who has no nonsense in his soul is fit—well, he certainly is not fit society for a rainy day in the country, nor for any of those many happy times when, like the President at Cleveland, we wish to — our dignity and be rollicking children again. The baby in arms is to be pitied whose parent does not rattle off baby-talk; and he who holds that the nursery library is complete without Mother Goose is capable of furnishing it with a copy of the Dairyman's Daughter. What—let us ask the boy of fifteen and sixteen—what is more imposing and awe-inspiring than the College Senior; that paragon of men who conquers wherever he comes, and who is fondly and far-off copied by the admiring crew of the high school? Yet unquestionably superior among mortals as he is, the College Senior is also human. He has been known to smile, to shout, to roar, to rattle. Indeed, it is a touching illustration of the fraternity of our common human nature that if the College Senior should arrive in London he would probably go to the cider-cellar and the concert saloon before he went to court. He would be gladly and enthusiastically one of that distinguished company of respectable and middle-aged people, who are described by our friend in All the Year Round as declaring at the top of their voices that they were "Coster-monger Joe." If the energy of his performance should draw the attention of the hall to him, and the College Senior should be called upon to favor the company with a song, he would probably throw them into an ecstasy with a song which beats the cider-cellar with its own weapons:

"Right in the middle of the boom-jing-jing,
The boom-jing-jing, the boom-jing-jing,
Right in the middle of the boom-jing-jing—
All on a summer's day,
I dee, I da, the boom-jing-jing, the boom-jing-jing,
I dee, I da, the boom-jing-jing, I oh!
So sal la! la! la, so sal la! la! la,
So sal la! la! la, I ho!
Rise, chop, set him up again—set him up again,
Set him up again, rise, chop, set him up again,
All on a summer's day."

Here is a beautiful blending of dignity, precision, and solemn mystery to the rapturous encore which would be sure to follow this effusion from those who are delighted with the celebrated ditty of the London cellar circles:

"Jog along, jog along, jog along, boys!
Jog along, boys, with a rattle and noise
Jog along, jog along, jog along, boys.
Jog along, boys, hurrah!"

The College Senior would probably gravely respond with "The Taylor No. 1;—"

"I'm on the floor, or on the parson, or on the middle-stone,
We strike right into a 240 gals and rattle out I's dry bones;
And we'll show what we can do if we ever get into a toasts;
For we'll off with our coats, and roll up our sleeves, and get right on our nooses."

Chorus.

She is a gay bird, a night-owl, a wide-awake old soul—
The pride of old Baffin, as every body knows,
The pride of old Baffin, as I have sung for you;
And they call her the bloody hose-carriage—the Taylor No. 1."

Indeed, the merely superficial student of the College Senior knows little of the hidden springs of the secret songs of his life; and a traveler fresh from the London concert saloons, or from a faithful investigation of their lyric literature, would be amazed to find identically the same kind of humor in the relaxations of the Senior upon this side of the water. Many of the college comic songs are merely adaptations of the cider-cellar favorites, and one of the most striking characteristics of such favorites is their celebration of the loves of our fellow-creatures who drive butcher-carts, or preside over cooking ranges, or make the snowy bed, or follow some other necessary and reputable business which the Muse has hitherto disdained to sing. Thus one of the favorites of the year in "swell" circles within the sound of the great bell of Bow is "Sal and Mathusalem," of which this is one stanza:

"You must know that Sal was a smart young gal,
And her fame had traveled far;
And an oyster-stand she kept in the Strand
Not a mile from Temple Bar.
Her lover rose up each morning at five,
And he dressed by the light of a star;
He was a dog-destroyer at a sausage machine,
This young Mathusalem."

Chorus.

"The lady was fair, let me declare,
The gent tall and muscular;
And held in respect by one and all Were Sal and Mathusalem."

This is in the same vein as "Polly Perkins" of the college circles:

"I'm a broken-hearted milkman, in grief I'm array'd,
Thro' keeping of the company of a young seamstress-maid
Who lived on board-ropes, like horses to keep clean,
In a gentleman's family near Abington Green."

Chorus.

Oh, she was beautiful as a butterfly and as good as a queen,
Was pretty little Polly Perkins of Abington Green."

The ballad relates the hopelessness of the milkman's suit by reason of the lady's pride of his tail-cine:

"Oh the man that has no must have silver and gold,
Must have a chariot to ride in, must be handsome and bold;

His hair must be curly as any watch-spring,
And his whiskers as big as a bunch of standing!"

The final catastrophe introduces a probable friend of the gay young dog-destroyer at a sausage machine:

"In six months she was married, this hard-hearted girl,
But it wasn't a vicar, and it wasn't an Earl,
It wasn't a baronet, 'twas a shoemaker or two more,
'Twas a bow-legged conductor of a one-genny bus!"

In all this kind of song there is a sly vein of satire, which seems to escape the observation of those who deplore that the ballads of Phillis and Chloe have disappeared before those of Sal and Polly Ann. These songs ridicule in the most joyous manner the high-stepping sorrows and romance of the operatic-pastoral divinities, and at the same time gently remind us that Polly down stairs has very much the same humanity as Lady Wilhelmina Dorothea in the parlor. Half of the sentimental ballads that lie upon pianos and are sung "so sweetly" by the domestic prime donne are not half so genuine as this ditty called "Mince-meat:"

"My sweet-heart was not a beauty height,
Nor yet overright a perfect fright;
She was only good to a butcher-maid,
And her name was Polly Ann.
When her unions she parted I could almost cry,
As adoring before her I knelt;
But when she chopped mince-meat at Christmas time,
What tranquil enjoyment I felt!
While her mince-meat knife went
Chop chop chop, chop chop chop, chop chop chop,
Chop chop chop, chop chop chop, chop."

Sometimes the satire is more subtle, as in the Harvard College song of G. Washington, which tells an old story in an entirely new style:

There lived once a planter,
With a son, his only love;
To whom, upon his birthday,
A bran-new axe he giv.

The planter had a garding,
All filled with appel-trees,
Which for the city market
He was trying for to reeze.

The boy he takes the hatchet,
Quite jolly and jocund;
And going to the appel-trees
He chops them to the grund.

The father called his servants
And ranged them in a row;
"Who has chopped down my appel-trees
And killed them root and bow?"

The servants stand amaz'd,
All drawn up in a line;
Then comes a-running up to him
His young and youthful sine.

"I can not tell a lie, pa,"
The youthful boy began;
"Twas I that chopped the appel-trees,
'Twas I, your little san."

Now who, then, was this father,
And who his filial kin?
It was the noble Bushrod,
And young G. Washington.

MORAL.

Then whoso takes a hatchet
And appel-trees chops down,
If he lives long enough will be
A great and pious mown.

There is a breezy fun in this which is delicious, and the moral improvement of young G. Washington's story is not less edifying than that of more solemn versions. Our friend in All the Year Round says that "very many of the popular songs of the present day are destitute of sentiment, destitute of sense, destitute of humor. They are only tolerable because their vulgarly nonsensical words are smothered in pleasing music. We need not search far in order to discover that the public to whom they are addressed tolerate them because they have no choice. One summer's day lately I was present at a bean feast. After dinner when conviviality began, the gay young apprentices favored us with some songs of the Music-Hall class and in the Music-Hall style. They were well received; but when a gentleman present, one of the old school, sang Tom Bowling the greatest enthusiasm was aroused."

Tom Bowling is one of the fine old songs undoubtedly of the sentimental heroic style. Let us hear it still and often. But because of virtue shall there be no cakes and ale? Not less delightful and humorous in its way is the remembrance of dear old Thackeray intoning in his rich, racy voice, and in the truest and best key of the "Cave of Harmony" his delicious ditty:

There were three sailors in Bristol city,
Who took a boat and went to sea.

And first with beef and captain's biscuit
And pickled pork they loaded she.

There was guzzling Jack and gorging Jimmy,
And the youngest he was little Billie.

Now very soon they were so greedy,
They didn't leave not one split pea.

Says guzzling Jack to gorging Jimmy,
"I am extremely hungarie."

Says gorging Jim to guzzling Jacky,
"We've no pervisions, some must eat we."

Says guzzling Jack to gorging Jimmy,
"Oh Jim, what a great big fool ye be!

"There's little Bill which is young and tender, We're old and tough, so let's eat he."

"Oh, Bill, we are going for to kill and eat ye,
So undo the collar of your chimie."

When Bill received this information
He pulled out his handkerchie.

"Oh! let me say my catechism
As my poor mammy taught to me."

"Make haste! make haste!" says guzzling Jacky,
While Jim pulled out his snick-er-snee.

So Billy went up to the main-top-gallant mast,
And down he fell on his bended knee.

He scarce had come to the twelfth commandment,
When up he jumps—"There's land I see!

There's Jerusalem and Madagascar,
And North and South Amerikee:

There's the British fleet a-riding at anchor,
And Admiral Nelson, K.C.B."

And when they came to the Admiral's vessel
He hanged fat Jack and flogged Jimmie.

But as for little Bill, he made him
The Captain of a Seventy-three.

A PLEASANT fact has lately come to our knowledge which, as a just tribute to an American scholar, we are very glad to record. All lovers of good old English poetry know the skill and learning of Professor F. J. Child, of Harvard University, whose monograph upon the language of Chaucer is one of the most thorough and satisfactory works of scholarly research in contemporary literature. Professor Child's edition of the old Ballads is not less admirable, and is accepted by scholars in England as well as here as the standard edition. Now to Professor Child, as to all lovers of the old ballads, it has been long known that the original manuscript of Percy's Reliques had disappeared apparently beyond recovery; and yet the fact which the Bishop mentions, that the ballads were not printed literally from his manuscript, has naturally aroused the liveliest curiosity to know in what respects the original differed from the copy.

It is now nearly a century since the Reliques were published, and the English scholars had abandoned all hope of ever seeing the manuscript. But Professor Child, confident that it was not one of the things which easily perish, made through many correspondents the most strenuous and sagacious inquiries, until at last some trace of the probable possessors among Bishop Percy's descendants was obtained. Tenaciously following the clew, the Professor at last ascertained that the manuscript, in good condition, was still in existence in a remote part of England, and was owned in common by certain members of the family. Establishing communication with them, he finally obtained their assent, for a moderate sum, to a new and exact publication of the work from the manuscript itself. This will be undertaken by the Society for the Restoration of Original Texts; and that Society, composed of the most accomplished men in England in this department, have confided the editorship to Professor Child. The first truly accurate and complete edition of Percy's Reliques will thus be due to the tenacity and accomplishment of an American scholar.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 20th of September. At home the principal events of public interest are confined to movements looking to the coming political campaign.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS.

A "Southern Loyalists' Convention" met at Philadelphia on the 3d of September. The number of delegates was large. Among the prominent names were Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee; Mr. Speed, of Kentucky, late Attorney-General of the United States; Mr. Hamilton, late Provisional Governor of Texas; Governor Boreman, of West Virginia; Thomas L. Durant, of Louisiana. Mr. Speed was appointed Chairman. A Convention of Northern Republicans was assembled in the city, consisting of many prominent men, among whom were Governors Andrew, Morton, Hawley, Ward; Senators Lane, Chandler, Sprague, Wade, Wilson; Generals Butler, Burnside, Garfield, Geary, Schurz; and Frederick Douglas, the colored orator. This body accepted an invitation to join the Southern Convention, and the members took part in its proceedings. The proceedings of the joint Convention were marked by speeches in strong denunciation of the course pursued by President Johnson. This was especially notable in the Address, in which the President was charged with grave political crimes, and in the Resolutions which were passed. Among the Resolutions originally prepared by the Committee was one in favor of universal suffrage for blacks as well as whites; this was withdrawn, in compliance with the wish of the delegates from the Border States. The "Committee on the Unreconstructed States" presented an address, in which universal suffrage was demanded; this was adopted by a large majority, the delegates from these States only voting upon it. This assemblage was in effect rather a mass meeting than a formal Convention. Several members of the Convention have been traveling through the Northern States, making violent speeches in opposition to the Administration.

The "Republican Union" State Convention of New York met at Syracuse on the 3th of September. For Governor Mr. Fenton was nominated by acclamation for re-election, and Colonel Stewart L. Woodford for Lieutenant-Governor. The Resolutions adopted by the Convention are in the main a statement and indorsement of the general line of policy advocated by the majority in Congress in opposition to that of the Administration. The following sentences, extracted and abridged from the Resolutions, embody the most essential principles:

"The Union of the United States is perpetual, and no power exists in the Federal Governments or in the several States rightly to dissolve or destroy it." The right of jurisdiction of the General Government over a State and its inhabitants can not be lost by the rebellion of a State or of its people. But a State may by rebellion "so far in fact rupture its relations to the Union as to suspend its power to exercise the rights and privileges which it possessed under the Constitution." In such case the Federal Government may wage war for its subjection, "using for that purpose all the powers of the laws of war, as recognized by the laws of nations;" and when that end has been accomplished it belongs to the Legislative power of the Government to determine at what time the State may safely resume the exercise of its rights and privileges under the Constitution, "which have been suspended by its own wrong; and the doctrine that such State has kept perfect and unimpaired all its rights and privileges while in rebellion and war, to be used at its option, and is in itself to judge when it is in proper condition to resume their enjoyment, is false and pernicious; and the other doctrine, that the President is alone sole judge of the period when such suspension shall be at an end, and the State permitted to resume its power in the Union, is equally unsound.—The pending Amendment to the Constitution, proposed by Congress... commends itself by its justice, humanity, and moderation to every patriotic heart; and when any of the late insurgent States shall adopt that Amendment such State should at once, by its loyal Representatives, be permitted to resume its place in Congress." The Resolutions further declare, in substance, that the continual absence of ten of the late insurgent States in Congress is a refusal to recognize the change growing out of late events, and that "their claim to enter Congress before that change is acknowledged is a demand that a bloody attempt to dissolve the Union shall be rewarded with increased representation of political power." Another Resolution charges that "the President of the United States, in denouncing as unconstitutionally incompetent the Congress whose authority he has officially recognized, convicts himself of usurpation of power;" and that the massacres at Memphis and New Orleans "should admonish him that his policy encourages a spirit fatal to tranquility, and which indefinitely delays the restoration of the Union."

A Convention of the "National Union" party of New York met at Albany on the 11th of September. This party is composed of those who, irrespective of former political affiliations, propose to support the policy of the President, as opposed to that of Congress, set forth in the action of the Philadelphia Convention of August 14. The Convention was, however, really one of the Democratic party, although there were many members who had formerly acted with the Republican party. The "platform" adopted declares that "the Democratic and National Union electors of the State of New York reaffirm the principles set forth by the Convention held in Philadelphia on the 14th of August last;" and that they hold inviolate the faith of the nation "pledged at various times, and finally by President Johnson in his proclamation of amnesty of May 29, 1865, which fully, lawfully, and finally restored to all the rights and privileges of citizenship the great mass of the people of the Southern States, who in their State Conventions and Legislatures fulfilled every required condition, and who by their delegations in the Philadelphia Convention gave every needful pledge of the sincerity of their renewed acceptance of the issues of the war." Mr. John T. Hoffman, Democrat, now Mayor of the city of New York, was nominated for Governor; and Mr. Robert H. Pruyn, formerly Whig, for Lieutenant-Governor.

The autumn elections thus far held give some indications of the result of the pending political campaign.—In Vermont the whole Republican ticket succeeded by even more than the usual large majority.—In Maine, where some doubts had been entertained as to the result, and where the vote was very full, the Republican candidate for Governor had a majority of about 28,000, a large increase upon the former preponderance; and the party elected its entire list of Members of Congress.—In New Jersey the Legislature being convened in special session, Mr. A. G. Cattell, Republican, was chosen Senator in Congress to fill the seat declared void by the declared irregularity in the election of Mr. Stockton, Democrat; and the Constitutional Amendment proposed by Congress was ratified on the 11th of September, in the House of Assembly by 34 to 24, and in the Senate by 11 to 10. New Jersey is thus the first State to ratify the proposed Amendment.

THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR.

The tour of the President, undertaken ostensibly merely to do honor to the memory of Stephen A. Douglas, assumed in the end the aspect of a political journey, the President taking occasion at almost every point to speak in advocacy of his own policy, and in condemnation of that proposed by Congress. At many places the reception accorded to him was rather that to be expected by a candidate for political favor than that due to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. This tendency was only slightly apparent until after the party had passed beyond the limits of the State of New York, and entered upon the region of the West. The general purport of the President's speeches, which were sometimes brief and sometimes elaborated, was that he had been faithful to the principles held by the party which elected him, and that he had endeavored to carry out the policy inaugurated by President Lincoln, that policy being, in brief, to restore to the Union as soon as possible all the States, with all their rights as such unimpaired. Mr. Seward also spoke frequently, and to the same general purport.

After passing into Ohio some insults were at various places offered to the President, to which he responded in kind. At Detroit the interruption to his speech was marked, and was replied to with extreme sharpness, the President speaking with unusual bitterness of Congress. A strong disposition had in the mean while been manifested to show honor to General Grant and Admiral Farragut. The party reached Chicago on the 5th of September, several disgraceful scenes having occurred at various intermediate points. For example, at Battle Creek the President was met with hootings from a portion of the crowd. He said, as reported, "I know some who have not civility enough to receive a fellow-citizen passing through your town. I know there are some so far lost to duty and propriety that they can not receive a fellow-citizen at their own home. There are some among you who have not respect enough for themselves to hear respectfully the Chief Magistrate of the Nation."

The ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the Douglas Monument was performed on the 6th of September. General John A. Dix pronounced a laudatory oration upon the life and career of Mr. Douglas. The President spoke briefly in praise of Mr. Douglas, but making no definite political allusion. Mr. Seward also spoke, stating that he had been asked to pronounce the oration this day. He had not been able to comply with this request. He was glad that he had declined, and that the task had fallen to the hands of one so capable, and whose oration "would live long after those who heard it had perished, and the corner-stone of the monument had crumbled into dust." He believed that "Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln would live in the memory and homage of mankind equally with the Washingtons and the Hamiltons of the Revolutionary age;" and for himself he asked no higher commendation than that when in future ages mankind "should mark and read the trials of this our beloved country under the administrations of Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson, that they may find that with Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A.

Douglas I was in true association with Ulysses S. Grant and David G. Farragut, and with all the great heroes and all the great statesmen who have given to the American people a new lease of life—a life that I now feel able to defy faction, sedition, and powerful enemies to destroy now or hereafter."

On the 7th the party left for St. Louis. The journey through Illinois was marked by several instances of insult offered to the President, to which he sometimes replied. At St. Louis, on the 8th, the reception was altogether enthusiastic. Here he received an invitation, signed by Mayor Monroe of New Orleans, and many others, requesting him to visit that city, and expressing the thanks of the people for the "consummate ability" with which he had advocated "the permanent reconstruction of the Union and the salvation of constitutional liberty on this continent, at the North as well as the South, so that the Southern Commonwealths may be saved and their people gather affectionately around your august administration, encouraging alike by their councils and support." This invitation was declined. At St. Louis the President made the longest speech which he delivered after leaving New York. He was especially severe upon the action of Congress, dwelling particularly upon the increase of pay which the members had voted to themselves.

St. Louis being the proposed limit of the tour, the party commenced their return on the 10th. At Indianapolis a scene of great tumult occurred, and in the mêlée several persons were wounded by pistol shots and beaten. The Common Council of Cincinnati, by a large majority, refused to tender to the President the hospitalities of the City. A brilliant reception was, however, given by a committee of citizens. The Common Council of Pittsburgh refused to give a formal invitation to the President to visit the place. Mr. McCarthy, the Mayor, wrote in reply to a request to be present: "I should be pleased to assist in doing honor to the Chief Magistrate of the United States if I had a reasonable expectation that he would refrain upon the occasion referred to from stigmatizing those whose views of reconstruction coincide with my own as traitors on the Northern side of the line. The speeches made by Andrew Johnson in other cities will prevent me from believing that he will. I am therefore constrained, by self-respect, to decline your invitation." The speech of the President was interrupted by shouts and cries for Grant and Farragut, and he was unable to finish it. The party returned by way of Harrisburg and Baltimore, where they were warmly received, and arrived at Washington on the 15th of September, the tour having occupied eighteen days.

PRUSSIA AND HER ACQUISITIONS.

The full text of the treaty between Prussia and Austria has been published. It is in effect the same as noted in our Record for October. The treaty between Prussia and Bavaria provides that Bavaria shall pay 20,000,000 florins (about $8,000,000) as indemnity for war expenses; and shall recognize the stipulation of the treaty with Austria; and, in order to rectify the frontier, shall cede certain districts to Prussia. Provision is made for the settlement of custom-house regulations, it being expressly stipulated that the levy of navigation duties on the Rhine shall be suppressed.

The motives and policy of Prussia in making the recent additions to her territory are set forth in a speech by the King in the Chamber of Deputies. He says that the "Governments of the Kingdom of Hanover, the Electorate of Hesse, the Duchy of Nassau, and the Free City of Frankfort, by their participation in the hostile attitude of the late Diet, placed themselves in a state of open war against Prussia;" they declined neutrality and alliance offered by Prussia, and "took an active part in the war of Austria against Prussia," appealing to arms, and the decision has been against them. Political necessity forced Prussia not to restore to these Governments the power of which they had been deprived, for they could, in case their independence was maintained, cause difficulties to the policy and military action of Prussia; hence it was necessary to unite these states with Prussia. The King was aware that only a part of the population of these states shared in the conviction of this necessity; but while he respected the attachment of these people to their ancient dynasties, he believed that they would soon become reconciled to the change. The decree of annexation is brief. It reads:

"(1.) We take for ourselves and our successors, in virtue of Article 55 of the Prussian Constitution, the Governments of the Kingdom of Hanover, the Electorate of Hesse, the Duchy of Nassau, and the Free City of Frankfort.—(2.) The definitive settlement of the relations of those countries with the Prussian territory, according to Article 2 of the Constitution, will be fixed by a special law.—(3.) The Minister of State is charged with the execution of the present measure."

On the 1st of September a deputation from Hanover received an audience from the King of Prussia. By whom this deputation was appointed does not appear; but it consisted of several high official functionaries. Their object was to induce the King of Prussia to forego his determination to annex the kingdom of Hanover. They admitted that the result of the war had decided that Prussia was called upon to become the leading Power of the new Germanic Confederation, and that she must have all the power and authority requisite for "the effective execution of her historic mission." But they urged that for this it was not necessary to destroy the separate political existence of Hanover. They urged that the military authority conceded to Prussia would prevent the possibility that Hanover should ever become "an unreliable neighbor to the crown of Prussia;" and, moreover, if the King of Prussia objected to the present King of Hanover, he was ready to renounce the crown to his son and heir. The question, they thought, was whether it would be better to acquire "two millions of faithful allies or as many unwilling subjects." It could not, they added, be agreeable to the King of Prussia "to dethrone a prince whose dynasty, which has been connected with the country for a thousand years, and who equally wears his crown by the Grace of God," because, taking a different view of Federal law, he considered himself not at liberty to adopt the policy of the Prussian King, and was forced "by an unfortunate concatenation of circumstances" to employ his troops against those of Prussia. They reminded King William that his predecessor had promised faithful support to the father of the King of Hanover, and hoped that he would redeem the promise; thus gaining, "in the irrevocable conquest of many thousands of true and thankful hearts, far more imperishable laurels than the subjection of a weak enemy can ever afford."

The King replied that he appreciated the sentiment of loyalty which had prompted the petition of this deputation; but it could not be granted. He went on to explain the motives by which he was governed. He said that the conduct of the "Band" had been marked by hostility to Prussia; that Hanover especially had maintained an "unfriendly attitude toward Prussia—interrupted almost exclusively during the reign of King Ernest Augustus—by more intimate relations, which, during the political complications of recent years, has often become hostile without any cause being given on the part of Prussia." The conclusion of the whole matter was, that "The most mature examination, all the more painful because of my relationship to the House of Hanover, has induced me to determine upon the annexation as a duty to relieve my Prussia from the heavy sacrifices it has brought, and the probable return of the dangers to be in future apprehended from the unfriendly attitude of Hanover. I trust," concluded the King, "that mutual confidence will ultimately lead to content."

The spokesman of the deputation replied that the King's reply had taken from them "the last hope of the preservation of any sort of independence." This hope had been based mainly upon the anticipation that "the remembrance of the unvarying and faithful devotion of the lamented King Ernest Augustus to the Royal House of Prussia might hold back your Majesty's mighty hand from striking his Majesty's son and grandson from the roll of German Sovereigns. From this day forth," the deputation say in conclusion, "provided your Majesty's determination remains irrevocable, no other resource remains for the loyal and reasonable Hanoverians than the endeavor to convert the bitterness and excitement partially created by the intention of annexation into the sentiment of hopeless resignation to the unavoidable decrees of Providence."

The Emperor Napoleon has issued a circular to the various Governments, of which we have only a telegraphic abstract. He says that the recent changes in Europe are favorable to France; Prussia and Italy are drawn nearer together in ideas and interest; Austria has no hostile intent; the Convention with Rome will be loyally carried out. The navies of the second-class Powers assure the freedom of the Baltic and the Mediterranean. He justifies his offer of mediation between Austria and Prussia and Italy; and intimates the advisability of the annexation of the people having the same language and interests to any of the Powers of Europe. He affirms the necessity of the maintenance by France of a state of perfect military organization, not as a menace, but as a means of securing the lasting peace of Europe.

An insurrection has broken out among the Christian inhabitants of Candia, the ancient Crete, against the Turkish power. This appears to have been suppressed for the moment; but the people have made earnest appeals for succor to the Christian Powers of the world, especially to the United States.

From the La Plata we have accounts up to August 25, which report more fighting, but with no definite result, between the Allies and Paraguay. The secret treaty between Brazil and her Allies has been brought to light. It provides that the present Government of Paraguay shall be overthrown; that the country shall be stripped of arms and munitions of war, the forts on the river destroyed and never rebuilt, and the navigation of the river be free. It also not only strips Paraguay of a considerable tract of territory for the benefit of Brazil, but assigns to the Argentine Confederation a large tract claimed by Bolivia. This treaty has called forth threatening remonstrances from Chili and other South American States.

Editor's Drawer.

A DUTCHMAN at Decatur married a second wife in about a week after the loss of wife No. 1. The Sabbath following the bride asked her lord to take her riding, and was duly "cut up" with the following response: "You tink I ride out mit anoder voman so soon after the death of mine frau? No, no."

OLD Dr. B——, of St. Lawrence County, New York, practiced medicine in the early settlement of the country there, and was noted as well for his kindness of heart as his oddity. Being aroused one stormy night by a man after "the Doctor," he said to his wife, "Now I am too tired to go out. You tell him I am not at home, and if it is very necessary I can go after he is gone." Not without some scruples Mrs. B—— announced to the man that the Doctor was not at home. The fellow then proceeded to tell a most pitiful story, when the Doctor, forgetting every thing but sympathy for the case, sang out: "I guess I'll go, Mary;" and at the top of his voice to the man: "I'll go right along." Mrs. B—— never lied for him after that.

LITTLE Willie Northrup, of Oswego, had been bitten by mosquitoes, while visiting in the country, till his arms were red and swollen. Shortly after his mother called him to the door to see the August sun setting very red and fiery. He looked at it a while and said: "Sketer bit it, mamma!"

THE following comes from Tuolumne County, California:

In your June Number the Drawer tells a good one of a soldier who spoke of General Burnside as an "old synagogue," which reminds me of "another of the same," which we have all laughed over repeatedly. Last fall Jim M—— was the Copperhead candidate for State Senator for this county, and although without the least chance of being elected, the party made a great noise about him, and among the loudest was a half-witted Irishman named John Jackson, who lives in our neighborhood. This Jackson is an inveterate talker, and repudiates Lindley Murray and Noah Webster on every occasion, for, as he says himself, he "niver heard tell on them." So a few days before the election, when nothing but politics was talked of, a Unionist asked Jackson if M—— had any trade, calling, or profession.

"Faix an' he has that," said Jackson, "for whin he lived in Yark State he wuz a dimagog, so he wuz."

"Oh no, not so bad as that," said the other.

"Be me sowl an' he wuz, thin, for he towld me so hisself, so he did."

"You are mistaken," said a third party; "it was 'pedagogue,' not 'demagogue,' which he said."

At this Jackson commenced thinking to himself, and at last said: "Well, it's meself's not jist sure, now, whether it's a dimagog or a padygog he is, but you can bet your pile he's some kind of a gog." And ever since Jim answers to the name of "Old Gog."

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following warning to dead men not to come back by Spiritualism or otherwise, in order to hear what is said about them:

Some years since an eccentric old genius, called

Barns, was employed by a farmer living in a town some six or seven miles westerly from the Penobscot River, Maine, to dig a well. The soil and stratum being mostly of sand, old Barns, after having progressed downward about forty feet, found one morning upon going to work that the well had essentially caved in, and was full nearly to the top. So, having the desire which men have of knowing what will be said of them after they are dead, and no one being yet astir, he concealed himself in a rank growth of burdock by the side of a board fence, near the mouth of the well, having first left his frock and hat upon the windlass over the well. At length, breakfast being ready, a boy was dispatched to call him to his meal, when, lo! and behold! it was seen that Barns was buried in the grave unconsciously dug by his own hands. The alarm was given and the family assembled. It was decided to first eat breakfast, and then send for the coroner, the minister, and his wife and children. Such apathy did not flatter Barns's self-esteem a bit. He waited patiently, determined to hear what would be said and see what was to be seen.

Presently all parties arrived and began "prospecting" the scene of the catastrophe, as people usually do in such cases. At length they drew together to exchange opinions as to what should be done. The minister at once gave it as his opinion that they had better level up the well and let Barns remain; "for," he said, "he is now beyond the temptation of sin, and in the day of judgment it will make no difference whether he is buried five feet under the ground or fifty, for he is bound to come forth in either case." The coroner likewise agreed that it would be a needless expense to his family or the town to disinter him when he was effectually buried, and therefore coincided with the minister. His wife thought that as "he had left his hat and frock it would hardly be worth while to dig him out for the rest of his clothes." And so it was decided to let him remain.

But poor old Barns, who had no breakfast, and was not at all pleased with the result of the inquest, lay quiet until the shades of evening stole over the landscape, when he departed to parts unknown. After remaining incognito for about three years, one morning he suddenly appeared (hatless and frockless as he went) at the door of the old farmer for whom he had agreed to dig the unfortunate well. To say that an avalanche of questions was rained upon him as to his mysterious reappearance, etc., would convey but a feeble idea of the excitement which his bodily presence created. But the old man bore it all quietly, and at length informed them that, finding himself buried, he waited to be dug out again, until all his patience was exhausted, when he sat to work to dig himself out, and only the day before succeeded, for his ideas being very much confused, he had dug very much at random, and instead of coming directly to the surface he came out in the town of Holden, six miles east of the Penobscot River.

No further explanations were asked for by those who were so distressed and sorrowful over his supposed final resting-place.

AN Oregon correspondent sends the following:

In a certain county the Chinamen had learned to know the tax-collector, and paid without suspicion whenever he came round; but knowing that attempts were made to impose upon them, of course regarded every body else as a swindler. An election resulted in another official being chosen, and when he attempted to collect they refused to pay. He was rather peremptory, whereupon they seized him, tied his wrists and ankles together, and, thrusting a pole between them, several of the Celestials lifted the pole, and carrying him thus, as they would a dressed pig, brought their captive up to town and handed him over to the proper authorities, with a self-satisfied "much canine value," conscious of having at the same time rid themselves of an enemy and rendered good service to the community. The pole was such a good one, and was so unflinchingly kept alive by the friends of the victim, that the poor fellow was obliged, in self-defense, to resign his office and quit the neighborhood.

THE readers of the Drawer no doubt remember the sad catastrophe of the Von-Phul, a Mississippi steamer, that snagged and went down on "Yazoo Cut-off," below "Milliken's Bend." On board the ill-fated boat was a detachment of the Tenth Missouri Cavalry, half of whom were drowned, together with two-thirds of the cabin passengers. We were at the scene of the accident within half an hour after its occurrence, and sent out our "gig" and "jaws" to pick up survivors. Among others saved was an Irishman, a member of the Tenth, whom we found floating on a piece of "bulk-head," as naked as when born, with the exception of a "Colt's army revolver" and a sabre belt buckled tightly around him. When asked why he considered himself with his "arms," he responded, in true Irish style: "Do you suppose I'd be payin' forty dollars for another pistil?" The reader will better appreciate it when informed that the price of a "Colt's army" was but twenty dollars, but from frequent sales of the weapon by enlisted men who were "hard up," forty dollars were charged on the muster-roll to the delinquent.

A LITTLE gentleman of the Hebrew persuasion, doing business in Philadelphia, and knowing as little of machinery as a man can well know, was compelled to go to the water-cooler one of those hot days in July for a glass of ice-water. The faucet was one that opened with a screw thread. Joseph turned the screw, and soon had the glass running over with the cooling draught, for having entirely withdrawn the screw he became confused, and failed, after several attempts, to stop the copious supply. After calling in vain upon each of the young men to come to his aid—for they were convulsed with laughter—a new idea seemed to strike our Hebrew friend. He caught the cooler in his arms and turned it bottom up, at the same time dropping the glass and its contents. The new position was no improvement on the first, for of course the lid came off, and out went ice and ice-water, thoroughly saturating the nice linen suit of our unfortunate, and of course the situation brought down the house, aided by our friend's impatient exclamation: "What for you laugh? You think I still laugh, von you do think? Not!"

FROM ISRAEL: sends the two following:

There lives in one of our towns a man who sometimes becomes so much intoxicated as to be unable to walk. He owns a large dog, which has the reputation of being a savage animal. One evening this individual having finished so freely as to be unable to walk, some of his neighbors kindly carried him to his residence. As they approached his house they heard the deep growls of the dog, and hesitated to go on, at which the drunken man roused up and exclaimed: "You needn't be afraid; he knows my step!"

YEARS ago two sons of the well-known Jacob Barker, Abram and Sigourney, were on a shooting expedition off the "Glen." Abram, who was about nine years old, had the helm; and Sigourney, even in hand, stood near by. Suddenly the boom flew over, and striking Sigourney knocked him into the water. As Abram assisted his brother into the boat, he exclaimed: "Never mind, Sig; if you didn't shoot you got a duck!"

WE have heard of the man who was so stingy that he put green soggles upon his horse and fed him on shavings, and we have heard of many other instances of meanness, but this one beats them all, we think:

At a school in Connecticut there was a janitor who took care of the school buildings, and he also kept boarders. One of the boarders owed him $20, and as a receipt for $20 it ever requires a two-cent stamp, the man gave the boy a receipt for $10.00, and gave him back one penny, thus losing one cent. If anybody can beat that of meanness let's hear of it.

A TRAVELER writes: "While in Buffalo, a few days ago, I got on board the 1 o'clock express for New York. Just as I had taken my seat a woman accosted me with: 'Where can I get a stamp?' I answered I couldn't tell her. 'But I must have one,' says she; 'my ticket'—showing me the ticket—'says, 'and good unless stamped by conductor,' and I have no stamp." The remainder of the passengers immediately began to snigger, and the woman took her seat quite indignant.

At the great fire in Magueyuan, Porto Rico, on the 24th May last, the crew of the United States steamer Albatross acted very nobly in extinguishing the flames, and of course the islanders were very grateful for the assistance, and piled upon the weary sailors refreshments of all kinds. Liquor was plentiful, and one of the crew, a native of the Emerald Isle, became so helplessly intoxicated as to be taken to the landing in a wheelbarrow. As the way down the hill of the "malshien" partially aroused him, when he inquired:

"What is the matter? and where are you taking me?"

"We're taking you to the grave-yard to bury you, you're dead."

"When did I die, there?"

"Last night at the fire."

"Oh, I am! then let me see the grave before I'm buried!"

In the course of the Tariff debate, in the House of Representatives, the following attempt was made to relieve the dullness by a bit of song:

Mr. Ross moved to increase the duty on apples, garden fruit, and vegetables from 10 to 30 per cent.

Mr. Thayer, of Pennsylvania, suggested that if the gentleman's amendment included "small potatoes" he might as for it. [Laughter.]

The Philadelphia Age remarks upon this that it is the first instance on record of a member of Congress proposing a tax upon himself!

The joke is old, but good. A good many years ago, when General Cass was a leader among Democrats, and consequently an object of dislike to the Whigs, it was moved in the Legislature of a Western State to bestow the name of Cass on a new county. A Whig, meaning to be sarcastic, rose and moved as an amendment that the first letter of the proposed name be struck out! The laugh was on his side hugely until the Democrat retorted that he might not have any objection, but that it was very unusual for a member to rise and propose that a county in the State should be named after himself! and then the other side had the laugh.

DEAR DRAWER,—Allow me to send you an apothecary's joke, which happened in our store the other night. A little girl entered and asked me "if I had any thing for a good sour stomach?" The laughter that greeted this request was immense.

ANOTHER: A little friend of mine, aged about three years, whose name is Nellie, had a present of a big doll. She called at our house one day with the doll enveloped in a number of blankets, and we asked her what was the matter with "dolly." "Oh, she sick." "What is the matter with dolly?" we asked. "Oh, I think she wants to be laid!" We immediately collapsed and were disinfected.

WE leave it for our readers to guess where the good lady can live of whom a friend writes as follows:

A day or two after the successful laying of the Atlantic Cable, while selling goods to a lady from the country, I thought it would be news to her to inform her of the fact; and accordingly told her that Mr. Field had laid the cable across the Atlantic all right. She looked at me, and innocently remarked: "What did they lay it across for?" My desire for giving further information was entirely gone.

It is related of Rev. Mr. Robin, of F——, that he once entered a store and bought, among other things, some eggs. One of the by-standers observing him put them in his pocket, told him to be careful not to sit on them. "Yes," said the divine; "but did you never know a robin to sit on hen's eggs without hurting them?"

SOME experiences of a new clerk are contributed to the Drawer by one of his friends:

A new firm recently set up business in our town as grocers and dry-goods merchants. The senior partner took his son (an eighteen-year-old boy) in as clerk. This was a new thing for John, and he had much to learn relative to his new position. On one occasion a woman came in and inquired if they had any scarlet-green. After having looked over the goods he informed her that they were just out, but would have some more in a few days.

At another time a lady came into the store and asked for cotton thread, No. 40. After examining several spools John came to one No. 46, when he addressed the purchaser as follows: "Here's one only six yards more, and I'll give it to you for the same price."

DEAR DRAWER,—It is a long time since "any thing of mine" has found its way into the Drawer. Here are two incidents relating to Oregon lads, some way below their teens. One of them is by my second son, and the other by that of a near neighbor and dear friend. To begin with the latter: This frolicsome urchin, like Socrates, is distinguished for asking questions. At the table he sat opposite his grandfather, who before eating always said grace. Observing the old gentleman's deliberate utterances as he bent his head forward and cast his eyes upon the table, the grandson asked: "Grandpa, do you read that off the table-cloth?"

THE second arose in this way: In the long days of June the boy was allowed to go across the river into the wood-country and gather wild strawberries. He returned quite successful; and as we consumed the delicious fruit after the regular course my young hopeful, feeling proud of his first foray upon the world, asked me if I had ever gathered wild strawberries when a little boy like him. I answered "No." and excused my want of adventure or enterprise by adding that "I was not allowed to go so far from home when a child." With a look compounded of incredulity and fun, he quickly answered: "I guess you didn't know the way."

THE Pine-Tree State sends the three following:

In one of the sea-port towns resides Uncle George P——, whose ready humor ever furnishes a fitting reply to any one of high or low degree. Late one fall Uncle George was plying his vocation of shipwright for a citizen who required all the hours of labor the daylight would admit. Coming tardily to work one morning he was accosted by the employer with, "George, this is a little late; you know the days are very short now." "Yes, yes," was the reply, "and the nights are mere nothings!"

DURING a severe storm a raft of choice lumber was broken up by wind and sea, and driven up the harbor, where a large portion was stranded on the shores belonging to a citizen who was new to the locality, and perhaps unacquainted with the laws and customs relating to estrays of the kind. Straightway he applied his beasts of burden to the prize, and having hauled it into his field betook himself to his noonday refreshment. Meantime the proprietor of the lumber appeared with his men, and in a short time had the material in the form of a raft, which they were propelling through the water when the owner of the land appeared upon the bank. Surprised at the turn affairs had taken he paced the strand for a while, and then raised his voice. "Mr. P——," said he. "what is the custom here regarding lumber that comes to a man's shore?" "Well," said P——, applying himself vigorously to his setting-pole, "the custom appears to be to steal it!"

WHEN Colonel J—— ran for Congress in this District, some eight years since, the vote was exceedingly close. On the night of election the Colonel's friends were assembled anxiously awaiting a telegraphic dispatch from a few distant towns that would determine the result. It so chanced that a dealer in fish had sent a cargo of his commodity to Boston, with instructions to the captain to telegraph when his freight was discharged. There was a confusion of dispatches at the telegraph-office, so that when the message was opened and read at headquarters the astonished listeners heard these words: "Dear Sir, your fish are landed!" And, sure enough, the returns, when they came in less questionable shape, showed the Colonel's fish to be high and dry. But the country lost the services of one of the clearest heads and best-informed commercial minds in the State. It may be added that the honest fish-monger was a good deal surprised, and not a little alarmed, to read in his dispatch that there was an attempt to send him to Congress.

A BUFFALONIAN sends the following:

Some time since the wife of one of our adopted citizens came to the office of the Assessor of this District for the purpose of making a return of income for her husband, he being out of the city at the time. She was directed to the desk of the Assistant-Assessor for her Division—who, by-the-way, is quite an elderly gentleman, an ex-Supervisor, and a great favorite in the office. The officer referred to propounded to her the usual questions and received the usual answers, which he recorded on the return (in dollars and cents), and upon deducting the amount exempt by law, discovered that the gentleman referred to was not liable. He thereupon handed the document to the fair one, saying: "Please sign that, Madam; Murphy has nothing to pay." But you can imagine his astonishment when he read in the place of the signature the words:

"Murphy has nothing to pay!"

A WASHINGTON correspondent of the Drawer writes:

I have a little brother who was last winter somewhat hard of hearing, which caused several amusing mistakes. One day I went with a friend and my little brother "Sam" to the St. Aloysius Church to hear the music, which is very fine. During the service Sam, with ears and eyes wide open, saw and heard every thing. When the incense-bearers came out he asked me what it was, and on being informed was quiet. Upon reaching home he gave a minute and graphic description of what he saw, and wound up by saying: "And two little boys were standing by the priest swinging nonsense around!"

DEAR DRAWER,—As a great many of those who search through your pages for entertainment are ruralists, the following incident may not be out of place, and also prove interesting to many, particularly those who so well remember the old horse "Ben," with his white face, dignified carriage, and steady trot, so repeatedly performed on the most popular avenue leading from Cincinnati, for ten successive years. Ben was known the country over for his faithfulness, instinct, and affection (particularly for his oats). We bought Ben out of a dray, and in him found a treasure unknown. He had a wonderfully sagacious head; never seemed to forget his groom, or any stopping-place on the road where there was good water—particularly at the Mill Creek House, for here he seemed to know his driver could always be regaled with the cool beverage, and always insisted on stopping. Ben lived with us for ten long years, making him nineteen years old, when it was suddenly concluded that he might die on our hands, and after a little discussion it was resolved to sell him to "an honest Dutchman," who lived some ten miles away, for the sum of fifty dollars. This was done four years since, and all remembrance of old Ben had passed from memory, when lo! a few mornings ago, bright and early, Ben's best friend thought she saw him coming down the road. We all laughed at such an impossibility, when soon a loud and familiar nickering was heard. And sure enough, there stood the faithful old horse, with his head over the front gate, looking straight up at the house, evidently calling for his old friends. This was after an absence of four years, making him now in his twenty-fourth year. A rush was made to let him in the gate and give him welcome; and it was a wonderful sight to watch his conduct. He deliberately walked along the carriage-way, stopped at his old watering-bucket, taking a survey of all things, then proceeded up past the house on toward the barn, and directly into the old stall, where he had lived so long. Of course he was given the freedom of the place. But during the day his owner came for him, and we all took an affectionate farewell of old Ben. This incident shows the wonderful sagacity of the horse, and proves that kind treatment is not easily forgotten even by dumb animals.

THE article entitled "Newspaperiana," in the August Number of the Magazine, reminds me of the following editorial effusion which appeared some years ago in connection with the announcement:

MARRIED.—Mr. Ebenezer Sweet to Miss Jane Lemmons.

How happily entwined do meet.

In Jane and Ebenezer:

She's no longer seen, but sweet.

And he's a lemon-squeezer!"

FEELING a special interest in the good things of the Drawer, and particularly some of those contributed by brother soldiers, I send you what I call a good one:

Being in one of the Western hospitals I met an old acquaintance, Pat Brady. Pat was one of those patriotic Irishmen, of which we had so many, that responded to the first call for troops. He was very loth to go into the hospital, and always willing to do a "good turn for his counthree." But a fever got hold of Pat and brought him to death's door—in fact, he was supposed to have already entered, and was carried to the dead-house. The guard, upon going in shortly after, saw Pat in a sitting posture on the bench that he had been laid out on only a short time before. In great surprise the guard asked what Pat was there for? "It's wathin transportation to the grave I am!" was the doleful reply.

FROM the very far West we have a number of good things. Let us have more from the same source and the same pen:

Did you ever hear of Y——, in ——? He was a pompous little fellow, and practiced law there. Judge R—— was Justice of the Peace, and detested Y——. On one occasion court was in session when Y—— bustled in and addressed the Judge: "Your Honor, is there any thing before the Court?" Judge R—— leaned back in his chair and included his questioner in one glance, then replied, slowly: "Yes, Mr. Y——, there's a thing before the Court." Y—— came again: "Your Honor is disposed to be facetious; I meant was there any thing of importance before the Court?" "The thing, Mr. Y——," said his Honor, gravely, "is of no importance whatever!" Y—— subsided.

DEAR DRAWER,—We have a volunteer cavalry organization of many years' standing in the city of P——, called the First City Troop. It has had, and still has many honored and worthy names on its roll, and we take a just pride in its handsome and soldierly appearance. The uniform is showy, the lower limbs being encased in spotless buckskin breeches and cavalry boots. Some time ago we had a public ceremonial, or reception, in which this troop led the line, and as it was passing our house, and we were clustered about the windows watching the pageant, one of the youngsters asked, "What soldiers are these?" "The First City troop," we replied; "don't you admire them?" "Well, I don't know," was the reply, glancing with a critical eye down the file of plump buckskins bestriding the saddles; "they look to me as if they had been melted and poured into their trowers!"

"LARRY," said a coquettish young lady to her cousin, prematurely bald, "why is your head like heaven?" "Don't know, I'm sure," replied the swell; "unless, indeed, because it has a shining crown." "Good, but not correct. Because there is no more dying or parting there!"

GOOD Deacon Tupper lived in the town of J—, in one of the lower counties of Maine. He belonged to the Baptist denomination, and took great delight in attending the annual meetings of their association. Here he met the ministers and delegated brethren from all the churches in the district, and there was a happy reunion. But most of all did he enjoy the good things prepared on these occasions to feast upon. On his return, at one time, one of his neighbors meeting him accosted him with: "Well, Deacon, did you have a good time at the Association?" "Oh yes; look here! do you see—God bless you, yes! glorious! glorious! Oh what pullings!"

THE band of the 4th Artillery is justly celebrated for the excellence of its music. The present head-quarters of the regiment is at Fort M'Henry, Maryland. The daily evening concerts are a most delightful entertainment to the residents of the post and visitors from the city. A few evenings since some friends of the Colonel commanding visiting the post were being regaled with very choice selections of music, when the Colonel, being desirous to know the name of a particular piece which had just been played, sent his orderly, one George, a sergeant of colored troops, to inquire. Being told by Professor Spittichi, the leader, that it was a selection from the opera of "Nebuchadnezzar," George returned and complaisantly informed the Colonel it was a selection from "de opera of Next-door-neighbor!"

GENERAL J. M. TUTTLE, of Second Iowa memory, tells a good story with as much vigor as he manifested in "moving upon the enemy's works" at Fort Donelson. Of the many good things in his reminiscences of army life is the following:

The General, while in command of a division at Shiloh, had in his command an inveterate old bohemian bummer, whom we will call B—, and who got maudlin on every possible occasion. The General, in going the rounds on inspection-day, found B—, for perhaps the fiftieth time, undergoing the usual punishment for drunkenness—lashed to the fifth wheel of the caisson. The day was intensely hot; B— lashed as aforesaid at an angle of 45°, gazing intently into the muzzle of a 6-pounder which pointed directly toward him. The General, on discovering "the situation," hailed him:

"Hello, B—! what are you doing there?"

B—, with as much dignity as it was possible to muster, having in view the surroundings, replied, in a deep, tragic voice: "General, I am seeking the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth!" It is perhaps needless to add that B— was immediately released.

DEAR DRAWER,—I have a friend whose name is Frost, and he has a little son, three years old, whom all the family acquaintances call "Jack Frost."

Now Jack is a right smart little fellow, and had often heard his father and others talk about the butcher killing the little innocent calves for people to eat, and Jack thought this cruel, and so he used to be on the look-out for every wagon that appeared, lest it should be the butcher after his calf. But one day when the man went out to milk Jack followed, and the man had not been long at his duty before he heard Jack crying at a furious rate, and upon going to him he found him lying on the barn-floor in great distress. He explained his situation by saying that he thought "if a man could milk a cow a boy could milk a calf," and having tried the experiment he got kicked heels over head. Jack ran to the house and told his father what had happened, closing with the remark that "he did not care how quick the butcher came and got that calf!"

WAY up in California a friend who receives the Magazine writes:

DEAR DRAWER,—I send a draft for at least part of my indebtedness to you for the many side-splitters which I have enjoyed since I have been reading the Magazine, which has been about five years.

The good folks of this far-off country are addicted to something more than digging gold—yea, even to getting married. And such was the case in the family of Colonel P—, not long since, when his daughter, in the presence of a large and select company, was joined in the holy bonds of matrimony to a Mr. Cannon. Now let it be understood that the Colonel likes a joke about as well as any man living, and as soon as the ceremony was over he arose and thus addressed the company: "I have seen double-barreled pistols, double-barreled shot-guns, and even double-barreled rifles; but," said he, pointing to the happy pair, "this is the first time in my life that I ever saw a double-barreled cannon!"

THE following comes from very near the Canada line, and was perhaps as fearful to the subject of the story as the great Fenian scare was to the Canucks:

A few years ago some efforts were made to convert the people of Ireland to Protestantism. Missionaries went abroad to collect funds for that object; tracts, books, etc., were supplied, and the missionaries started on their errand. One of the missionaries, while traveling through Ireland, called at the cabin of an Irishman, and asked "if the man of the house was in?" Patrick, jumping up from his low seat, quickly replied, "I'm the man, your Honor!" "Patrick, I have some very good books and papers I desire to leave you, but with the understanding that you will not let any one have them only your family till I return." "Never a one will see them, your Honor, but Biddy and the children." Not long after the departure of the missionary the parish priest, hearing of the affair, repaired to the house of Patrick, and accosted him as follows: "Patrick, I am told you have some books, tracts, etc., and I wish to see them." "I have, your rivrance, and very nice ones they are indeed, but I told the gentleman that I would not let any one see them but Biddy and the children until he returned, and sure your riverance would not have me tell a lie." "If you do not give me up those books, Patrick," replied the priest, "I will turn you into a rat!" The priest immediately departed, supposing the terror of being turned into a rat would induce Patrick to give up the books. Patrick did not do so, however; but, calling Biddy, he sighingly said: "Biddy, haven't I always loved you and our dear children dearly?" "You have, Patrick; and why do you ask these questions?" "Oh, Biddy, it's all day wid me now; the priest has jist gone, and I will have two little ears on me, hair all over me back, and a great long tail sticking out of me; and, if you have any love for your dear husband, for God's sake kill all the cats about the place!"

A TRAVELER gives a cool bit of his experience for the readers of the Drawer:

I was returning from New Orleans the other day on one of those magnificent steamers of the Morgan line. The sea was calm as a lake, the weather delightful, and we were progressing at the rate of about fourteen knots an hour. The delightful weather and smooth sea brought all the passengers together at dinner. Near me sat a long, lank, green-looking specimen of the genus homo, sub-genus rusticus, and directly opposite Rusticus sat Colonel G——, of Texas. Rusticus devoured all the eatables within reach of his lengthy arms in an incredibly short space of time, then reaching over, he seized Colonel G——'s glass of water, and it disappeared at one gulp, whereupon Colonel G—— remarked: "Stranger, that's decidedly cool." Upon which the stranger, smiling pleasantly, replied: "Yes; guess it had ice in it."

Had there chanced to be a ship within a hundred miles the passengers thereon would doubtless have been terrified at the explosion.

WHEN Beriah Magollin was Governor of Kentucky J. H. Johnson was editing the Frankfort Commonwealth. Although violently opposed in politics, the Governor was personally a great favorite with the editor, and vice versa. While the Legislature was in session a New York man stopped at the Capitol Hotel, and in due time became fashionably drunk. He was anxious to become acquainted with the Governor. The Governor happened to be in No. 20, with various Senators and Representatives, and New York finding it out, besought divers persons to introduce him; but seeing his condition, all declined. He finally asked Mr. Johnson to do him that favor. "Certainly; come with me. Governor, allow, etc., Mr. —, who will represent the State of New York in the coming tobacco fair." The usual civilities having been passed, New York, steadying himself upon his heels, took a long, inebriated stare at the Governor, and abruptly waddled out of the room.

"Jake," said the Governor, turning to Johnson, "don't you think your friend was a leetle too drunk to be introduced to me to-night?"

"Not at all, Governor. If he hadn't been so drunk he never would have sought an introduction."

A FEW days since we accompanied some friends who were making a pilgrimage to the "graves of their ancestors," in a stroll through an old burial-ground in "ye ancient citie" of Middletown, Connecticut; and while they were engaged, apparently, in the usual solemn meditation upon such of the virtues as a century or more had left still legible upon the stones, we amused ourselves in deciphering some of the literary eccentricities among the inscriptions. Here are a few of those worthy of repetition:

Upon a stone dated "1682:"

"Beneathe thys stonne
Death's pris'ner lyes;
The stonne shalle move,
The pris'ner ryse."

Another, dated "1691:"

"Here lyes our Deaconne Hall,
Whoe studyd peace with alle,
Was upprighte inne hys lyfe,
Veide of malygnante stryfe.
Gonne toe hys restte,
Doubtlesse hys goode
Works wylle hym followe."

Two, dated "1711" and "1807," tell the same story:

"A loving wife
And tender mother
T' enjoy the other."

Another takes up the lament after this fashion:

"Beautiful flower of Middletown!
How art thou cutted down! cutted down!"

One of "1753" gives this brief bit of family history:

"This lovely, pleasant child—
He was our only one,
Altho' we've buried three before—
Two daughters and a son."

And a rare instance of juvenile precocity is recorded in the following:

"Sacred to the Memory of Charley and Varley,
Sons of loving parents who died in infancy."

LINES

TO HER WHO CAN BEST UNDERSTAND THEM.

I've wooed thee by starlight, by moonlight, by day;
I've wooed thee with sweetmeats and fragrant bouquet;
I've wooed thee in sonnet, in passionate rhyme;
I've wooed thee with music, oh! many a time.

I've coaxed thee with kisses (of sugar, of course);
I've coaxed thee in carriage, and too upon horse;
I've coaxed thee in railway, and too in street cars,
Imploing the aid of fair Pallas and Mars.

I ask'd for your hand, and you gave me your shoe—
I ask'd, for you had some good bank-stock I knew;
I ask'd for your kerchief, for ah! I was smitten;
I ask'd for your gloves, and you gave me the mitten.

DEAR DRAWER,—I find some amusing anecdotes on milking cows in the last Number of Harper's. I shall tell one which I think will amuse many. We had in our employ some time ago a Frenchman whose knowledge of the English language was rather limited, but who nevertheless was never at a loss to express himself. He had occasion to go to a relative of mine in the country, at which place a younger brother of mine was staying. On his return I asked him was my brother making himself useful on the farm? His reply was: "Oh yes; he can now pull down ze milk from ze cow!"

THEY use decided language and express their opinions freely in Texas, if the following is a fair sample:

A few days since a conversation took place, not many miles from here, which I consider is too good to be kept: Lieutenant—— presented his accounts to the Paymaster—who, by-the-way, was in a bad temper—who, after examining them for a few seconds, assumed as fierce an expression as possible, and in a thundering voice exclaimed, "Do you think, Sir, I am a fool?" "I don't know," said the Lieutenant, with the greatest composure; "but I've heard some people say you was!" It is perhaps needless to add that the accounts were paid without further discussion.

THE three following are from one who always reads the Drawer, and does not forget to contribute a few odds and ends occasionally:

Two Irishmen and myself occupied the same room. I found them asleep one Sunday afternoon, and returning to the room again soon after I found Patrick by himself snoring away at a great rate. I awoke him, with the remark that he had a fine nap. "Yes," said he; "the only thing I remember is Johnny [the room-mate] getting up and leaving without me knowing any thing about it!"

LAST fall, on the train from Indianapolis to Lafayette, I fell in conversation with a discharged soldier and his North Carolina bride. In answer to my question how she liked Hoosierdom, she replied: "Why, just as soon as we crossed the Ohiers I saw that the climate got to be much leveler!"

ONE day, on our trip to Atlanta with General Sherman, two teamsters belonging to different trains got into a big fuss. The day was a dark, gloomy, miserable one, and it appeared to me that they had saved up all their "cuss words" for use on just such a day as that. One of them was a loud-mouthed fellow, who, having elaborated some thousand or so of his seventeen-syllabled imprecations to the other, had stopped to rest, when the other exclaimed: "Shut up your mouth, or the sun will warp your ribs!"

DEAR DRAWER,—Your contents affording me much pleasure at home and abroad, I thought I would try and repay, in part, by stating the facts in reference to a friend who formerly was subject to fits of absence of mind. Ed F—— had courted, proposed, and was soon to lead Miss J—— to the altar. One evening, shortly before their marriage, he had made an engagement to go with her to spend the evening. To appear properly before her he thought it necessary to don a clean shirt. So, in his usual systematic way, he laid a nicely-ironed one out, ready to put on as soon as the other parts of his toilet had been completed. He was soon ready to assume this most useful article, when, much to his dismay, it was not to be found! He looked every where that he could possibly think of, he swore, and he stamped, but all of no avail. Finally, after sundry evolutions around the room, he came in front of a large looking-glass, and was greatly surprised to find the shirt (which he had been hunting for) hanging in graceful folds upon what was supposed to be (from the reflection) himself! He says since he got married he has never put his shirt on and then gone to look in his trunk for it.

A RECTOR of the Episcopal Church has picked up the following scraps and sends them to the Drawer:

In the town of J——, in Western New York, a sign hangs suspended from the front of a saloon, facing the Erie Canal, bearing the following inscription:

"This gate keeps high
And hinders none;
Refresh and pay,
And then pass on."

One of my parishioners gave me something similar, which is conspicuously displayed on a black-board with white chalk, in a village of New Hampshire:

"Call and eat and drink with me,
And very welcome you shall be—
For the money, though, mind ye."

The last line is the saving clause.

COUSIN CHARLEY is the most precocious youngster that it was ever my lot to know. Last summer he and his little sister paid me a visit at my farm in Orange County. One day when I was taking them out for a drive a robin red-breast flew past and alighted on a fence near at hand.

"Oh, what a beautiful little bird!" exclaimed Jennie.

"Yes," I said; "but it's a very naughty bird; it eats up all the cherries."

"What is its name?" asked Jennie.

Charley, who had been listening attentively to what had been said, turned toward me with a self-satisfied expression on his little face and shouted out: "I know; it's cherry pec(k)toral; isn't it, cousin?"

We think this too good to be lost:

Do you know Colonel Jack Hines of North Carolina? If you don't I do, and I intend to give the Drawer some knowledge of him. Jack was a valiant Colonel in the Confederate service, and fought bravely through the whole war. What he fought for he was never able exactly to discover; but Jack was happy, and would sometimes imbibe a little of the ardent, just to please surrounding friends. Upon one occasion, Jack being somewhat replenished, sat half asleep in a chair at the village tavern. General Williams entered, and soon got into an argument with Colonel Jack about the results of the late war, claiming that the South ought to have been victorious, as it was always admitted that one Southern man was equal to five full-bred Yankees. "You are right, General [hiccup]; you are right—just exactly right, I reckon [hiccup]: one Southern man is equal to five [hiccup] Yankees. You always said that [hiccup], and I am just the man to prove that you are [hiccup] right. Now, General, you see, if our people had staid in Congress it would have taken the Y-Y-Yankees, with all their population and wealth, at least twenty years to have freed the [hiccup] niggers; and even then we would have obliged them to pay for them their full value in good solid gold; but, you see [hiccup], General, we took hold of the matter, and have freed the darkeys in just about four years, and haven't got a cent for them either. You were right, General—you were right. Ah, don't go! Well, if you will, good-morning!"

THERE lives in the city of L——, in the State of Kansas, a middle-aged gentleman, Colonel ——. The Colonel has been a Captain in the Regular Army, was a soldier in the Mexican War, and a Colonel in the Volunteer service during the late rebellion. He is now an attorney-at-law in the city of L——, and is a good lawyer, highly respected, and liberally patronized. The Colonel loves to tell yarns, and loves to tell none better than those connected with his own exploits. Out of many others I select the following as deserving a place in the Drawer:

"During the Mexican War," the Colonel says, "I was one day ordered to carry dispatches from General Scott's head-quarters to General ——'s head-quarters, at a distant part of the field. My way led right through the enemy's country, but the General thought that by being cautious there would be little danger. I had got about half-way on my journey when, turning a sharp point in the road, I came right upon seventeen Mexicans, mounted and armed to the teeth. I thought I was in for it, but remembered just then that the Mexicans always shut their eyes before shooting. I was on my guard. The Mexicans all drew up their pieces at once. I watched until I saw their eyes shut; then I knew what was coming. I stooped down; the bullets passed over my head; I rushed into their midst; and in ten seconds had killed the whole seventeen with my sabre. Fact, sure as Gospel, I did it."

Who but Harry Gilmor could match such an exploit?

At our school-feast, writes the Superintendent, every body had exhibited a tolerable appetite, but one boy had eaten to repletion, so that when I saw him suddenly turn very pale, and attempt to rise from the table, I began to fear that he had made himself ill.

"What's the matter, my good boy?" inquired I, while a sympathizing throng of philanthropic ladies, who had been acting as waiters upon the company, gathered around the sufferer. "Do you feel unwell?"

"My stomach aches, Sir," replied the boy, with great distinctness.

"Dear me!" said I, almost suffocated with my endeavors to repress laughter; "don't you think you had better go home?"

"No, no, Sir," replied the lad, with determination. "It will ache a precious sight more afore I he done me him!"

And I am bound to say that he did not submit to the threatened dictation, but devoured two slices of cold pudding in addition to his previous supplies, as well as an enormous hunch of bread and cheese.

DEAR DRAWER,—In early life I was elected to the office of Inspector of Common Schools in a town not a thousand miles from the head of Cayuga Lake. In the discharge of my official duties I was once visiting a school in the centre of the town, said to be superior to all others in my jurisdiction, when, bestowing my attention upon the specimens of penmanship submitted to me, I saw one the copy of which was this:

"Whatever is is right, says the Pope."

Writing was taught in those days by the teacher writing in a fair hand and with his best grace some short sentence like the above, excepting the last three words. This short sentence was called the copy, and this the pupil was to imitate, or write after, to the best of his ability. How often has my writing-book had "Many men of many minds," or "Command you may your mind from play," or some other profound proposition, with each word arrayed upon a page in martial order, and in exact rank and file arrangement, as copies!

"Well, Mr. Editor, in this instance, anxious to do my duty, I whispered to the man with the birch and ferule my profound conviction that the copy was calculated to implant in the mind of the hopeful young scholar an untruth not warranted in history, and the idea thence shooting forth would be erroneous, and perhaps an exposition of ignorance damaging both him and his teacher, for, whatever might be the opinion of the world in regard to the ethics of the question, I doubted that the Pope had ever said any thing of the kind.

"What, Mr. Inspector, du you go for tu say the Pope—him as burnt John Rogers at the stake—didn't say that are?"

"Yes, I say it."

"Wa'al, now, I can prove it to your eyes."

"Do so."

I saw victory and triumph in every feature. "Now, Mr. Inspector, you jest be generous and just. You wouldn't give me a certifikit to teach this 'ere school last fall jest 'cause I miss'd a single question; now if I am right in this 'ere, and can prove it in a book, will you give me one?"

"I will, indeed."

"Honor bright?"

"Honor bright."

"Malvina Ann Terry, come right here tu onst and bring yer English Reader with ye. I s'pose the English Reader is good enough proof, ain't it?"

"Any book will do."

Malvina Ann Terry was duly informed of the dispute, and bidden to open it at an extract from Pope's Essay on Man, and there I read:

"In spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,

One truth is clear, whatever is is right."

POPE.

"Will ye give it up now—will ye give it up now, Mr. Inspector? Ha! ha! ha! Oh, I was sartin I had ye. You college-larnt folks don't know every thing yet. I'll jest drop in to-night, and you be sure to have my certifikit ready; and jest look here, I say; don't you tell I couldn't git a certifikit of ye, and I won't tell a single word nor nothin' else about your mistake here to-day. Nor Malvina Ann won't tell neither, 'cause she's a little sweet on me, and I'm a little mite sweet on her. You're a rising young doctor, and I'm a rising young schoolmaster, and so, you see, we can be friends."

What could I do but say nothing? Nine-tenths of that community would have believed me vanquished by the schoolmaster. By-the-by, I found before a day had passed that Malvina Ann Terry was very "sweet" on the schoolmaster, for I heard her telling her mother (I had a room at her father's) that the schoolmaster had proved to her entire satisfaction, out of her English Reader, that the Doctor was a very ignorant, pretentious person—in fact, no better than he should be.

OUR little four-year-old Carrie went with her aunt to a revival meeting. The preacher was very earnest in his delivery, and she was very much interested. "Mother," said she, when she came home, "I have heard such a smart minister—he stamped, and pounded, and made such a noise! and, by-and-by, he got so mad he came out of the pulpit and shook his fists at the folks, and there wasn't any body dared to go up and fight him!"
